Mr. C. E. RAWLINS said, when he looked around the platform, he missed the presence of one man on the present occasion whose name had always been associated with human progress and improvement—he meant Mr. Rathbone. A note, however, had been received from him that afternoon, saying that a prior engagement of long standing had prevented him from having the pleasure of attending the meeting (hear, hear). Mr. Rawlins then proceeded to read the report, a voluminous and interesting document, containing an able sketch of the history of the course of Free Trade during the last year of success and triumph. We have only room for the following extracts:

"The year 1845, the fourth of the existence of the Anti-Monopoly Association, and the seventh of that of the Anti-Corn-Law League, has been distinguished by a progress more than usually rapid in the attainment of the object which has united us together, namely perfect freedom of trade.

"In alluding to this result we, as the council of your association, have endeavoured faithfully to exercise the trust you reposed in us, to the fullest extent of our power.

"In addition to the ordinary means of agitation, by the distribution of tracts, and the assembling of public meetings, we undertook, in March last, the care of the registers for the borough, the Liverpool polling district for South Lancashire, and the Birkdale and Birkenhead districts for South Lancashire; and we have also been in communication with the Council of the League, relative to voters having qualifications in other districts or counties, but residing in our own.

"Finding that the purity of the register greatly depended on the thorough honesty of the men who were returned to serve in a public office, we issued an address to our fellow-townsmen last Easter, entreating them only to elect men who would faithfully administer their trust, without using it for the benefit of any political party or class. This call was at once responded to, and the result of the poll was the triumph of our candidates. A further object ought to be made this year, to place the voters on an equality with respect to parties. More than this we neither ask nor desire.

"The results of our registration labours have been very successful.

"Borough Register.—We have made a thorough revision of the borough register, and by objecting to a large number of bad votes, dead votes, and false & duplicate votes (a work which received the approval of the revising barrister), we have ensured that in every decision upon an election shall be in accordance with the unbiassed opinions of the community at large, on the subject of Free Trade.

"County Register.—SOUTH LANCASHIRE.—We have improved the district of South Lancashire, by placing on the list 43 new electors, 39 of whom were induced to purchase qualifications in shares. All these names were objected to by the magistrates' party, and struck off by the revising barrister. We were equally successful, however, against his decision to that of the Court of Common Pleas. The court not only restored the names, but Chief Justice Tindal characterised the desire for qualifying as a county elector, by a bona fide investment of property, as highly commendable. The same efforts have been made in other districts of the county with equal success. We have thus secured the return of our townsman William Brown, Esq., and the Hon. C. P. Villiers, by a working majority of 3000 votes.

"SOUTH CHESHIRE.—For the Birkenhead polling district we placed on the present register 109 voters, and are in possession of 344 claims for next register, of whom 244 qualified by share property at our instigation. The total number of Free Trade claims now ready for the coming register on the whole division, is upwards of one thousand, which will render the county perfectly safe on a contest after next December.

"In both counties we successfully objected to a large number of spurious votes.

"During the past year our members have very greatly increased. In 1842 they numbered 340; in 1843, 271; 1844, 404; and in 1845, 595.

"We have to regret the retirement of Thos. Thornely, Esq., by his own special wish, from the responsible office of president, which he has filled from the commencement of the association. He has, however, consented to act as one of the vice-presidents, should the numbers continue to desire his services. Our thanks are due to Mr. Thornely for the attention which he has invariably given to the interests of the association, and his consistent advocacy of it, both in and out of Parliament.

"It is hardly to be regretted that so bold and comprehensive an association, as that proposed by Sir Robert Peel, should be defeated, in the execution of a still lingering prejudice in favour of the sliding scale. It is opposed to his experience of the sliding scale of 1828, which he altered because it did not accommodate itself to the wants of the community, and to that also of his own scale of 1842, which, as Sidney Herbert confessed, 'would not slide,' when it was required. It is inconsistent with all the Premier's own convictions in favour of entire freedom of trade; and, above all, it is unjustifiable in the prospect, to which no one can be blind, than Sir Robert Peel himself, of an impending scarcity of food. Alluding to the destruction of the potato crop in Ireland, he declared, 'that at an early period of the autumn he was of opinion that it was impossible to meet the emergency without a suspension of the duties of corn and provisions. On the 17th Nov. he said, that the evil was unchecked, and that it was fast spreading itself among the people. Mr. Peel's own desire of provision, as I the difficulty to be met was to deal with the evil, without waiting its further progress. Subsequent information has confirmed his worst fears, and he looks forward to the month of May with the greatest apprehension. And yet, in the face of an impending famine among large tracts of the people the year, which deficiency of seed potatoes, or a decay in those preserved, may probably render a still more extensive, he proposes a law, which must have the effect of limiting the supply of food, or at all events, of augmenting its price. In plain words, he proposes to tax the food of the people, and to increase, in some parts, actually suffering starvation. And this is the evidence of his desire, without favour or undue partiality, to suggest that which is just—to terminate that conflict which all must regret, and to remove the cause of the social and sectional divisions between different classes—not to increase pauperism—and, is conclusive to the spread of morality, by diminishing those temptations to crime which arise from poverty and distress—can that law be just,' which has a tendency to limit the abundance of food, on which these blessings depend; and which will be productive of appalling evils in proportion as it effects its own object? If this scheme of a new sliding scale be not abandoned now, and if one-half the evils which may fairly be anticipated should arise, we believe it cannot survive the three years of its destined existence. Like a kindred measure of compromise with injustice—the apprenticeship system in the abolition of negro slavery—it will assuredly be annihilated by the indignant voice of the people.

"What the agricultural interest (meaning those by the real cultivators of the soil) have really most to fear, is a day in the final settlement of this question. There will be no adjustment of rents and leases while the change is in process. All the disadvantages of a sudden repeal are thus insured to the farmer, without any of its corresponding advantages to himself or the community. The evil may not be felt during 1846, because security throughout Europe, preventing under any circumstances extensive importation, may prevent its operation. But during 1847, stocks of foreign corn, prevented by the sliding scale from gradual importation, will, in all probability, accumulate in foreign ports, and, on the sudden fall of duty in 1849, be poured on the market, unannouncedly lowering the price, to the great injury of the English producer.

"On these two grounds, then, first, injustice to the consumer by the continued imposition of a duty for three years longer on the importation of food, unjust under any circumstances, but more essentially so in the face of impending scarcity; and, secondly, that protracted repeal, especially when accompanied by a sliding scale, will be a serious injury to the home producer—we must express our strong disapproval of this part of Sir R. Peel's scheme.

"On the motion that the house should go into committee on the measure, Mr. Miles, M.P. for East Somerset, moved a direct negative; but, after three weeks' debate, the amendment has been lost by a majority of 97 votes.

"When in committee, Mr. Villiers moved his amendment for the total and immediate repeal; but the peculiar circumstances induced many strong advocates for this mode of settlement to vote against him, lest it might endanger Sir R. Peel's measure in its subsequent stages.

"Seventy-eight members, however, have asserted the principle, which, in its simple unity and justice, has been the secret of the success of the League. But, failing this, they have now determined to give their strenuous support to the Ministerial measure—a determination to which we accord our most unqualified approval.

"National revolutions have generally been bought with the price of blood; they have too often resulted only in the substitution of one despotism for another; they have almost always been confined, in their effects, to a single country. We are on the eve of a revolution precisely the reverse. It has been peaceful in its operation; it will be world-wide in its blessings. All honour be to the League that has prepared us for the change. This League was born in contempt—it rose, amidst sneers and contumely, into popular favour—it has triumphed amidst the acclamations of its once most violent opponents. We must agree with those who look upon the past existence of the League as an evil, only justified by a still greater one. It may be, that gentle and peaceful agitation is as necessary to the salubrity of the political atmosphere as that of the material world; nay, that its severest storms have the same utility in the economy of the one as of the other. If so, the League has proved not an evil, but a good. It is certain that it has used its vast influence for high and noble purposes. In all respects it has been an intellectual agitation. Its magnificent bazaar, rightly considered, have been expositions of the triumph of mind over matter. Its tracts and lectures have embodied the soundest doctrines of moral and political science. With the knowledge of the true principles of international intercourse, it has infused an intense love of international peace. It has awakened the most generous emotions of the national heart. If it has curbed the power of the aristocracy, it has purified the press, and exalted the people. On every suitable occasion it has repudiated the doctrine of physical force. It was not the League, but a minister of the Crown, who, while acknowledging that its agitation was 'not of force, but of reason,' said, that if reason were not yielded to, 'some day force might be added.' The League has never for a moment lost sight of the efficacy of its weapons of the justice of its cause. And when it has fulfilled its mission—when its mighty organisation shall have ceased to exist with the enormous wrong which called it into being, the names of its leaders—no less wise than powerful—Colcland and Bright, and Wilson and Villiers—will long be remembered as benefactors to their country and mankind."

Mr. Rawlins concluded by moving the adoption of the report.

Mr. J. T. CROOK, one of the treasurers, said their worthy secretary had moved that the valuable document just read be adopted by that meeting, as the report of the council of the Anti-Monopoly Association, and it gave him great pleasure to second the proposition that it be printed and distributed amongst the members, for he was fully convinced that a document of that nature would be instructive to the world. He hoped, however, that they would allow him to include in it the treasurer's accounts, as being highly important also. It was well they should be published, because, though the League might be dissolved after the Corn Laws were totally repealed, the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association remained until Free Trade in everything was obtained (loud cheers). Mr. Crook then read an abstract of the accounts, from which it appeared that the balance in hand was only £2. 3s. 9d.

The motion was then put and carried unanimously.

Mr. Thos. BOLTON moved the thanks of the meeting to the council of the association. In doing so, he congratulated the meeting on the prospect of Free Trade in corn. He much regretted that anything in the shape of a sliding scale should be extended for three years, and should have wished instead of that, something like a permanent duty of 4s. (No, no). He believed that Sir Robert Peel could not have carried on his Government had he tried for total and immediate repeal. Lord John Russell himself could not form a Government with any chance of carrying such a measure; he would never have been able to secure such a majority as Sir Robert Peel had gained for his—97; and they must all agree that Sir Robert had proposed the most liberal measure he could get his party to consent to adopt; and when all could not be got that was wanted, it was best to take the next best thing they could get. For his own part, he thought that a very small fixed duty would be necessary upon wheat, if only to pay the landing waiters' charges (cries of "no, no; no duty whatever.") Mr. Bolton then took a short review of the corn trade since the year 1815, and again reminded the meeting that if all things were admitted free of duty, the expenses of Government could not be paid (cries of "Put a direct tax upon property." Much cheering.) He would just remind them that an inquiry was going on before Parliament as to the charges upon landed property, and there was one thing he should like to learn from that inquiry, and that was, why the people of England should pay 40 per cent. more for their food than the people of other parts of the world (loud cheers)?

Mr. D. MATHER seconded the motion, and he hoped the meeting would direct their serious attention to that part of the report which had been read to them, with reference to the repeal of the Corn Laws. He would remind them that it was not a total repeal they were going to have, neither total nor immediate; and he hoped they would never cease to agitate the question until they succeeded in getting the total and immediate repeal. They must not think of being satisfied with a sliding scale, or even a sliding duty (cheers) for so long as that one sliding scale and one sliding duty, and that some future minister would raise it to two shillings, and another might make it three. Suppose the Duke of Richmond were to come in to-morrow, what would he not do? He urged them to go for total and immediate repeal. They could register cotton and other articles without a duty, and what matter if they were not registered, so that they had plenty to put into their bellies, what was the use of registering it (laughter and cheers). As to the sliding scale, it was all sliding nonsense (laughter). The Premier and all the Ministers had been converted, because the people were going to be starved, and yet they clapped on a duty of 10s. to 11s. That was like knocking their own heads on the wall. He could not see the use of their proposing anything of the kind. Sir Robert Peel had ample means of passing the measure if he chose. He was delighted to find Mr. Colcland and Lord Morpeth had voted for the total repeal. Lord J. Russell had objected to it because he thought it would put Ministers in a fix; but Lord Morpeth did not think so. He was the man who would stand by them, but they could not put the slightest trust in Lord John Russell (cheers).

The CHAIRMAN said that, as they had elected him to the office of President for the next year, he would endeavour to discharge his duty faithfully; but unless the Council were sustained with large funds, he was afraid they would not be able to get on so satisfactorily as might be wished (hear).

Mr. LAWRENCE HILWORTH proposed the next resolution, which was to the effect, that while they steadily adhered to their object of total and immediate repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws, and of all differential duties, and on this occasion renewed their determination never to dissolve their association until protective duties were annihilated, they nevertheless approved of the policy which induced Mr. Villiers and the 78 members who voted with him, after failing in their endeavour to carry into effect their great principle in the House of Commons, to give their hearty support to the modified but still comprehensive measure proposed by Sir R. Peel.

Mr. RICHARD SHEIL seconded the motion.

The CHAIRMAN begged to make one observation. He thought, from the remarks made by several of his friends, that they did not sufficiently understand the embarrassing position in which the Premier now stood. He had a difficult position to sustain. He was, as he (the Chairman) believed, as honest a Free Trader and as much disposed for total and immediate repeal as any man could be (cheers). But he also believed that it was a matter of policy on his part to frame his measure as he had framed it, in order that he might have a reasonable hope of getting it through the House of Lords; and unless he had so framed it, he would have had no hope of carrying it through at all. He appealed to the meeting, as men of business and reflection, whether it was not better to sustain the measure Sir Robert Peel had brought forward, than to be thrown into two years' further agitation (hear)? With this view he hoped that on every proper occasion they would express themselves firmly and resolutely, and sustain the measure of Sir R. Peel until they got it fairly through the House of Lords (hear, hear).

Mr. C. E. RAWLINS reminded the meeting that Mr. Bolton was the first mayor of Liverpool who thought it consistent with the duties of his office to call a town's meeting at such a time and such a place as would suit the convenience of the working classes of this town (hear).

Thanks were voted to the Chairman, and the meeting broke up, after giving three cheers for Free Trade.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

PARIENTE v. LUCKETT.

Mr. Wellsby for the Appellant; Mr. Grove for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—I think the information derived by the overseers is to be thrown overboard. What the overseers thought proper to say—indeed, what they came forward to say, though they came forward as a body corporate, is of little weight, for a few overseers are not to be listened to when we are explaining a written instrument. We are to give that written instrument a reasonable construction, and not by considering any other instrument of the same nature. When there was a column following the first name, that was to be filled up with the following name. It seems to me, certainly, that this construction must follow, that you must supply the name of Joshua Pariente as it appears in the preceding column. You find the numbers two and three in the margin, and Haynes's name and Pariente's name are put in the same subject-matter of rating; there must have, therefore, been some sense in Pariente's name being put there. It must have had some meaning, and I conceive it could have had no other than that of supplying the blank in the column in the same way as Haynes's name, and applying it to the same subject-matter to which they are both rated. Therefore they ought to be restored.

Mr. JUSTICE MAULE.—With respect to the first rate, it is conceded that the person rated has done all to enable him to come within the 30th section of the 2d William IV, chapter 45. That section gives this benefit to the claimant upon his doing all that is required without anything being done in compliance with it. Then with respect to the subsequent rates, the question is, whether the claimant is rated? That is to be decided by looking at the rate, without looking to anything that was said by one of the overseers; for the overseers said they put his name on the rate in consequence of his claim, but without any intention to rate him for anything. They might have done all they did without any intention to rate him; they might have had an intention to do as much, and he would have no right to complain against them for not doing what they had done; yet they might have had no intention to confer any franchise which he wished to have. Whatever their intention was, they have done their duty when they might not have had an intention to do it. It is lucky for them to have done what they did, though they might have had an intention of omitting to do what they were bound to do, though it was done foro conscientia; they may have this consolation, they have not done the mischief they intended to do. The opinion of a witness with respect to what is the proper effect of a written instrument, is clearly admissible; and it seems to me the whole thing is otherwise beyond doubt, for the construction of the document is very plain. The barrister seems to have been actuated by an anxiety to do justice between the parties, and has done something he ought not to have done.

The rest of the court concurred. Decision reversed.

J. at Publishr,
MR. CORDEN'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Friday, February 27th, 1846.—Revised. Price One Penny, 16
Pages.
MR. BRIGHT'S SPEECH in the House of Commons
on Tuesday Night, Feb. 17. Price One Penny.
MR. GIBSON'S SPEECH in the House of Commons
on Monday Night, Feb. 16. Price One Penny.

Leagu Office, 67, Fleet-street, London; J. Gadsby, Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Where may be had,
THE GOATCRE MEETING.

Just published, price One Penny, or 5s. per 100,

A VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATCRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.

Sold at the Leagu Office, 67, Fleet-street, London; and by J. Gadsby, Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Upwards of 100,000 copies have been printed.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By Miss MARTINEAU. Written
expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.

"The getting up is superb: equal to any specimen of typographical art
that ever met our eyes."—Scintilla.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. MARCET. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By Earl DECK, Messrs. VILLIERS, CORDEN, PRIOR, GIBSON,
O'CONNELL, M'CULLAGH, BAINES, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

*Jessop, T. and Sons, Pond Works	..	50	0	0
*A Friend, per Edward Smith	..	20	0	0
*Drabble and Sanderson, Spring-street	..	10	0	0
*Birks, Thomas, Pond-street	..	10	0	0
*Anti, Curry	..	10	0	0
*Parker, S. and Son, Broom Grove	..	10	0	0
*Thompson, Corden, M.D., Norfolk-st.	..	10	0	0
*Appleby, Charles, The Mount	..	8	0	0
*Wall, James, The Hills	..	5	0	0
*Hutton, W. and Son, High-street	..	5	0	0
*Hawthornth, J. W., Arundel-street	..	5	0	0
*Leader, R., jun., Independent Office	..	5	0	0
*Nanson, E. and J., Bridge-street	..	5	0	0
*Peace, Charles, Eagle Works	..	5	0	0
*Spear, Messrs. & Jackson, Saville Works	..	5	0	0
*Mappin, Josh., Norfolk-street	..	5	0	0
*Wostenholm, G., Rockingham-street	..	5	0	0
*Walker and Wall, Exchange-street	..	5	0	0
*Carr, John, Paradise-square	..	5	0	0
*Stevenson, J., Allen-street	..	3	0	0
*Smith, Wm., jun., Bank-street	..	2	2	0
*Frith, Peter, Arundel-street	..	2	0	0
*Leader, Robert, Pitmoor	..	2	0	0
*Ashton, Richard, South-street	..	2	0	0
*Hobson, Josh., Arundel-street	..	2	0	0
*Hoebuck, Jonathan, Saville-street	..	2	0	0
*Roberts and Mettman, Barker Pool	..	2	0	0
*A Friend, Townhead-street	..	1	0	0
*Moore, Samuel, Woodside	..	1	0	0
*Ballans, J. N., Angel-street	..	1	0	0
*Frost, Samuel, Broad-lane	..	1	0	0
*Liddell, E., Bank-street	..	1	0	0
*Brookes, W. and Son, Rockingham-st.	..	1	0	0
*Davenport, Brothers, 12, Rockingham-st.	..	1	0	0
*Thompson, E., Union-street	..	1	0	0
*Merritt and Roberts, Duke-street	..	1	0	0
*Atkin, Henry, Howard-street	..	1	0	0
*Lingley, J. and Sons, Wicker	..	1	0	0
*Parker and Linley, Union-street	..	1	0	0
*Wilks, T. and Co., Eagle Foundry, Park	..	1	0	0
*Parkes, David, Charles-street	..	1	0	0
*Brown, James, Division-street	..	1	0	0
*Smith, Josephus, 14, South-street	..	1	0	0
*Steer, W., Castle Fields	..	1	0	0
*Hall, J., 31, High-street	..	1	0	0
*Darby, John, 10, Cavendish-street	..	1	0	0
*Turner, John, Harvest-lane	..	0	8	5
*Innocent, John, Campo-lane	..	0	5	0
*Omixon	..	0	5	0
*Ashmore, James, South-street	..	0	5	0
*Oakes, H., do	..	0	5	0
*Dalson, G., Wellington-street	..	0	5	0
*J. B.	..	0	5	0
*Cadman, John, South-street	..	0	4	0
*Hall, S., Bright-street	..	0	4	0
*Morforth, J. at S. Frost's, Broad-lane	..	0	4	0
*Smith, H., Occupation-road	..	0	4	0
*Taylor, Brothers, Burnt-tree-lane	..	0	3	0
*Davy, J. S., Bridgehouses	..	0	2	6
*Ryalls, John, do	..	0	2	6
*Beckett, Alfred, Osborne-street	..	0	2	6
*Hoyle and Goddard, do	..	0	2	6
*Raynor, J., Harvey-lane	..	0	2	6
*Oakes, M., do	..	0	2	6
*A Friend to the League	..	0	2	6
*Wheelhouse, J., Occupation-road	..	0	2	6
*Mason, W., Campo-lane	..	0	2	6
*Symmons, S., do	..	0	2	6
*Greenwood, C., do	..	0	2	6
*Wright, David, do	..	0	2	6
*Copley, R., do	..	0	2	6
*A Friend, Townhead-street	..	0	2	6
*A Friend, South-street	..	0	2	6
*Walton, David, do	..	0	2	6
*W. B., Wellington-street	..	0	2	6
*Goddall, W. A., South-street	..	0	2	0
*Atkinson, C., do	..	0	2	0
*Small Sums	..	0	6	6

Sheffield.

Leeds.

Kirkcaldy & vicinity.

	*Lupton, Arthur, North-street	..	50	0	0
	*Hammond, Messrs., and Son, Lowfold	..	20	0	0
	*Taylor, Messrs., Wordsworth and Co., Holbeck, near	..	20	0	0
	*Austin, Joseph, Albion-street	..	10	0	0
	*Scholefield, Wm. Mill-hill	..	8	0	0
	*King, Edward, Albion-street	..	5	0	0
	*Heycock, Edwin, Park-square	..	5	0	0
	*Newton, Messrs., and Taylor, Water-ls	..	5	0	0
	*Herries, Robert, East-street	..	2	2	0
	*Wickstead, Rev. Chas., Blenheim-square	..	2	2	0
	*Dickinson, R. C., Cookridge-street	..	2	2	0
	*Dickinson, T. S., do	..	2	2	0
	*Hetherington and Thompson, Steander	..	2	2	0
	*Foster, Messrs., and Dary, Hunslet	..	2	0	0
Leeds.	*Asquith, W., Bagby	..	1	1	0
	*Collett, Messrs. & Brown, Basinghall-st	..	1	1	0
	*Bro, Joseph, St. Paul's-street	..	1	1	0
	*England, G. W., Commercial-street	..	1	1	0
	*Mortimer, Messrs. and Co., Mortimer-st	..	1	1	0
	*Neil, John, Dock-street	..	1	1	0
	*Kirk, John, Meadow-lane	..	1	1	0
	*Wood, John, Colbourn-street	..	1	1	0
	*Smith, John, 16, Briggate	..	1	1	0
	*Parkinson, J. spirit merchant, Yeadon, nr	..	1	0	0
	*Parkinson, Thomas, do	..	1	0	0
	*Bley, Joseph, Bentham Park	..	1	0	0
	*Gault, Jonas, and Son, Wortley, near	..	1	0	0
	*Gilston, James, Briggate	..	1	0	0
		*Scates, Rev. Thomas, York-place	..	0	10
	*Napier, Jacob, Elmwood-terrace	..	0	10	0
	*Fergus, J.	80	0	0
	*Swan, P. D.	40	0	0
	*Aytoun, James	20	0	0
	*Anderson, George	20	0	0
	*Laudale, David	20	0	0
	*Russell, Alexander, and Son	20	0	0
	*Lockhart, Nisiam, and Sons	15	0	0
	*Hutchison, Robert, and Co.	10	0	0
	*Bowie, James, of Balbie	10	0	0
	*Russell, William, and Co.	10	0	0
	*McDonald, Archibald	5	5	0
	*Wotherspoon, William, and Son	4	0	0
	*Beveridge, Mrs. George, Dysart	4	0	0
	*Heron, Robert, and Co.	3	0	0
	*Greig, Peter	3	0	0
	*Melie, Thomas, and Sons	3	0	0
	*Ireland, James, and Co.	2	0	0
	*Ray, T. and J.	2	0	0
Kirkcaldy & vicinity.	*Sharp, James	2	0	0
	*Henderson, D. W.	2	0	0
	*Lornie, John	1	0	0
	*Anderson, John	1	0	0
	*Russell, John, spirit dealer	1	0	0
	*Anderson, Thomas	1	0	0
	*Henderson, Robert	1	0	0
	*Stenhouse, Andrew	1	0	0
	Galloway, James, Baker-st., Clairtown	..	0	10	0
	Smith, John	..	0	8	0
	Williams, Andrew, Lochty Bleachfield	..	0	5	0
	Rigney, Martin	0	1	0
	Gow, Alexander	0	4	0
	Kinnmonth, William	0	4	0
	Smith, Philip	0	4	0
	Hutchison, Alexander	0	4	0
	Smith, Mrs.	0	4	0
	Ferguson, John	0	4	0
	Stewart, Robert	0	4	0
	Whyte, Thomas	0	4	0
	Hutchings, W.	0	2	0

General near Leeds.	*Burnley, Thomas	10	0	0
	*Thornton, Benjamin	10	0	0
	*Bewthorpe, Wm. and Sons	10	0	0
	*Sawley, J. and E. and Co.	6	0	0
	*Hoskins, William	5	0	0
	*Hoskins, J. and F. Birkenshaw, near	5	0	0
	*Hoskins, Fish and Co.	4	0	0
	*Hoskins, J. and F. Birkenshaw, near	2	0	0
	*Hoskins, Birkenshaw and Co.	1	4	0
	*Hoskins, J. and F. Birkenshaw, near	1	0	0
Kilnburn, in the town-ship of Lockwood, &c.	*Taylor, Joshua	1	0	0
	*Hoskins, John and Son	1	0	0
	*Johnston, Josiah	1	0	0
	*Hoskins, Thomas	0	10	0
	*A Friend, per Wm. Crowther	0	8	0
	*Hoskins, Samuel	0	8	0
	*Hoskins, Thomas	0	4	0
	*Smith, Josiah	0	4	0
	*Ellis, Benjamin	0	4	0
	*Steele, John	0	4	0
Barnsley District.	*Kershaw, Samuel	0	4	0
	*Hoskins, Henry, Birkenshaw, near	0	4	0
	*Sandilands	0	6	0
	*Sutton, J. Messrs. J. and Son	1	4	0
	*Senior, Matthew and Sons	1	4	0
	*Sutton, J. William, jun.	1	0	0
	*Sutton, J. Messrs. John and Son	1	0	0
	*Sutton, J. William, sen.	0	12	0
	*Sutton, J. Jeremiah	0	12	0
	*Walker, James	0	12	0
Boston.	*Sutton, J. George	0	6	0
	*Sutton, J. John, jun.	0	6	0
	*Oddy, Chris., sen.	0	6	0
	*Sutton, J. Samuel	0	4	0
	*Ritchards, John	0	4	0
	*Barby, John	0	4	0
	*An Enemy to Monopoly, per Mr. Harvey	2	0	0
	*Hindle, W. James	1	0	0
	*Jubb, George, Thurgoland	1	0	0
	*Poles, William, Wentworth	1	0	0
Ricardo, Ralph, and Sons, Champion Hill, Camberwell	*Biran, B.	0	10	0
	*Beardshall, W., jun.	0	10	0
	*Cooper, Henry	0	8	0
	*Henderson, Joseph	0	6	0
	*Moore, Francis	0	5	0
	*Steele, Erasmus, jun.	0	5	0
	*Benson, John	0	5	0
	*Hart, Charles	0	5	0
	*Hart, John	0	5	0
	*Mann, James	0	5	0
St. James's, London.	*Helding, Francis	0	5	0
	*Jackson, Josiah	0	5	0
	*Cooper, Henry	0	5	0
	*Green, Thomas	0	4	0
	*Baldwin, Joseph	0	4	0
	*Bark, W.	0	2	6
	*Sandilands	0	4	0
	*Stevenson, Robert	1	0	0
	*Gibson, John, South-place	1	0	0
	*Darby, C. H., High-street	1	0	0
St. James's, London.	*Morrison, John, Market-place	1	0	0
	*Howdon, W., engineer	1	0	0
	*Baker, W., Worgate	0	10	0
	*Sharp, T., Witham Town	0	5	0
	*Smith, J., fellmonger	0	5	0
	*Whitson, A.	0	2	6
	*Mouna n, H., musician	0	2	6
	*Ricardo, Ralph, and Sons, Champion Hill, Camberwell	20	0	0
	*Baker, G., 4, 10, 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, 46, 48, 50, 52, 54, 56, 58, 60, 62, 64, 66, 68, 70, 72, 74, 76, 78, 80, 82, 84, 86, 88, 90, 92, 94, 96, 98, 100, 102, 104, 106, 108, 110, 112, 114, 116, 118, 120, 122, 124, 126, 128, 130, 132, 134, 136, 138, 140, 142, 144, 146, 148, 150, 152, 154, 156, 158, 160, 162, 164, 166, 168, 170, 172, 174, 176, 178, 180, 182, 184, 186, 188, 190, 192, 194, 196, 198, 200, 202, 204, 206, 208, 210, 212, 214, 216, 218, 220, 222, 224, 226, 228, 230, 232, 234, 236, 238, 240, 242, 244, 246, 248, 250, 252, 254, 256, 258, 260, 262, 264, 266, 268, 270, 272, 274, 276, 278, 280, 282, 284, 286, 288, 290, 292, 294, 296, 298, 300, 302, 304, 306, 308, 310, 312, 314, 316, 318, 320, 322, 324, 326, 328, 330, 332, 334, 336, 338, 340, 342, 344, 346, 348, 350, 352, 354, 356, 358, 360, 362, 364, 366, 368, 370, 372, 374, 376, 378, 380, 382, 384, 386, 388, 390, 392, 394, 396, 398, 400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 410, 412, 414, 416, 418, 420, 422, 424, 426, 428, 430, 432, 434, 436, 438, 440, 442, 444, 446, 448, 450, 452, 454, 456, 458, 460, 462, 464, 466, 468, 470, 472, 474, 476, 478, 480, 482, 484, 486, 488, 490, 492, 494, 496, 498, 500, 502, 504, 506, 508, 510, 512, 514, 516, 518, 520, 522, 524, 526, 528, 530, 532, 534, 536, 538, 540, 542, 544, 546, 548, 550, 552, 554, 556, 558, 560, 562, 564, 566, 568, 570, 572, 574, 576, 578, 580, 582, 584, 586, 588, 590, 592, 594, 596, 598, 600, 602, 604, 606, 608, 610, 612, 614, 616, 618, 620, 622, 624, 626, 628, 630, 632, 634, 636, 638, 640, 642, 644, 646, 648, 650, 652, 654, 656, 658, 660, 662, 664, 666, 668, 670, 672, 674, 676, 678, 680, 682, 684, 686, 688, 690, 692, 694, 696, 698, 700, 702, 704, 706, 708, 710, 712, 714, 716, 718, 720, 722, 724, 726, 728, 730, 732, 734, 736, 738, 740, 742, 744, 746, 748, 750, 752, 754, 756, 758, 760, 762, 764, 766, 768, 770, 772, 774, 776, 778, 780, 782, 784, 786, 788, 790, 792, 794, 796, 798, 800, 802, 804, 806, 808, 810, 812, 814, 816, 818, 820, 822, 824, 826, 828, 830, 832, 834, 836, 838, 840, 842, 844, 846, 848, 850, 852, 854, 856, 858, 860, 862, 864, 866, 868, 870, 872, 874, 876, 878, 880, 882, 884, 886, 888, 890, 892, 894, 896, 898, 900, 902, 904, 906, 908, 910, 912, 914, 916, 918, 920, 922, 924, 926, 928, 930, 932, 934, 936, 938, 940, 942, 944, 946, 948, 950, 952, 954, 956, 958, 960, 962, 964, 966, 968, 970, 972, 974, 976, 978, 980, 982, 984, 986, 988, 990, 992, 994, 996, 998, 1000

George Thomas	£250	0	0
Joseph Eaton	250	0	0
Edward Thomas	250	0	0
William Tohill	250	0	0
Edward Kidd	100	0	0
Nash and Co.	100	0	0
James Clark	100	0	0
Thomas Sanders	100	0	0
William D. Willis	100	0	0
H. O. Willis	100	0	0
J. S. Fry and Sons	100	0	0
Alfred Thomas	100	0	0
Charles Tohill and Co.	50	0	0
Robert Bruce	50	0	0
James Jenkins	50	0	0
Harman Visger	50	0	0
S. P. Jackson	50	0	0
Samuel Long and Sons	50	0	0
Thomas Frupp and Thomas	50	0	0
Barnes, Staples, and Co.	50	0	0
A Friend, per G. Thomas	50	0	0
George Jones	50	0	0
Wm. Terrell and Sons	50	0	0
Robert Charleton	25	0	0
W. H. Somerton	25	0	0
Francis Tuckett	25	0	0
Philip D. Tuckett	25	0	0
Joseph Rake	25	0	0
Daniel Wheeler	25	0	0
John B. Estlin	25	0	0
James Hall	21	0	0
A Friend per G. Thomas	10	0	0
A Friend	10	0	0
William Butler	10	0	0
Joseph Reynolds	£30	0	0
Thomas Reynolds	25	0	0
Henry Tuckett	25	0	0
Thomas Rankin & Son	25	0	0
Received since the Meeting.
T. and H. J. Mills	£10	0	0
William Knowles	5	0	0
Thomas Bale	2	10	0

LEICESTER SUBSCRIPTIONS.

The following gentlemen have signified their intention of subscribing the amounts which appear attached to their respective names:

£	s.	£	s.
Riehl, Harris and Sons	500	0	0
John Biggs and Sons	500	0	0
T. Stokes and Nephews	200	0	0
Brewin and Whetstone	200	0	0
Joseph Fielding	100	0	0
J. Ellis and Son	100	0	0
Whetstone and Gittens	50	0	0
D. Orange and Co.	50	0	0
N. Corah and Sons	50	0	0
Charles Billson	50	0	0
Thomas Biggs	50	0	0
Alfred Burgess	50	0	0
Stone and Paget	50	0	0
N. Westermann	50	0	0
R. Carter and Son	50	0	0
Joseph Underwood	50	0	0
R. Marston and Co.	50	0	0
Frisby and Chawner	50	0	0
C. Bedells and Co.	50	0	0
Thos. Sunderland	25	0	0
Fielding and Hay	25	0	0
Hull and Shenton	25	0	0
John Baines	25	0	0
R. and G. Toller	25	0	0
Jos. Cripps	25	0	0
Higgins and Coleman	20	0	0
T. Sargeant and Sons	20	0	0
W. K. Eames	20	0	0
Rev. G. Legge, LL.D.	10	10	0
E. Newton	10	0	0
Hiffe and Breward	10	0	0
William Bates	10	0	0
Rev. C. Berry	10	0	0
Mr. Clarkson	10	0	0
Charles Bowmer	10	0	0
J. and J. Harvey	10	0	0
T. and W. Archer	10	0	0
Joseph Swain	5	0	0
T. Thompson and Son	5	0	0
J. Burton and G. Small	5	0	0
Geo. Vicars and Son	5	0	0
Samuel Baines	5	0	0
W. and G. Baines	5	0	0
Robert Palmer	5	0	0
J. W. Noble, M.B.	10	0	0
J. Whitmore	10	0	0
S. Kirby	10	0	0
C. B. Robinson	10	0	0
T. Paget	10	0	0
J. and G. Thorp	10	0	0
W. E. Hutchinson	10	0	0

THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

The Council have, we believe, determined upon advertising upon a somewhat extensive scale the promised subscriptions to the League Fund, and to continue the same at intervals, in order to show the progress of the fund towards completion. To do this effectually, they seek the assistance of the local committees and treasurers, who have been requested to send a list of all the subscribers up to the present period, and to continue the same from time to time till all have appeared.

These lists, it may be well to state, are to contain only the gross amounts promised, and have no reference whatever to the instalments, which should be forwarded separately.

A few additions to the list of treasurers have been made since last we published it, which we subjoin:

Andover—James Baker, Esq., Prospect House.	Ashton-under-Lyne—Thomas Mason, Esq.	Aylesbury—J. P. R. Payne, Esq.	Alwicks—Thos. Duncan, Esq.	Ayr—J. Kinross, Esq.	Aman—Alex. Doumie, Esq.	Amersham—E. West, Esq.	Barnstaple—Mr. Jos. Tite, Cleham Mill.	Bath—Admiral Gordon, R.N., Nelson-place, Norfolk-cres-cent.	Barnsley—J. S. Parkinson, Esq., Linen manufacturer.	Belper—Mr. J. W. Hancock.	Bromsgrove—W. A. Greening, Esq.	Bridgewater—William Brown, Esq.	Burton-on-Trent—J. N. Hanson, Esq.	Bristol—George Thomas, Esq., Great George-street, street.	Burnley—Geo. Wolgate, Esq., jun.	Bridport—J. P. Stephens, Esq.	Barnard Castle—Mr. Wm. Runc, Horse Market.	Brighton—Isaac Gray Bess, Esq.	Bury—James Kay, Esq., woollen manufacturer.	Boston—Mr. Robert Stevenson.	Bolton—John Deon, Esq., Silverwell House.	Clackhoughton—Geo. Anderson, Esq.	Cambridge—Chas. Newby, Esq., 55, Regent-street.	Credford, Devon—Edward Day, Esq.	Crayford, Kent—Henry Gould, Esq.	Caliside—J. Forster, Esq., Coldewgate.	Colne—Mr. T. T. England.	Chorley—Mr. James Wallwork.	Charnham—Henry Norton, Esq.	Chapel-en-le-Frith—J. Carrington, Esq.	Conington—J. Broadhurst, Esq.	Canarvon—William Turner, Esq., jun.	Devonport—Samuel Oram, Esq., Market street.	Derby—Messrs. Boden and Morley.
--	--------------------------------------	--------------------------------	----------------------------	----------------------	-------------------------	------------------------	--	---	---	---------------------------	---------------------------------	---------------------------------	------------------------------------	---	----------------------------------	-------------------------------	--	--------------------------------	---	------------------------------	---	-----------------------------------	---	----------------------------------	----------------------------------	--	--------------------------	-----------------------------	-----------------------------	--	-------------------------------	-------------------------------------	---	---------------------------------

Dundee—Edward Baxter, Esq.	Doncaster—Mr. Robert Milner.	Dunbar—James Wilson, Esq., Belhaven.	Dartmouth—Nash Clark, Esq.	Darlington—Charles Green, Esq.	Dunfermline—Mr. R. Robertson, Draper.	Edinburgh—Messrs. Arch. Thomson and Co., 255 High-street.	Exeter—Mr. Samuel Maunder.	Eynsford, Kent—Mr. H. Rogers.	Falkirk—John Smith, Esq., Writer.	Forfar—Mr. Wm. Sturrock.	Gateshead—Geo. Crawshaw, Esq.	Garstang—Dr. Bell, Chapel-street.	Glossop—John Kershaw, Esq.	Gloucester—Samuel Bowly, Esq.	Horsham—James Agate, Esq., North Parade.	Halifax—Mr. Thomas Denton, Old Market.	Hinckley—Mr. Thos. Payne.	Holywell—Thos. Mather, Esq., Glyn Abbot.	Hastings—Mr. Thos. Ross, jun.	Hazel Grove—Mr. T. Whannely.	Huddersfield—Foster Shaw, Esq.	Hull—Joseph Jones, Esq.	Hawick, N.B.—Mr. George Easton.	Idle, near Bradford, Yorkshire—Mr. Wm. Russell.	Liverpool—Donald Frazer, Esq., jun.	Jedburgh—Geo. Hilson, Esq., Manufacturer.	Kendal—Geo. Chanley, Esq.	Kelso—Mr. Alexander Dodds, Grocer.	Knarborough—Mr. Thos. Addyman, High-street.	Keighley—J. Craven, Esq., worsted spinner.	Kirkcaldy—Mr. Robt. Bryson.	Knutsford—Henry Long, Esq.	London—A. W. Paulton, Esq., at the offices of the League 67, Fleet street.	Luton—James Waller, Esq., merchant.	Leek—Thos. Birch, Esq.	Lancaster—George Jackson, Esq.	Leicester—J. D. Harris, Esq.	Leighton Buzzard—Thomas Price, Esq., Newtown.	Leominster—Mr. J. V. Chilcott.	Landport, &c.—Mr. Thos. Ross.	Lichfield—Dr. Rowley, M.D.	Liverpool—Jas. Mullineaux, Esq., John Taylor Crook, Esq.	Leeds—Samuel Birehall, Esq., woolstapler.	Maesteg, near Bridgend, Glamorganshire—Mr. Jos. Crayne.	Manchester—Mr. James Jones, at the offices of the League, 5, Newall's-buildings, Market-street.	Maidenhead—Mr. Thomas Woodcock, draper.	Maidstone—Richard Nemes, Esq., 109, Week street.	Maldon—G. W. Digby, Esq.	Middleton, near Manchester—Mr. Daniel Burton.	Montrose—Mr. John Muckart.	Mottam—Mr. Saml. Oldham.	Mitcham and Tooting, Surrey—Mr. Richd. Aitken.	Newcastle-upon-Tyne—George Crawshaw, Esq., and Mr. Daniel Liddell, Carlisle-street.	Nantwich—Mr. Philip Barker.	Newcastle-under-Lyne—Mr. Elias Shaw.	New Mills—John Yates, Esq.	Oldham—John Platt, Esq., Hartford Ironworks.	Osselt, near Wakefield—Mr. Frank Fearnside.	Potters, The—Francis Wedgwood, Esq.	Poole—G. R. Penney, Esq.	Pontefract—Mr. W. Kidd, news agent.	Pateley Bridge—Mr. R. Haiker.	Plymouth—Jno. Symons, Esq., Kintburg-st.	Reigate—Mr. Thomas Damm.	Ramsgate—Mr. Henry Scott, 57, Queen-street.	Salisbury—Jas. Lambert, Esq.	Sevenoaks, Kent—John Clark, Esq.	St. Columb—Mr. W. Brown, 3, Fair-street.	Scarborough—Isaac Stickney, Esq.	Sheffield—William Hargreaves, Esq., Merchant.	Skipton—J. B. Dewhurst, Esq.	Southport—Richard Johnson, Esq.	Stockport—Mr. J. Heginbotham, Millgate.	Sichow, Monmouthshire—Rev. Richard Jones.	South Shields—Mr. James Bell.	Stourbridge—Mr. E. Baylie.	Stroud—Mr. John S. Cobb.	Swaffham and West Norfolk—Arthur Morse, Esq., Swaff-ham.	Swansea—Mr. Joseph Rutter.	Stroud—Mr. T. Parsons.	Stirling, Robert Smith, Esq.	Sunderland—Mr. Edward C. Robson, Frederic-street, Bishopwearmouth.	Stockton-on-Tees—J. B. Clepham, Esq.	Shepton Mallett—W. Richardson, Esq., Woodbourne Cot-tage.	Staleybridge—Henry Bayley, Esq.	Sudbury—Colonel Addison.	St. Austell—The Rev. Jas. Cepe.	Todmorden—W. Haworth, Esq., North View.	Tewkesbury—Mr. Benjamin Harris.	Thetford—Mr. Henry Brown.	Warrminster—Mr. H. Hastings.	Wednesbury—Benjamin Pound, Esq.	Wareham—J. Pike, Esq., Merchant.	Westbury—N. Overbury, Esq.	Wigan—Thomas Taylor, Esq., Spinner, and Mr. Thomas Wall, Bookseller.	Wirksworth—Mr. B. Street, White Lion Inn.	Wakefield—Charles Morton, Esq., Whitwood Colliery.	Whitchurch—Mr. Richard Thomas.	Weymouth—Mr. Charles Pope.	Westbromwich—J. Spittle, Esq.	York—Thomas Swales, Esq., Lawrence-street.	Yarmouth—Mr. John Fish, Denes.
----------------------------	------------------------------	--------------------------------------	----------------------------	--------------------------------	---------------------------------------	---	----------------------------	-------------------------------	-----------------------------------	--------------------------	-------------------------------	-----------------------------------	----------------------------	-------------------------------	--	--	---------------------------	--	-------------------------------	------------------------------	--------------------------------	-------------------------	---------------------------------	---	-------------------------------------	---	---------------------------	------------------------------------	---	--	-----------------------------	----------------------------	--	-------------------------------------	------------------------	--------------------------------	------------------------------	---	--------------------------------	-------------------------------	----------------------------	--	---	---	---	---	--	--------------------------	---	----------------------------	--------------------------	--	---	-----------------------------	--------------------------------------	----------------------------	--	---	-------------------------------------	--------------------------	-------------------------------------	-------------------------------	--	--------------------------	---	------------------------------	----------------------------------	--	----------------------------------	---	------------------------------	---------------------------------	---	---	-------------------------------	----------------------------	--------------------------	--	----------------------------	------------------------	------------------------------	--	--------------------------------------	---	---------------------------------	--------------------------	---------------------------------	---	---------------------------------	---------------------------	------------------------------	---------------------------------	----------------------------------	----------------------------	--	---	--	--------------------------------	----------------------------	-------------------------------	--	--------------------------------

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE.—We understand that a requisition was forwarded to this gentleman on Saturday last, signed by many of the leading members of the Conservative and Liberal parties in Wigan, requesting him to allow himself to be placed in nomination as a candidate for the borough, in the place of the Hon. Mr. Lindsay, who has resigned. It is generally expected that Mr Gladstone will accept this invitation, and that he will be returned without opposition.—Liverpool Times.

The Duke of Newcastle has addressed another letter to "his countrymen." His grace's plea for doing so is the "encouragement" he received on the former occasion. The subject of the present letter is the downfall of our agricultural system. It is a "very melancholy and gentlemanlike" production, and is well calculated to "raise the waters" in the eyes of the British yeomanry.

A GLANCE AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

By REUBEN.

Last Monday was a cold, ill-tempered day. Towards four o'clock, as the Lords and Commons of England, not already within the walls of Parliament on railway committees, came down Parliament-street and passed Westminster Hall, some to the entrance to the House of Commons, and others to the doorway of "another place," some riding in the storm, with spurred and booted grooms after them, as if they were going to "another place," farther off than the House of either Lords or Commons; some cabbed and covered up, with outside tigers holding on their laced hats, and laced hats refusing to be held on; some coming along the foot-pavement on such conveyances as nature gave them, of whom the Prime Minister was one; but even he, stepping out to escape the coming storm, which had gathered wind, rain, hail, chimney-pots, tiles, plaster, glass, straw and dust, and was about to hurl them on the heads of every man, woman, child, and member of Parliament within reach—a kind of atmospheric Ferrand; even the Prime Minister, seeing what was to come, walked faster than his usually solid, grave, dignified pace. Such, at four o'clock on Monday afternoon, was the weather in Westminster, as the collective wisdom of the nation was collecting through the different channels of the West-end, but directly through Parliament-street.

It is at all times a sight worth seeing, that of the arrival at the doors of Parliament of the picked men of the nation. How oddly they come! how oddly they look! Now the tall man, now the short one. Now a venerable gray beard; and now a beardless bread-and-butter looking boy—boys I should say; for the number of Parliamentary youths astonishes the stranger more than anything he will see or hear in the house. Now there is the dark-featured, strong-bodied borderer, Sir James Graham; and now the tall, sprightly Sydney Herbert, of Wiltshire. A Lord Something, of brief stature, with hunch back and white gloves, is followed by some other lord, whom every on-looker at once declares to be a fine specimen of an Englishman. But both are Englishmen, and what of it? Both have votes in the house, and both are the nominees of one duke.

But Monday was a day upon which the members passed into the house almost without criticism—an uncommon thing, certainly; but it was a day upon which country stragglers in London, who usually form four-fifths of the line of critics on the opposite pavement, could not keep their places, as the wind and Westminster Abbey raved and roared over that particular part of the street, as if they would close and grapple, and the one throw the other down. They did come to blows, but the Abbey only shook itself, and tossed the storm into the street below—in which, while I was there, on my way to the House of Commons, to try to obtain an entrance to the Speaker's gallery, it seemed to be playing a kind of overture to the performances which were afterwards to be witnessed within the house, as if in anticipation of who were to speak, and of their manner of speaking.

There was the bitter gust, whistling from all points of the compass, insinuating itself into every street, lane, alley, and spider's hole; now buffeting the lords on the back who might happen to be passengers, and then smiting poorer men in the face, biting the very noses of the cabmen as if it would be satisfied if it could bite a nose off. Now whizzing round the cold bronze of Caning's statue, now rushing upon the pavement opposite, as if it would take the official papers out of Sir Robert Peel's pocket, and then whistling among his feet, as if it would trip him up, because he held the papers fast. The scowling cloud which gave forth this gust, and which, to look at, was enough to make ordinary mortals feel that nothing but bitterness could come out of it,—this weather-sour fraction of discontented nature played in the overture an epitome of what Mr. Ben D'Israeli had been, and was again to be that night.

Again the wind would cease, and all nature would seem to be empty for a space—as empty as some gambler's pocket; then, in a moment, the storm was high again, raised as suddenly as a gambler "raises the wind." Once more it would be dead still, and again it would move and stop, and rush on and turn the corners and come back again, and wheeze inharmoniously, as if it were fore-shadowing even at greater length and with more precision than an overture foreshadows an operatic performance, the inharmonious sentences of the forthcoming speeches of the new orator, Lord George Bentinck.

Again the gale would recommence loudly, and continue loud yet unstable in its noise, softening where it was expected to be strong, bursting with strength where one expected to hear it soft, as if it were already re-echoing George Banks, who was not yet on his feet.

The rain came on and poured, as if the tempest had taken the Thames from its bed to carry it away, and the Thames was not willing to go any farther. I listened no longer to the elemental strife. It had been announced that the Speaker was at prayers, which announcement opened the doors of the committee-rooms as a knife cuts the straw band of a potato sack, and straightway there came rolling out upon the street dozens and scores of railway witnesses, engineers, attorneys, barristers, clerks, and reporters. I went to look for some member who might oblige me by obtaining a Speaker's order, and though not fortunate enough to see one for nearly an hour and a half, a gentleman who has more than once been kind enough to put himself to some trouble to obtain this favour for me did so again.

The time was not lost. Indeed, I know of no other spot in London, or out of it, where an hour or two may be more agreeably, usefully—I might say philosophically—employed than in the lobbies of the House of Commons, through which the members are passing in and out, and in again every minute; and in which persons are standing in rows waiting to see their own member, or some one known to them, to get an order, or to deliver a message, or a letter, or a petition, or some papers which are to cram, as a silkworm is crammed with mulberry leaves, some George Banks or Lord George Bentinck, who is to spin a silk-yarn speech, and has not got the material all at hand from which to make the speech.

Standing in the lobby for an hour or two with a companion, such observations as the following were exchanged:

"That gentleman carrying the black leather box in his hand, who is he?" "Do you mean that genteel man, slender, rather young, with light coloured hair?" "Yes." That is a member of the Government, Mr. Cardwell. He will perhaps speak to-night if he is not too hoarse; but he has got a bad cold. He is a good speaker, and has the promise of a statesman in him."

"Some of those men standing near that door are weavers, or pretended weavers, from Spitalfields. The silk question is expected to come on to-night if there is not too much debate on the items of the tariff before silk. We shall very probably see Lord George Bentinck, or Peter Borthwick, or D'Israeli, or George Banks, or perhaps old Spooner of Birmingham, or Squire Newdegate, of Warwickshire, come and speak to them; they have sent into the house for somebody. I heard of a lady some time ago; she is the wife of one of the members of a borough, not over sixty miles from here; she has a certain kind of regard for the poor, and visits them in their own houses. Her chief object is to teach them not to waste anything, and particularly not to waste the skins of the potatoes; to show, that though a lady, she can eat a potato with nothing but salt to it, and very little of that; she eats a potato at their dinner table, with just the least thing in life of salt to it; and to show that poor people may eat the potato skins, she eats the potato with the skin on it. Now, those kid-gloved lords—here is Lord George Bentinck; that is he in white gloves; rather a good-looking man when his hat is on; he is well whiskered, which shows favourably as he stands now; but he has an indifferent head, so far as the intellectual or moral power of it are indicated, which you can see when his hat is off. Those lords in kid gloves, hunting after the Spitalfields weavers, remind me of the lady who eats the skins of the potato; she, submitting to a kind of gastronomic martyrdom for five minutes out of the twenty-four hours; they, opening their mouths to be crammed with the statistics of the silk-trade and the sorrows of poor men, 'for this night only.' The lady could no more digest a meal of potato skins, day after day, than could those men who have suddenly become the weavers' advocates, take in, understand, and intellectually digest, the statistics of the silk trade. It is a mere sham. The only thing in their favour is, that they have not intellectual capacity enough to know when they are blundering, as we shall hear if we get into the house to-night, and the house should get as far through the tariff as the article silk."

"What reason have you for saying those are not real weavers?"

"I do not say but they have been weavers. I call them pretended weavers, because they pretend to represent the weavers, and they only represent a few, and these not the most intelligent or most industrious. Moreover, they are not working men at present. They are in the pay of the corn monopolists to get up opposition to the Free Trade scheme of Sir Robert Peel. At the meeting held lately at Bremhill, in Wiltshire, where so many labourers and their wives attended, and told how poorly they were paid, how poorly fed, poorly lodged, and poorly clothed, one of these pretended Spitalfields men attended from London, sent down by agents of the monopolists here, and endeavoured to draw the attention of the poor people there from the question of large loaf or little loaf, to that of machinery. He insisted that it was the threshing mills that had caused the misery of Wiltshire; and the blockhead said that, not knowing that threshing mills were very little in use. But the people shouted—"No, it ben't the machines; it be the Corn Laws that make little trade, little wages, and little loaves of bread. Don't come to tell we that we have nothing to do with the Corn Laws; we has more to do with 'em than any body, for we live on bread, and get nothing but bread!" And they at last drew him from the platform, and told him that they were determined to act peacefully, and not to be led by the like of him into mischief, to break machines, and get themselves hung, or transported. So the man decamped. But within a few days, he was at a meeting at Birmingham, and in a few days after at a meeting at Macclesfield—always in the character of a working man, and instigating the working men to follow after some other object than that which they were met about, the Corn Law. The purpose of the monopolists in paying the travelling expenses and the wages of this man to get up a crusade against the threshing-mills rather than the Corn Laws was plain enough. They were so well prepared to make use of such a perversion of the popular excitement, that two of the least discreet of them did make use of it, though it had never occurred. Mr. J. Benett, one of the members for Wiltshire, and a leading protectionist member, had been so well prepared for what had been expected to follow the employment of such agents of the Central Protection Society at Anti-Corn-Law meetings, that he could not resist the temptation of standing up in the House of Commons and accusing the League of sending persons to Bremhill to incite the Wiltshire labourers to break machinery! And the Duke of Richmond's brother, in imitation of John Benett, said the same thing, and something worse, in the House of Lords. Now there, before us, in the lobby of the House of Commons, are some of those men, speaking to, and feeding, and cramming, as they would pigeons with peas, the members who are getting off the parts of poor men's friends for a night or two, that they, the said members, who are getting off the parts, may, under cover of this new disguise, continue to pick the national pocket and the weaver's cupboard.

"Why have those weavers, or pretended weavers, or whatever they may be, not given information to the monopolist members before this time? This does not seem a convenient place for such business."

"No doubt they have before. But they have come now to get into the gallery, and have perhaps brought something which was forgotten before."

We read of an animal which can be schooled to betray its fellows into a snare, by lavishing a spurious affection on them. This animal is not without excuse; it finds that its new masters have fed it better than it was fed before, and it is willing to lead as many of its kind as its arts can compass into the enjoyment of the same advantages with itself. Moreover it is not a man; it is only a four-footed beast. But there are men, the Pariah dogs of mankind, who for a bellyful to themselves will betray their fellows into the hands of those who have starved, will starve, and can only live by starving them.

Pots, pans, tin kettles, where are you all, that such dogs can go along the streets without one of you at their tails?

After passing a policeman, who asked me if the order I had was for the Speaker's or for the stranger's gallery, and being directed by him up a particular stair when I had said the Speaker's gallery, I went up that stair and another, and along a narrow passage, through a barrier, which was lifted to admit me along the passage still farther to another barrier, where the order was asked for and delivered up; then through some place wider than a mere passage, with a table in it, a chair and a stove; then through a door-way into the region of the bude lights, beneath which I could indistinctly see the Opposition benches well filled with Opposition members. A voice was speaking, which I knew to be the somewhat thin, but clear and melodious voice of Sir R. Peel. In a few minutes I got a front seat. After Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Plumptre, of Kent, rose to urge that the excise duty should be taken off hops of home growth, and that the import duty on hops of foreign growth should not be reduced. All that was said by him, and by those who followed, has been before the public since Tuesday morning; and if it had not been so there was nothing in it requiring notice from me. A division took place on this question of hops, at least I read next morning that a division took place. All I know of it is that the Speaker ordered strangers to withdraw, and that two officers of the house pushed the strangers out into the place before-mentioned, where stood one table, one chair, and a stove. It seemed to be the desire of most of them to remain as near the door as possible, to be the first to re-enter; and some to make sure of not being pushed too far out, laid hold of the stove and burned their fingers. In this way five or six or seven minutes passed over, and the green door was opened again, and we got to our seats; some to the front, who were behind before, and some to the back seat who were in front at first.

The clerk at the table read a number of articles from the tariff list, which, with the exception of straw plait, did not cause a remark, and that very little, until the article of silk was named. Shoes, for instance, in their different varieties, were specified, but met no opposition; which was attributable, I believe, to the fact that the 240 opponents of the tariff are corn growers and not shoemakers; and partly also to the fact that the shoemakers have not gone up to the monopolist corn growers as a few of the silk weavers have done, to deliver themselves into the hands of the bread taxers, for the bread taxers' own sakes.

On the silk subject, Mr. Bankes, who moved that silk be omitted from the tariff, evinced much sympathy with the meetings of the weavers. I know a place not far from Kingston Hall, where working men would meet, but dare not (in the parish of Sturminster Marshall, Mr. Bankes's own property), where they do not earn one-half of the wages of the silk weavers, poorly paid as the weavers often are. It is an odd thing for the squire of Kingston Hall to come to Parliament as the weavers' friend. I have the authority of the medical gentleman who relates the circumstance, to publish the following:

"It is, as I may say, within the shadow of Kingston Hall that I was sent for some time ago to see the family of a working man, some of the children being ill. I was sent for as medical officer of the Poor Law Union. I am not that now; but I was then. I found the family without bedding, and almost without covering of any kind, even to lie on the floor with. I saw the husband at work in the fields, and he told me he had no money, and had none to get. His wife said the same thing. I inquired of his master, who farms a large breadth of land, near Sturminster Marshall, and he said the man was a very industrious and sober man, that he thought the family was only so poor because they did not manage well, but that he was not so badly off as he said; he had 8s. a week; this was pay day, and he had a month's wages to get—32s. I then returned, and asked the man why he had imposed on me, saying, they had no money to get anything for the children that were ill, and had no money to receive, when, in fact, he had 32s. to get that very evening. The man said it was more than he knew of if he had 32s., or any number of shillings to receive.

"I thought this very strange; and as I had time to make the inquiry, I made it. Going back to the farmer's house, I said, it is within a little of the time of paying your men; if you please I will just stay and see that man convicted of a falsehood with my own eyes; he still says he has no money to receive, and has not received any. What can the man mean?

"Why" said the farmer, he is a very good, industrious, quiet man, himself—a very good man, but they don't manage at home, some way. Our people hereabout are always running out of provisions before they get their money; and, you see, we are obliged to get credit for them. Nobody would trust them if we did not go security. So I dare say the man has some shop debt to pay with part of his wages. But come into the parlour, Sir; come in and take a glass of wine; you cannot stand all that time at the door.

"I saw the drift the matter was taking, and resolved to get to the bottom of it. I did not go in. I stood to see the men paid; and when the farmer was at last obliged to tell me that he sent his men to the shopkeeper, his brother-in-law, who paid them, I said I would go there. I did not know then, but I soon afterwards discovered that a messenger had been sent to the shopkeeper, to put him on his guard as to me. I was pressing invited into the parlour to a glass of wine, or any thing else, as at the farm-house. I declined. The result was, that the man had nothing to get; instead of 32s. to receive, he was about 15s. in debt, and had been so for a long time, after paying his month's wages.

"All the men were obliged to deal there. All were led into debt just enough to bind them to that shop. They could never get clear, consequently they had to take any articles of provision, of whatever inferior quality, at whatever extravagant prices they were offered at, and could not refuse. Moreover, they were bound to the employer by the same means, obliged to bear any insolence or oppression because they could not leave him: this debt of 15s. was as a chain upon their necks. The man said to me after leaving the shop, 'Now I have got 32s., or the worth of 32s., for my month's work? And he said he would have left that master if he could have got rid of this shop debt; but he had not been able to pay it, and he feared he never would.

"His account of losing his furniture was, that he had once resolved on seeking work with another master, and left this one. This master to prevent him, resorted to the usual custom of sending round to the farmers a message requesting they would not employ this man. They, as is usual, in such cases, did not give him work. He was soon glad to go back and beg the pardon of this one, and seek to be taken on again, for his large family of children, and himself and wife, were starving. But no: he could get no work there; he must go into the workhouse. So to qualify the family for the workhouse, they must sell their furniture. That was sold, and the money spent; and as they were about to go to the union, the farmer came and said—'You need not go; I require a hand, and will give you work.' Had the man refused to take this work, he would have been proceeded against as a rogue and a vagabond, for refusing to maintain his wife and family. And this was his punishment for having dared to leave one master to look for another."

Now this took place within the shadow, not literally, but almost literally, of Kingston Hall, Mr. Bankes's residence. And in that part of Dorset, it is a custom notorious to everybody, that men are thus compelled to work for any master, for any wages, bearing any oppression that may be offered to them.

Next to the oddity of Mr. Bankes coming out of Dorset—and, of all places, out of the north-eastern parts of Dorset, to be a poor man's advocate in London, is that of Lord George Bentinck, who followed him in the debate, lamenting the increase of female prostitution, which would follow, he said, the increased importation of French silk dresses. But of this, no more for the present.

AGRICULTURE.

HUSBANDRY RECOVERING FROM "PROTECTION."

The practical and rational tone which all discussions on agriculture amongst farmers are now assuming, fully bears out all we have said as to the direct and immediate value of Free Trade to the business of husbandry. Lords and squires may whine and cant about their fears for farmers, or their sympathy for labourers, and may asseverate that the cultivation of land will go back, and the demand for rural labour fall off, in consequence of a Free Trade in corn, but nobody believes them. Their cry of "wolf" has been too long continued to excite any other feeling than that of pity and contempt towards such purblind politicians. Farming land become worse cultivated! Rural labour less in demand! Why, the very propositions excite a smile with those who know what is the present state of English farming, and the actual demand for agricultural labour. The land is not now half cultivated. The amount of labour employed is scarcely sufficient for a system of half cultivation. Yet there is an abundance of labour seeking, longing, begging for employment; there is capital to any amount ready to be employed in farming wherever land can be obtained on lease, free from obsolete rules, and landlord-imposed burdens. Hear what the farmers say upon this subject. Our readers are probably aware of the character Norfolk has attained for improved farming—and justly, for the average cultivation of Norfolk is high, very high, as compared with other counties—yet in Norfolk land is not nearly as well cultivated as it ought to be with a view to profitable farming; and there is generally believed to be in that county a superabundance of the agricultural population; that superabundance, however, is only apparent, for the general adoption of very moderate improvements amongst the Norfolk farmers would demonstrate that there is no superfluity of labour. And the farmers are aware of these things. A striking illustration of this is to be found in a very interesting discussion at the North Walsham Farmers' Club, which we find reported in the Mark Lane Express. The subject of discussion was, "On increasing the demand for labour"—a topic evidently suggested by the supposed superabundance of rural labour to which we have alluded.

The following extracts form, incidentally, complete answers to the Parliamentary harangues of the monopolists, the self-styled "farmers' friends," the professing patrons of the agricultural labourers. The first speech we find reported is that of Mr. Gower, who said:

"Of the amount of agricultural labour in East Norfolk I cannot speak definitely, and will merely affirm that the average is low, considering the nature of the soil, which is, generally speaking, suitable to almost any rotation. I would earnestly impress the members with the belief that capital employed in labour is a most profitable investment indirectly, as well as immediately, for by increasing the means of the labourer, it enables him to buy more of the farmer's produce. I would suggest the following alterations in farm practice—green cropping and stall feeding. It is an undeniable fact, that double the quantity of stock may be maintained by feeding them in open yards, or, what is still more preferable, in covered boxes or stalls, and the extra manure thus made would amply repay the extra labour."

And he referred to his own practice, thus teaching by example:

"I would beg to refer you to our report of last year for a system of cropping. I have begun in earnest to carry out that system, and shall have a piece of rye after wheat ready for sowing at the end of next month, which I intend to follow by tares, thus securing a succession through the summer, and I think I may say that by this plan I shall employ two men and two boys extra for 26 weeks."

He then mentioned some of the obstacles to good farming, which our readers will recognise as amongst the evils we have designated as landlord-imposed burdens:

"Another important improvement and source of increased employment for the labourer is the better management of our fences, which have hitherto been great obstacles to good farming, as it is very evident they injure the crops in their vicinity, and are nurseries for weeds which are continually fouling the land. When we consider the fact, that in every 100 acres of land there are 10 in fences, it will be seen how desirable it is to do away with half of them. I may be told that the landlord may object to these alterations; but I believe this will rarely occur, as I am bound to say my experience has taught me the gratifying fact, that the landlord will always appreciate the efforts of the tenant to provide full employment for the poor. I am aware this question opens a wide field for discussion on the restrictive clauses of leases, and I do hope the enlightened spirit of the age will tend to simplify these. I do not intend to enter into this subject; but surely it would be sufficient security for the landlord if the tenant be restricted from taking two white straw crops in succession, except when the land has laid more than one year in grass, and if he be required to consume the produce upon the farm."

We suspect Mr. Gower spoke rather in the spirit of prophecy than of the actual system, when he said landlords will not oppose the removal of obstacles to good farming. Landlords will not object to remove the obstacles their prejudices offer to good farming when they find they cannot otherwise keep up their rentals. Till then, we doubt.

Mr. Cubitt, who is himself a capital farmer, said:

"I am aware that I am in the presence of many farmers whose example I might well follow, but I'll defy any practical man to go through the eastern part of this county—yes, even this far-famed county of Norfolk—without seeing thousands of acres most slovenly cultivated for the want of additional labour. To improve the condition of the labourers we must endeavour to keep them fully employed at fair wages, without which all other attempts will be perfectly futile; and I cannot but think it would be to the interest of every farmer in this county to allow each of his labourers a few rods of land for the growth of vegetables. Such a system judiciously carried out would tend more than any other to improve the character and the morals of the agricultural labourers, and I think it would assist in destroying the influence of that greatest of all his enemies—the village beer-shop. But there is another point worthy of attention. It ought to be the duty of every employer to watch over the interests of his labourers, and he has various opportunities of adding to their comforts with but little pecuniary inconvenience to himself; and depend on it, if a farmer expects to have good and faithful servants, he must first teach them that he feels interested in their welfare, and he will then achieve an object of no small importance to his own individual interests."

Mr. Cubitt then adverted to the question of the demand for labour, saying:

"I conscientiously believe that if all the land in this county was properly and profitably cultivated there would at the present day be a very great insufficiency of agricultural labourers. I shall commence with the root culture, and I challenge any practical farmer to ride through the more fertile districts of this county without seeing a great annual loss in the turnip crops, arising from ineffectual tillage and the want of manual labour, a loss amounting on some farms to many tons per acre, which would more than repay the proper cultivation of the whole crop (manuring excepted). A heavy crop of turnips cannot now be grown where land has been long cultivated with that plant (as in Norfolk) without great care and trouble."

This points to the fact we have more than once mentioned, that there is a too close and bigotted adherence to the four-course system in districts where the farming is far above the average.

Amongst many other useful and practical suggestions, Mr. Cubitt thus mentions the importance of stock-feeding, and the landlord-imposed obstacles to its extensive adoption:

"Every farmer has become aware of the advantages of box or stall-feeding, but I regret that that excellent system is not likely to become general amongst tenant farmers without the assistance of their landlords, for the majority of farm buildings in this neighbourhood are now one of the chief obstacles to good farming, being not only dilapidated, but constructed in such a manner as to tend more to the destruction than the preservation of the manure. In feeding cattle, I would recommend every farmer to make himself acquainted with the valuable properties of linseed (boiled) and mixed with cut hay, straw, chaff, or other provender; it makes excellent food in addition to turnips, is generally relished by all descriptions of stock, and enables him to keep an increased quantity."

And he afterwards, with reference to the same subject, added:

"I would call your attention to the unprofitable manner in which our artificial grasses are consumed. Where artificial grass is required for fattening purposes, it might be cut up and mixed with a portion of boiled linseed: and at the early part of the season it is advisable to cut and mix dry provender with green food. This plan, more than all others (of mixing our grasses) would prove a great saving, and increase the demand for labour."

Mr. Mott, who stated himself not to be a farmer, gave a very interesting account of some contrasts in farming he had met with in Dorsetshire. After giving some detail of the Rev. Mr. Huxtable's management of a farm of 230 acres, on which he pays 12*l.* a week for labour, Mr. Mott observed:

"We ought all to be much indebted to Mr. Huxtable for making these experiments, for they plainly show that capital may be applied, and labour profitably employed, from an improved system of farming; and I think you will all allow that these experiments on grazing are of the greatest value just now, when, from the depreciation which may take place in the price of corn, the attention of the farmer must more than ever be directed to that which is the most important and the most profitable."

Can we have more direct testimony to the fact that protection has prevented the farmer from directing his attention "to that which is the most important and the most profitable?" And in the following reference to the Blackmoor Vale, we learn the more ordinary aspect of the state of Dorsetshire farming. Mr. Mott said:

"In the Vale of Blackmoor (a few miles from Mr. Huxtable's) a friend of mine has some farms quite saturated with water, which he proposed to one of his tenants to drain, either finding all the labour himself and charging five per cent., or finding the tiles if he would find labour. Both propositions were declined, as the farmer was perfectly satisfied to go on as he had done for the last twenty years. Now, I would ask, is such a man fit to be a farmer? Do you think such a man, even if our worst fears are realised, can possibly be benefited by such a system? Would he not reap thirty per cent. by laying out his five per cent.? In other words, would not the demand for labour be profitably increased? Protection certainly has not benefited, and never can benefit such a man; and I fear he is by no means a solitary instance. But mark the consequences: Here is a man, with the labourers around him culling (as Mr. Huxtable has justly observed) for labour and for bread; and he refuses to employ them, even when it might be done profitably to himself. The labourer is willing and anxious to work, but there is no one to hire him. A large supply and no demand; and what is the consequence? The labourer is half-starved, and the land is half-cultivated. His miserable cottage and poverty-stricken appearance in many parts of the county too plainly show that the rate of wages is generally very far below the average of the best cultivated districts. It is evident that such a state of things must continue wherever such a miserable system prevails. The land must be uncultivated, the tenant impoverished, the labourer degraded, until the agriculturist becomes persuaded, by the success of repeated experiments, that capital may be safely invested, and that alteration in his practice may be profitably made in order to increase the demand for labour."

How much more of this is really attributable to the landlord than the farmer, we shall not now stay to distinguish; but in truth, monopoly—hopeless, helpless reliance on monopoly,—is the great cause of the backwardness of English agriculture.

AGRICULTURAL ACTIVITY.

FLAX CULTURE.

Already agriculture gives signs that the incubus of "protection" is being loosened. Even now, with a prospect of revisionary Free Trade, farmers are making up their minds "to do something." They have ceased to regard the dreary and mindless orations which the New-degates, the Lord George Bentincks, and that sort of men persist in inflicting on the House of Commons. Many and various will be the resources which farmers in different localities will find to be within their reach when they have fully learnt to depend upon their own exertions, rather than an Act of Parliament, for profit. Now, besides the improvements which may be made in the existing system, there is a new branch of husbandry of almost universal application, which is attracting very much of the attention of the more intelligent gentlemen and farmers; we allude to the culture of flax. The persevering advocate of flax growing, Mr. J. Warnes—who pleasantly enough calls himself a protectionist, from advocating the culture of an unprotected article as the means of redemption for "protected" farmers, we presume—is now in London making another vigorous movement to bring the advantages of a flax crop before the agricultural community. He feels that this is the time when farmers are prepared to adopt new plans, and to seek from their own skill that protection which monopoly never afforded them. That gentleman has favoured us with two letters, which have been addressed to him on the subject since the publication of his letter, a few weeks since, in THE LEAGUE; they show that men of the right sort are considering the subject. The first letter is from Mr. George Hope, the well-known Free Trader, of Fenton Barns. It is as follows:

Fenton Barns, 11th March, 1846.

SIR,—I notice in THE LEAGUE that you purpose publishing a volume on the cultivation of flax, &c. If I will be able to get the book through any Edinburgh bookseller, you may put me down for a copy. Some 10 years ago I grew nine imperial acres of flax, but the difficulty of obtaining labour in this part of the country made it two years before I could turn it into cash. In the end I had to put up a simple machine, driven by a horse, to aid the scutching, or I would not have got it done at all. The flax was sold at Perth and Dundee, where it fetched the very top price, if I remember right, 60*l.* per ton. I also sold the seed at a high price; the quality being excellent, it was re-sold for sowing. I found the trouble of personal superintendence greater than I could afford, in the cleaning of the flax, but were it made a trade and aided by machinery, the cultivation of it would pay the farmer handsomely, as, after deducting all expenses, it left a clear profit of 15*l.* per imperial acre, which was certainly good, considering I was a novice at the business. Your efforts to call the attention of the community to this source of industry, entitle you to their warmest thanks; accept of mine, and believe me, Sir, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

John Warnes, Esq.

GEORGE HOPE.

This is practical and decisive testimony to the advantages of a crop of flax; it also points to the only difficulty in the way of a very general adoption of flax growing, viz., the deficiency of men skilled in the preparation of the fibre for market. To remedy this is the point to which Mr. Warnes is now directing his efforts. Of his plans for that purpose we shall say a word or two presently.

The following is the second letter we have referred to; it is from a gentleman of Manchester, Mr. C. Rigg:

Office, Dickinson-street, Manchester, Feb. 18, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—Your obliging letter of the 16th inst., and interesting accompaniments, reached my hands this morning; the receipt of which I hasten to acknowledge, and thank you, most cordially, for your polite attention to my inquiries.

Although I am neither a grower of flax nor a manufacturer of linen—yet, from the experience of a long life devoted to commercial pursuits—a sincere love for my country, and my kind—and being not an inattentive observer of what has been enacted around me—I have always regretted that flax culture has never been made a prominent national object. In Ireland, in the days of Isaac Corry, it was so made; but, unfortunately, the linen trade was strangled by protection. And why? Because the protectionists were bats and moles, similar to the bats and moles of our own day, and could not (or would not) see the difference between encouragement and protection.

As regards the beneficial effects which would result to agriculture, and the linen manufacture, no object can be of more national importance than the growth of flax.

With the exception of a portion of wool, all raw materials for our textile fabrics, are drawn from abroad. Our climate is unfavourable to the existence and labours of the silkworm. Cotton is a plant of other regions; but for the culture and growth of flax many large tracts of land in the United Kingdom are pre-eminently favourable. In fact, flax will grow in ordinary seasons, and come to perfection, on most soils of the United Kingdom, if properly attended to. To show that it is not a very coy plant, it will grow to a considerable height from seed put between the folds of an old and much worn wetted blanket (in a similar way that cress and mustard are reared on ship-board, for salad.)

I am fully persuaded, from all I have read, heard, and seen, relative to the flax plant, that by the aid of chemical science, and with proper management, its cultivation will repay all and every outlay and attention bestowed upon it; and beyond this, that it will yield to the cultivator larger profits than those derivable from the growth of corn; or, indeed, from any other vegetable substance whatsoever.

Whenever the time arrives—and may it soon arrive!—that flax growing and the linen manufacture meet with the encouragement their importance demand, in a national point of view—it may then be truly said that agriculture and manufacture go hand-in-hand; and foreign countries will soon learn, and understand, the value and effect of this union.

With very few exceptions, neither agricultural nor manufacturing skill, capital, and industry, have ever been brought to bear with sufficient power on the culture of flax, and the manufacture of linen.

Our manufacturing appliances have brought to gigantic growth both the silk and cotton fabrics—the raw materials of which are brought to us from foreign climes. And how does it happen that we are such large importers of linen cloth, as well as of flax, which could be grown at home; and which, in the preparation for the loom, would give employment and bread to tens of thousands of our parish-fellows?

If the landowners and the occupiers of land will but respond to the call of the manufacturers of home-grown flax, properly prepared, and suitable for the loom and the twine craft, our merchants (among whom the writer presumes to class himself) will soon turn back the tide of linen imports, by the overwhelming flow of British exportations.

Believe me, dear Sir, your most faithful and obdt. servant,
C. RIGG.

To John Warnes, jun., Esq., Trimmingham, Norfolk.

That flax is a highly profitable crop seems to be generally admitted; but a notion has got into the heads of the landowners that it is a scouring crop, and therefore its growth is almost universally prohibited by the agreements under which the tenant farmers of England hold their farms. This notion is, however, altogether erroneous. When the land is in good heart, it has been found that not only does a crop of flax not exhaust the soil, but that in fact it is a very good preparation for wheat. Mr. Warnes, and other flax-growers of Norfolk, have found that their wheat and barley crops, after flax, are at least as heavy as when they fall in the usual routine of the four-course system; that when flax culture is carried on in connection with linseed-feeding (as it ought always to be), there is no crop which affords such an abundant source of reproduction. The manure made from boiled linseed is as superior to oilcake manure as oilcake manure is to the ordinary straw-yard manure. Instead, therefore, of flax exhausting the soil, there is no more ready way of increasing the fertility of the soil than by growing linseed and consuming it upon the farm. And here again we meet with an instance of the benefit to the farmer of the access to cheap grain when the corn trade is free. Not only is the feeding properties of boiled linseed and chaff greatly increased by the addition of a certain portion of barley, rye, or maize meal, but the cattle, being induced by the admixture to eat more than they would of linseed alone, become fat more quickly. This is the grand point for the farmer. Quick feeding is profitable feeding; slow feeding, the reverse. Flax, then, will furnish the means, not merely of keeping up, but of increasing the fertility of the land. But then the full profit of the crop depends upon the preparation and sale of the fibre. The mode of preparing the stalk is by steeping it in water so long as to separate the woody portion from the fibre without injuring the tenacity of the latter. Some skill and observation, the results of experience, are required for conducting that operation. The stalks having been then dried and bleached, are scutched—that is, beaten either by hand or machinery to separate the woody parts from the fibre. This part of the work also requires some skill; at all events, some instruction from those accustomed to the art.

These operations may be either carried on by each grower upon his own premises, or the grower may sell the stalks of his flax, after he has beaten out the seed, to flax dressers, whose business it is to prepare the fibre for market. And the latter, we think, is the plan which will best suit the business of the farmer, and most tend to promote the growth of flax. The best practical means of providing for both are those suggested by Mr. Warnes. He says men are wanted who understand the growth and subsequent preparation of the fibre for market; and the way to supply that want is to establish a society for training workmen in the art. This must be effected by an extensive co-operation amongst those who would promote the improvement of agriculture and encourage new means of profitably employing our rural population. For the latter object, flax dressing has peculiar advantages; it is performed under cover, in the winter season, when other work is scarce; and women and boys may earn good wages at the employment. A society being formed, a committee might hire a farm in a central situation, where the growth and preparation of flax would be the primary objects. To this establishment, conducted of course by persons skilled in the art, men would be admitted for the purpose of learning the business, so that in a very few years skilled flax dressers would be found in every district. In order to render such a model flax farm complete, the best modes of using the seed for feeding should be in constant operation; and thus men, alive to the full value of the flax culture, would be regularly furnished to all farmers or landowners who might wish to adopt it. This is one of the directions agriculture will take from the impulse Free Trade must afford, and is a signal instance of the utter folly of supposing that agricultural activity and rural skill can be promoted by a system which prevents farmers from relying on their own industry for success.

WHY IS THE DELUSION KEPT UP FOR THREE YEARS?

It is plain that farmers have got over their fear of Free Trade—that like men of business they are preparing to accept the benefits, and guard against the difficulties of a new order of things. This is obvious from the Mark Lane Express review of the present state of the corn trade:

"Though the opposition to Sir Robert Peel's new Corn Law has not been carried on so vigorously this week (several of the amendments, of which notice had been previously given, having been withdrawn), still it is very probable that the final settlement of the measure may be delayed for some weeks longer, and the trade be kept in a state of suspense. The wants of the millers have now become so pressing, that they can no longer do without old wheat; and it is pretty clear that, when the liberation of bonded does take place, a very extensive demand may be reckoned on. We are, consequently, disposed to think that, happen what may, the present value of bread-stuffs will be maintained; and we feel confident that, within a comparatively short period after the release of the lock wheat, any slight depression which may thereby be occasioned will be recovered. Judging from the firm tone which sellers have recently assumed at the markets in the agricultural districts, it may be inferred that farmers take the same view of the subject; indeed, no one seems anxious to sell at present rates. On the other hand, considerable unwillingness continues to be displayed by merchants and millers to purchase largely; many still doubting the wisdom of going into stock in the present bare state of the markets. The advance of 1*s.* to 2*s.* per qr., which has been established since our last, has certainly been paid very reluctantly, but the absolute necessities of buyers have obliged them to accede to the terms of sellers. A rise under such circumstances is much more likely to be maintained than one caused by speculation; the upward movement having, in the present instance, been wholly produced by the supplies falling short of the quantity required for actual and immediate consumption."

This, like all business views of the corn trade, shows how closely the farmer's interest is identified with a steady non-speculative demand, and how much he is injured by the fluctuations and uncertainties caused by monopoly.

We believe there are not two opinions amongst farmers as to the advantage of immediate over deferred Free Trade in corn. Hear what the Norwich Mercury, a journal deriving its agricultural intelligence from the best sources, says upon the subject :

"The corn trade, as might be anticipated from the political movements, has been in a most torpid state, and will probably remain so, until the great question of Free Trade be settled. There seems but one opinion, now that the result of the debate is known, as to the policy of having it immediate, instead of the deferred plan of the Government. We question, however, if those most interested in it—the tenants—will stir in the matter; and indeed there is but little encouragement to do so, after the great majority in the House of Commons against Mr. Villiers's proposition for total and immediate repeal, the debate on which proves, we think, that the sense of the house is exactly contrary to its vote. It is admitted now to be a sop to the upper house, a boon to the landlords, which we fear will be given AT THE TENANTS' EXPENSE."

ANTI-FEUDAL MOVEMENT.

It seems that the proprietors of entailed estates in Scotland have discovered that in retaining the fetters of feudalism on land, they are in fact restricting their own enjoyment of their own property. Landowners will become more and more aware of that truth, as soon as the delusions, kept up, perhaps, rather than created by the Corn Laws, have been completely dissipated. The following paragraph marks an important and hopeful movement amongst the Scotch landowners :

"THE LAW OF ENTAIL.—A meeting of the proprietors of entailed estates in Scotland was held in the Hopetoun Rooms on Thursday, for 'the purpose of considering the great national evils connected with the law of entail, and the propriety of an immediate application to the legislature thereupon.' The meeting being a preliminary one, the representatives of the press were not allowed access to it. We have, however, been furnished with the following outline of the proceedings:—Sir David Baird, Bart., in the absence of the Marquis of Breadalbane (from whom a communication was made to the meeting) was called to the chair, and gave a lucid statement of the injurious effects of the law of entail in preventing free commerce in land, and particularly as preventing those improvements now rendered necessary to meet the expected competition of foreign corn, and the adjustment of rights between landlord and tenant. As was to be expected, when a subject of such momentous interest was brought before them for the first time, there were different opinions stated by the proprietors present, as to the proper mode of following up the movement. We understand, however, that a unanimous resolution was entered into, remitting to a committee, of which the most noble Marquis of Breadalbane was to be chairman, and Sir David Baird, Bart., the convener, to consider as to the best mode of seeking a legislative remedy for the evils of the entail law, and to call other and more extended meetings as they might deem proper. The meeting, which was pretty numerously attended, lasted about two hours; and only one feeling was expressed as to the great national evil inflicted by the law in question; and subscriptions were entered into for carrying forward the movement, and defraying the necessary expenses."—Edinburgh Witness.

The present state of the great mass of English landowners proves that the cumbrous machinery of settlements and entails has only preserved to aristocratic families the shell, and not the substance, of a large domain.

So general and heavy are the incumbrances upon the estates of the landed proprietors, that with the appearance and burthens of ownership they are little more than receivers and distributors of (nominally) their rents. In many cases, the political influence which the control of the property gives is by far the most beneficial part of the nominal owners' share of an estate. Hence the desperate struggles to retain monopoly and high rents by means of artificial scarcity. Indeed, the intensity of any landowners' protectionist ardour is a pretty good indication of the extent of his incumbrances. All the high-flying "farmers' friends," with very few exceptions, are chin-deep in mortgages; to expect improvement of land in the hands of such men is to expect to gather grapes from thorns. There is nothing to be done with them but to deal with them as with other insolvents, that is, to sell the estates, and distribute the produce amongst the creditors. In most cases, with good management, a surplus would remain which might be really their own, and wherewith they would be far more happy and useful members of society.

AGRICULTURAL CORRESPONDENCE.

The following calculations, which have been forwarded to us by a correspondent, are said to have attracted some attention in a midland county. We offer them to our readers as evidence, that farmers are now beginning, like other men of business, to scrutinise and investigate the circumstances which affect their own business:

FREE TRADE v. PROTECTION.

No. 1.—100 acres of poor land, with protection, farmed under the old system. Wheat, 7s.; Barley, 3s. 6d.; Oats, 2s. 6d.; per bushel. The rent 15s. per acre.

	£	s.	d.
25 acres, fallow
25 " wheat, 4 loads per acre, 100 loads, at 35s. ..	175	0	0
25 " seeds, beans, or tares, less expenses	25	0	0
25 " oats, 4 qrs. per acre; or, barley, 3 qrs., 4l. per acre	100	0	0
100	300

Year's rent, 100 acres, at 15s., 75l., rates and taxes, 25l. .. £100 0 0
Keep for three horses, 75l.; wages, two men, 50l. .. 125 0 0
Capital employed, 500l.; interest 15 per cent. .. 75 0 0

No. 2.—The same, with Free Trade, supposing wheat reduced to 5s.; barley, 2s. 6d.; and oats, 2s. per bushel. Rent 10s. per acre.

	£	s.	d.
25 acres, fallow
25 " wheat, 100 loads, at 25s.	125	0	0
25 " seeds, beans, or tares	25	0	0
25 " oats, 4 qrs.; or, barley, 3 qrs.; 3l. 4s. per acre ..	80	0	0
100	230	0	0

Year's rent, 100 acres, at 10s., 50l.; rates and taxes, 18l. .. £68 0 0
Keep, three horses, 60l.; wages, two men, 40l. .. 100 0 0
Interest on 450l. capital employed, about 13½ per cent 62 0 0

Capital employed, with protection, £500 .. profit £75 62
" " Free Trade 450 .. " "

Capital less, with Free Trade .. 50 .. profit less 13
15 per cent on 450l., .. £67 10 0
Profit 62 0 0

Loss by Free Trade .. 5 10 0

No. 3.—100 acres of poor land, under protection, farmed on an improved system, with wheat 7s.; barley, 3s. 9d.; oats, 3s. On lease for 21 years, thorough drained. Rent, 1l. per acre.

	£	s.	d.
25 acres, fallow, seeds, tares
25 " barley, 5 qrs.; 125 qrs. at 30s.	187	10	0
25 " beans, seeds, or tares, 4l. per acre	100	0	0
25 " wheat, 6 loads; 150 at 25s.	262	10	0
100	550	0	0

Year's rent, 100l.; rates and taxes, 25l. .. 125 0 0
Keep, four horses, 100l.; wages, four men, 100l. .. 200 0 0
Loss by feeding stock for manure .. 50 0 0
Interest on capital employed, 1000l., at 17½ per cent 175 0 0

550 0 0
* This was 100l., and interest 12½ per cent., 125l.

No. 4.—The same, under Free Trade, supposing the price of wheat reduced to 5s.; barley, 3s.; oats, 2s. per bushel; and corn rents 15s. per acre.

	£	s.	d.
25 acres, fallow, seeds, tares, &c.
25 " barley, 5 qrs.; 125 qrs. at 24s.	150	0	0
25 " seeds, beans, or tares, 3l. per acre	75	0	0
25 " wheat, 6 loads; 150 at 25s.	187	10	0
100	412	10	0

Year's rent, at 15s. per acre, 75l.; rates and taxes, 15l. .. £90 0 0
Keep, four horses, 60l.; wages, four men, 100l. .. 160 0 0
Interest on capital employed, 800l., at 20½ per cent 162 10 0

Capital, with Free Trade £800 .. interest 20½ per cent. 162 10 0
" " protection 1000 .. " 17½ "

In favour of Free Trade 2½ per cent.

The calculation in No. 3 is made, supposing the farmer to lose 50l. in feeding stock for the sake of the manure; and I feel quite satisfied that if the system was carried out fairly, it would prove still more in favour of Free Trade principles.

A rise in the value of corn increases the cost of producing; it therefore does not give the farmer the increased profit that might be supposed at first sight, especially when corn is consumed to a great extent in feeding stock; then the high price produces a loss upon the stock fed, much greater than the gain upon the corn sold.

A REAL INUNDATION OF FOOD (NOT FROM TAMBOFF)

FREE OF DUTY.—ALARMING TO THE PROTECTIONISTS.

—The East of Fife Agricultural Society's Show, which lately gratified the good people of that district by a very magnificent display of animal obesity, was succeeded as usual by a dinner, at which the principal speakers were Sir Ralph Anstruther, Lord W. Douglas, Mr. Gillespie Smyth, &c. At, or after, this dinner, a statement was made of a very striking character, on which the editor of the Fife Herald has the following remarks:—"One of the most remarkable incidents of the evening was a statement of an extraordinary nature by Lord William Douglas, which, when made public, will most assuredly startle the country from one end to another, as it certainly did those who listened to it at the meeting. His lordship gravely stated that he had, on the previous day, received from his son, who is at present at Constantinople, a letter with the marvellous intelligence that, in a district where famine had for some time prevailed, the people had been providentially saved by a fall of manna which covered the ground to the depth of about two inches. (Pro di-gi-us! exclaims our P. D. This, if it came near ourselves, would be far worse for the 'agricultural interest' than the repeal of the Corn Laws!) It was further stated that the son had partaken of this singular species of food. Lord William, however, does not anticipate that any phenomenon of this extraordinary description will visit this country, and ergo the landed proprietors and the farmers must trust to their own resources."

The general belief in the political clubs is, that the measures of the Government, for the immediate reduction and eventual abolition of the duty on foreign corn, will be carried in the House of Lords by a majority of from 25 to 30.—Observer of Saturday.

The net income of the property and income tax, as appears by a Parliamentary paper, published on Friday, was, in the year ending the 5th April, 1844, in Great Britain, 5,372,780l. 12s. 6d.; and in the year ending the 5th April last, 5,303,591l. 10s. 1½d.

REVIEW.

The Life and Correspondence of the Marquess of Wellesley. By R. R. R. Pearce, Esq. London: Bentley.

In these instructive and amusing volumes, Mr. Pearce has given a very able summary of the life of a statesman, whose reputation and rewards have been very inadequate for the services he rendered his country. This is in some degree owing to the fact that the most brilliant part of his career, his Government of India, was contemporaneous with a war which taxed all the energies and engrossed all the attention of the British nation, and that his less conspicuous, but not less useful services, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, were blended with discussions which had little attraction in themselves, and less importance in their consequences. Referring our readers to the work itself for the details of Lord Wellesley's laborious career, we shall merely regard him as an enlightened friend of education and Free Trade, at a time when neither of these great principles met favour from men in power.

As a patron of education, Lord Wellesley's most conspicuous exertions were his efforts to establish the college of Fort William in Calcutta. His preface to the regulations intended for that institution are as creditable to him as they are disgraceful to the monopolist who then ruled in Leadenhall Street:

"Whereas it has pleased the Divine Providence to favour the counsels and arms of Great Britain in India with a continued course of prosperity and glory; and, whereas, by the victorious issue of several successive wars, and by the happy result of a just, wise, and moderate system of policy, extensive territories in Hindostan, and in the Deccan, have been subjected to the dominion of Great Britain, and under the Government of the Honourable the English East India Company, in process of time a great and powerful empire has been founded, comprehending many populous and opulent provinces, differing in language, manners, and habits, and respectively accustomed to be governed according to peculiar usages, doctrines, and laws; and whereas, the sacred duty, true interest, honour, and policy of the British nation require that effectual provision should be made at all times for the good government of the British empire in India, and for the prosperity and happiness of the people inhabiting the same; and many wise and salutary regulations have accordingly been enacted from time to time by the Governor-General in Council with the benevolent intent and purpose of administering to the said people their own laws, usages, and customs in the mild and benignant spirit of the British constitution; and whereas, it is indispensably necessary, with a view to secure the due execution and administration of the said wise, salutary, and benevolent regulations in all time to come, as well as of such regulations and laws as may hereafter be enacted by the Honourable the English East India Company that the persons exercising high and important functions in the government of India should be properly qualified to discharge the arduous duties of their respective offices and stations; should be sufficiently instructed in the general principles of literature and science; and should possess a competent knowledge as well of the laws, government, and constitution of Great Britain as of the several native languages of Hindostan and the Deccan, and of the laws, usages, and customs of the provinces which the said civil servants respectively may be appointed to govern; and whereas, the early interruption in Europe of the education and studies of the persons destined for the civil service of the Honourable East India Company, precludes them from acquiring, previously to their arrival in India, a sufficient foundation in the general principles of literature and science, or a competent knowledge of the laws, government, and constitution of Great Britain; and many qualifications essential to the proper discharge of the arduous and important duties of the civil service in India cannot be otherwise fully attained than by a regular course of education and study in India, conducted under the superintendence, direction, and control of the supreme authority of the Government of these possessions; and whereas, no public institution now exists in India under which the junior servants appointed at an earlier period of life to the civil service of the Honourable the English East India Company, can attain the necessary means of qualifying themselves for the high and arduous trusts to which they are respectively destined; and no system of discipline or education has been established in India for the purpose of directing and regulating the studies of the said junior servants; or of guiding their conduct upon their first arrival in India, or of forming, improving, or preserving their morals, or of encouraging them to maintain the honour of the British name in India by a regular and orderly course of industry, prudence, integrity, and religion; the most noble Richard Marquess Wellesley, Knight of the illustrious Order of St. Patrick, &c. &c., Governor-General in Council, deeming the establishment of such an institution and system of discipline, education, and study, to be requisite for the good government and stability of the British empire in India, and for the maintenance of the interests and honour of the Honourable English East India Company, his lordship in council hath therefore enacted as follows."

The rules which followed were truly excellent, and show a thorough acquaintance with the deficiencies of the Company's government and servants, and with the exigencies of British India. But this accuracy and extent of knowledge was a great cause of the failure of the plan:

"Both the college and its founder were, however, doomed to meet with the most severe disappointment. The Court of Directors, while professing to applaud the design and unequivocally sanction the principles on which Lord Wellesley had acted, for some reason never sufficiently explained, ordered the college to be abolished. The greatness of the expense was the excuse put forward; but the truth appears to be, that the men of mere facts, figures, and money-bags, were not reasoned out of their predilection for the old routine of mere mercantile utility; they had not sufficiently entered into Lord Wellesley's enlightened and comprehensive views for uplifting the character of the natives of India, and we fear we must add, that they were actuated by some small personal piques, because the governor-general had attempted to execute, on a scale of such magnitude, so grand a design, without previous authority from Leadenhall-street."

Lord Wellesley wrote in the strongest terms on the subject to Lord Dartmouth:

"I think it proper to apprise your lordship (and I leave it to your discretion to use the information as you think fit) that if the Court should ultimately abolish this institution, it is my fixed and unalterable resolution to propose to Parliament, immediately after my return to England, a law for the restitution of an establishment which I know to be absolutely requisite for the good government of these possessions. So convinced am I of the necessity of this institution, that I am determined to devote the remainder of my political life to the object of establishing it, as the greatest benefit which can be imparted to the public service in India, and as the best security which can be provided for the welfare of our native subjects. The East India Company can afford the expense of the institution. If, however, this proposition be contested, on just grounds, the public ought to indemnify the Company for the amount of the charge. Without such a system of discipline and study in the early education of the civil service, it will be utterly impossible to maintain our extensive empire in India."

His expressions to Lord Castlereagh are even stronger:

"I repeat to your lordship the assurance of my unqualified contempt and abhorrence of the proceedings and propensities of the court of directors, and of my determination to withhold any public reprehension of the wickedness of that graceless faction until I shall be enabled to claim the justice of my king and country in my place in the House of Lords, before a tribunal with whom is righteous judgment."

Mr. Wilberforce not unjustly attributed the opposition which Lord Wellesley met to the hostility of the Court of Directors to the diffusion of Christianity in England. Those who have read the life of Henry Martyn will be at no loss to understand the opposition which the monopolists of that day offered to the presence of pious missionaries in India. Mr. Wilberforce writes:

"MY DEAR LORD W.—Notwithstanding your obliging permission to me to break in upon you to day, intimated to me last night by Mr. Wellesley, yet knowing that just now your time and mind must be so fully occupied, it must naturally arise rather from your friendly disposition to comply with my request than by your own desire, I have resolved not to intrude on your lordship in person; but merely to send you a few lines, which cannot, like a conversation, draw on into a length that was unintended. That I may trespass on you as shortly as possible, I will confine myself to what requires immediate mention, and is, indeed, indispensable."

"I know not whether your lordship has heard of the unreasonable clamour that has been raised by the Anglo-Indians in the House of Commons, against all, even the most prudent, attempts to convert the natives of India; and more especially against missionaries. Now let me hope—a hope which I share with, I am glad to say, a considerable number of men in the House of Commons, and with many more out of it—that your lordship will to-morrow use your just authority in putting to flight these vain fears. The rather because the alarmists are enemies of the system which your lordship certainly established, and which I trust you will confirm and revive—that, I mean, of diffusing useful knowledge of all sorts among the natives of India; and I confess for my own part that I have always held and still retain the opinion that education, the translation and diffusion of the Scriptures and advancement in general knowledge, would be far the most powerful agents in the great work of Christianising the natives of India. Your weight, thrown into the right scale, will make it preponderate."

"I will only add, that your lordship can scarcely conceive (if I may judge of the House of Lords from the general condition of the members of the House of Commons) how ignorant their lordships in general are likely to be respecting India, and therefore how little they are qualified to ask questions in committee. When your lordship can attend, I hope you will now and then look in, and there also prevent the examination from being rendered the excuse for condemning the population of India to ignorance and darkness so long as they continue under British rule. I remember my assurance. I break off, assuring your lordship that I am, my dear Lord W., your lordship's very sincerely,

"W. WILBERFORCE."

Mr. Pearce dwells more briefly than we could wish on the great measures of Free Trade established by Lord Wellesley in British India, which exposed him to much calumny and persecution from the monopolist Court of Directors, and were not appreciated by the incapable successors of Mr. Pitt. At a later period Lord Wellesley came forward as a firm opponent of the Corn Laws, and his conduct at this crisis is justly appreciated by his biographer:

"On the termination of hostilities with America and the Continental war, the blockades which had disarranged the commerce of the whole world, and committed havoc on all regular trade, were removed. Commercial intercourse between nation and nation, it was hoped, would return to its former channels, and peace permit industry and enterprise to exert themselves without hindrance or limitation. A vast artificial system had grown up under the restrictions of rigid blockades and acts of non-intercourse. From the year 1804 to the year 1814 the average price of wheat in England was 90s. per quarter. The landed interests were resolved, if possible, to keep up this scale of prices; and anticipating that the markets would soon be glutted with foreign corn, which could be sold at a much cheaper rate, they made preparations in the Legislature to regulate the corn trade by law. On the 10th of June, 1814, a committee of the House of Lords was appointed to investigate the circumstances of the Corn Trade; in seventeen days from that date they made their report, recommending restrictions on importation. The committee were, on the 27th of June, instructed to examine witnesses on the question, and make a second report. The result of the labours of the committee was, that they recommended that so long as the average price of wheat was under 80s. per quarter, the ports should be completely closed against supplies from other countries—that till the average price of wheat attained the pivot of 80s. foreign corn should be absolutely prohibited. This was considered by the agriculturists as a very reasonable proposition,—80s. per quarter for wheat being accounted a very "low figure." Some of the witnesses were of opinion that the ports should be shut against foreign grain till the price of wheat was 90s. per quarter; and out of sixteen agricultural witnesses examined before the committee, but four suggested a lower standard than 80s. The second report on the corn trade was presented on the 29th of July, 1814; but the country had not yet felt the evils of peace, the session closed without any other legislative proceeding relative to corn than the repealing the 54th of George III. c. 69, by which a bounty was given on its exportation.

"The recommendation of the Lords' committee produced violent tumults in the metropolis, in the large towns, and in the manufacturing districts. Public meetings were held to petition against its adoption, and the whole country was in a state of dangerous commotion."

"The average price of wheat in some months of the year 1811 was as low as 66s. and even 60s. The agriculturists became alarmed. Again, they declared, was impending over British agriculture; and early in the session of 1815 a bill was brought into Parliament, giving effect to the recommendations of the committee of the previous session, and fixing 80s. per quarter as the point at which importation could be permitted,—positively prohibiting all foreign corn as long as prices were below that mark."

"The manufacturing population petitioned and remonstrated; but as neither Leeds, Manchester, Birmingham, nor the other great seats of commercial enterprise, were then represented in Parliament, their expostulations were unheeded. Riots took place in many places, and a strong feeling of discontent and disaffection to the Government was manifested in different parts of Great Britain."

"The bill was warmly contested in Parliament, but the influence which the nomination boroughs secured to its promoters in the House of Commons enabled them to command decided majorities in its favour. At an early stage of the Corn Bill in the House of Commons a division took place on the proposition that 74s. should be substituted instead of 80s. The motion was negatived by an overwhelming majority; there being 35 votes for it; against it 154. On the 3d of March, the vicinity of the Houses of Parliament was thronged by a vast multitude in a high state of excitement. Several members were stopped and interrogated: some were roughly handled; and the houses of many of the advocates of the new regulations were visited by the populace. The military were called out; and it required great exertions to keep the streets clear. On this evening (the 3d of March) the gallery of the House of Commons was closed against strangers. Another attempt was made to mitigate the stringency of the law by making 74s. the standard instead of 80s. There were, however, but 77 votes in favour of the proposal, and 208 against it. On the 8th of May, on the bringing up of the bill, the advocates of Free Trade made another attempt to throw out the bill. An amendment was moved that the bill should be read that day six months, and it was supported by many able speeches; but the amendment was lost, there being, 50 for it, 108 against it. A final effort was made to substitute a lower pivot price than 80s., leaving it to the house to determine what the precise sum should be: 78 members supported this motion, and 184 opposed it. On the 10th of March, the last attempt was made to arrest the progress of the bill; 77 voted for throwing out the bill,—245 for it. The Corn Bill passed the House of Commons by a majority of 168."

"In the House of Lords the measure passed with less difficulty. It was sanctioned by the Upper House on the 20th of March by a majority of 107;—there being 21 non-contents; among whom was the Marquess Wellesley. His lordship had, in his conflict with the Court of Directors while in India, exhibited a steadfast adherence to freedom of trade; and he opposed the Corn Bill of 1815, on the ground that it was wrong, on principle, to place restrictions on the supply of food, and that the general happiness was best promoted by leaving commerce free. The arguments against prohibitions or restrictions on the importation of corn are most summarily summed up in the well-known protest drawn up by Lord Grenville and the Marquess Wellesley."

Lord Wellesley lived to see the monopoly of the India Trade destroyed, and we feel our respect for his memory increased by having our attention directed to that subject, at a time when the still greater grievance of monopoly of food, which he so steadfastly resisted, totters to its fall.

CORN DUTIES—It will be recollected that, soon after Parliament met, Sir Robert Peel held out that so soon as the resolutions which he had to propose for the reduction of duties were passed in committee of the House, the new duties would come into operation; but subsequently, he stated that he was in error in making the promise, as the old duties must remain in force until the Bill for reducing them obtained the royal sanction. Technically, Sir Robert was quite right; but he has since departed from his own technical rule by agreeing that all the articles to which his new tariff applies, with the exception of wheat, barley, and oats, shall be admissible at the new duties from the date of the resolutions passed in committee being reported; and, as that has been done, the articles, with the above exceptions, are so admissible at the present moment. Indian corn, buckwheat, and rice, then, may now be imported and let out of bond at the nominal duty of one shilling; and a Treasury order to that effect has been issued.—Londonderry Journal.

FREE TRADE ORGANISATION IN MARYLEBONE.—A public meeting of the electors of the borough of Marylebone, resident in St. Pancras, took place on Thursday evening, the 12th inst., in the Bedford Saloon, Bedford Arms, High-street, Camden-town, for the purpose of forming an organisation in favour of Free Trade, and securing the return of two Free Trade candidates at the ensuing election, by a new and united Borough Reform Association. Joseph Ivimey Esq., of Amphill-square, presided, and was supported by Messrs. Douglas, Dyke, J. Wells, Clarke, Vince, Aldis, and other well known reformers of the district. Delegates also attended from Marylebone and Paddington; amongst them were observed Messrs. J. Williams, H. C. Wilson, W. Kennett, John Loveridge, Charles Nixon, J. Savage (Titchfield-street), Thorne, Swaine, &c. &c.

TIME WORKS WONDERS.—It is remarkable that the majority in favour of Sir Robert Peel's measure of total repeal is the same almost to a unit as that with which the same Parliament rejected Lord John Russell's eight shillings duty!

PLYMOUTH FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. SYMONS, THE HON. SECRETARY.—On the 11th inst., a large and highly influential meeting was held at the Plymouth Mechanics' Institute in compliance with a requisition from the respected President, C. B. Calmady, Esq., for the purpose of taking into consideration a proposition which that gentleman had to submit. The company generally were unprepared as to the object of the meeting, which was that of presenting a testimonial to Mr. Symons, the honorary secretary of the Association, for his valued and zealous services; but when they were made acquainted with its purport, they welcomed it with their most cordial approbation, and the only matter discussed in reference to it was as to the most effective way in which it should be carried out. In the course of the evening one or two other matters were touched upon incidentally—the members congratulated each other on the progress of their opinions—they excited each other to further exertion in the good cause—they declared that their work was not yet finished, but only commencing; and it was evident that they are determined to proceed with decision in unshackling our trade, and in giving greater freedom to our institutions. This is scarcely to be wondered at; the protectionists compel the continuance of the League and of those other bodies that have sprung up in opposition to monopoly; and we question whether they will not yet have great cause to regret the partial continuance of their unholy laws, even for the space of three years.

The Chairman opened the business by saying that he had taken the liberty of asking their attendance in order that they might take into consideration a proposition which he wished to submit to them with regard to the services of their excellent Secretary, Mr. John Symons (cheers). That was the sole object of this meeting; and he felt that they must be unanimous upon two points—that he had done his duty efficiently, and that he had also done it gratuitously (loud cheers).

After farther enlarging on the valuable services of Mr. Symons, the Chairman called upon other gentlemen to address the meeting—an appeal, which was responded to by W. Burnell, Esq.; Lieut. J. D. Haswell, R.N.; the Rev. W. J. Odgers; G. W. Soltan, Esq.; Mr. Friar, Mr. Blackwell, and other gentlemen zealously devoted to the good and prosperous cause, in behalf of which the Association was formed. The Rev. C. Aldrick, a clergyman of the Church of England, read an admirable paper, expressive of the change which his mind had undergone on this question, entirely through the reasoning and information promulgated by the League, and that Association. The opinions of the rev. gentleman were expressed with great vigour and with much firmness, and the candour of his remarks led to frequent and enthusiastic cheering.

By unanimous concurrence, a committee was named to consider the most appropriate method of expressing their hearty estimation of Mr. Symon's disinterested and incessant efforts to promote the efficiency of the Association and the success of the cause. It was suggested that some honourable token, expressive of their gratitude and esteem, should be presented to Mr. S. at a general tea-meeting, of which due notice would be given, and at which it was hoped that they might both congratulate their secretary, and themselves, and the great interests of this country, on the general recognition of their principles, and the ultimate success of their efforts in agitating Free Trade.

AN ACT FOR THE ABOLITION OF "HANSARD."—We have determined, for good reasons, to draw a bill, which we beg Sir Robert Peel, the Cabinet, and Parliamentary converts to Free Trade at large, to accept. We shall not trouble them with this little bill. Unlike little bills in general, it is calculated to give them pleasure, and no doubt they will gladly pass it. Here it is: "Whereas, it is expedient that on divers subjects, topics, and principles of legislation, Members of Parliament shall, upon rational conviction, or on other grounds or inducements which need not here be alluded to, change and alter their minds, speak and vote contrarily to their former professions, and veer and turn about in such manner as to them shall seem good and convenient, and that without let, molestation, or hindrance. And whereas, when disposed to make such change, the fear and dread of being twitted with inconsistency, and subjected unto irony, sarcasm, and ridicule on account thereof, is a serious let, a grievous molestation, and a strong hindrance to the accomplishment of this their design. And further, whereas any record or document containing and setting forth their said former professions, and the speeches, declarations, or votes, which they have made or given in time past, doth help and enable any evil or maliciously disposed person or persons so to twit and ridicule them, and overwhelm them with sarcasm and irony. And whereas during a late debate numerous and several hon. members have been, after this fashion, by that kind of persons, twitted, ridiculed, and sarcastically and ironically reviled to their great annoyance and discomfort, and to the infliction on them of a heavy blow and a great discouragement, by reason whereof they are well nigh unable to show their faces."

"And lastly, whereas there existeth a certain record or document of Parliamentary Debates, commonly called Hansard, which unhappily hath furnished the means and occasion of citing, quoting, raking up, and casting in their teeth their former speeches, votes, and declarations aforesaid; and which, if it continues to exist and be in being, will afford a like handle on future similar occasions which may be confidently expected to occur. Now, in order to prevent and render impossible hereafter for ever such injuries and vexatious revival of things past, to the discomfort and detriment of hon. members, and in particular to the affixing on them of the odious nickname of Rat; and also for their encouragement in the due and fitting change of their opinions."

"Be it therefore enacted; and it is hereby enacted, That the said record or document of Parliamentary proceedings called Hansard be forthwith, altogether, and entirely suppressed, discontinued, abrogated, and utterly abolished; sufficient and reasonable compensation to the printers thereof having been rendered."—Punch.

"PROTECTION."—Sir James Graham's annual let of grazing parks took place last week, and although the quantity of land offered for competition was considerably less than last year, the total rental obtained exceeded that of last year by upwards of 100%. This, in the face of Sir Robert Peel's new tariff! Who shall say that our "cocks of the north" are afraid of competition, or that they apprehend we shall be "dependent on foreigners for our supplies?"—Carlisle Journal.

OLDHAM.

REPRESENTATION OF OLDHAM.—On Monday evening a well-attended and highly respectable meeting of the friends of Free Trade, convened by circular, was held at the King's Arms Inn, Town Hall Place, for the purpose of selecting a gentleman suitable to become a candidate for Oldham on Radical and Free Trade principles. About one hundred gentlemen were present, the greater proportion of them electors. Scholes Brierley, Esq., hat manufacturer, was called upon to preside. Jonathan Mellor, jun., Esq., earnestly recommended the Liberals of the borough to be united above all things in their choice of a candidate to represent the borough in the room of General Johnson, who was expected to resign. He was extremely sorry to see the Radical and Free Trade party very much divided in their opinions as to the suitability of a candidate, but he denied that there was any truth in a rumour that had been circulated to the effect that he had identified himself, so far as support went, with the friends of Mr. John Cobbett.—William Simmons, Esq., hat manufacturer, introduced the name of John Whittaker Esq., of Higher Hurst, Ashton-under-Lyne, as a likely gentleman to be invited as a candidate, and after commenting in commendatory terms on the qualification of Mr. Whittaker, concluded by proposing that he be invited to become a candidate. John Bentley, Esq., of Greenacres Moor, seconded the motion. John Phillips Brierley, moved that the report of a sub-committee appointed at a previous meeting, recommending Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., of Liverpool, as a suitable gentleman for a candidate, be adopted.—Mr. James Butterworth, draper, of Greenacres Moor, seconded the motion. Mr. Radcliffe, solicitor, secretary of the Free Trade committee, read a communication received from Mr. Heyworth by the Radical Election Committee, explanatory of his political views. Mr. Wrigley, the secretary of the Radical Election Committee, stated, by request of parties present, that that committee had twice determined that W. J. Fox, Esq., of London, was the most suitable gentleman to become a candidate on thorough Radical and Free Trade principles. Mr. Radcliffe read the communication received from Mr. Fox by the Radical Election Committee. Abraham Wild, Esq., of Marlam Mill, proposed that W. J. Fox, Esq., of London, should be invited to become a candidate. Mr. James Chadwick, of Lees Road, seconded the motion. On the suggestion of Mr. Bailey, the letters received by the Radical Election Committee from John M. Cobbett and James Holladay, Esqrs., were read. Mr. Wrigley stated that letters had also been received from Messrs. Surge, Miall, and Vincent, but he had not them in his possession then. Mr. A. F. Taylor, of Haggate, Royton, observed that the friends of Mr. Fox had brought that gentleman forward solely with the object of uniting the Liberal party together. Mr. James Bailey, of Oldham, remarked that he extremely regretted the divisions that had taken place in the Liberal party, but as it was very desirable that they should have a townsman as a candidate on Radical principles, he would at once propose that James Holladay, Esq., be invited to become a candidate. Mr. E. Barlow, publican, seconded the motion. The various motions being put to the meeting, and a show of hands taken, the numbers were; for Mr. Fox, 46; Mr. Heyworth, 7; Mr. Holladay, 4; Mr. Whittaker, 4. The chairman declared Mr. Fox to have the majority, and in making the announcement pledged himself to do all in his power to secure his return. Jonathan Mellor, jun., Esq., recommended the propriety of each of the three Radical Election Committees appointing two or three persons from each to canvass the borough immediately, and ascertain which of the three Liberal candidates would have a majority, and that it should be arranged that the one who would be likely to obtain the greatest support should be then supported by the whole body of the Liberal party. Mr. Arrowsmith seconded the motion; and after some discussion, in which Messrs. Bailey, B. Barlow, Taylor, and Dransfield took part, the motion was rejected on a show of hands, by a large majority against it. On the motion of Daniel Collinge, Esq., the following gentlemen were appointed a sub-committee to prepare a requisition to W. J. Fox, Esq., Messrs. Wrigley, S. Brierley, A. F. Taylor, John Holden, M. Scholesfield, and J. Heap. The proceedings terminated by a vote thanks to the chairman.—Manchester Times of Friday.

THE
FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Paulson, Esq.,
Richard Potter, Esq.,
William Davies, Esq.,
William Wilson, Esq.,
R. G. Wilford, Esq.,
Sidney Smith, Esq.,
Charles Swaisland, Esq., Grayford.
TRUSTEES.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Fitzhugh-terrace, Islington.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place.
Captain Coggin, Upper Mill, Hammer-smith.
SECRETARY.
Messrs. Prescott, Grote, & Co.
Josh. Trimey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.
CLERK.
Mr. Frederick Farrand, Priory Villa, Peckham.
SECRETARY.
Mr. Alfred Leach Saul.

Prospectuses may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Office, East Temple Chambers, Whitechapel street, Fleet street. The Rules (6d. each) are now ready, and may be had as above.
Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately.
The Society's Office will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

THE
FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—
As the Second Subscription is about to be called for, parties intending to avail themselves of the benefits of the Association are requested to make application for shares immediately. Until the Second Subscription is called in, shares can be obtained on the same terms as those which have been already taken up. Attendance at the Office, East Temple Chambers, Whitechapel street, Fleet street, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from Six to Nine o'clock.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 21, 1846.

We once more beg to impress upon the minds of our readers that the time has not yet come when it would be safe to relax our exertions or abate our vigilance. The policy of the protectionists is to delay the progress of the measures now before Parliament until sheer weariness of watching may produce popular apathy, and thus furnish an excuse either for rejecting the Ministerial proposals, or so mutilating them as to destroy their efficacy. It is now certain that the Bill for repealing the Corn

Laws will not reach the House of Lords in time to pass before the Easter recess, and monopolists hope that the protraction of a settlement will produce a kind of careless anxiety to get rid of the contest on any terms:

For even with goodness men get discontent,
When times are out of joint and virtue spent;

These tactics, openly and avowedly adopted by our opponents, point out to us the course which we must adopt. Perseverance, steady and continuous perseverance, can alone ensure final success. Any sign of wavering on our parts would stimulate the monopolists to some great effort to disappoint our hopes, and dash away the cup at the moment it approached our lips. Let us then remember that "the end is not yet." The harbour is in sight, but it is not yet safe to drop the anchor; there are rocks and shoals to be passed, before we can reach sure holding ground. Our pilots are watchful, our officers are steady; let not our crew give way to premature indulgence of triumph. It may be that the resistance we have yet to encounter may be greater than even the monopolists themselves have yet ventured to anticipate; but we may be assured that its strength will be exactly proportioned to our state of preparation. If we exhibit such an array of force, spirit, and determination, as to render the issue certain, the struggle cannot be protracted; but if we appear supine and acquiescent, the monopolists will not fail to profit by the opportunity. "While men slept the enemy sowed tares;" let us, therefore, not sleep, "but keep our loins girt, and our lamps burning."

The monopolists are avoiding the final issue; they see that now the cause of truth and justice would be sure to triumph, but they also know that popular excitement is in its nature transitory, and that a people is in most danger during a period of reaction. We must show them that the demand for "Free Trade" is no sudden ebullition of passion, but the result of deep-rooted conviction and strong principle. Truth is the same to-day that it was yesterday, but zeal in the advocacy of truth is liable to fluctuations. The Free Traders have hitherto been as remarkable for their steadiness as for their sincerity; they have only to maintain their position, and the overthrow of monopoly will be complete, speedy, and ir retrievable.

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. Mar.14	MON. Mar.16	TUES. Mar.17	WED. Mar.18	THUR. Mar.19	FRI. Mar.20
Bank Stock	211½	212	212½	113	..
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	..	95½	95½	96½	96	95½
3 per Ct. Con. Ann.	96½	95½	95½	96½	96	95½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	107½	107	107	107	107	107
Long An. Ex. 1860	107½	107	107	107	107	107
Cons. for Acct.	96½	96½	96½	96	96	95½
Exc. Bills, pu.	34	34½	33½	35	29	..
Ind. Bds. un. 1000l.	40
Venezuela 2 per Ct.	4½
Do. deferred.	13½	13½
Belgian 4½ per Ct.	13½	97½
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	..	83	84	83
Chilian	99	99½	99	..
Colomb. ex. Venez.	88½
Danish	95	95	91½	94½	94½
Dutch 4 per Cent.	60	59½	..	59½
Dutch 2½ per Cent.	31½	31½	31½	31½	31½	31½
Mexican	36½	37½	36
Peruvian	109
Portug. conv.	26	26	25½
Russian 5 per Cent.	26½	26½	26	26	26	25½
Spanish 5 per Ct.	36½	36½	36	36½	36½	36½
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, MARCH 16.—We are to-day again moderately supplied with English Wheat, both coastways and by land-carriage. Fine dry White Wheat fetches 1s. more money than last Monday, but all other descriptions sell at the same prices as on that day. In Bonded Wheat the transactions continue to be to a very limited extent, without alteration in price. The arrival of Barley to this morning's market is not large; the best samples sell readily at last week's prices, but inferior qualities hang rather heavily on hand. Altogether there are about 22,000 quarters of Oats in the return; of these about 8000 are Foreign, and are being landed in bond. The trade is not very active, and it is impossible to effect an extensive business; but the prices obtained are rather higher than last week. Beans and Peas in fair show, with no alteration in value. S. H. LUCAS.

	BRITISH.	PER IMPERIAL QUARTER
Wheat, Essex,	Red 54 to 60	White 58 to 66
Kent, & Suffolk	49	58
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	47	54
Scotch	54
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feeds	22	21
Do.	22	25
Ditto	22	25
Ditto	22	25
Scotch Feeds	26	26
Lincolnshire	24	25
Ditto	27	29
Cork
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	21	23
Sligo	29	24
Galway	19	21

Barley	36	39
Beans, Maragan	New 31	31
Harrow	33	37
South	39	40
Peas, White	38	42
Groy	30, 32	32
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 250 lbs.	45
Norfolk and Suffolk	46

FOREIGN.

	PRICE.	IN BOND.
Wheat, Danzig, high mixed	58 to 65	54
Rostock	56	60
Stettin	52	58
Hamburg	52	57
Olesna	48	50
Odessa Polish	50	51
Russian
Ditto
Spanish	51	60
Algarve	56	62
Australian	60	69
Barley, Gristling	37	23
Distilling	20	31
Oats, Archangel	24	25
Danish
Swedish	21	24
Stralund
Dutch Feeds	22	23
Brew	27	25
Polands	29	24
Black
Beans, Egyptian	34	36
Peas, White
Ditto Boilers	42	..
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 166 lbs. ..	35	..
United States	36	37
Danzig	28	30
Australian, per sack of 250 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Mar. 9 to Mar. 14, 1846, both days inclusive.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	9588	5577	7584	1703	709
Scotch	30	680	138	..	10
Irish	5389
Foreign	18929	140	800	3540	1557

Flour, 6459 sacks; 1635 barrels.

FRIDAY, MARCH 20.—During the week 25,000 quarters of Foreign Wheat have arrived to this market. Of English Wheat there is not much fresh up. There is no alteration in the value of either English or Foreign from Monday. The trade continues dull. Very little Barley has arrived; and what is on sale fully supports Monday's prices. Several vessels, with about 12,000 quarters of Oats from Ireland, are reported in time for to-day's market. This is a considerable proportion of what was on the way from Ireland; so that the quantity at present coming is very limited. From Scotland also but few shipments are now being made. The trade to-day is dull; but is, more money asked than on Monday, and what sales are effected are at fully 6d. over the prices of that day. There is no alteration in the value of Beans or Peas. The duty rose yesterday 1s. each on Barley, Beans, and Peas. S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 16th of March to the 20th of March, both inclusive.

	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	2160	..	25000
Barley	970
Oats	2170	11500	690

Flour, 1020 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending March 17, 1846.

	Qrs.	Price.		Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	7281	59s. 6d.	Rye	27	36s. 0d.
Barley	4590	50s. 5d.	Beans	14½	34s. 10d.
Oats	18213	22s. 11d.	Peas	715	35s. 0d.

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.
s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d.
7th Feb.	54	3	30	10	21	7
14th "	54	0	31	6	21	9
21st "	55	0	29	11	21	6
28th "	54	6	29	7	21	5
7th March	54	10	29	3	21	10
14th "	54	3	29	4	21	9

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 54s. 7d.; Barley, 29s. 11d.; Oats, 21s. 8d.; Rye, 35s. 5d.; Beans, 34s. 11d.; Peas, 34s. 10d.

Duty. Wheat, 18s. 0d.; Barley, 9s. 0d.; Oats, 6s. 0d.; Rye 9s. 6d.; Beans, 8s. 6d.; Peas, 8s. 6d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Feb. 5, 1846.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.	Flour
In London, 424256	13765	48060	..	534	1351	115436	Cwts.
Unit. King. 1061780	74467	82619	..	4757	4175	685814

MEAT MARKET.

The supply of Beef being inadequate to the consumption very much advanced the price this week.

	PRICE OF 8 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.
Prime Beef	4s 0d to 3s 8d
Middle Mutton	4s 2d to 4s 0d
Middling do.	3s 6d to 3s 4d
Plain, or info.	3s 4d to 3s 2d
Prime Mutton	4s 0d to 3s 8d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, MARCH 13.

BANKRUPTCY ANNOUNCED.

Henry Pearson Coles, of Suffolk, innkeeper.

BANKRUITS

Joseph Scholesfield, Cheapside, cutler. [Messrs. Reed and Langford, Friday street.

Miles Griffith and Philip Pearson, of New Bond street, tailors. [Messrs. Wood and Fraser, Dean street.

Thomas Hubert, Hungerford Market, Strand, lighterman. [Mr. Tribe, Barge-yard-chambers, Bucklersbury.

J. E. West and H. Tennant, Leeds, stock brokers. [Mr. H. Walker, Farnival's Inn, London.

A. Shipton and J. W. Jenkins, Painswick, Gloucester, clothiers. [Mr. W. T. Paris, Stroud, Gloucestershire.

Thos. Sutton, jun., Atherstone, Warwickshire, draper. [Mr. Wratlaw, Rugby.

W. Hading, Stockport, cotton manufacturer. [Mr. J. Coppock, Cleveland-row.

D. Broadhead & A. J. Halcro, Leeds, stock brokers. [Messrs. Williamson and Co., Gray's Inn, London.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

R. Stevenson and Co., Glasgow, sewed muslin manufacturers.

J. Robertson, Glasgow, iron merchant.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17.

CROWN OFFICE.

MEMBERS RETURNED TO SERVE IN THE PRESENT PARLIAMENT.

Borough of Stafford.—The Hon. Sir James Thomas Carnegie, one of the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury.

Borough of New Wiltshire.—Hugh Neville, Esq., one of the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury.

County of Mayo.—Joseph Miles McDonnell, Esq., in the room of Mark Billo, Esq., who has accepted the office of Steward of her Majesty's Chiltern Hundreds.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

Peter Orr, Kilmarnock, skinner.

James Cowper, Broomelton, farmer.

Henry Reid and John Reid, Greenock, drysalter.

THE FREE TRADE, or CORNUCOPIA WALTZES.

—Dedicated by permission to R. W. J. M. P., and published expressly for the benefit of the League Fund. The book by subscription to E. M. J., No. 9, Rutland-square, Hampstead-road, London. Price 2s. 6d.

Price 3s. 6d.

COMPENSATION to the People for Aristocratic Food

Laws and Unfair Taxation, &c., the Influence of Aristocracies on the Condition of Nations. By J. M. G. Esq., London: Fisher, Son, and Co., and all Booksellers.

Now ready at all the Libraries, 3 vols., post 8vo, £1 11s. 6d.

LOVE, WAR, AND ADVENTURE.

Also in a few days, price 10s. 6d. H. K. Esq., London: Fisher, Son, and Co., and all Booksellers.

This day is published, in 1 vol., price 9s., with a Railway Map.

CHURTON'S ENGLISH COUNTY CALENDAR.

—Containing a concise description of each County, its Geographical Position, Population, Cities, Towns, Commerce, Fairs, Markets, and Railway Stations, with Lists of the Peers, M.P.s, Lord Lieutenants, High Sheriffs, Deputy Lieutenants, Magistrates, County Officers, Legal Functionaries, Bankers, Stamps, Taxes, &c. London: Fisher, Son, and Co., and all Booksellers.

Shortly will be published by Subscription.

THE ORIGINAL PAMPHLETS AND PUBLIC LETTERS OF MR. WARRS, ON THE CULTIVATION OF FLAX, the Fatiguing of Cattle upon Native Produce, Box Feeding, and Summer Grazing.

The Work will contain much additional information, be illustrated by Engravings of the Cattle Boxes with the requisite Apparatus, and be found calculated for distribution amongst Farmers of every grade; insuring, where adopted, proportionable benefits, to the smallest and to the largest occupier.

Profits to be appropriated to the promotion of the Flax Cause. Price 6s. 6d., or Four Copies for a Guinea.

The names of Subscribers will be received at Trimmingham, Norfolk, till the 25th of March, when the List will be published with the book.

CRABBS LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols., royal 8vo., price £2 18s., boards.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY IN ITS PRESENT STATE,

practically arranged and digested in all its branches, including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By George Chas. Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-law.

A. Maxwell and Son, 32, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn.

PLAIN INSTRUCTIONS TO EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS,

showing their Duties, and how safely to perform them, and especially illustrating, by Forms adapted to every variety of case, all of which are properly filled up, the mode of complying with the Requisitions of the Legacy-duty Office, in passing the Accounts and paying Legacy-duty, obtaining a Return of Probate-duty, &c. This work is in very general use in Attorney's Offices. By J. H. Brady, Esq., Barrister-at-law.

Also, by the same Author, in 8vo., price 5s., boards.

PLAIN ADVICE TO THE PUBLIC TO FACILITATE THE MAKING OF THEIR WILLS.

A. Maxwell and Son, 32, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn.

Now ready, published by G. Berger, Holywell-street, Strand, and to be had of all Booksellers.

THE LADIES' GAZETTE OF FASHION for April, price 1s., post free, 1s. 6d., contains a superb Extra Plate, and Spring Fashions in extraordinary and unprecedented variety, amounting to double the number given in any other work. 4 large Plates, 70 Figures, Patterns of 30 Walking Dresses, 20 Evening Dresses, Children's Dresses, and endless novelties. Descriptions, Tales, Poetry.

PERCY ANECDOTES, at Half price.—A New Edition of the established Percy Anecdotes, uniform with the first Edition, of which they were sold, and containing the same Engravings and Letterpress at half the price. Vol. 1, price 3s., handsomely bound, and Parts 1 and 2, price 1s. 3d. each, are now ready.

NEW WORK BY GEORGE CRUKSHANK.

On 31st March, price 1s., the continued Monthly No. 1 of OUR OWN TIMES.

Illustrated by GEORGE CRUKSHANK. London: Bradbury and Evans, 90, Fleet-street.

TO INQUIRE ABOUT MEMBERSHIP.

Now publishing, price 3s. 6d., in cloth boards.

PRACTICAL INSTRUCTION IN ANIMAL MAGNETISM OR MESMERISM; the result of 35 years' experience and observation.

By T. P. F. DELUCZ. This volume is for the express purpose of guiding novices—its spirit is very beautiful, and its instruction safe.—Harriet Martineau.

London: Cleave, Shoe-lane; Manchester: Heywood; and all Booksellers.

WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID.

Addressed to the Nervous and Dyspeptic. By R. J. C. Esq., M.D., Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, &c. Sherwood, 12, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand.

CORNER'S NEW HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading.

Each History, commencing with the earliest authentic records, is continued to the present time; faithfully portraying, also, the Manners, Customs, and States of Civilisation of the People.

England and Wales; five fine plates, and map, 4s. - - - 3s. 6d.

Ireland; three fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Scotland; three fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

France; three fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Spain and Portugal; three plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; with two fine plates and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Germany and the German Empire; three fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Tukey and the Ottoman Empire; three fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Poland and Russia; with three fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Italy and Switzerland; three fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

Holland and Belgium; with two fine plates, and map, - - - 2s. 6d.

The object of these works—peculiarly suited to Schools and Families—is to furnish the reader with a clear and accurate History of each Nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the Religion, Customs, National Characteristics, State of Civilisation, and Domestic Habits of the people, in various periods of their history—to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of diction, and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.

London: Dean and Co., Threadneedle-street; and, by order, of all Booksellers.

National Tableau of Public Interest, which has been Eight Months in Preparation.

THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert, and their four lovely children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F. Tussaud, the Costumes by Mrs. F. Tussaud, is now added to the Collection.

—BAZAAR, Baiton-street, Portman-square, and all the principal Dealers.

—This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis.—Times.

Admission, 1s.; Napoleon 1st, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 10 till 10.

LITHOGRAPHY.

MESSRS. MACLURE, MACDONALD, and MAC-

GRIGOR, General Lithographers, beg to call attention to a peculiar feature in their system of conducting business: namely, their having a large and permanent staff of Assistants, in all the varied departments of the Art, on the premises, which arrangement they submit gives a force and effect to immediate production unobtainable by other means, and which is obviously of great advantage to those who may require their services, independent altogether of the excellence of their work.

London Establishment, Saville House, 6, Leicester Square; Liverpool Establishment, 18, Fenwick-street, Glasgow Establishment, 37, Buchanan Street.

Vacancies for two Pupils, one in Writing, the other in the Artistic Department.

FENDERS, STOVES, and FIRE-IRONS.

Bright steel fenders, 4 feet, from 30s. each; rich bronzed scroll do., with steel bar, 10s.; iron fenders, 3 feet, 4s. 6d.; wrought iron kitchen fenders, 3 feet, 1s. 6d.; bright register stoves, with bronzed ornaments, and two sets of bars, from 5s.; bed room register stoves, 2 feet, 16s.; fire-irons for chambers 1s. 6d. per set, handsome do., with cut heads, 6s. 6d. The money returned for every article not approved of. Detailed Catalogues, with engravings, sent per post free.

WILLIAM S. BURTON'S date RIPPON and BURTON'S stock of general furnishing ironmongery is literally the largest in the world, and as no language can be employed to give a correct idea of its variety and extent, purchasers are invited to call and inspect it.—29, Oxford-street corner of Newman-street. Established in Wells-st., 1820.

THE TOILET.—No toilet can be considered complete without careful attention to the department which so materially affects the entire contour—the face, which, both in beauty and quality is susceptible of most material improvement. That which is weak can be strengthened, and be made to receive most beautiful gloss, by artificial applications. It is to its extraordinary and valuable properties in these respects that is due the character of the OLD RIGGS' BALM OF COLUMBIA.

for its invigorating, nutritious, and strengthening qualities. 3s. 6d., 6s., and 12s. per bottle. No other price is genuine.—Oldriggs's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

GLASS.—A Splendid Stock of GLASS LUSTRES

Glass Chandeliers, Planes, and Table Lights, Engraved and Richly cut Decanters, Line Cases, and every description of Table Glass, at F. and C. OSBORN, 41, Oxford-street, near Brompton-street. Also, a very great and extensive assortment of Bohemian, French, and Venetian Glass, just imported. Manufacturers, Broad-street, Birmingham. Established, 1847. Wholesale and export orders executed on the lowest terms.

BEDFORD AND HIGGINS.

Mixed, per lb. - - - 1s. 6d. Best Tarragon Grey Goose 2s. 6d. Grey Goose, - - - 1s. 6d. Best Irish White Goose, 2s. 6d. Foreign ditto - - - 1s. 6d. Best Dantale - - - 1s. 6d.

BEAL and SON, 195 (opposite the Chapel), Tottenham Court Road.

THE DISSENTERS' and GENERAL LIFE and FIRE

ASSURANCE COMPANY.—(Instituted 1857.)—Empowered by Special Act of Parliament, 3 Vic. c. 23.—82, King William-street, London-bridge, London; 21, St. David-street, Edinburgh; 6, King-street, Queen's-square, Bristol.

Capital, £100,000. Trustees and Directors.

George Bousfield, Esq., Thomas Chubb, Esq., M.D., Jacob C. Esq., Esq., John Dixon, Esq., Esq., Peter Ellis, Esq., Esq., Joseph J. Fletcher, Esq., Esq., Richard Hollier, Esq., Esq., Charles Hindley, Esq., M.P., Thomas Piper, Esq., Thomas H. Simpson, Esq., Esq., and Smith, Esq., Esq., Hon. C. P. Wilson, M.P., Esq., John Wilks, Esq., Esq., Edward Wilson, Esq., Esq.

On the return of the Lady Day Quarter, the Directors beg leave to remind their friends that the Life Department they receive profits of all descriptions, including chapels, school-rooms, mills, roads, and shipping in dock, farming &c., &c., at the same reduced rates as other respectable companies, and make no charge for fire policies transferred from other offices.

In the Life Department, they continue to transact all business relating to life assurance, annuities, and family endowments, upon the most liberal terms consistent with sound principles and public security.

Loans are also granted on equitable terms to life-assurers on life interests, or satisfactory personal securities.

All agents and solicitors, surveyors and auctioneers, liberal allowance will be made. By order of the Directors.

THOMAS PRICE, Secretary.

ALLIANCE BUILDING and INVESTMENT SOCIETY.

(On Messian's Plan to terminate in 11 Years.) Shares, £130. Monthly Subscriptions, 12s. per Share. Entrance, 2s.

In this Society there is no Redemption Fee. No Fine on Withdrawal. No building for Shares. And other advantages.

The whole of the last charges, exclusive of Stamp and Registration Fee, £10s. 6d., £12s. 6d., £14s. 6d., £16s. 6d., £18s. 6d., £20s. 6d., £22s. 6d., £24s. 6d., £26s. 6d., £28s. 6d., £30s. 6d., £32s. 6d., £34s. 6d., £36s. 6d., £38s. 6d., £40s. 6d., £42s. 6d., £44s. 6d., £46s. 6d., £48s. 6d., £50s. 6d., £52s. 6d., £54s. 6d., £56s. 6d., £58s. 6d., £60s. 6d., £62s. 6d., £64s. 6d., £66s. 6d., £68s. 6d., £70s. 6d., £72s. 6d., £74s. 6d., £76s. 6d., £78s. 6d., £80s. 6d., £82s. 6d., £84s. 6d., £86s. 6d., £88s. 6d., £90s. 6d., £92s. 6d., £94s. 6d., £96s. 6d., £98s. 6d., £100s. 6d., £102s. 6d., £104s. 6d., £106s. 6d., £108s. 6d., £110s. 6d., £112s. 6d., £114s. 6d., £116s. 6d., £118s. 6d., £120s. 6d., £122s. 6d., £124s. 6d., £126s. 6d., £128s. 6d., £130s. 6d., £132s. 6d., £134s. 6d., £136s. 6d., £138s. 6d., £140s. 6d., £142s. 6d., £144s. 6d., £146s. 6d., £148s. 6d., £150s. 6d., £152s. 6d., £154s. 6d., £156s. 6d., £158s. 6d., £160s. 6d., £162s. 6d., £164s. 6d., £166s. 6d., £168s. 6d., £170s. 6d., £172s. 6d., £174s. 6d., £176s. 6d., £178s. 6d., £180s. 6d., £182s. 6d., £184s. 6d., £186s. 6d., £188s. 6d., £190s. 6d., £192s. 6d., £194s. 6d., £196s. 6d., £198s. 6d., £200s. 6d., £202s. 6d., £204s. 6d., £206s. 6d., £208s. 6d., £210s. 6d., £212s. 6d., £214s. 6d., £216s. 6d., £218s. 6d., £220s. 6d., £222s. 6d., £224s. 6d., £226s. 6d., £228s. 6d., £230s. 6d., £232s. 6d., £234s. 6d., £236s. 6d., £238s. 6d., £240s. 6d., £242s. 6d., £244s. 6d., £246s. 6d., £248s. 6d., £250s. 6d., £252s. 6d., £254s. 6d., £256s. 6d., £258s. 6d., £260s. 6d., £262s. 6d., £264s. 6d., £266s. 6d., £268s. 6d., £270s. 6d., £272s. 6d., £274s. 6d., £276s. 6d., £278s. 6d., £280s. 6d., £282s. 6d., £284s. 6d., £286s. 6d., £288s. 6d., £290s. 6d., £292s. 6d., £294s. 6d., £296s. 6d., £298s. 6d., £300s. 6d., £302s. 6d., £304s. 6d., £306s. 6d., £308s. 6d., £310s. 6d., £312s. 6d., £314s. 6d., £316s. 6d., £318s. 6d., £320s. 6d., £322s. 6d., £324s. 6d., £326s. 6d., £328s. 6d., £330s. 6d., £332s. 6d., £334s. 6d., £336s. 6d., £338s. 6d., £340s. 6d., £342s. 6d., £344s. 6d., £346s. 6d., £348s. 6d., £350s. 6d., £352s. 6d., £354s. 6d., £356s. 6d., £358s. 6d., £360s. 6d., £362s. 6d., £364s. 6d., £366s. 6d., £368s. 6d., £370s. 6d., £372s. 6d., £374s. 6d., £376s. 6d., £378s. 6d., £380s. 6d., £382s. 6d., £384s. 6d., £386s. 6d., £388s. 6d., £390s. 6d., £392s. 6d., £394s. 6d., £396s. 6d., £398s. 6d., £400s. 6d., £402s. 6d., £404s. 6d., £406s. 6d., £408s. 6d., £410s. 6d., £412s. 6d., £414s. 6d., £416s. 6d., £418s. 6d., £420s. 6d., £422s. 6d., £424s. 6d., £426s. 6d., £428s. 6d., £430s. 6d., £432s. 6d., £434s. 6d., £436s. 6d., £438s. 6d., £440s. 6d., £442s. 6d., £444s. 6d., £446s. 6d., £448s. 6d., £450s. 6d., £452s. 6d., £454s. 6d., £456s. 6d., £458s. 6d., £460s. 6d., £462s. 6d., £464s. 6d., £466s. 6d., £468s. 6d., £470s. 6d., £472s. 6d., £474s. 6d., £476s. 6d., £478s. 6d., £480s. 6d., £482s. 6d., £484s. 6d., £486s. 6d., £488s. 6d., £490s. 6d., £492s. 6d., £494s. 6d., £496s. 6d., £498s. 6d., £500s. 6d., £502s. 6d., £504s. 6d., £506s. 6d., £508s. 6d., £510s. 6d., £512s. 6d., £514s. 6d., £516s. 6d., £518s. 6d., £520s. 6d., £522s. 6d., £524s. 6d., £526s. 6d., £528s. 6d., £530s. 6d., £532s. 6d., £534s. 6d., £536s. 6d., £538s. 6d., £540s. 6d., £542s. 6d., £544s. 6d., £546s. 6d., £548s. 6d., £550s. 6d., £552s. 6d., £554s. 6d., £556s. 6d., £558s. 6d., £560s. 6d., £562s. 6d., £564s. 6d., £566s. 6d., £568s. 6d., £570s. 6d., £572s. 6d., £574s. 6d., £576s. 6d., £578s. 6d., £580s. 6d., £582s. 6d., £584s. 6d., £586s. 6d., £588s. 6d., £590s. 6d., £592s. 6d., £594s. 6d., £596s. 6d., £598s. 6d., £600s. 6d., £602s. 6d., £604s. 6d., £606s. 6d., £608s. 6d., £610s. 6d., £612s. 6d., £614s. 6d., £616s. 6d., £618s. 6d., £620s. 6d., £622s. 6d., £624s. 6d., £626s. 6d., £628s. 6d., £630s. 6d., £632s. 6d., £634s. 6d., £636s. 6d., £638s. 6d., £640s. 6d., £642s. 6d., £644s. 6d., £646s. 6d., £648s. 6d., £650s. 6d., £652s. 6d., £654s. 6d., £656s. 6d., £658s. 6d., £660s. 6d., £662s. 6d., £664s. 6d., £666s. 6d., £668s. 6d., £670s. 6d., £672s. 6d., £674s. 6d., £676s. 6d., £678s. 6d., £680s. 6d., £682s. 6d., £684s. 6d., £686s. 6d., £688s. 6d., £690s. 6d., £692s. 6d., £694s. 6d., £696s. 6d., £698s. 6d., £700s. 6d., £702s. 6d., £704s. 6d., £706s. 6d., £708s. 6d., £710s. 6d., £712s. 6d., £714s. 6d., £716s. 6d., £718s. 6d., £720s. 6d., £722s. 6d., £724s. 6d., £726s. 6d., £728s. 6d., £730s. 6d., £732s. 6d., £734s. 6d., £736s. 6d., £738s. 6d., £740s. 6d., £742s. 6d., £744s. 6d., £746s. 6d., £748s. 6d., £750s. 6d., £752s. 6d., £754s. 6d., £756s. 6d., £758s. 6d., £760s. 6d., £762s. 6d., £764s. 6d., £766s. 6d., £768s. 6d., £770s. 6d., £772s. 6d., £774s. 6d., £776s. 6d., £778s. 6d., £780s. 6d., £782s. 6d., £784s. 6d., £786s. 6d., £788s. 6d., £790s. 6d., £792s. 6d., £794s. 6d., £796s. 6d., £798s. 6d., £800s. 6d., £802s. 6d., £804s. 6d., £806s. 6d., £808s. 6d., £810s. 6d., £812s. 6d., £814s. 6d., £816s. 6d., £818s. 6d., £820s. 6d., £822s. 6d., £824s. 6d., £826s. 6d., £828s. 6d., £830s. 6d., £832s. 6d., £834s. 6d., £836s. 6d., £838s. 6d., £840s. 6d., £842s. 6d., £844s. 6d., £846s. 6d., £848s. 6d., £850s. 6d., £852s. 6d., £854s. 6d., £856s. 6d., £858s. 6d., £860s. 6d., £862s. 6d., £864s. 6d., £866s. 6d., £868s. 6d., £870s. 6d., £872s. 6d., £874s. 6d., £876s. 6d., £878s. 6d., £880s. 6d., £882s. 6d., £884s. 6d., £886s. 6d., £888s. 6d., £890s. 6d., £892s. 6d., £894s. 6d., £896s. 6d., £898s. 6d., £900s. 6d., £902s. 6d., £904s. 6d., £906s. 6d., £908s. 6d., £910s. 6d., £912s. 6d., £914s. 6d., £916s. 6d., £918s. 6d., £920s. 6d., £922s. 6d., £924s. 6d., £926s. 6d., £928s. 6d., £930s. 6d., £932s. 6d., £934s. 6d., £936s. 6d., £938s. 6d., £940s. 6d., £942s. 6d., £944s. 6d., £946s. 6d., £948s. 6d., £950s. 6d., £952s. 6d., £954s. 6d., £956s. 6d., £958s. 6d., £960s. 6d., £962s. 6d., £964s. 6d., £966s. 6d., £968s. 6d., £970s. 6d., £972s. 6d., £974s. 6d., £976s. 6d., £978s. 6d., £980s. 6d., £982s. 6d., £984s. 6d., £986s. 6d., £988s. 6d., £990s. 6d., £992s. 6d., £994s. 6d., £996s. 6d., £998s. 6d., £1000s. 6d., £1002s. 6d., £1004s. 6d., £1006s. 6d., £1008s. 6d., £1010s. 6d., £1012s. 6d., £1014s. 6d., £1016s. 6d., £1018s. 6d., £1020s. 6d., £1022s. 6d., £1024s. 6d., £1026s. 6d., £1028s. 6d., £1030s. 6d., £1032s. 6d., £1034s. 6d., £1036s. 6d., £1038s. 6d., £1040s. 6d., £1042s. 6d., £1044s. 6d., £1046s. 6d., £1048s. 6d., £1050s. 6d., £1052s. 6d., £1054s. 6d., £1056s. 6d., £1058s. 6d., £1060s. 6d., £1062s. 6d., £1064s. 6d., £1066s. 6d., £1068s. 6d., £1070s. 6d., £1072s. 6d., £1074s. 6d., £1076s. 6d., £1078s. 6d., £1080s. 6d., £1082s. 6d., £1084s. 6d., £1086s. 6d., £1088s. 6d., £1090s. 6d., £1092s. 6d., £1094s. 6d., £1096s. 6d., £1098s. 6d., £1100s. 6d., £1102s. 6d., £1104s. 6d., £1106s. 6d., £1108s. 6d., £1110s. 6d., £1112s. 6d., £1114s. 6d., £1116s. 6d., £1118s. 6d., £1120s. 6d., £1122s. 6d., £1124s. 6d., £1126s. 6d., £1128s. 6d., £1130s. 6d., £1132s. 6d., £1134s. 6d., £1136s. 6d., £1138s. 6d., £1140s. 6d., £1142s. 6d., £1144s. 6d., £1146s. 6d., £1148s. 6d., £1150s. 6d., £1152s. 6d., £1154s. 6d., £1156s. 6d., £1158s. 6d., £1160s. 6d., £1162s. 6d., £1164s. 6d., £1166s. 6d., £1168s. 6d., £1170s. 6d., £1172s. 6d., £1174s. 6d., £1176s. 6d., £1

THE LEAGUE.

No. 131.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newalls-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

PLAIN HINTS TO ALL PARTIES.

We are afraid the people and the protectionists do not, even yet, quite understand one another. There is a mistake somewhere—a twofold and mutual mistake—pregnant with very serious consequences, to at least one of the parties concerned. On each side there is a disposition to take things for granted; and things taken for granted are apt to turn out unpleasantly. The people are too easy about the Bill—and the protectionists are too easy about the people. Agitation has had a lull, since Sir Robert Peel took the Free Trade business in hand; and the landlords flatter themselves they have seen the worst. They do not discriminate—they mistake the quiescence of confidence for that of indifference—the repose of conscious power for lassitude and weakness—a momentary halt for a final retreat. Because we feel ourselves so sure of our revolution that we can afford to take it composedly, they fancy we are willing to let them off, and go without our revolution. As they have neither been tossed in a blanket, nor brushed into the Thames, they take heart and play their antics—and, “thank God,” they have not been in a hurry—and don’t mean to be in a hurry, for who knows but the chapter of accidents may turn up something to their advantage?

We warn both parties not to be too sure. The people will do well not to take for granted anything about the Bill that it is not in their own power to realise. It is anything but certain that the Bill will pass. To be sure, Sir Robert Peel has made a Government measure of it, and the Premier has got a reputation for passing his measures; but we have nothing that can be called a guarantee for the passing of this measure. Sir Robert Peel can give us no sort of assurance that his Bill will encounter, unharmed, the ordeal of that “other place” to which it will be forwarded some time between now and next Christmas. Sir Robert Peel’s jurisdiction does not, in the estimation of some of our best and most modern political geographers, include that “other place.” The Duke of Richmond, the other day, on catching the words “Corn Bill,” “repeal,” and “delay,” as read from a petition, interjectionally ejaculated, “I do not say that it will pass at all;” and we, for our part, are not prepared to contradict very positively the vaticinations of a prophet who possesses, we know not what power, of verifying his own prediction. We “do not say that it will pass at all;” i.e., that Sir Robert Peel’s Bill will pass at all. We can only say, that we can’t say. We only know, that there is no knowing. The Bill has a long way to go yet before reaching the haven of the statute book, and there is no counting and measuring chances. We never heard yet, on reliable authority, that a majority of lordly votes would so much as affirm the second reading—to say nothing of the dangers of the Committee, at which stage proxies go for nothing. It is quite certain that the opposition will be very numerous, very fierce, and very reckless—and will enjoy, in Lord Stanley, the leadership of a chieftain pre-eminently qualified for heading a mad party in a mad policy. It is also certain, that a meeting of the protectionist peers has just been held, the temper of which would appear to have been very much the same with that of the men who “thank God” for their own obstinacy, and hold themselves “justified in resorting to any Parliamentary form to get rid of the measure.” On the whole, we advise the people to make sure of nothing—to believe nothing till they see it—and prepare themselves meanwhile to act on the instant, as occasion may require it.

To the landlords likewise we would offer a word in season. It may not be, indeed, a very hopeful task, advising Messieurs the protectionists to be rational. Yet there are degrees and individual diversities in all collective psychological phenomena; and it is just possible that the good seed of cautionary suggestion may fall, here and there, on good ground. Possibly it may not be altogether a waste of time to attempt interpreting, for the benefit of protectionist honourable gentlemen and noble lords, the real significance of those indications of public opinion and temper which they are so dangerously bent on reading the wrong way. We warn them not to mistake the import of the present lull:—there are in it, and beneath it, all the elements of a storm brewing—of such a storm as the oldest man among them has never been out in yet. That the country takes the present delay so quietly, is because the country has not the particle of a doubt but it will all come right by and by. We are not particular for a week or two, more or less, because we look on the eventful result as a fixed thing. It never occurs to us to doubt that what Sir Robert Peel, and Lord John Russell, and every man with a statesman’s name and fame among the adherents of either of these party chiefs, are unanimously agreed on, is certain of coming to pass;—and if it were not, we have, behind and underneath our faith in Peel and Russell, an absurd, self-relying faith in our own strength and the inevitable course of events. Now, this is a decidedly dangerous temper of mind to take liberties with. When, for weeks and months together, the total repeal of the Corn Law has stood foremost among the certainties of the people’s political creed; when popular expectation has become familiar with the total repeal of the Corn Law as with a thing that is as good as done; when the very certainty and nearness of repeal have already begun to suspend or relax exertions that seem to be no longer in requisition;—then, we say, let all lords and men take care how they thwart so ripe a national purpose, so strong and self-collected a national will.

If their lordships of the Upper House have it in contemplation to throw out this bill—or to “amend” it, which would come to exactly the same thing—they will do well to prepare themselves for very disagreeable consequences. In the event of the Peel measure not becoming law, there will be such a revulsion of public feeling as England has not seen yet—not even in those Reform Bill days which a few of their lordships may happen to retain in fresh remembrance. The people had never felt so sure of the Reform Bill as they feel now of the Free Trade Bill. The people had never felt the Reform Bill to be already as good as passed, as they have now, for upwards of two months, felt the Free Trade Bill to be as good as passed. There never was such a union of parties in favour of the Reform Bill, as there is now in favour of a Free Trade policy, that arrays on one and the same side all the first-class statesmen of the country, and the entire commercial and industrious public, without a shadow of distinction between Whig and Tory; or between capitalist and operative. There never was such unanimity for the Reform Bill, as that expressed and represented by the deputations from Lancashire that have visited London within the past two days. And there never was the same physical and social necessity for the Reform Bill which there is for abolishing a prohibitory food tax in the face of famine. We tell the protectionists—as they were told not long since by Mr. Cobden—that there is opinion enough on this question to change the constitution of the country. Let them look to it, that this stupendous, but as yet quiescent, mass of moral force be not stimulated into active and antagonistic self-assertion.

Assuming that if it visibly came to be a question between protection and the “order,” our protectionist peers would mostly be for letting protection go, and standing by their order, we beg to give them early notice that this is the question. The rejection of the Government measure by the House of Lords would bring us at once to the broad practical issue,—which is the stronger, the House of Lords, or the empire minus the House of Lords? There would be nothing to break or divide the force of that reactionary movement which would instantly set in against aristocracy as a political power. It would be, the Lords against the country, and the country against the Lords. The case would be terribly distinct and simple. The Lords would stand ALONE. The sympathies of no one class or party in the country would be with them. They are, essentially, a class by themselves. No other class is mixed up with them. Lords are only lords. They have no merchants, no manufacturers, no middle-class men among them. They are all landowners, and only landowners. If rumour be correct in stating that “the duke” has, in a quiet way, pressed on their lordships’ attention the dire possibility of a NEW REFORM BILL as the penalty of obstinacy, rumour has certainly done great honour to the duke’s sagacity. No institution, or constitution, on the face of the earth could stand the stress of such a struggle as would commence in this country, from the hour in which the House of Lords should declare itself Non-content with the Bill for giving hunger and industry their own.

THE LANDLORDS’ CHIEF DIFFICULTY.

The progress of the great Parliamentary talking-match against time does not present any noticeable points. Since the house disposed of the political philosophy of those distinguished statesmen who rest England’s “maritime supremacy” on bad ships and little trade, things have gone on rather heavily. A tedious succession of nobodies have duly mouthed, with dismal uniformity, their several and respective nothings; and we may fairly hold ourselves exonerated from the worse than Egyptian toil of endeavouring to make something out of nothing. Even the Free Trade speeches, excellent as they were in themselves, of Mr. Fox Maule and Mr. Hawes, can scarcely be regarded as having materially helped forward the business of the house and the country. In the present state of the question, “constitutional silence” seems, on the whole, the best contribution that our best friends can make to the public cause.

One speech of the week deserves, however, to be named, as standing out in relief from the general blank and negation of practical interest. Mr. Francis Baring, on Tuesday night, offered a really useful and timely aid to the progress of business.

Mr. Baring asked the protectionists a question which, it is evident, has stuck by them ever since, and which they will probably continue to ponder over, not altogether without benefit to themselves and the public in general. He "begged to ask them what THEY proposed to do with regard to this Corn Law?" Let us have your plan, gentlemen protectionists. You will not have Peel's Bill—you will not have the League's Bill—what will you have? Suppose you were in office to-morrow, what would you come down to Parliament to propose the day after to-morrow? By your own admission—an admission which you have only begun retracting since its inconvenient consequences have suggested themselves—you must do something. By your own admission, the sliding scale of 1842 will not exactly do now. You have confessed, that with famine in Ireland, Sir Robert Peel would have been justified in suspending—or was, rather, bound to suspend—the sliding scale that won't slide. You would have indemnified him if he had suspended it. You have condemned him because he has not suspended it. You are ready to help him in suspending it now—at least, the other day you said you were. Well, then, if you come in, the sliding scale of 1842 goes out, for a while;—and what do you mean to put in its place? You can never restore it—for its suspension would be its condemnation. Suspend the sliding scale, and you deny its self-acting power—the only merit which it was ever pretended that it possessed. Suspend the sliding scale, and you must give us a new Corn Law of some sort or other;—now do tell us, of what sort. "Condescend to be intelligible."

If the faction were honest and in earnest, this would be decisive. It is plain that if Mr. Miles or Lord George were Prime Minister to-morrow with a working majority of Tyrrells and Finches, he would by-and-bye begin to do exactly what his predecessor had done. The moment responsibility really pressed, he would show himself a perfect Peel for perfidy. Tyrrell would turn traitor, and Finch himself would finch. No help for it. The Peel premises, which are FACTS, would necessitate the Peel conclusion. The moment they began breathing official atmosphere, they would inhale the "Free Trade influenza." It is only a question who shall do it, and when it shall be done;—done it must and will be. The difference is only a little sooner, or a little later—this year or next year—the spring or the autumn—by this Parliament and Cabinet, or by another;—in a time of comparative national quiet, or amid the crash of confusion of a political hurricane. The protectionist Premier's three months' experience—one only wishes he could have it free of cost to the empire—would come to exactly the same thing as Sir Robert Peel's three years' experience: protection would go all the same—only some other things quite as valuable would go with it.

IRELAND AND THE CORN LAWS.

It was with mingled feelings of regret and surprise that we felt ourselves compelled to annul last week on the advocacy of the Corn Laws by Mr. W. Smith O'Brien. Another Irish member has adopted the same course since our last publication, whose exhibition gives us no pain, as the very best of causes would have been dishonoured by his advocacy—and no surprise, for his career has been marked by the most perfect consistency. The right honourable Frederick Shaw, representative of the Dublin University, has been the unvarying supporter of Corn Laws and coercion bills—of protection and proscription—of prizes to landlords, and penalties to tenants—of ascendancy for one class and degradation for another—of the despotism of the few and the oppression of the many; so that it needed not the notorious disregard of his arrogant pretensions by the Premier to explain his opposition to any and every measure designed for the general benefit of the Irish people.

So jumbled in his cranium meet
The subjects, he must often doubt
Whether this year, 'twas bonded wheat
Or bonded papists they let out.

There were, however, a candour about the Shaw system of policy, a simplicity in his theory of economic science, and a truthfulness in his exposition of his system of Government, which merit attention, if not approbation. Irish destitution is, in his view, a matter of periodical recurrence; and, therefore, he declares that relief must be unnecessary. Like the eels in the fable, the Irish are as used to be starved alive, as the fish were to be skinned alive; and, therefore, the application of a remedy is superfluous. In his opinion there has been a prescriptive right established for famine, and a vested interest created for fever; and if the two pestilences have been this year a little more destructive than usual, he deems that their excesses deserve no more reprobation from Englishmen than wholesale ejections have received from Lord Brougham. It is only a question of the lives of a few thousand peasants, more or less; a matter far too trivial to interfere with the weightier matters that press upon the mind of a Dublin Recorder, or an English ex-Chancellor.

The representative of a University is generally taken as a type of the intellectual standard of the place of learning that has made him its choice. The Lord help Trinity College if its member be ever taken as a measure of its capacity! He says that fever in Ireland is to be attributed to want of employment, and not to want of food! There is not a child in an English Sunday School who could not tell him that employment is only valuable as a means of purchasing food; and that want of employment and want of food are perfectly identical. It would be time to despair utterly of Ireland if Mr. Frederick Shaw were taken to represent its intelligence, and Mr. Smith O'Brien its patriotism.

But Mr. Shaw supports his views by a reference to authorities; he quotes Mr. Justice Torrens, who declared at Omagh that "he had not been greatly struck by any appearance of starvation or misery." Rolling in a comfortable carriage over the excellent roads of the county Tyrone, and escorted by policemen, javelin-men, and the retainers of a high-sheriff, it is not at all probable that such an amount of misery would be brought within the sphere of observation as would greatly strike the mind of Mr. Justice Torrens; and if, according to the theory of Descartes, magnitude of external object requires equal magnitude of mind to afford due susceptibility, we should not be at all surprised to learn that the effect of the striking on the mind of Mr. Justice Torrens was in something like an inverse ratio to the misery which he witnessed.

The next witness is Mr. Lefroy, the member for Longford; but he gives adverse evidence, for he allows the admission to ooze out that "precautions are necessary,"—not such precautions as those with which the name of Lefroy is apt to be associated, against too great comfort in farmers, or too great respectability in tenants,—but precautions against actual famine, and the perilous counsels of starvation.

The letters of the unnamed clergymen read by the learned Recorder must be taken, like all anonymous statements, as destitute of any weight from external evidence. Let us then glance at their internal value. A clergyman of the established church (we should be glad to know his name), residing near Fermoy, declares, "My own potatoes are very good; and several persons whom I saw opening pits, told me that theirs were very good, also." The excellent man!—quite content with hearsay for the supply of his poor neighbours, but resolved to have ocular demonstration for his own store! Now, in this very town of Fermoy, several meetings have been held, at one of which at least Lord Mountcashel (no great friend to Free Trade), was present, and took an active part in the proceedings, when resolutions proclaiming a terrific state of destitution in the town and neighbourhood, and a still more terrific prospect for the coming summer, were unanimously adopted. Where, then, was this pious clergyman, whose own potatoes were very good? Why was not his voice raised to give hope in the midst of despair? How beautiful upon Kilworth mountains would have been the feet of the bearer of such glad tidings! The yale of the Blackwater would have rejoiced, and the dell of the Funchoon would have reflected its gladness! But this anonymous clergyman appears to be one of those who proclaim evil with the sound of a trumpet, and love to whisper announcements of good into such sympathetic ears as those of Mr. Frederick Shaw. There are so few Presbyterian clergymen in the south of Ireland, that the correspondent of Mr. Shaw, under this title, is sure to be identified, and to furnish a theme for laughter unextinguishable as that of Homer's gods. We say for laughter, because the ludicrous and the melancholy have a strange propinquity in their sympathetic associations. Democritus and Heraclitus have their representatives in every human bosom.

Si credas utrique
Res sunt humanæ flebile ludibrium.

"The mournful laughing-stock" of the poet would be as perfectly exemplified in the presbyter's letter, if we could be quite sure that the extracts were not garbled; but on this point we have a doubt, and we give the unfortunate man the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Shaw informed his hearers, or rather his readers (for we cannot believe that the speech before us was really spoken in a legislative assembly, and are disposed to believe that reporters have formed a conspiracy against recorders), that he was no political economist—a fact which it needed no ghost to tell us,—but he added that he was a man of common sense, and forthwith set himself to refute the assertion most satisfactorily. He compared the keeping of Irish corn at home for the support of the people to the case of a butcher keeping his meat to feed his family; and the mischievous reporters assert, that amid the collective wisdom of the British nation were to be found such arrant blockheads as those who could cheer the comparison. Every-body knows, that for every joint of meat the butcher exports from his shop, he imports other articles of consumption or the means of purchasing them; while for the quarters of corn exported from Ireland, the producing peasantry literally import nothing. So far as Ireland is concerned, the whole question turns on the interest of the producers,—a very different interest from that of landlords, as the demand for a coercion bill proves, unfortunately, too well,—and we need go no farther than Mr. Shaw himself, to prove the consequences of the Corn Laws on the condition of Irish producers, when he tells us that they are subject to periodical visitations of scarcity, of which the present famine is but a slight aggravation.

While we write, the copy of a petition for the continuance of the Corn Laws, from certain grand jurors of the county of Tipperary, has been placed in our hands. Now it is a singular but not inexplicable coincidence, that the petitions in favour of the Corn Laws from the South of Ireland have emanated from the landlords in the disturbed districts, while not one has come from a locality in which peace and order have been maintained without interruption. Of the three names that appear in the Parliamentary return, two, we believe, represent properties in other counties. We should like to know how these names happen to be influential for protection in Tipperary, and of no avail in Cork and Waterford? It is significant to find that Corn Laws are most supported where coercion bills are most earnestly sought; and we leave our readers to ponder on the fact that those who are the most opposed to exchange of produce are also most averse to exchange of thought; and that the supporters of restriction on trade are also the clamourers for restriction on every principle that deserves to be considered a constituent of freedom.

THE AMERICAN FREE TRADE LEADERS.—We have the pleasure to announce the receipt by the League of a gratifying present from America. Henry Gourdin, Esq., of Charleston, South Carolina, has presented to the Council the busts of the Hon. J. C. Calhoun and the Hon. George Macduffie, the Villiers and Cobden of America. These busts of the distinguished leaders of the Free Trade party in America, and the advocates of peace, have been placed in the Council Room, surrounded by the various portraits of their cotemporary labourers in the same good cause in England. We hope this is the commencement of a collection of distinguished Free Traders of all nations.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE
SESSION OF 1846.

Tenth Week, ending Saturday, March 28.

The new farce of Protectionist tactique, the title of which is Never say Die, continues to be played nightly in the House of Commons with a most unsuccessful yet most persevering run. Sometimes the benches are crowded; more frequently they are empty, unless when a vote is required, and then a powerful majority musters, to give to the house and the country an emphatic declaration of opinion. But the minority receive each successive defeat in the same sense that the actor who was playing Richard the Third on a barn door, Bosworth Field, received an encore—he got up after he was killed, to gratify his audience by being killed over again. The whole thing would be very funny if it were as harmless as Richard's duplicate death. But when the bankers, the merchants, the manufacturers, the traders, of London, Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, and all our other great towns, are pouring into the House of Commons petitions complaining of the mischief which the unnecessary delay is causing, it is scarcely possible to keep temper at witnessing the desperate conduct of a desperate faction. Had Mr. Villiers and his supporters pursued a similar line of conduct on any occasion during the last seven years, the section "under the gangway" would have uttered frantic outcries, and branded their conduct with all the terms of a copious vocabulary. Even on occasions when the certainly modest request was preferred, of prolonging an Anti-Corn-Law debate for a day longer, in order to allow members who had not yet spoken an opportunity of expressing their opinions, there used to be vociferous shouts for a division; and the "gangway section," in particular, poured out such epithets as "factious," "indecent," "vulgar," and so forth. Now, they have had two clear months, and yet show no disposition to submit to the constitutional will of a majority. Let them beware of setting the precedent of a REVOLUTIONARY practice, the imitation of which, at some future period, may show how possible it is to "better the instruction" given by the protectionist faction.

Compare the conduct of the Anti-Corn-Law League, as exhibited by its supporters in the House of Commons, with that of the Miles and Bentinck clique on the present occasion. The Anti Corn-Law League invariably submitted to the expressed will of a majority. In so doing they acted most constitutionally, and proved how truly conservative are those reformers who rely on the force of argument and the power of truth. Their renewed discussions were certainly most distasteful to those who are now the "gangway" revolutionists. But though they persevered in bringing them on, they also allowed them to go off. The debates ran their constitutional course. They were commenced, and they were finished. Motions were made; speeches were delivered; a division was called for; and Mr. Villiers and his friends were defeated. Then, "strong in faith," and "hoping against hope," they submitted to legislative will, and turned to the country. With perfect and humble reverence be it said, there is, though of course in a far inferior degree, an analogy between the course of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and that of the first propagators of Christianity. The leading language of both was "submit to those who are in authority," even though they brand your doctrines as absurd, and your conduct as wicked. But continue your peaceful exertions until the moral atmosphere is charged with your doctrines. If Cæsar repulses you, retire respectfully from his presence; and continue your argument with the subjects of Cæsar. Then, when you have triumphed in the country, return once more to the palace. Appeal again unto Cæsar. It may be that his heart will be opened; and that fact, experience, and truth, may lead him to kick his idol into the fire, and become a leader in your ranks.

What is the course of the section "under the gangway?" Literally that of mere desperadoes. It would be absurd—nay, a little too much of the ludicrous—to compare Lord George Bentinck to Milton's "Satan"; for it is not recorded in "Paradise Lost" that he wore white kid gloves, a little soiled, though we have not the least doubt that he has often won bets at Epsom and Newmarket. Yet, on Friday night week, in his speech on the timber duties, Lord George uttered, in hissing accents, a furious speech, the burden of which was, "Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven!" For the sake of protection he would have war with France, war with the United States, war for Oregon, war for anything, war with everybody. He scarcely disguised his object by adopting the correct phrases about "thundering broadsides," "language not to be understood," (a blunder which caused a great laugh, and which he corrected by saying "not to be misunderstood") and other warlike epithets. The undeniable construction of the speech of Lord George Bentinck, on Friday night week, was clearly this: Let us get this country into a desperate struggle with other nations, and then we will have a chance of at once thinning our surplus population, and of maintaining high rents for a long time to come.

The whole conduct of the protectionists is worthy of such a leader. They have no other idea than that of "obstruct, obstruct, obstruct." Their speeches, they believe, will find their way, like so many hopping toads, to the House of Lords, and, in particular, will sit down at the ear of that pacific Eve, Lord Stanley, and persuade him to pluck the fruit which may bring ruin on our world; for, be it known, that Lord Stanley thinks that he has been politically extinguished by Sir Robert Peel, forgetful of much that may be attributed to his own petulance and his pride. So he is waiting in senatorial dignity for the expected opportunity of finding out a new way of paying old debts. He may be stimulated to try if he can upset the present political stage-coach, in order once more, to run his own "Derby Dilly" in its stead. Never mind commerce. Never mind trade. Never mind manufactures. Give us a row—the vernacular meaning of appealing to the constituencies. Let not our readers suppose this to be too strong. The madness of faction is much stronger. It touches, as the protectionists think, the interest of their breeches pockets; and so, with Lord John Manners, they sing—

"Let trade and commerce, laws and learning, die,
But give us still our corn nobility."

We are sorry that truth compels us to say that the language and conduct of the Whig party gives some encouragement to the protectionists. For, though they are heartily supporting the ministerial measures, their whole tone and temper, their language and their acts, amount to this:—Let us get the Corn Bill passed, and then an early occasion will arise for a motion which will upset the Government of Sir Robert Peel. The protectionists take advantage of this, and they hope that by protracting the debate, the occasion will arise before the Corn Bill has passed. Meantime, Sir Robert Peel, conscious that by his inconsistency he has saved the aristocracy from ruin, and the country from the dangers, of an ultimate revolution, patiently, devotedly, determinedly, perseveres, as if he had made up his mind that the present ministerial schemes were the fulfilment of his present mission, and that he will dignifiedly retire when what he himself has termed his "great undertaking," has been accomplished.

Of the debate, on Friday night week, on the timber duties (which terminated the initiatary discussions on the tariff) we are not disposed to take any notice. The leading point was the violent and inflammatory speech of Lord George Bentinck. Its characteristics were the practical speech from Mr. Warburton, and the sensible one from Mr. Charles Bulwer. If nonsense could ever comprehend sense, these two speeches might have been conclusive. But a division was necessary. For the Government measure there voted 233; against it 109, giving a majority of 123. Then permission was given to introduce the bill or bills embodying the tariff.

On Monday, Earl Grey, in the House of Lords, raised an important debate on the state of Ireland. The attendance of peers was numerous; and Earl Grey, who, as Lord Howick, in the House of Commons, used to support the motions of Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden with great power, clearness, and force of argument, did not lower his reputation on the present occasion. His speech contained many boldly uttered truths, which the House of Lords is not in the habit of hearing. But after a lengthened debate, the noble lord's motion was rejected by 61 to 17.

In the House of Commons, the second reading of the Corn Bill came on, when, as had been announced, an amendment was proposed, on which it was understood there was to be a week's discussion. On this occasion there was a slight change of performers. The amendment, that the Bill be read "that day six months," was proposed by

Mr. Eliot Yorke, the brother of the Earl of Hardwicke, and one of the representatives for Cambridgeshire. It will be recollected that the Earl of Hardwicke held a situation in the royal household, which he resigned when Sir Robert Peel announced his measures. Now, so long as the Earl retained an official position, his brother, the county member, defended the Government, and got himself into much trouble with his constituency; and to do some of the farmers and landlords of the Cambridgeshire fens justice, they are about as troublesome a set of protectionists as may be found. The reason is at hand. They believe that if protection be withdrawn, the sea will not merely break down their dykes, but flood their low levels, sowing "wild oats" over their property. The Earl of Hardwicke having gone into opposition, his brother goes also, and makes up for his former advocacy of Sir Robert Peel by the bitterness of his present attack on him. "The right hon. baronet," said Mr. Eliot Yorke, in a fluent, dippant, schoolboyish speech, looked to posterity for his indemnity, and there was no doubt but that the future historian would give him his due. He would be represented as a man who had been trusted on account of his professions by a great party of his countrymen, but whom that party had been obliged to abandon on account of his subsequent withdrawal from every one of these professions. It would be said of him—

"He stood alone, a renegade
Against the party he betrayed;
He stood alone amidst his band,
Without a trusted heart or hand."

This sort of vituperation from the small fry of the protectionists must often remind Sir Robert Peel of the Fool in King Lear:—

"Lear.—O me, my heart, my rising heart!—but down!
"Fool.—Cry to it, Nuncle, as the cockney did to the eels, when she put them i' the paste alive; she rapped 'em o' the coxcombs with a stick, and cried, 'down, wantons, down.' 'Twas her brother that in pure kindness to his horse butchered his hay."

Omitting all mention of the small arguments of the small men who spoke on Monday night, we may mention that Mr. McGeachy, the Conservative member for Honiton, made a sensible speech in support of the Government. But the following deserves particular perusal. Mr. Fox Maule, eldest son of Lord Panmure, is heir to a vast agricultural property; yet see what he says:

Mr. Fox MAULE hoped the house would allow him to introduce a few observations upon this question. He did so from feeling it was right that those who were connected solely with the landed property of the country, and who had nothing else to look to, ought to state the grounds upon which they supported the proposition of her Majesty's Government. He could not say of that proposition that it had his entire and cordial approval, because it did not go to the extent he wished it to proceed. It fell short of that which he considered requisite to remedy the difficulties it was proposed to meet; but nevertheless, such as it was, he for one accepted it with gratitude, and he should endeavour to give it his most cordial support (hear, hear). He had listened to the honourable gentleman who proposed the amendment, and he confessed he felt some difficulty in accounting for the statement he had made with reference to the feelings this measure had created, not only in the breasts of landlords, but in the breasts of farmers and agricultural labourers on this side of the Tweed. It had been his duty, ever since the measure had been proposed, to investigate the feelings which existed towards it in that country, and among that class to which he more immediately belonged; and he had no hesitation in publicly declaring that the result of that investigation had been this—not only was there no panic among the landlords, or among the farmers, but in spite of all that had been said, agricultural arrangements were proceeding with an increased activity from day to day. He would state to the house, in reference to the observations which had fallen from the other side, a practical example of that which he had mentioned. When this proposition was first made, a document was laid before a public meeting emanating from one to whom, however he might have sometimes differed upon the means he took to advocate this question, he had no hesitation in saying the country was under a very deep debt of gratitude for his exertions. He meant the honourable member for Stockport (hear, hear). The letter which that hon. gentleman addressed to the farmers of the kingdom, shortly after this measure was proposed, had been widely canvassed in his (Mr. F. Maule's) county, at many of the largest markets there; and within ten days after the right honourable gentleman at the head of the Government had developed his measures, the farmers, who he would not say were in the first instance anxious for it, but after having seen and heard the arguments in their support in that letter, they came to the conclusion, that instead of their being put off for three years, their interests would have been best consulted had the abolition of the Corn Laws taken place at once (hear, hear, hear). Such was his own conclusion, and he must say that he looked with regret upon the proposed measure of the Government, because it contained provisions for maintaining the present Corn Laws for a further period of three years, and he also looked with regret upon the time which had already intervened since the right honourable gentleman had proposed this measure, and which he feared must yet intervene before even the measure of the right honourable gentleman could be carried into effect (hear, hear). He could not but remember that on the 1st of November last the right honourable gentleman had proposed, on account of the apprehended scarcity, both in Ireland and in this country, to open the ports for the free admission of foreign grain. We had now arrived at nearly the end of March, and still there was no decided prospect of even the partial remedy of her Majesty's Government being carried through that house of Parliament. He had certainly anticipated, and had hoped, before that house should separate for the Easter recess, that the measure would at any rate have passed that tribunal; but he regretted to think that, during the next week, they were to have mixed with that debate another subject of the deepest importance to a neighbouring country; and the experience which he had had of Irish debates forbade him to hope that the present measure would be read a third time in that house before the Easter recess (hear, hear, and a laugh). Under all the circumstances, he could not anticipate that before the end of May, at least, any advantage could be expected to accrue from it. He could not find fault with the length of time which the discussion of that subject had already occupied, for every one had a right fully to speak on so important a subject, particularly if he felt that his interests were affected. The landlords had stated that it was a question in which they were deeply concerned. He (Mr. F. Maule) must say he believed that in his county the interests of the landlords would be as safe after this measure should become law as they were at present; and he not only believed that the alarm which they expressed now was groundless, but he was surprised at the conduct of many of those who had (if he might use the expression) the very groundlessness of it under their own immediate eyes. He knew one noble lord who had withdrawn his proxy from the Government, and had given it to the noble duke who led the protectionist party in another place, and yet he knew at the same time that ten days after the right honourable baronet had made his proposal known to the country the noble lord had let two farms upon his own property at an increased rental (hear, hear, hear). He stated the fact, because one fact was worth a bushel of arguments (hear, hear). One farm was renewed for a period of nineteen years. Previously the rent was 480*l.* a year. Ten days after the right honourable baronet's proposal was made known, a rent was offered for the ensuing nineteen years of 570*l.* per annum, being an increase of 90*l.* a year (hear, hear). Hitherto the rent had been paid half in grain and half in money; the whole increase of rent was conditioned to be paid exclusively in money (cheers). The other farm was let within a few days afterwards. He was not acquainted with the precise details, but he was within the mark when he stated that it had been let at an increased rent of 20 per cent. He had consulted nearly the whole of the land agents in the large county of Perth, and they could not inform him of one single instance within their knowledge where the lease of a farm having expired the offers on it had not risen, and the increased offers had not been accepted by the landlords (hear, hear). He observed that a few days ago a petition had been presented in another place from the county of Haddington against the proposed measures of the Government, and yet he knew that so far from having been depressed in value, a farm in that county had not many days ago, been let upon a new lease at the enormous price of five guineas an acre. These facts concurred to make him think that if the whole agricultural interest of Scotland were fairly to consider the proposed measures, the result would be that they would look forward to the issue of the principles of Free Trade as to one which would enable them to stand in a much improved condition with reference to the other classes of the community (hear, hear). He looked upon those measures of her Majesty's Government as calculated to sooth and calm the feelings of irritation which might exist in our own community; but he looked also upon those measures of commercial freedom as calculated to reach to a far greater extent, and to secure peace between nations and throughout the world (hear, hear). Let them look to America, and he would ask to what did they attribute the changed tone of America? He attributed it, first, to the calm and dignified manner in which all parties in this country had treated the subject in dispute; but he equally ascribed it to those measures of freedom of trade and commercial liberty which had emanated from her Majesty's Government, and which he was sure would be found by all parties, whether extended to America or to any other country on the face of the globe, to be their best security for peace, whilst they would eventually secure to this country an abundant supply of all articles which entered into the food, and conduced to the comfort of the people (hear, hear).

The adjourned debate on Tuesday was marked by two or three good speeches. Mr. Hawes, member for Lambeth, gave an able and elaborate review of the whole influence and effects of Corn Laws and a protective system, demonstrating by figures and facts their inutility as well as mischief. Sir John Hamner, also, descendant of a celebrated SPEAKER of the House of Commons—

(“Illustrious age! how bright thy glories shone
When Hamner filled the chair, and Anne the throne”)

speaking as a landed proprietor, condemned the Corn Laws. Mr. Francis Baring, too, (he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Whig administration) warned the protectionists against the folly and madness of endeavouring to force on a dissolution of Parliament on such a question as this. But only conceive Mr. Shaw, the Recorder of Dublin, after denying that there was any famine in Ireland, from a failure of the potato crop, talking in this strain:—But the right hon. baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government had changed his opinions, and in the words of the poet:

“Ban, ban!—Cú—Caliban,
Has a new master—Get a new man.”

(Renewed cheering and laughter from the protectionists.) No wonder they cheered and laughed. Mr. Shaw is a judge; and if he goes on in this style, he might possibly emulate that celebrated judicial wag, Lord Norbury, who could make a poor fellow burst out laughing, on whom he was passing sentence of death.

But there is one speech which was delivered on Tuesday night deserving preservation. Mr. Rashleigh, head of the ancient Cornwall house of Rashleigh, spoke in the following enlightened way:

MR. RASHLEIGH should like to ask the First Minister of the Crown if he was prepared to agree to all the unconstitutional demands made on him by the Anti-Corn-Law League on the opposite benches. There may be other anti-law leaguers, as well as Anti-Corn-Law leaguers, and if this measure of the Government passed, it could be looked upon as nothing but a bonus to other agitators. The right hon. baronet below him (Sir J. Graham) smiled at that; but the Secretary for the Home Department had no right to smile (laughter) at the great question before them (ironical cheers and laughter from the Opposition benches). Honourable members opposite might smile, but they would not put him down by that course, nor would the important interest which he advocated be put down by the honourable member for Stockport, and the crew behind him (laughter, and ironical cheers from the Free Trade members). He held in his hand a speech of the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government, made in June, 1844, not twenty-one months ago, a portion of which he should read to the house, in order to show what a change had taken place in the opinions of the right honourable baronet within the short space of time which had elapsed since that speech was made. Here the honourable member read an extract from a speech delivered by Sir Robert Peel in 1844, in which the right honourable baronet urged, in very strong terms, the expediency of not applying the rigid rules of political economy, in all cases, to a state of society such as that which exists in this country. He (Mr. Rashleigh) declared it to be his opinion that it was the duty of the house and the country to call upon the right hon. baronet and ask him the reason for his tergiversation (hear, hear, from Colonel Sibthorp). He recollected the time when the motions of the hon. member for Stockport were treated with silent contempt in that house, and defeated by large divisions. That was the constitutional way of dealing with unconstitutional propositions (ironical cheers and laughter). It was some consolation, however, for him to think that the present measure would be treated in the other house in a manner very different from that in which it had been received here. He called upon the right reverend prelates to defend the altar (laughter from the Opposition). Aye, the altar, the throne, and the cottage (renewed laughter from the same quarter). He did not know why honourable members opposite should laugh. He lived at some distance from their smoky regions; but their long chimneys were high in the horizon of his memory (ironical cheers). The right hon. baronet, the First Minister, in introducing the present measure to Parliament, had stated that the Cornish miners were now so well off, that they were able to invest a portion of their earnings in feathers, and actually enjoyed the luxury of a feather-bed. Even admitting this to be the case, it was no argument in favour of the right hon. baronet's measure, as it was much better to let well alone, than to run the risk of losing what we had by grasping after more. He should like the hon. member for Stockport to come down into the county of Cornwall. He would not poison or hang the honourable member, and he would be proud to show him the state of the peasantry in that country. He should not be able, perhaps, to place the honourable member in a feather-bed, because a feather-bed was not exactly what the peasantry would prepare for him. He could tell the right hon. baronet, that if he determined to carry the reductions on copper ore into effect, he would soon ruin the classes whom he said now laid out their surplus earnings in feathers. He had a letter from a gentleman who had been in the habit of employing from 2000 to 3000 persons daily, and who expressed his entire disapprobation of the Government measure. He would not further occupy the time of the house. He might have used some hard language, owing to his want of experience in addressing the house; but he could assure honourable members that he was not ashamed of what he had said. It was painful to him to oppose the right hon. baronet; but he could not consent to be dragged through the muck and mire of expediency to support his new-fangled notions.

But for a few characteristic incidents, the continued debate on Thursday night would have been the dull and dreariest in the interminable list of dull and dreary nights. First, there was shallow Mr. Banks—a veritable “Justice Shallow”—testifying his deep sense of constitutional responsibility by inventing new pretexts to delay the progress of the Corn Bill. He moved that a Select Committee be appointed, to which should be referred the consideration of the entire Law of Settlement. To this, Sir James Graham and Sir Robert Peel replied, that there was already a bill in the House, the second reading of which would afford an occasion for discussing the entire question. This appeared so reasonable, that Mr. Colquhoun and Sir R. H. Inglis begged Mr. Banks to withdraw his motion. The “Justice Shallow” of Dorsetshire consented, not, however, without betraying the spirit in which he has brought it forward. He would avail himself, he threatened, of every available opportunity of raising a discussion on the Law of Settlement, before the Corn Law Bill passed that House. The meaning of this is, that he will take every opportunity to delay the measure. This is the spirit of those who arrogate to themselves all the loyalty, all the constitutionality, all the respectability, and all the responsibility, of the empire.

The resumed debate was taken up by Mr. Finch; and to those who have never heard Mr. Finch, our description of him may appear coloured. Yet it is not so. The look of the man is quite enough. There is a pert conceit playing about his lips; and the atmosphere around his face is charged with a most prodigious amount of self-esteem. But he is excessively voluble; and he mistakes this for talent. His words roll out of his mouth, like potatoes pursuing one another out of a sack that a man is emptying; they run, here and there and everywhere, swift as the “arrowy Rhone,” but not like it, to termination. He talked, and talked, and talked, and talked, until the Opposition benches became deserted, with the exception of Mr. Hume. But even Mr. Hume could not stand the chilling blasts of empty benches, though the fiery torrent of Finch was struggling with the frozen regions. He crossed over to the ministerial benches, in order to feel the comfort of having a shadow. Then on the Opposition benches there remained nothing but a HAT. The owner of the hat, Mr. Hawes, was ensconced behind the chair of the SPEAKER, enjoying a snug tete-a-tete. But the hat tried to supply the absence of its master. It stood on its crown, on the front opposition bench; and, like the kettle, in Mr. Dickens's tale of the “Cricket on the Hearth,” leaned forward, so as to catch with open mouth the great points of the Finch Speech. Yet the hat was not like the kettle, for it showed symptoms of intelligence: now and then you might almost imagine that it raised itself up, as if muttering of Finch, as Pope did of Henley:

“How fluid nonsense trickles from his tongue.”

But the hat was at last released from its sufferings. Its owner approached the empty benches, and put it on his head. There seemed a strong feeling of satisfaction in the hat as it felt itself over a head with brains. It needed all the comfort; for just before it was released, Mr. Finch had threatened that if ever the hat appeared there again, all alone by itself, he would punish it by a four hours' speech!

The rest of the night was worse than a hatti scherif. Small men spoke; and they spoke small. There was one exception. Mr. Charles Buller rose; and he put some intelligence into the matter. But his speech was drowned by Lord George Bentinck, who reproduced his figures and “calculations.” He did more. He compared ministers to pirates who had scuttled and ran ashore the good ship Protection, but he and his gallant crew will fetch her off the lee-shore, and tow her into port. Marvellous impudence, did we not know that a training on Newmarket, and at Tattersall's, is the very best school for unblushing impudence. But something more transpired in the course of the night. Lord George has been trying to strike a bargain with ministers, that if they will postpone the Corn Law Bill till after Easter, the protectionists will support the Coercion Bill—if not, they will oppose it! This is the political morality of the party which struggles to live at the expense of the public, and has for a leader a qui iam hero.

The debate, it is understood, is to terminate on Friday (last) night.

THE PEERS AND FREE TRADE.—A meeting of peers, very numerous attended, took place yesterday (Wednesday), at the Clarendon Hotel, at which it was unanimously resolved to oppose, by every constitutional means, the progress of the Government Free Trade measures in the House of Lords.—Post.

SPECIAL EXCEPTIONS IN FAVOUR OF LAND.—Besides all the great exemptions from taxation with which agriculture is favoured, and which are well known, there are many lesser ones seldom if ever noticed. For instance, in this town (Preston) grain has been permitted to stand in the market free from time immemorial; and when the Corn Exchange was erected in 1824, at an expense of 12,000*l.*, the whole of the pavement area was reserved for corn without any charge, and has been so occupied ever since. For several days in the week, our large central market place is filled with carts, laden with hay and straw; but these all stand and sell, without a farthing of charge. Where can such indulgence and favours be found in favour of any of our manufactures? The rate for the improvement of our borough is usually divided into two, the “paying rate” and the “lighting rate.” All the land included in Preston is contiguous to the town, yet it is free from the lighting rate, which is 6*d.* in the pound, the other being only 4*d.*, though buildings pay for both in situations where the one gets as little benefit of the paving as the other may seem to do of lighting. These little matters show the spirit of former times, and how land, instead of being “burdened,” has indeed been the object of special favours.

IMPORTANT DEPUTATION TO SIR R. PEELE.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

It has seldom fallen to the lot of an English Minister to receive a deputation, so important, in whatever light it may be viewed as that which yesterday waited upon Sir Robert Peel from Manchester. This deputation, which was accompanied by Mr. Gibson and Mr. Brotherton, consisted of Mr. Thos. Bazley, the president of the Chamber of Commerce; Mr. J. A. Turner, president of the Commercial Association; Mr. Edwd. Tootal, and Mr. Wm. Stewart, three of whom alone are the employers of no fewer than ten thousand work-people, and to whom, therefore, at the lowest estimate, thirty thousand human beings look for their weekly subsistence. This deputation waited upon Sir Robert Peel, on the part of all the bankers, of fifty-five members of the town council, and of more than a thousand of the most influential manufacturers and merchants of Manchester and its immediate vicinity, whose aggregate capital employed in the trade of the country exceeds thirty millions sterling, who are directly the employers of one hundred and twenty thousand persons, and on whom nearly four hundred thousand of the surrounding population rely for their daily food—to request the Minister to present their petition to the House of Commons, praying for an immediate passing of the measures now pending before Parliament. This petition originated and was completed within twenty-four hours, having received the signatures of eleven hundred and twenty-two of such men as we have described, and of all shades of political opinion. High Conservative, moderate Whig, and ultra-Radical were unanimous upon this occasion. The ruinous disasters which appear to impend over them and the surrounding population, by the protraction of those debates in Parliament, have sunk all other considerations. The pertinacity of a reckless minority, which impedes, by every vexatious contrivance, the progress of those great commercial questions, has levelled every distinction of political party in those great districts of trade, where merchants and manufacturers are threatened with the most serious embarrassment, and their numerous dependents with starvation.

It is two months to-day since the great commercial reforms introduced by Sir Robert Peel were received by the nation with universal acclamation. Since then the news of their introduction has traversed the Atlantic, has carried “a message of peace” and future hope to the interior of the American Continent; and we have received back in this country assurances of friendship and mutual good offices. Yet it was only last night that the bill for the first of those measures reached the second reading in the House of Commons. Three weeks were occupied with a single debate; and several weeks more have been wasted under the pretence of protecting and defending the interests of silk manufacturers, timber merchants, and other traders, all of which are suffering the most severe losses by the delay, and whose only desire is for the speedy adoption of the ministerial proposals. Lord Worcester, Lord George Bentinck, Mr. D'Israeli, and Mr. Borthwick are the obstructives, who set up their authority as the guardian of commerce, in spite of the remonstrances of Manchester, Liverpool, and London. Majorities of ninety-seven, one hundred and two, and one hundred and thirty-three, against all their amendments in Parliament, and general consternation at their proceedings on the part of the country, appear to weigh but little with them. Their sport, for such it is evidently to them, they appear determined to have at whatever cost to the country.

The embarrassment which has been caused by the suspension of all commercial transactions for so long a period, has been and is felt severely in all branches of business, and in all the large trading towns in the kingdom. In London and Liverpool it would be difficult to calculate the losses which have arisen from the monetary derangement consequent upon the interruption to the usual transactions of trade and exchange of commodities. But when we go to the manufacturing districts, difficulties and consequences of a much more serious character present themselves. There it is not alone the balance sheet of the merchant at the end of the year that is affected by the interruption to business; it is not there a mere question of profit or loss to the wealthy trader; there the stagnation of trade and the cessation of demand involve the very existence of millions of our toiling people, and ultimately the peace of society and the security of property. It is difficult for those at a distance to realise to themselves the extent of individual suffering and public danger which attend any material cessation of the usual demand for labour in those districts. The ministers who had the responsibility of the public peace in 1842, have not readily forgotten the alarm which existed in that year. The merchants and manufacturers who lived in the midst of that distress, are above all things solicitous to avoid its recurrence. For two months past they have been struggling against accumulating stocks, in the daily hope of confidence being restored to trade by the final passing of these measures. But week after week has only brought its disappointment, until at length a material contraction of production has been a matter of necessity which can no longer be postponed.

The deputation which waited upon Sir Robert Peel yesterday furnished the Minister with facts, carefully collected from the official accounts of the town of Manchester as to the condition of its population in 1841, the last period of a general stagnation of business, which afford strong evidence of the sufferings then endured, and which must again be experienced in an aggravated form, if from a continued suspension of confidence no relief is afforded to trade. In that year, in Manchester and its immediate suburbs, there were 5492 untenanted buildings, usually containing about 27,000 persons; there were 681 empty shops and offices; and 116 mills, engineers', and other works closed up, representing property, in the whole, which stood assessed in the town books at 87,094*l.* a year, and the real rental of which exceeded 100,000*l.* During that period the weekly consumption of coal in the town of Manchester was less than usual by 2620 tons, of which 620 tons are calculated to have been used less in business, and 2000 tons less for private domestic consumption. These are the grave facts by which some faint idea can be formed of the sufferings of a population amongst whom such a change had occurred. But had as Manchester was at that time, the condition of Stockport, Bolton, and other surrounding towns was infinitely worse.

It is scarcely necessary for us to dwell upon the great importance of confidence for the success of commerce; or to show how impossible it is that that necessary confidence should exist as long as those great questions on which so much depends are in any degree uncertain. Further delay and doubt threaten another visitation of all the sufferings of former years; but if these misfortunes are again to be endured by the country, we trust that the Government will not incur any of the odium attached to them, by interposing any business whatever which can delay the final settlement of these questions, or fail to use every means in their power to bring them to a close. They have a powerful majority in Parliament—they have already exhibited forbearance enough to a mere obstructive minority—to whom further concessions will only be made at a severe sacrifice to the whole community. We trust, therefore, they will use every means which their influence and their majority place within their reach, to meet the prayer of the petitioners from Manchester and other parts of the kingdom, and thus avert that widespread distress, the approach of which is creating so much alarm and dismay.

FREE TRADE VINDICATED BY FACTS.

(From the Economist.)

In our last number we referred to a remarkable array of facts, produced in an official return to Parliament moved for by Sir Robert Peel, showing the operation of some of the chief Free Trade measures which have been adopted during the last twenty years. The first accounts relate to the shipping and navigation of the British empire. The following are the tables:—

AN ACCOUNT OF THE NUMBER OF VESSELS, with the Amount of their Tonnage, and the Number of Men and Boys usually employed in navigating the same, that belonged to several Ports of the British Empire, on the 31st December in each Year, from 1820 to 1845.

Year.	Vessels.	Tonnage.	Men.	Year.	Vessels.	Tonnage.	Men.
1820	25,374	2,648,593	174,514	1833	24,385	2,634,577	164,000
21	25,636	2,560,203	169,179	34	25,055	2,716,100	168,061
22	24,642	2,519,044	166,333	35	25,121	2,783,761	171,020
23	24,542	2,506,760	165,474	36	25,820	2,792,645	170,637
24	24,776	2,559,587	168,637	37	26,037	2,791,018	173,506
25	24,290	2,553,682	166,183	38	26,690	2,890,601	178,583
26	24,625	2,635,644	167,636	39	27,745	3,068,433	191,283
27	23,196	2,460,500	151,415	1840	28,992	3,211,538	201,340
28	24,09	2,518,191	155,576	41	30,052	3,512,480	210,198
29	23,458	2,517,000	154,808	42	30,815	3,619,750	214,699
30	23,721	2,531,819	154,812	43	30,983	3,588,387	213,977
31	24,242	2,581,064	158,422	44	31,320	3,637,231	216,350
32	24,435	2,618,068	161,634	45	not yet completed

Custom House, London,
6 March, 1846.

JOHN COVEY, Registrar.

RETURN OF THE NUMBER AND TONNAGE OF VESSELS, distinguishing British from Foreign, employed in the Foreign and Colonial Trade, which entered Inwards and cleared Outwards from Ports of the United Kingdom, in each year from 1832 to 1845, exclusive of Vessels in Ballast.

Years.	Entered Inwards.
	British.		Foreign.		T-tal.
	Vessels.	Tons.	Vessels.	Tons.	Vessels.	Tons.
1832	10,762	1,036,846	3,865	561,047	14,627	1,497,893
33	10,980	1,090,530	4,490	648,911	15,470	1,639,441
34	11,678	1,108,492	4,870	732,886	16,548	1,841,378
35	11,740	1,203,026	4,701	749,808	16,441	1,952,834
36	11,644	1,230,173	5,959	882,194	17,603	2,112,367
37	12,252	1,246,300	5,861	869,519	18,113	2,215,819
38	12,890	1,464,020	6,749	1,037,234	19,639	2,501,254
39	13,348	1,556,533	8,766	1,200,935	22,114	2,757,468
40	14,370	1,807,367	8,355	1,207,440	22,725	3,014,807
41	14,119	1,900,740	7,430	1,081,350	21,549	2,982,090
42	13,821	1,890,838	5,851	974,392	19,672	2,865,230
43	13,064	1,910,528	5,600	1,005,804	18,664	2,916,332
44	14,681	2,087,437	7,247	1,143,887	21,928	3,231,324
45	15,904	2,669,853	7,895	1,353,735	23,799	4,023,588

Years.	Cleared Outwards.
	British.		Foreign.		Total.
	Vessels.	Tons.	Vessels.	Tons.	Vessels.	Tons.
1832	9,667	1,637,093	2,975	436,333	12,642	2,103,426
33	9,244	1,643,894	3,437	523,903	12,681	2,167,797
34	9,734	1,640,274	3,447	545,285	13,181	2,185,559
35	10,158	1,711,091	3,935	625,939	14,093	2,337,030
36	10,216	1,828,501	4,438	667,016	14,654	2,495,517
37	10,614	1,861,121	4,912	716,897	15,526	2,578,018
38	11,471	2,584,246	5,733	858,062	17,204	3,442,308
39	11,952	2,197,014	6,472	898,738	18,424	3,095,752
40	12,964	2,408,792	6,776	983,834	19,740	3,392,626
41	11,243	2,624,690	6,618	918,776	17,861	3,543,466
42	15,197	2,734,558	6,205	956,591	21,402	3,691,149
43	15,205	2,727,306	6,774	1,026,063	21,980	3,753,369
44	13,842	2,604,243	7,200	1,075,823	21,042	3,680,066
45	14,515	2,947,257	9,266	1,361,939	23,781	4,309,197

Statistical Department, Board of Trade,
9 March, 1846.

G. R. PORTER.

There is no class which has more pertinaciously clung to the principles of protection and restriction than the shipowners of this country, from the period when the celebrated Navigation Act was finally passed by the 12th of Charles II. That law enacted that no produce should be imported from Asia, Africa, or America, except in British ships, and established higher rates of duties on all goods imported in foreign ships from other parts of Europe, than if imported in British ships. This law was retained without change until 1815, when the condition of our relations with the United States rendered it impossible to maintain it against that country. The large trade which existed between this country and the United States, while the latter were colonies of the British empire, continued to increase after the independence of that country was established; but in regard to their shipping they lost the privileges which they possessed as colonies, and were placed on the same footing as foreign countries. The consequence was, that American ships coming to England were obliged to sail in ballast, to return with a cargo, while English ships carried cargoes both ways. To obviate the disadvantage to which American ships were thus exposed in the competition with British, the American Government passed a law placing British ships under the same disabilities in entering American ports that American ships were exposed to in entering British ports. The consequence of these mutual restrictions was, that all American produce was brought to this country in British ships, while all English goods were carried to America in American ships; the vessels of the respective countries passing one way in ballast, and thus exactly double the number of ships were required for the trade between the two countries; or, in other words, the produce of each country became chargeable with double the expense for freight to the consumers in each respectively. This reciprocal folly lasted until 1815, when it was terminated by a treaty, by which each country ceded to the other all the privileges enjoyed by its own ships.

No farther alteration was made in the Navigation Act till 1823. In that year Prussia instituted differential duties against our ships, similar to those which existed against their ships on entering our ports, which caused a great clamour amongst our shipowners. Mr Huskisson then saw that it was in vain to attempt to maintain our Navigation Act any longer. To have negotiated with Prussia alone, as we had already done with the United States, only left the same to be done with every other country, sooner or later, whose shipping was injured by our laws. Mr Huskisson, therefore, in the same year, proposed the Reciprocity Acts of 4th and 5th George IV., authorising his Majesty, by order in council, to repeal all discriminating duties on the ships of those countries which should enter into treaty with us to admit our ships on similar conditions. Since that period we have concluded treaties of reciprocal navigation with—

Prussia	Lubeck	Brazil
Denmark	States of La Plata	Austria
Hanover	Columbia	Russia
Oldenburg	Holland	Portugal, and prior
Mecklenburg	France	to that time with
Greece	Sweden & Norway	the
Bremen	Mexico	United States
Hamburg

From the time the Reciprocity Act of 1823 passed, to the present day, the shipowners have never ceased to assert that that act had brought ruin upon the trade. The "Cornhill Committee" have published their annual reports, ever complaining of the ruinous consequences of foreign competition, and at their instance numerous Parliamentary investigations have been made into their alleged distress. The object of the tables given above is to show how much truth there has been in these assertions, and to exhibit the real consequences of the measures of 1823.

The first table shows the quantity of shipping possessed at the end of each year from 1820 to 1844. In 1823 the whole registered tonnage amounted to 2,506,760 tons. From that time to 1844, independent of replacing all the ships which were during that period lost at sea, we find the registered shipping amounted to 3,637,231 tons, showing an increase of no less than 1,130,471 tons, or rather more than 45 per cent. during the period. This fact is calculated to contradict the assertion which has constantly been made as to the ruinous diminution of the shipping trade. But the best test of the two principles—that of restriction or Free Trade—will be to compare the progress of British shipping for the last twenty years prior to the change of the law with the twenty years immediately succeeding it. In 1804 the registered tonnage amounted to 2,268,570 tons; in 1823, it had increased to 2,506,760 tons, or by 238,190 tons, being rather more than 10 per cent. The comparison may be thus stated:

Period from 1804 to 1823, under the Navigation Act and restriction policy.		Period from 1823 to 1844, under the Reciprocity Act and Free Trade policy.
Tons of Shipping.		Tons of Shipping.
1804 .. Tonnage ..	2,268,570	1823 .. Tonnage ..	2,506,760
1823	2,506,760	1844	3,637,231
Increase of tons .. 238,190		Increase of tons .. 1,130,471
or 10 per cent.		or 45 per cent.

We have thus the astounding fact before us, that while British shipping of this country, under the protective policy, from 1804 to 1823, increased only by 238,190 tons, or 10 per cent. in a similar period, from 1823 to 1844, under a Free Trade policy, it increased by 1,130,471 tons, or 45 per cent; and yet the latter is the system which the practical men of the times have vehemently denounced as the ruin of the shipping interest!!!

The next tables above show the number and tonnage of shipping entered inwards and outwards, distinguishing the proportion of British and foreign in each year since 1832. In this return there is an important misprint in the Parliamentary document, which represents this account to be "inclusive" in place of "exclusive," of ships in ballast, which we have corrected. A reference to the annual tables presented to Parliament will show that this is a mere error. We wish this account had extended back to 1823, when the law was altered, as the results would have appeared even more striking than they are. As it is, we find the comparison between the two periods to have been as follows:

	1832.		1845.
	British Shipping.	Foreign Shipping.	British Shipping.	Foreign Shipping.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
Entered inwards ..	1,996,846	561,047	3,660,851	1,353,735
Entered outwards ..	1,637,093	466,333	2,947,257	1,361,940
Total tonnage ..	3,573,939	1,027,380	6,611,110	2,715,675
COMPARISON.
	British Shipping.	Foreign Shipping.	British Shipping.	Foreign Shipping.
1832	3,573,939	1,027,380
1845	6,611,110	2,715,675
Increase ..	3,037,171	1,688,295

So that, after all we have heard of the prejudicial effects of the competition of foreign shipping, it appears that while the whole tonnage of that class has increased by 1,688,295 tons, that of our own shipping has increased by no less than 3,037,171. It has been attempted to account for this contradiction of the usual assertions with respect to the decay of the shipping interest, by saying, that the great increase of British shipping is caused by the repeated voyages of Continental passenger boats, especially of those in the Channel. This, however, cannot be the case, because those vessels clear in ballast, and do not carry cargoes, and consequently are not included in those accounts. Who, then, has benefited most by the Reciprocity Act of 1823—the British shipowner or the foreign shipowner? If the law had remained as it was, English ships must have been excluded from carrying goods to the United States, to Prussia, and, sooner or later, to all countries whose ships were excluded. It is, therefore, an easy calculation to determine which party has benefited most by the change which took place in 1823. Since 1832 only, foreign shipping with this country has increased by 1,688,295 tons; but our own shipping with foreign countries has increased by no less than 3,037,171 tons. Which party, then, has been most benefited by those treaties which provided for both parties open ports in each other's country? While this extraordinary increase has been going on, what has been the language of the shipowner? In 1834 their reports say—"The long continued and still existing depression of the shipping interest—the partial productions and great aggravation of distress caused by continual changes in our navigation system—the utter impossibility of the successful maintenance of an unrestricted competition with foreign navigation—the gross injustice of the imposition of peculiar and exclusive burdens on maritime commerce, for purposes purely national, while exposed to that competition—the declining quality and estimation of British tonnage—the embarrassment, decay, and ruin of the British shipowner—may now be viewed as incontrovertible positions." Such has been the language of this class, while they have been doubling their property and their trade in shipping; and whenever a minister has proposed to rescind the burdens of which they have complained, by reducing the duties on timber and provisions, he has met with no more inveterate opponent than the shipowner. The shipowners have generally pretended to a claim for protection, on the plea of supporting the colonial interests; but in their report issued in 1841, so forgetful were they of that interest, that they proposed to charge a duty on the registration of colonial built ships as a protection to themselves.

The next table in these returns is—

STATEMENT OF THE REAL OR DECLARED VALUE OF BRITISH AND IRISH PRODUCE AND MANUFACTURES EXPORTED FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM TO DIFFERENT FOREIGN COUNTRIES AND COLONIAL POSSESSIONS, IN EACH YEAR, FROM 1827 TO 1844:

	Total.	Central and South America, including Brazil.	Foreign West Indies.	British North America, and British West Indies.	United States.	Asia.	Africa.	South-em Europe.	North-em Europe.
1827	36,860,376	4,004,319	907,309	4,980,572	7,018,272	4,760,452	671,488	5,945,701	8,533,263
28	36,483,328	4,181,060	818,066	4,980,748	5,810,315	4,892,408	716,926	5,592,788	8,243,082
29	36,322,057	4,290,360	900,882	5,193,808	4,831,315	4,821,350	828,720	5,592,788	8,243,082
30	37,927,401	5,188,362	938,882	4,605,381	4,605,381	4,450,396	960,292	7,233,587	8,346,118
31	38,383,768	5,019,369	1,000,004	4,071,276	6,032,346	4,406,444	863,292	7,233,587	8,346,118
32	38,183,008	4,572,247	1,170,684	4,155,353	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
33	38,331,413	4,542,360	998,786	4,080,139	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
34	41,288,326	5,177,671	1,270,302	4,351,039	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
35	47,030,670	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
36	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
37	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
38	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
39	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
40	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
41	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
42	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
43	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
44	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570
45	43,088,572	4,577,671	1,192,881	5,345,008	6,032,346	4,235,483	880,753	6,286,949	7,876,570

Statistical Department, Board of Trade,
9th March, 1846.

G. R. PORTER.

This table exhibits the gratifying fact that notwithstanding all the difficulties with which this country has had to contend, from bad laws at home, and hostile tariffs abroad, we have nevertheless been able to increase the amount of our exports, in actual value, from 36,860,376*l.* in 1827, to 58,584,292*l.* in 1844; which has been accomplished entirely by the unprecedented progress which, during that period, we have made by the improvement of machinery, the application of science, and other means, all combining to a greater economy of production. The extent to which this has taken place will be best seen by comparing the official value, which being taken at the same fixed rates, represents the comparative quantity at any period, and the real or actual value, which has relation to the price at the time. In 1827 and 1843 the comparison of these two values was thus:

	Official Value.	Real Value.
1827 Exports ..	62,050,008	36,860,376
1843	131,833,391	58,584,292

While therefore the quantity of goods exported, exhibited considerably more than doubled in the period, yet so great has been the reduction of prices that the aggregate real value has increased little more than forty per cent.

The divisions of our exports to various countries, exhibited in this table, furnishes extremely valuable illustrations of some of the great arguments at present contended for in commercial legislation, and cannot fail to correct some of the most prevalent and popular errors. The increase to the various markets is thus shown:

	1827.	1844
Exports to Northern Europe	8,533,263	14,926,707
Southern Europe	5,945,701	11,294,388
Total to Europe	14,478,964	26,221,095
Africa	671,488	1,615,530
Asia	4,760,452	11,273,721
United States	7,018,272	7,938,079
British North American Colonies and British West Indies ..	4,980,572	5,522,288
Foreign West Indies	907,309	1,173,931
Central and South America, including Brazil	4,004,319	4,439,508
Total	36,860,376	58,584,292

It will be observed that the largest actual increase has taken place to the Continent of Europe, being 11,442,221*l.* out of the whole increase of 21,723,916*l.* This fact shows how little influence the hostile tariffs of the various Continental countries have had in restraining our exports, when met by relaxations of those restrictions which affected our imports. And this is even more remarkable if we examine the particular countries to which the greatest increase has taken place. The countries which have pursued the most stringent protective principles, and created the most hostile tariff against us during that period, have been France, Russia, Prussia, and Germany (the Zollverein), and Belgium. But these are also the countries in respect to Belgium, first the great reduction, and finally the entire removal of the duty on wool, flax, and hemp, the reduction of the duty on sugar, and the operation of the Corn Law, which led to a huge importation of grain for several consecutive years, have all tended materially to increase the amount of our exports in return for our increasing imports. The following table shows the progress of our exports to those countries during the period in question:

	1827.	1844.
Exports to	£	£
France	446,952	2,656,259
Russia	1,408,970	2,128,425
Prussia	171,368	505,364
Germany	4,651,618	6,151,523
Belgium, included with Hol- land, but in 1833	750,059	1,471,251
	7,434,937	12,913,348

Here, then, we have an increase of exports amounting to nearly five millions and a half, merely as the result of relaxations in our own tariff, and in spite of the numerous hostile laws which those countries have enacted against our commerce. We have in this fact the best answer to that class of politicians who have faith only in diplomacy and reciprocal treaties, and who deny that we can "fight hostile tariffs by free imports." This school of politicians tell us that our trade with France can only be increased by negotiation and treaty. The facts before us form the best reply to their theory, and the whole proves incontrovertibly the truth of that rule, which directs a government to take care of its imports, with a feeling of full security that its exports will care for themselves.

The greatest relative increase is apparent in our exports to Asia. This is made up almost entirely between the trade to our own East India possessions and to China, which are both very striking examples of the benefits of free and unrestricted commerce. Our exports to India remained almost stationary for many years prior to the entire opening of that trade to private enterprise, at the last renewal of the East India Company's charter, the effects of which may be dated from 1834. The progress of the trade to these two markets has been thus:

	1827.	1844.	1844.
Exports.	£	£	£
East India and Ceylon ..	3,662,012	2,578,569	7,665,666
China	610,637	842,852	2,305,617

The great reductions of duties on our goods into China is another striking illustration of how far a country can "fight hostile tariffs by free imports." The Chinese are making the experiment, and it is quite obvious that this free admission of British manufactures will compel us to reduce the exorbitant duties on their teas. Meantime they even succeed, to a great extent, in increasing their exports. Our imports from China have rapidly increased during the last three years, as a mere necessity arising from our exports. Of tea our import has increased since 1842 more than 10,000,000 of lbs., and of silk the increase has been greater. It has been as follows:

	bales.	1841	bales.
1842	1,951	3,782
1843	2,651	11,358

And in the present year it will be about 18,000 bales.

But while these tables speak so strongly in favour of Free Trade, they furnish evidence as strong against a reliance on the protection system. There is no branch of our trade for which such domestic sacrifices have been made as for that with our North American and West India colonies. For their encouragement this country has submitted to the greatest sacrifices. Canadian timber and West India sugar have been the greatest drains that the productive industry of this country has had to contend against. For the encouragement of these interests sacrifices amounting to many millions a year have been almost cheerfully submitted to, under the impression that they formed the foundation and guarantee for our chief export trade. These returns show that during the whole of the period under review, our exports to these colonies have been stationary; the average of the three first years being 5,051,799l., and of the last three years 5,026,980l.; and it is for this trade that this country has been called upon to sacrifice a sum annually, which, prior to the reductions of duties in the last two years, was variously estimated at from 5,000,000l. to 7,000,000l., in the direct price paid for sugar and timber, and independent of the indirect loss sustained by interfering with other great markets.

REVENUE.

The next table in these returns is a

STATEMENT OF THE NET REVENUE OF CUSTOMS in each Year, from 1839 to 1845; the Amount of Duty received on CORN, and the REVENUE exclusive of the Duty on CORN; showing also the principal Duties of Customs repealed and reduced in each Year.

Years.	Revenue.	Duties re- ceived on CORN.	Revenue ex- clusive of CORN.
	£	£	£
1839	21,583,907	1,088,858	20,495,049
1840	21,784,199	1,156,636	20,627,563
1841	21,888,841	568,310	21,320,531
1842	21,025,145	1,364,969	19,660,176
1843	21,033,717	758,273	20,275,444
1844	22,504,821	1,094,382	21,410,439
1845	20,196,856	397,004	19,799,852

Note.—Estimated Loss of Revenue by reductions, &c., in the Tariff:

1841. Rice in the husk, oil from the kingdom of the Two Sicilies	£ 21,170
1842. Coffee, hides, indigo, oil, seeds, timber, liquorice, mahogany, turpentine, and export duties ..	1,338,122
1843. Cork, wood, timber, and other articles ..	171,521
1844. Coffee, currants, wool, and other articles ..	286,431
1845. Sugar	£1,300,000
Cotton wool	680,000
Coal, export duty	118,000
Minor articles	320,000
	2,418,000
	£4,235,244

In estimating the effects of changes in the tariff upon the revenue of the country, it has been found necessary to exclude the amount received from corn under the operation of the sliding scale. The corn duties hitherto have avowedly been for the object of protection, and not for revenue; and have been so regarded in their operation that no reliance could be placed upon them. The above account shows that between 1839 and 1845, reductions of customs' duties have taken away equivalent to £4,235,244l., while the amount of revenue received has only diminished by the sum of 798,015l. While the public have benefited by the reduction of the prices of commodities to an amount represented by import duties equal to £4,235,244l., the consumption of these and other commodities has so much increased as to leave a deficit of only 798,015l., to be supplied in other ways on account of these reductions. Besides this direct advantage, arising from the relaxations of duties, the country has had all the benefit of the increased amount of trade to which an extended consumption, import, and consequent export of our goods have led. The great evil of indirect taxes is, that they limit and interfere with the industry of the country, and the creation of the means for paying them. There is no indirect tax that does not in one way or other take much more from the pockets of the people than it places in the Exchequer; and it is on this account that reductions of duties always yield so much more advantage to the public than they impose loss upon the state. The tables before us show that if we are directly taxed to the extent of 798,015l. to make up a deficit in the revenue, the nation has a fund of at least £4,235,244l. arising from the reduction of duties, from which that direct tax can be paid.

The next table in the return is—

SILK.

RAW, WASTE, and THROWN SILK,
Entered for home consumption in the United Kingdom.

Years.	Raw.	Waste, Knots, and Husks.	Thrown.	All sorts
	lbs.	lbs.	lbs.	lbs.
1814	1,591,235	29,234	586,505	2,119,974
1815	1,099,565	27,971	377,822	1,475,358
1816	873,111	4,162	210,758	1,088,031
1817	1,314,051	49,955	294,553	1,658,559
1818	1,144,881	86,940	391,166	1,622,987
1819	1,116,097	71,311	311,125	1,538,533
1820	1,022,799	91,883	309,053	1,423,735
1821	1,064,513	105,047	309,218	1,478,778
1822	1,093,764	61,921	382,873	1,538,558
1823	2,051,995	52,362	363,864	2,468,221
1824	3,414,520	133,257	463,371	4,011,148
1825	2,848,506	190,120	559,042	3,597,668
1826	1,064,188	(included with raw)	289,325	2,253,513
1827	3,759,138	(included with raw)	451,015	4,210,153
1828	4,102,550	(included with raw)	385,212	4,487,762
1829	3,771,969	(included with raw)	172,429	3,944,398
1830	3,055,832	585,013	436,535	3,977,380
1831	3,401,445	600,656	514,240	4,516,341
1832	3,938,795	641,381	268,367	4,768,543
1833	3,816,750	1,094,692	195,669	5,107,111
1834	4,151,008	1,382,872	251,578	5,785,458
1835	4,372,501	1,508,731	294,338	6,175,570
1836	3,730,427	875,781	213,368	4,819,576
1837	3,683,739	960,147	211,470	4,855,356
1838	3,483,363	1,042,655	220,910	4,746,928
1839	3,860,680	745,243	288,951	4,895,204
1840	3,209,855	1,379,314	267,333	4,856,502
1841	3,936,714	1,434,663	393,977	5,765,354
1842	3,649,747	1,495,457	334,835	5,480,039
1843	4,021,908	1,775,855	410,358	6,208,121

Aggregate quantities entered for consumption. In the
10 years 1814-1823 ..	15,214,245	585,906	3,608,872	19,409,023
Do. 1824-1833 ..	32,916,905	2,801,515	3,872,828	39,591,248
Do. 1834-1843 ..	37,425,114	11,924,815	2,657,189	50,007,118
Average annual consumption. In the
10 years 1814-1823 ..	1,521,424	58,591	360,887	1,940,902
Do. 1824-1833 ..	3,291,690	280,151	387,283	3,959,124
Do. 1834-1843 ..	3,742,511	1,192,481	265,719	5,200,711
Consumption of the single year 1844 ..	4,021,908	1,775,855	410,358	6,208,121

The alterations in the rates of duty during the period have been as follows:—

	Raw.	Waste, Knots, &c.	Thrown, not dyed.	Thrown, dyed.
	per lb.	per lb.	per lb.	per lb.
To July 5, 1819.	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.	£ s. d.
Bengal	4 2
Other East India ..	6 3	3 11 1/2	2 5 6
Indian, &c.	5 6	3 4
From July 5, 1819.
British East India ..	4 0
Other parts	5 6	4 0
From Mar. 25, 1824.
All sorts	0 3	0 3
From July 5, 1825.
All sorts	0 3	0 3
From Nov. 15, 1825.
All sorts	0 3	0 3
From July 5, 1826.
All sorts	0 1	0 1
From July 5, 1829.
All sorts	0 1	0 1
From May 15, 1840.
From July 9, 1842.
All sorts	1 1-20d	Col. 6 3-10d	6 3-10d	1s 0 3-5d
		For 1s 0 3-5d	1s 0 3-5d	2s 1 1-5d
				Same as

From March 19, 1845.

All sorts Free .. Free .. Free .. July 9, 1842
* Singles, tram and organzine, and crape.
† Singles and tram, organzine and crape.

Great pains have been used to produce an impression that the whole increase of the consumption of silk has been of "waste, knots, and husks." No doubt there has been an enormous trade created by the free introduction of these inferior parts of silk of which the country was entirely deprived under the high prohibitory duties which formerly existed. In the ten years prior to 1823, we consumed only 58,591 lbs. per annum of this raw material, at a duty of about 4s. per lb. In the single year of 1844, at a nominal duty, our consumption was no less than 1,775,855 lbs. Taking even this small item of the silk question, it would not be easy to find a stronger example of the benefits derived from the free introduction of raw materials. When it is considered how much employment has been derived from the free introduction of even this refuse, and the valuable branch of trade which has been created from it, we can form some idea of how much even the revenue is indirectly benefited by the additional consumption of other articles which is promoted by relaxing such duties.

But independent of this new branch of trade, we find that the consumption of thrown and raw silk has been considerably more than doubled during the period in question. Thus:

	Average annual consumption.	Consumption
	1814 to 1823.	1844.
Raw silk	1,521,424	4,021,908
Thrown silk	360,887	410,358
Total raw and thrown ..	1,882,311	4,432,266

The next table in the return is—

AN ACCOUNT OF THE DECLARED VALUE OF BRITISH SILK GOODS Exported from the UNITED KINGDOM, in each Year from 1826 to 1845, both inclusive.

Years.	France	Other countries in Europe.	United States of America	Mexico, S. America, and West Indies.	British Possessions in America and the West Indies.	Africa, Asia, and Australia.	Total.
	£	£	£	£	£	£	£
1826 ..	1,498	49,477	27,365	56,518	19,523	11,199	164,891
27 ..	4,661	50,466	67,111	61,057	23,352	18,757	236,344
28 ..	11,009	61,825	46,587	80,346	24,936	31,138	255,871
29 ..	32,047	70,064	58,889	50,743	36,069	20,324	267,080
1830 ..	31,808	95,196	135,057	69,015	100,312	25,692	521,010
31 ..	43,462	75,252	237,985	67,916	120,521	33,748	678,874
32 ..	75,187	103,113	92,235	97,591	113,561	46,004	528,691
33 ..	76,525	119,308	251,278	108,450	129,316	51,527	737,404
34 ..	60,346	113,894	200,306	106,191	102,487	53,974	617,199
35 ..	45,612	157,762	57,010	67,062	116,421	48,890	593,786
36 ..	43,160	82,850	521,301	75,026	122,990	61,495	917,822
37 ..	43,141	81,007	109,629	73,325	113,514	79,963	508,578
38 ..	56,598	81,214	318,506	65,675	111,109	114,178	777,280
39 ..	44,628	66,463	410,093	96,681	175,217	75,036	868,118
1840 ..	48,807	68,476	274,159	140,974	162,110	98,122	792,648
41 ..	117,353	72,314	306,757	107,601	110,317	68,522	788,894
42 ..	181,924	75,779	81,243	98,988	98,305	53,462	599,185
43 ..	184,222	106,876	164,283	120,026	62,509	66,066	667,954
44 ..	159,680	110,125	180,698	117,594	109,191	8,847	736,152
45	761,429

Office of the Inspector-General of Imports and Exports, Custom House, London, 7 March, 1846. W. IRVINE.

Trades that exist only by the aid of protection cannot command a foreign market; for if their cost of production be so high that they cannot withstand foreign competition at home, when their rivals must incur the expense of transport to meet them, it is quite clear that they will be less able to do so in the neutral markets of the world when each party incurs the same charges. If, on the other hand, a producer can successfully compete in neutral markets, it must be clear that protection in the home market is a mere form and dead letter. All branches of industry, therefore, which subsist only by the aid of protection are exposed to much more serious reverses than those which are in such a natural state that they freely compete with other countries. When the silk trade of this country was dependent only on the monopoly it possessed, the slightest derangement of the home market, by a change of fashion or otherwise, at once deprived it of its whole reliance, and involved all connected with it, both masters and operatives, in the most severe distress; while other trades under similar circumstances could fall back upon their extensive foreign markets, and by a comparatively slight reduction of prices induce so much greater a demand there as materially to mitigate the temporary depression of the home market.

As soon as the silk trade was exposed to competition we find an export demand coming into existence. In 1826, when foreign silks were first admitted, the whole of our exports amounted only to 168,801l., in ten years they reached 917,822l., and in 1845 they amounted to 761,429l. It has, moreover, been a matter of notorious fact, that no cases of distress have existed in Spitalfields since 1820 in any way to be compared with the periods of suffering and depression which existed prior to that time. It is not the least encouraging evidence of the advancing state of this branch of industry, that our largest market for exports is the United States, where the French, German, and Swiss manufactures come in direct and equal competition with us. And it is still more gratifying that the next largest market we possess is in France itself, the country of our greatest rivals, which takes more of our silk manufactures than all our colonial possessions together.

Connected with our exports to France, the next table in these returns brings to light an interesting principle in commerce. The table is:

AN ACCOUNT OF THE QUANTITIES OF FOREIGN SILK MANUFACTURES retained for Home Consumption in the United Kingdom since the removal of the Prohibition (5th July, 1836). Silk Manufactures of Europe entered by Weight.

Years.	Quantities retained for home consumption in the United Kingdom.	Years.	Quantities retained for home consumption in the United Kingdom.
	lbs.		lbs.
1826 ..	48,301	1836 ..	180,078
1827 ..	115,278	1837 ..	172,860
1828 ..	169,469	1838 ..	217,067
1829 ..	121,585	1839 ..	256,851
1830 ..	126,314	1840 ..	243,216
1831 ..	148,479	1841 ..	248,902
1832 ..	144,956	1842 ..	237,460
1833 ..	142,267	1843 ..	267,673
1834 ..	166,261	1844 ..	285,125
1835 ..	160,810	1845 ..	310,153

Since the removal of the prohibition on French silks, the quantity imported has steadily increased each year; while our exports to France have also steadily, but more rapidly increased, showing that, under a perfectly natural and Free Trade, different countries would import from each other different descriptions of the same kind of goods, for which each had the greatest advantage in the production. While France sends silk goods to England which are preferred on account of their better designs or colours, England sends to France other descriptions of silk goods, which have either cheapness or durability to recommend them. It is not too much to say, that the import of silk goods of one kind from France, actually promotes the export of British silks of other kinds to France.

TIMBER.

The next table in these returns relates to the operation of the timber duties from 1840 to 1845.

AN ACCOUNT showing the Quantities of SAWN and HEWN TIMBER, the Produce of the British Colonies and of Foreign Countries respectively, entered for Home Consumption in the United Kingdom, in each Year from 1840 to 1845 inclusive.

		BRITISH COLONIAL:
		Deals, Battens, &c., sawn or split.		Timber hewn.
Years.	By measure-		Masts		By meas.
	By tale.	ment.	by tale.	Number.
	Gt. huuds.	Loads.			Loads.
1840 ..	52,230	3	8433	644,512
41 ..	50,594	3	7546	619,857
42 ..	15,134	170,783	1845	418,939
43 ..	—	347,366	—	605,994
44 ..	—	398,194	—	551,994
45 ..	—	498,891	—	797,490
FOREIGN.
1840 ..	42,872	6,532	14,104	172,628
41 ..	37,479	2,525	11,375	136,165
42 ..	27,079	57,788	5,052	108,388
43 ..	661	229,222	—	121,812
44 ..	279	321,439	—	202,209
45 ..	201	312,965	—	282,928

AN ACCOUNT OF THE AMOUNT OF DUTY received in the United Kingdom on TIMBER (except Staves), in each Year from 1840 to 1845 inclusive.

Years.	Foreign.	Colonial.	Total.
1840 ..	1,222,688 ..	453,805 ..	1,676,493
41 ..	1,012,255 ..	452,509 ..	1,464,764
42 ..	809,055 ..	122,795 ..	931,851
43 ..	575,735 ..	68,750 ..	644,485
44 ..	820,423 ..	71,069 ..	891,492
45 ..	947,843 ..	91,262 ..	1,039,105

Office of the Inspector-General of Imports and Exports, Custom House, London, 10th March, 1845.

WILLIAM IRVING.

The change in the mode of measuring timber introduced when the duties were altered in 1842, renders it difficult to institute any accurate comparison between the years immediately before and succeeding, as to quantity. However, since the reduced duties came into full operation, the import and consumption of timber have rapidly increased, and the revenue is quickly recovering its former amount. The comparison of the consumption and the revenue of 1844 and 1845, the only two years in which the new duties have been fully in operation, is as follows:

	Colonial Timber.	Foreign.	Total duty
	Deals, &c. Hewn.	Deals, &c. Hewn.
	loads.	loads.	£
1844	398,184	551,994	321,439
1845	498,891	797,490	342,965

WOOL.

The next table in these returns is a

RECAPITULATION OF THE RATES OF DUTY chargeable on FOREIGN and COLONIAL WOOL, the Quantities thereof Imported, the PRICES of SUCH WOOL, and the DECLARED VALUE of the Declared Value of British WOOLLEN MANUFACTURES Exported in each Year, from 1818 to 1845.

Year.	Foreign Wool Imported	Colonial Wool Imported	Total Wool Imported	Price of Foreign Wool per lb.	Price of Colonial Wool per lb.	Declared Value of British Woollen Manufactures.	Total.
1818	1,172,139	—	1,172,139	—	—	£	£
1819	1,639,599	—	1,639,599	—	—	£	£
1820	1,543,795	122,229	1,666,024	—	—	£	£
1821	1,616,896	243,551	1,860,447	—	—	£	£
1822	1,839,293	198,415	2,037,708	—	—	£	£
1823	1,888,886	502,889	2,391,775	—	—	£	£
1824	2,217,310	416,915	2,634,225	—	—	£	£
1825	2,165,282	351,984	2,517,266	—	—	£	£
1826	2,110,753	1,232,069	3,342,822	—	—	£	£
1827	2,522,712	562,590	3,085,302	—	—	£	£
1828	2,628,121	1,607,938	4,236,059	—	—	£	£
1829	1,908,629	1,877,020	3,785,649	—	—	£	£
1830	3,306,173	2,002,141	5,308,314	—	—	£	£
1831	2,110,753	2,541,936	4,652,689	—	—	£	£
1832	2,558,129	2,461,191	5,019,320	—	—	£	£
1833	3,161,537	3,611,896	6,773,433	—	—	£	£
1834	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1835	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1836	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1837	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1838	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1839	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1840	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1841	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1842	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1843	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1844	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£
1845	3,770,932	3,770,932	7,541,864	—	—	£	£

Statistical Department, Board of Trade,
9 March, 1846.

• R. PORTER.

Rates of Duty on Foreign Wool.

Year.	Duty per lb.
1818	0 3d. per lb.
1819	6 "
1821	1 "
1822	0 1d.
1844	free

We have so often remarked upon the interesting and important facts contained in this table, and which must be so familiar to our readers, that we do not think it necessary to do much more now than furnish the return itself. It may be well, however, to draw attention to the remarkable decline in our export of woollens in 1819 on the imposition of the high duty. The trade of 1818, the last year of the low duty, has never entirely been recovered in amount till 1844; this is a striking example of the danger of interfering with any branch of industry. It is also very remarkable that with the imposition of the high duty of 1819, although the import fell off immediately by more than thirty per cent., yet the price of English wool fell from 2s. 6d. to 1s. 7d. per lb.; and throughout the whole period it will be observed that the highest price for English wool has been co-existent with the largest imports, while the smallest imports have co-existed with the lowest prices for home-grown wool. The importation of wool last year exceeded that of 1842 by nearly thirty millions of pounds; but in 1842 home-grown wool was worth only 11½d. per lb., which in 1845 was worth 1s. 4d. per lb.

The next table shows the NET PRODUCE paid into the Exchequer, of the REVENUE of CUSTOMS (exclusive of the Corn Duties) and of the REVENUE of EXCISE, in the Years 1842, 1843, 1844, and 1845, with the Amount of duties remitted in those years respectively.

	1842.	1843.	1844.	1845.
Net produce of the Customs, exclusive of Corn Duties	19,661,163	20,275,424	21,406,439	19,829,818
Net produce of the Excise	12,517,646	12,877,528	13,308,050	13,585,583
Duties remitted—
Customs	1,398,122	171,521	286,431	2,418,000
Excise	—	—	70,000	913,000
Total amount remitted, Customs and Excise ..	1,398,122	171,521	356,431	3,331,000

An increased duty of 1s. per gallon on spirits in Ireland was imposed in 1842, and repealed in 1843.

Ed. CARDWELL.

Whitehall, Treasury Chambers, 9th March 1842.

While taxes to the amount of 5,197,074l. have been remitted, the actual receipts of the Exchequer have been reduced only by 1,236,617l.

This interesting and highly instructive document concludes by a statement of the reductions effected in the expenses of the excise department, since the repeal, in 1845, of the duties on auctions and glass, and with some correspondence from glass manufacturers relating to the improved condition of that trade, and the great increase in the demand consequent upon the repeal of the duty. The saving by reductions in the establishment amounts to no less than 52,636l., in reference to which it is stated that most of the officers discontinued in consequence of these reductions have been provided for, and the remainder, it is expected, will all be employed within the next six months, to supply vacancies which occur.

THE COMMERCE OF ROME.

(From a Correspondent of the Daily News.)

ROME, MARCH 12.—That "amusing print" the Diario di Roma, which, as you know, is merely a recital of church ceremonies, chronicled with chamberlain precision and Chinese solemnity, published, last week, in a fit of generosity, the balance sheet of the Savings' Bank for February. The lity were thus informed that during the past month a sum of 30,103 dollars had been lodged by them, while only 16,332 had been withdrawn; a palpable hint to be joyful at such evidence of their prosperous condition under the ecclesiastical system of rule; as if they did not know this exceptional surplus to be a simple derivative from the disturbances of foreign opulence during carnival, and a casual result of the circulating medium being freely lavished among tradesfolk by these northern revellers, far from being an index to the sustained healthy condition of remunerative industry. This topic I have touched on before, and may resume with effect. The middle classes, the proletaires, and operatives having been utterly overlooked in the dominions of the church (with, thereunto, the ignoble connivance of the aristocracy); uniformly snubbed and crushed since the days of Rienzi.

The declamations of Young Italy may or may not be all froth; but Arabic figures cannot be dealt with in the fashion of rhetorical flourishes; the whole question may resolve itself into a simple study of the balance sheet of Roman trade. Let your readers (matter of fact people) pause at each separate figure, and then sum up their impressions from the general comp-dell of the following cartoon, which has not been painted in the Vatican.

1. Cotton tissues.—The population pays for every yard in use, hard cash to the looms of England, Switzerland, and Mulhausen. Two millions of dollars (exclusive of smuggling) are ascertained to be lost on this item. The only attempt to manufacture a coarse description of cotton stuffs was made in the workshop at Dioclesian baths, and in the arsenal of galley slaves at Civita Vecchia. The paupers preferred begging, and the only "cotton lords" left are the latter gentry.

2. In Woollens, things are not quite so bad, though the staple is miserably cared for. Alarmed some years ago at the enormous outgoings of money to purchase foreign broad cloth, the present Pope's advisers suggested the exploded system of bounties, a certain sum was ordered to be paid to the manufacturers according to quality as well as quantity. The result was, that the trade appeared to revive.

1836	there were in operation	28	manufactories producing	31,526
1837	36	48,492
1838	46	67,165
1839	44	63,810

But the force of bounties could no farther go. The thing had been worked up-hill to the utmost of its capacity; smuggling increased and the bounties were jobbed; last year Peel's policy of reducing the tariff was adopted; and at the fair of Sinigaglia, the quantity of foreign cloth admitted at reduced rates doubled in amount, and kept up the produce to the papal treasury; but several factories have since been discontinued, and much misery has ensued. It must be added that the intelligent manufacturers blame Government for not giving them such powers as are supplied in France by the system of livrets, a matter not understood in England, but absolutely necessary here whenever workmen are congregated in bodies. Meantime, the Roman States export raw wool to the amount of 260,000 dollars, and import the same spun or woven to the amount of 490,000 dollars.

3. In Silken tissues these states could supply all Europe with common painstaking. The whole campaign might be planted with mulberries, if the landowners had the slightest wish to improve their enormous tracts. The women spin enough to save a portion of the loss, which is thus—

Raw silk exported, in value 489 dollars.
Spun silk 515,651
Woven silk, imported, in value 237,554

4. In Flax and Hemp the balance of trade is actually in favour of Rome, and that to an unexpected extent, so as to cover the whole loss of the cotton imports. The spinning and weaving of linen is attended to, not in manufactories, but in the homesteads of the cottagers, and without any encouragement or interference of Government. The women here again redeem the laziness and incapacity of the men. For, particularly on the other side of the Apennines, the old habits of the peasantry have survived, and though no longer is part of Macaulay's description true—

"When the oldest cask is opened,
And the largest lamp is lit;
And the chequers glow in the embers,
And the kid turns on the spit."

If no longer—
"The good man mends his armour,
And trims his helmet plume;"

Still—
"The good wife's shuttle merrily Goes flashing thro' the loom."

5. In wax and honey the imports surpass the exports by 140,000 dollars. This is absolutely shameful, and shows how little the fourth book of the Georgics, or the good old man of Æbalia's example has done for the degenerate agricultural mind.

6. The fisheries are in as miserable a state of neglect as in Ireland. St. Peter appears to have only bequeathed his ring (anulum piscatoris) to the Pontiffs. 400,000 dollars are paid in hard cash to us English, for fishing the cod banks of Newfoundland, to enable the Romans to keep Lent, which they do very badly.

7. In the matter of oil only think of a country where the olive has but to be planted to spread its silver leaves in the sun and give abundant returns, actually importing foreign oil from the other Italian states, particularly its neighbour Tuscany, to the amount of 320,000 dollars. Most of the land thus mismanaged is in the claws of the church. To be badly off for soap is a still more blameable condition, arguing arant laziness: this article is imported to the extent of 100,000 dollars.

8. Corn shall form a chapter to itself in a future communication. This is the monster grievance, and ought not to be dealt with perfunctorily.

9. For Gums, Resins, Fruit, Wines, the absolute loss on the balance of import and export is 130,000 dollars.

10. Colonial produce—tea, coffee, sugar—are of course on the wrong side of the ledger; but not an attempt has been dreamt of to imitate the French and German beet-root factories, though this vegetable, planted lately in the fat ground near Aricia, produced roots varying in weight from ten to thirty pounds! It might as well rot on Lethe's wharf as on the banks of the Tiber, for all the Government cares.

11. In the matter of Cheese and Butter, fancy an agricultural country importing these two articles from its neighbours to the amount of 85,101 dollars, and at the same time exporting cows and oxen to the extent of 100,000 dollars.

12. Iron, brass, tin, lead, and zinc, are all imports; yet are there abundant indications of iron and lead mines of iron at Viterbo, at Tolfa, at Monteleone, and coal beds unworked. The Government prefer bringing this all-important article from Elba of the Florentines. Some praise is due to Gregory for the iron works established at the falls of Tivoli and Terni, but the rule subsists more gloriously because of the exception.

13. In Straw Bonnets the industry of the women again exhibits a slight compensation in an export of 120,000 dollars.

14. I have not been able to get at the returns of the doll and crockery trade, but a large balance is here against Rome; though one of its small dependencies, Livorno, had formerly the glory of giving its name to this most profitable branch of industry.

15. In the article of Delli Arti the export is of course on the side of Rome, but to amount far less than would be supposed—a mere trifle over 100,000 dollars. These are a few data on which to found an opinion as to the value of church government and the exclusion of laymen from the management of temporal affairs; and further, while such an aggregate of poverty is necessarily accumulated in the Roman States, with what face can the ecclesiastical rulers of the benighted land refuse the offer of capital for the construction of the railroads? Let Europe judge.

ECONOMICAL BLUNDERS.

(From the Nonconformist.)

The difference in a fortress between the day before surrender and the day after, is not more marked than the fallen estate of the protectionists in Parliament. Blasts of the oratorical trumpet that would once have called out the overwhelming array of banded monopolies, now are quashed harmless under majorities of seven to three. The wonder does not seem so much that this should exist as that it should not have been before. What is this has happened, that makes folly now of what was statesmanship and wisdom a few short months ago?

The last fight has been on the timber duties; a rich subject, and which has been treated accordingly. But why was not the whole craft and mystery as well understood twelve months ago? A band of mercantile gentlemen stand forward and say, "Enable us to get 5l. 10s. a load for timber instead of 4l., and you shall see how curiously we will get you timber for the dearer price. We will not put sixpence into our pockets except in the way of trade. Our rate of profits on the capital employed shall not be greater than that of anybody else; only we will go the long voyage instead of the short, and bring you the bad timber instead of the good. And the reason why you must do all this for us, because we are Englishmen, and make the timber in a place we call a colony; and if you were to get the other timber instead, you must get it of Prussians or Norwegians."

Upon which, it is not clear, now that the nine days of political blind-puppyhood are over, that if the other course were taken, the consequence would be, that instead of 5l. 10s. being given to the dealer in bad timber, Jobson, the 5l. would be given to some British manufacturer or dealer, Johnson, to create the goods which would be given for timber of the same intrinsic goodness to the Prussians or Norwegians, and that the 10s. would be given to some other British manufacturer or dealer, Jackson, for something over and above, to the use and enjoyment of the original owner of the 4l. 10s.? If there is any doubt whether Jobson gets it instead, propose to destroy some existing trade by a new duty, and see whether the Johnsons will not cry out. If there be any doubt of the existence of the Johnsons, ask the consumer to point out the dealers from whom he stops the 10s., if it is to be given to Jobson, and see if they do not join the Johnsons' cry. So that Johnson and Jackson are to lose to a pennyworth the custom which Jobson is to gain; and the consumer, Bull, who pays for all, is the same thing; he is to give him 10s. for nothing, instead of getting what Jackson used to give him. The world has been a long time in finding this out.

The fraud, therefore, when stripped to the skin, amounts to this: "Give us for an article more than you could get it for elsewhere; and there shall be an exact balance,—not the fraction of a grain or loss to industry in the aggregate; saving always this one triviality, that you the payer of the excessive price shall get nothing for the excess. Pay us more than you ought, and we will promise you that neither you nor anybody else shall get anything for it in return. It shall be clean lost and thrown into the fire. And for all this we will make a hubbub in Parliament, and call on heaven and earth to witness our solemn warnings and our deep despair."

It might be supposed the force of folly could no further go; but there is a lower depth. In rear of these statesmen, there is a reserve of philanthropists, sorrowing over the sad estate of "British Industry," if there is to be no more taking from it at one end and giving at the other, with a loss to the industrious classes in their character of consumers besides. For if the industrious classes are not the greatest consumers of foreign produce, they are some consumers, and would be more if they might. So that the plan amounts to taking water in a bucket from one end of a pond to put in at the other, and spilling half by the way. Jobson's workmen are to cry out for taking the work from Johnson's men and Jackson's, and so on to the greatest extent found possible; and the result is to be called protection to British Industry. The working classes by this time understand this as well as anybody, or a huge expenditure of the parts of speech has been made for nothing.

It is pleasing to see a man like Lord Ashley escaping timely from such a perplexity. It was Mr. D'Israeli, was it not, who was last reported as saying something about "economical blunders?"

TRADE OF LEICESTER.—The delay with respect to the ministerial measures has produced a most injurious effect here. Many wool-combers and others are out of employment, and many hands who are not so have limited work. Not only are manufacturers affected, but the general trade of the town is suffering, and much indignation is felt at the needless hindrances to which the measures of government are subjected.

The Queen has presented a pair of milk-white Cashmere goats, part of a flock sent to her Majesty by the Shah of Persia, to the 23d Welch Fusiliers, to replace the venerable Cambrin goat which accompanied that gallant regiment, and which lately died at Barbadoes.

Just Published,
MR. COBDELL'S SPEECH in the House of Commons
 on Friday, February 27th, 1846.—Revised. Price One Penny, 16
 Pages.

MR. BRIGHT'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Tuesday Night, Feb. 17. Price One Penny.

MR. GIBSON'S SPEECH in the House of Commons
 on Monday Night, Feb. 16. Price One Penny.

LEAGUE Office, 67, Fleet-street, London; J. Gadsby, Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Where may be had,

THE GOATACRE MEETING.

Just published, price One Penny, or 5s. per 100.

A VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATACRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.
 Sold at the LEAGUE Office, 67, Fleet-street, London; and by J. Gadsby, Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Upwards of 100,000 copies have been printed.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

DAWN ISLAND. By MISS MARTINEAU. Written
 expressly for the Great Bazaar. Price 2s. 6d.
 The getting up is superb—equal to any specimen of typographical art that ever met our eyes. Sentinal.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
 the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECO-
NOMY. By Mrs. M. A. C. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE
TRADE. By EARL DUFF, MESSRS. VILLIERS, COBDELL, BRIGHT, GIBSON,
 O'CONNELL, McCULLAGH, BAINE, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

*Several members of the Council of the League are desirous of making complete their sets of the Anti-Corn- Law Circular, which was printed in Manchester, prior to the commencement of the LEAGUE paper. They are deficient of the following numbers:

76, 93, 103, 107.

Any reasonable sum will be paid for the numbers, or any of them.

They may be addressed to the care of Mr. Gadsby, Newall'sbuildings, Manchester, and should be accompanied by a letter from the senders, which shall be promptly replied to, with payment.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending
 Wednesday, March 25, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding,
 but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their
 Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League
Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON,
67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
*Munn, Robert, Bacup	200	0	0
*Bannerman, Henry and Sons, York-st., Manchester	100	0	0
Anderson, Arthur, Scarborough	50	0	0
*Allen, John and Richard, Warrington	50	0	0
*Newton, Samuel, Atherton, near Chowbent	20	0	0
*Heywood, Robert, Bolton	20	0	0
*Southam, J. H., Ashton-under-lyne	10	0	0
*Herford, John, King-street, Manchester	5	0	0
*Hyde, George and Joseph, Staley, near do	5	0	0
*Gardner, Wm., 41, North John-street, Liverpool	5	0	0
*Wilson, Thomas, Quay Side, Newcastle-on-Tyne	5	0	0
*From the Hands of A. and G. Murray New Mill, Great
Ancoats-st., Manchester	4	13	0
*Rawson, Richard, Wigan	4	0	0
*Grimson, J. and Son, Ebenezer-place, Ashton-road,
Manchester	2	2	0
Jones, Joseph, Uttroter	2	0	0
*T. B., Salford	2	0	0
*Procter, Jno., Aberdeen, N.B.	2	0	0
*Bradshoigh, Josh., 15, Birch-lane, Manchester	1	4	0
Reynolds, George, and other Workmen at Mr. Cook's
Paper Mill, York-place, Richmond, Yorkshire	1	1	6
*Aubrey, Richard, Gloucester-place, Swansea, S.W.	1	1	0
*Paxton, John, Berwick-on-Tweed	1	0	0
*Brown, George, Slatford, near Edinburgh	1	0	0
*Hardy, S. C., Nottingham	1	0	0
*Soller, W. J., Foregate-street, Chester	1	0	0
*Harrison, Lawrence, Mauldland, Chester	1	0	0
*Shaw, Wm., Roston, near Oldham	1	0	0
*Seville, Thomas, sen., Sandy-lane, do	1	0	0
*Glover, John, per Thomas Mason, Ashton-under-lyne	1	0	0
*Robinson, George, Saddleborough	1	0	0
*Swindella, George, Littleborough, near Rochdale	1	0	0
*Wilson, Thomas, jun., Quay Side, Newcastle-on-Tyne	1	0	0
*McCaslin, Wm., Side	1	0	0
*Hewitt, Thomas, Dean-street	1	0	0
*Montgomery, James, Marlboro Crescent	1	0	0
*Wilson, Wm., Albion-street	1	0	0
*Brockett, W. H., Gateshead	1	0	0
*Ellis, John, 28, Garside-street, Manchester	1	0	0
*Gaid, Thomas, Alport Town	1	0	0
*Jenkins, David, Tregeir Farm, near Swansea	1	0	0
*Brown, George, Senhouse-st., Maryport	1	0	0
*Robinson, John, Blockmaker, do	1	0	0
*A Shipowner, do	1	0	0
Robson, Andrew, Berwick-on-Tweed	0	10	0
Brown, J. T., do	0	7	6
W. R., Manchester	0	5	0
Cocking, George, Bull-ring, Ludlow, Salop	0	5	0

*Court, Henry	1	0	0
*Lea, Wm., tailor	1	0	0
Martin, Thomas, Earsbourn	0	10	0
Martin, James	0	10	0
Rutter, Thomas	0	5	0
Smith, J.	0	5	0
Charley, Robert	0	4	0
Reed, Charles	0	2	6
King, T.	0	2	6
Moore, Mr.	0	2	6
Barnard, Mr.	0	2	6
H. G.	0	2	6
W. I.	0	2	6
White, James	0	2	0
Smith, Wm.	0	1	0

*Fish, John, Theatre Road	1	0	0
*Bailey, Joseph, King-street	1	0	0
*Jackson, James, North Quay	1	0	0
*Douglas, James, Theatre Plain	1	0	0
*Boulter, Henry, North Entrance	1	0	0
*Burroughs, Wm. Norton, Market-place	1	0	0
*Barnes, Robert, King-street	1	0	0
*Gourlay, D. A., Market-row	1	0	0

Lamb and Scott, linen manufacturers	30	0	0
Guthrie and Hood, do	20	0	0
Smart, J. and J., do	5	0	0
Duncan, Wm., merchant	5	0	0
Monro, Alexander, flax-spinner	5	0	0
Wood, James, merchant	1	0	0
Davidson, William	1	0	0
Shepherd, James	1	0	0
Grassick, Peter	0	10	0
Siewright, James	0	10	0

*Higginbotham, Samuel, Queen-street	100	0	0
*Thompson, Neil, Hutcheson-street	40	0	0
*Gemmell, Wm., St. Vincent-street	30	0	0
*Dunlop, Charles, Miller-street	20	0	0
*Murray, Wm. and James, West George-st	20	0	0
*Hutcheson, Robert, Hutcheson-street	20	0	0
*Robson, George, Queen-street	10	0	0
*Chapman, David, Jamaica-street	10	0	0
*McConnell, A., do	10	0	0
*Anderson, D. and J., South Hanover-st	10	0	0
*Mitchell, Thomas, Virginia-street	10	0	0
*Fleming, Watson, and Nairn, Ingram-st	10	0	0
*McEwan, W. and Sons, Tron-gate	10	0	0
*McKinlay, David, 113, Brunswick-st	10	0	0
*Anderson, George, and Co., Hyde Park	10	0	0
*Ewing, Paul, and Co., Ingram-street	10	0	0
*Stirling, John, South Frederick-street	10	0	0

*Armour, Robt. and John Liddell, South	10	0	0
Hanover-st	10	0	0
*Paterson, Walter, St. Vincent-street	6	0	0
*Sandeman, David, Miller-street	6	0	0
*Davidson, Jas., jun., South Frederick-st	6	0	0
*Mitchell, George, 47, Ingram-street	5	0	0
*Tweedie, James, Argyle-street	5	0	0
*Miller and Caldwell, Croy-place	4	4	0
*Brown, John, jun., Virginia-street	4	0	0
*Risk, J. and C., Cochran-street	4	0	0
*Tennant, Alexander, Wilson-street	4	0	0
*Laird and Thomson, Ingram-street	4	0	0
*Service, Wm. and Sons, London-street	4	0	0
*Smith, David, 173, Tron-gate	4	0	0

*Hunter, A. G. and Co., Buchanan-st	4	0	0
*Jamieson, James, Fife-place	4	0	0
*McKeand, A. and J., Tron-gate	3	0	0
*Small, John, Stirling-square	3	0	0
*Gilmour, Matthew, Glassford-street	3	0	0
*McNab, A. and J., 145, Ingram-street	2	2	0
*Black, J. and D. and Co., do	2	0	0
*Smith and Sharp, Argyle-street	2	0	0
*Ord, George, Virginia-place	2	0	0

*Blackwood, Wm., Candleriggs	3	0	0
*Mitchell, S. and Sons, St. Andrew's-sq.	2	0	0
*Mitchell, W. W., Ingram-street	2	0	0
*McGregor, J. and Sons, 43, Old Wynd	2	0	0
*McKay, Robert, 123, Candleriggs	2	0	0
*Henderson, Wm. and Sons, New Wynd	2	0	0
*Boyd, C. and Sons, Clyde-st., Anderson	2	0	0
*Ross, Philip, Buchanan-street	2	0	0
*Bankier, Wm., George's-square	2	0	0

*Kay, Alex., jun., 2, Royal Exchange-st.	1	1	0
*Mair, John, 82, Tron-gate	1	1	0
*Stenhouse, John, Provyn-place	1	1	0
*Gibson, Wm., 18, East Campbell-street	1	0	0
*Galloway, John, 10, George's-street	1	0	0
*Thomson, Wm., 34, Glassford-street	1	0	0
*Caird, Robert, Argyle-street	1	0	0
*Hendry and Ewing, Glassford-street	1	0	0
*Kerr, John, jun., 14, Garthland-street	1	0	0
*Geddes, J., Govan Bank, Upper Govan	1	0	0
*Finlay, John, Buchanan-street	1	0	0

*Livingstone, Wm.	20	0	0
*Wrigley, John, and Sons	10	0	0
*Shaw, Wm., and Sons, Golcar	10	0	0
*Walker, Josh. and Sons, Lindley	10	0	0
*Taylor, John, Newsome	4	0	0
*Hirst, David, 41, Westgate	4	0	0
*Vickerman, Benjamin, Taylor Hill	4	0	0
*Woodhead, Edward	2	0	0
*Lea, Edward	2	0	0
*Willet, Richard	2	0	0

*Hoy, Benjamin, Dyer, Aspley	1	0	0
*Turner, Frederick	1	0	0
*Raiton, George, New-street	1	0	0
*Hirst, Walter	1	0	0
*Ibbotson, Thomas	1	0	0
*Taylor, Joseph, Small-lane, Golcar	1	0	0
*Taylor, Jas., jun., Bolster Moor, Golcar	0	10	0
*Hirst, John, Golcar	0	10	0
*Denham, John, Clough in Clifton	0	6	0
*Crawshaw, George, Kirkburton	0	4	0
*Walker, John, Bastrick	0	4	0
*Walker, Alfred, do	0	4	0
*Hopkinson, Henry, Skithwaite	0	4	0
*Broadbent, Joseph, Kirkheaton	0	4	0

*A Friend, per J. Crossley	10	0	0
*Wood, S., Sowerby Bridge, near	10	0	0
*Sugden, Thomas, and Sons, Brighouse	10	0	0
*Stocks, Joseph, Lightcliffe, near	2	0	0
*Farrar, J. B. and J., Causeway	1	1	0
*Ottley, Thomas	1	0	0
*Rothery, James, Stone Dam Mill	1	0	0
*Dickenson, James	1	0	0
*Clayton, Henry, Trinity-place	1	0	0
*Blackburn, Thomas, Newmarket	1	0	0
*Wyde, James	1	0	0

*Blyth and Graham, Broad-street	10	0	0
*Kempson, T., Fazeley-street Mills	1	10	0
*W. T., at Mr. Sturk's, Shipston-on-Stour	1	1	0
*Taylor, T., draper, Camden, Gloucester	1	1	0
*Sherwood, John, Litchfield-street	1	0	0
*Wakfield, John, S. Molan-street	1	0	0
*Sherwood, R., Litchfield-street	1	0	0
*Workmen at Sherwoods	1	0	0
*Sherwood, John, jun., Litchfield-street	1	0	0

*Kenrick, Archibald, Roebuck-lane	20	0	0
*Kenrick, Timothy, do	20	0	0
*Spittle, James, and John, Carter's Green	20	0	0
*Gilbert, Luke, jun., Lyndon	2	0	0
*Wilson, Wm., Hill Top	2	0	0
*Smith, Isaiah, High-street	1	0	0
*Hardware, Roger, do	1	0	0
*Bent, John, do	1	0	0
*Clark, John, do	1	0	0
*Hudson, R. S., do	1	0	0
*Walton, John, Black Lake	0	10	0
*Sundry small sums	1	10	0

*Mitchell, Jno. and D., Chichenley, near	4	0	0
*Clarkson, Richard, Dewsbury Moor	1	1	0
*Gomersall, Thomas, and Brothers	1	0	0
*Day, Mark, Batley Carr, near	1	0	0
*Harrop, Timothy, Eurl-shenton	1	0	0
(Siddall, Samuel and William	0	5	0

*Stone, Richard, 6, Oxford-terrace	21	0	0
*Powell, Messrs. Townsend & Co., St. Etienne, Franco	10	0	0
*Field, E. W., 41, Bedford-row	10	0	0
*Swainson, Wm., 72, Wood-street	10	0	0
*Cox, Heische, and Co., America-square, Minories	5	5	0
*Hull, H., Uxbridge	5	0	0

*McCullagh, W. Torrins, 3, New London-st., Crutched-friers	5	0	0
*Hubbuck, Thomas, jun., 115, East Smithfield	5	0	0
*Huxley, Thomas, 15, Whitechapel-road	5	0	0
*Johnson, James, M.D., Bare, near Lancaster	5	0	0
*Kirby, P., Conington, St. Ives	4	0	0
*A Shipowner, Sunderland	2	10	0
*Baker, Capt., Ramsgate Vale, Ramsgate	2	0	0
*Broad, Rev. P., St. Mary's Cray	2	0	0
*Cox, Wm., 16, Pinner Hall, Old Broad-street	1	1	0
*Martin, W. W., 201, Lower Thames-street	1	1	0
*Ralph, James, 150, Strand	1	1	0
*Quinn, R., 23, Kippie-street, Russell-square	1	1	0
*Frost, Master Thomas, Arnold, near Nottingham	1	1	0
*The Members of the Literary Institution, Faversham	1	1	0
*Feast, Robert, 16, Finsbury Pavement	1	1	0
*Richards, Wm., Maisemore, near Gloucester	1	0	0
*Rowley, John, Mill Field, Hanley, Staffordshire	1	0	0
*Eno, John, Jersey	1	0	0
*Puntin, Wm., Ardrossan place, Greenock	1	0	0
*Turnbull, Thomas, Church-street, Whitby	1	0	0
*Brown, Henry, Lewes	1	0	0
*Howard, R., Sprexhall Road, Halesworth, Suffolk	1	0	0
*Clarke, A., Flax Mills, Boulogne-sur-Mer	1	0	0
*Artists employed in Mr. W. S. Kennedy's Porcelain
Manufactory, Burslem	1	0	0
*Bailey, Lieut. W. R.N., Abwell Farm, near Berkely,
Gloucestershire	1	0	0
*Brooke, Thomas, clothier, Ossett, near Wakefield	1	0	0
*Williamson, Joshua, do, Horbury do	1	0	0
*Wood, Wm., Nicholas-street, Bristol	1	0	0
*Fead, Lieut.-Col., Ravensbourne-terrace, Lewisham	1	0	0
*Tinkler, Henry, Castle-st., Wellingford	1	0	0
*McKean, David, 20, St. Enoch's-square, Glasgow	1	0	0
*Smith, Robert, St. Paul's-place, Walworth Common	1	0	0
*A Free Trader, Hants	1	0	0
*Lettley, C. D., 37, Soho-square	1	0	0
*Fox, Charles, 67, Paternoster-row	1	0	0
*Wright, E., 11, Aldermanbury	1	0	0
*Goodman, Wm., 21, Percival-street, Clerkenwell	0	5	0
*Clary, Wm., 13, New Inn-yard, Shoreditch	0	5	0
*Sykes, James, Holywell-row, Worship-street	0	5	0
*Leach, James, 12, President-street, St. Luke's	0	5	0
*Bennett, Wm., 36, Percival-street, Clerkenwell	0	2	6
*Cable, Collier, 209, Stone-street, Chelsea	0	2	6

</

* It is the first article in a book published at Mr. Wilson's Royal Exchange, entitled 'Liberté du Commerce.' Price 1s. 6d. The Duc d'Harcourt is a rich landed proprietor. Upon a similar topic, in 1845, he said that he was 'an owner of iron forges and forests; and not at all disposed to ruin himself by way of exportment. At least he was disinterested when he wished the tariff to be changed.' (10th June, 1845.)

Joseph Acton, Wigan	100	0	0
George Gibson and Co., Arbroath	100	0	0
E. Lombe, Great Milton, Norwich	100	0	0
Arthur Morse, Swaffham	100	0	0
Crossfield, Brothers, and Co., Horsham	50	0	0
Jarrow Chemical Company, South Shields	50	0	0
Renny, Sons, and Co., Arbroath	50	0	0
E. Sykes and Sons, Lindley, near Huddersfield	50	0	0
John Hutchinson, Sunderland	30	0	0
John Patten and Son, Alloa	30	0	0
A Friend to the Agricultural Labourer, Sunderland	25	0	0
J. and W. Archibald, Alloa	25	0	0
D. and F. Lambert, do.	25	0	0
Thomas Bell, Donk Alkali Works, South Shields	25	0	0
J. P. Packer, Upton Lovell, Herefordshire	25	0	0
E. J. Waterhouse, Lindley, near Huddersfield	25	0	0
George Canning, Arbroath	20	0	0
John Arkcoll, Maidstone	20	0	0
James Johnson, M.D., Bare, near Lancaster	20	0	0
A. J. Moore, Bridge-street, Sunderland	20	0	0
A. G. Rahm, South-street, do.	20	0	0
Thos. Robson, Cumberland-terrace, do.	20	0	0
Thos. Thompson, Villiers-street, do.	20	0	0
Robert Vint, Herald Office, do.	20	0	0
Joshua Wilson, Frederick-street, do.	20	0	0
Henry Wilson, Twickenham place, do.	20	0	0
Jonathan Freeman, Newcastle-on-Tyne	20	0	0
E. Swinbourne, Troutbeck Bridge, Kendal	20	0	0
James Walter, Luton	20	0	0
John Jubb, do. Batley	15	0	0
Michael Shead and Son, do.	15	0	0
Alexander Mann and Son, Arbroath	15	0	0
William Park, Southell, Greenock	10	10	0
William Andrew, do. Arbroath	10	0	0
Charles Anderson, do.	10	0	0
Joseph S. Brown, do.	10	0	0
William Johnston, do.	10	0	0
Armedy Lawson, do.	10	0	0
David Loring and Son, do.	10	0	0
Robert Main, do.	10	0	0
Amicus Herald Office, do. Whitehaven	10	0	0
William Nicholson, do.	10	0	0

'Private interests have hitherto prevailed against Free Trade; but the nation is ready to adopt it. It is the grand question of modern times.' The ancients were our superiors in letters, and the fine arts. But a privileged few only shared that superiority, whilst the millions were ignorant slaves. Christianity has rescued them from their degradation; and it remains for us to carry out the doctrines of Christianity, by making our laws conform to them. These doctrines are yet to be better than mere theories with us. Religious liberty, civil liberty, commercial liberty, are all refused with disdain by the monopolisers of every degree. They know well that the best means of getting the most money out of the nation is to set class against class. They do not know that the true germ of civilisation, perhaps the only universal one, is Free Trade. There is no mistake in the argument establishing the triumph of Free Trade. They are these: first, mutual wants must lead to communication between man and man; and, secondly, without mutual wants, the earth would become a silent solitude. The more wants men have, the greater must be their intercourse, and the steadier their progress. Providence, in its wonderful plan, has infinitely varied the productions of different countries, in order to compel their inhabitants to seek each other out. To put obstacles in the way of that intercourse, is to oppose the course of Providence. Savages are savages only because they live apart from us, and have no wants. Free Trade, then, is civilisation; and prohibitions are real barbarism. Archimedes said, that with a fulcrum he would move the earth. I venture to assert, that with Free Trade at my command, I could defy religious animosities, war, famine, poverty—to overturn the old lot of man.

'No will Free Trade make food and clothing the cheaper; it will improve means of subsistence, and increase their intelligence, because it will give them time for the one, and incline them to the other. It is in vain to open schools if the scholars are starving. But feed them well, and they will rapidly acquire all the knowledge you can offer them.'

'The industry of man is in an eternal ferment. Its last result is, over abundant production. Consumption has its natural limit; production has no bounds. England and Belgium and France have all reached the last point of consumption in several articles. One two neighbours admit this fact; and half France does the same thing when year after year complaining bitterly of the tariff, which cuts them off from the proper remedy—access to foreign markets. The whole civilised world, with its natural, instinctive view of the truth, perceive this to be the case; and, therefore, it is now eagerly seeking an outlet in all quarters for its overabundant abundance. Unhappily the Government of France, well as it knows all this, is bound hand and foot by our monopolists.'

'There is, however, one example near us, which we ought to follow. It is passing in England surpasses in grandeur all that is recorded in history—the struggle of the League to emancipate industry. The British Free Trade League is making prodigious strides. And when we reflect upon the obstacles in its way—upon the private interests opposed to it, and upon the power of a once resisting Government, we are bound to do justice to a nation capable of such an effort. Mr. Cobden deserves to be enrolled among the benefactors of mankind for his share in this prodigious success. On our parts, instead of fostering a blind, unprofitable hate towards our neighbours, let us imitate their great deeds—let us become free, like them—above all, let us become Free Traders. All the rest will follow.'

'This is a faithful translation of a small part of the speech of a French duke, on the 12th of January last.'

A RESIDENT IN FRANCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"Blessed is he that considereth the poor."

SIR,—Permit me once more to state, through the medium of your "great fact" paper, that another of the real friends of the peasantry has sent me a sovereign for the poor of our province. Many thanks to E. S. W. I am right glad, that while many Free Traders have sent me various sums of money for the peasantry, so few have requested me to give them money. Food, clothing, firing, beds, and bedding, are at all times a great blessing to the degraded and famishing sons and daughters of toil; but they are so ignorant, and too many of them are so inferior in moral and mental elevation to others of the same class in the manufacturing districts, that they do not know how to use money when they have it. They are in very deed a degraded and ruined class of men, women, and children. They have too long been left to the tender mercy of those who maintain that the best way to keep the poor in order and obedience, is to pay them low wages, and to keep them ignorant. I hope the important information in relation to the condition of our peasantry, and the low wages paid them, which I have forwarded at his own request to Edward Galsdon, Esq., Assistant Poor Law Commissioner, will be published. I have now the high honour of being publicly abused by a protectionist farmer in the county of Bucks. Yes, the worthy gentleman has said in public company that I ought to be burnt for the part which I have taken in the cause of suffering humanity and justice. I hope the valiant yeoman will not entangle himself in his own net. I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

W. FERGUSON,

King's End, Bicester, March 25.

Mr. Gordon, of Naish House, East Somersetshire, has addressed to the Editor of a London paper the following letter, which, with something of an Irish blunder, is headed "The Frightened Farmers":

"Naish, East Somerset, March 13, 1846.

"Sir,—You inserted, a few days since, a circular forwarded on the 14th Feb., to above sixty of my tenants here, offering to take their farms, at Lady-day, off their hands, if they felt alarmed at the repeal of the Corn Laws, and would give notice before the 18th February.

"I apologise to you for not having informed you of the result, namely, that although at Mr. W. Miles's threshold, and most of us his supporters, not one accepted.

"If panic ever really did exist, it is fast dying away among the farmers.

"That it is also among the landlords, may be gathered from the fact of persons applying to myself for land, who had to leave their holding under the members for East Somerset and Bristol, as they stated, from their being desirous to farm it themselves. I am about to follow their good example on land that ought, but won't go out of cultivation."

"Courage, Protectionists! Does not this speak more volumes than Hansard himself?"

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"J. A. GORDON"

THE TRUE WEALTH OF ENGLAND.—The great internal resources of this country depend on its minerals; a bag of coals would not be so comfortable a thing for the Lord Chancellor to sit upon as the woodsuck, but much more emblematical of the wealth of England. It is the coal, and not the wool, that has made England what it is, and our mineral resources both in coal and iron are yet in their infancy. We have just touched on the fringe of our mineral wealth, something like the cultivation of New South Wales as compared with what it may be. The great increase of railway communication will tend to develop these resources beyond all conception; but any want of uniformity in the gauge will tend to diminish that development.—Capt. Law's Evidence upon the Gauge Commission.

ANOTHER GLANCE AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

BY REUBEN.

YOUNG MEMBERS—THE MARQUIS OF WORCESTER.

Of the youthful members of the House of Commons, whom we see sitting as representatives of farm-yards, or rising to address the house as the instructors of commercial men on commercial policy; or stretched on the benches of the gallery asleep, as if worn, while yet in the bud, with legislative toil; or skipping arm-in-arm through the lobbies as bosom friends, happy upon the threshold of a pleasant time of life; or standing at the bar in clusters, caring little more for the calls of "order at the bar," from the Speaker, than they cared a year or two ago at college for the calls of the proctors to prayers; listening, it may be, to what the railway king, who stands in the midst, tells them of the chances of scrip being hatched into golden dividends by the committees which sit on scrip as hens sit on eggs—the king, proud to have young lords to listen, and the young lords pleased to have an adviser so respectable in adventure and success as the king of railways; or listening, it may be, to equally confidential and acceptable advice from Lord George, king of jockies, who hints to them how to hedge, and having hedged, how to lay against their own favourites, and win enough to live like lords;—of all the youthful members whom we see sprinkled among the old ones, making an old House of Commons look like a young one, the most noticeable are the sons of the dukes recently withdrawn from school, and brought to London to adorn the drawing-rooms, and legislate for their fathers' corn fields, game preserves, dog-kennels, grease and lard, kitchen-stuff, and all the other elements of ducal grandeur—Temple Grenville, Churchill, Lennox, Bentinck, and Somerset.

Of these the last, who is the heir of the Duke of Beaufort—the handsome, reputedly intelligent, and youthful Marquis of Worcester, deserves special notice. He was sent in the room of the Hon. Francis Charteris to represent protection to the cheese, grass, tenants-at-will, and foul cultivation of Gloucestershire. Mr. Charteris is the grandson of the Earl of Wemyss, a Scotch nobleman, owning a good estate in the well-known agricultural county of East Lothian; and having, as near neighbours, and, I believe, tenants, Mr. Hope of Fenton Barns, and his son, the author of the prize essays, which pleaded so well for Free Trade, for the sake of the farmers. Lord Wemyss has also landed property in Gloucestershire, which, together with his Tory connection, obtained for his grandson a seat in Parliament in 1841 for one of the divisions of that county. And there can be little doubt that the superior cultivation of their Lothian estates by tenants paying rents according to the prices of grain, and not a fixed sum of money, holding on lease, making the land a profitable investment for capital, without reference to the Corn Law, most of them repudiating protection as being not only worthless, but a positive evil,—there can be no doubt that with such an estate so cultivated in Scotland, with another estate badly cultivated, and low rents badly paid, though the soil is naturally good, in Gloucestershire, where the tenantry have been almost unanimous, and those of them who have been the worst farmers have been the loudest, in calling for protection;—there can be little doubt that these circumstances had a strong tendency to make the Charteris family Corn Law repealers, even before Sir Robert Peel declared a change in his opinions.

But Mr. Charteris had also learned that in Gloucestershire a practical agriculturist, who repudiates protection, who has striven against it, and torn the delusion to shreds and exposed it to the world, both by his pen upon paper and by his plough in the land, by his intellect as a theorist, and by his capital as a practical farmer—I mean Mr. Morton, of Whitefield farm; Mr. Charteris knew that Mr. Morton was producing the best of crops easily where the worst had grown with difficulty under the Gloucestershire system; that his landlord, Earl Ducie, had laid out 7000*l.* on the permanent improvement of that farm for which Mr. Morton paid five per cent. of augmented rent; and that he, the tenant was working the farm with a capital of 4000*l.*; while under the old system, which gave but a bare living to the farmer and no profit, the working capital was barely 700*l.*; that where a man, a boy, and two women were employed, and paid the meagre wages of a county over-run with pauperism, twelve men and a proportionate number of women and boys are employed now, and are paid wages according to the worth of their work, and not according to how little they could live on without falling on the poor rates. Mr. Charteris had learned these facts; also that while Whitefield farm employed in proportion to its acres two and a half times more labourers than England could give to agriculture, its rateable value for poor's rates had been tripled. Knowing these things, and others equally valuable, which we need not stop to particularise now, Mr. Charteris changed his opinion on the question of protection to agriculture; and having, like many older and more experienced men, given a pledge in 1841 to preserve the Corn Law, he resigned his seat rather than vote for it again, and the Marquis of Worcester is sent up in his place to vote for protection.

The marquis has already voted several times, and has spoken once. High expectations were formed, and by some are still held, of his speaking qualities. Seldom has the House of Commons bent down its head and listened, and been more complimentary to a young marquis than to him; but seldom has a young marquis made so poor a beginning.

But his ability to speak is not the question with us, it is his ability to protect the farmers. And protect them from what? Let us see.

Besides the fifteen or twenty miles of green fields, foul ditches, scrubby hedgerows, excellent land, in a state of deplorable mismanagement, with a pauper population on it in Gloucestershire—a district not surpassed in all England for its fox-hunting—the Duke of Beaufort, who is its owner and fox-hunter, possesses a large estate in the neighbouring shire of Monmouth. This Monmouth estate is large enough to give him the power of returning his brother as a county member, and to bring him in upwards of 50,000*l.* a-year of rent, although it is very defectively cultivated.

This is the ancient family estate of Ragland; and Ragland Castle is famous, not alone in the history of the Duke of Beaufort's ancestors, but in the history of England. No circumstance connected with Ragland Castle, however, in history, equals in interest the tradition that it was here that the discovery of the power of steam was first made. The discoverer and first experimenter was a Marquis of Worcester, ancestor of the Somersets of the present day. But this is digressive; to the subject now before us.

The most striking characteristics of the Ragland estate at the present time, are the necessity for drainage, the facilities for drainage, and the utter absence of drainage; the consequent feebleness of grain crops on strong loamy soils; the coarseness of meadow pastures; the insufficiency of winter feeding for live stock; the poor and profitless condition of the live stock; and the similitude of the farmers, and the farm-labourers, to the poor live stock. I may add, as another characteristic, the ditches with their weedy wastes varying from three to ten yards wide, which occupy more land as absolute waste than would pay all the local taxes.

Now it so happened, a few years ago, that one of the tenants more adventurous than the rest drained some of his fields, imperfectly it is true, yet so beneficially as to add greatly to the fertility of his farm. He is now able to grow excellent Baga turnips (Swedes) and feed winter stock. He produces manure therefrom, and has a large increase of all kinds of crops in return; not extraordinary crops compared with what are taken from similar soils elsewhere; indifferent, compared with Mr. Morton's produce on Whitfield farm, in Gloucestershire; yet great, compared with anything produced in Monmouthshire, under the common agriculture of Monmouth—the system, or rather the systemless waste, of Ragland.

The tenant now under notice also dressed up his hedges, scoured out his ditches, levelled down the banks, made compost of the earth he found there, and, in a word, improved the farm by venturing to obey some of the axioms and recommendations of the Royal Agricultural Society.

What followed? the agent of the duke demanded an advance of rent—the tenant holding, as all the others do, at will. This demand led to a disagreement—to the threat of being served with a notice to quit, and ultimately to the appointment of a land valuer to value the farm, who set the fair rental at fifteen shillings per acre more than was previously paid, which augmentation of fifteen shillings per acre is now paid—a warning to all other farmers not to drain their land, not to grow winter food for stock, not to produce manure to fertilise their fields, not to attempt to save the manure now running to waste, not to clear out the foul ditches, not to level down cumbrous banks and make compost, not to attempt to follow any of the instructions of the agricultural societies—an unmistakeable warning to avoid joining in the progress of the age—an injunction not to attack, contend with, and overcome the obstinacy of the uncultivated earth, but to preserve its stubborn strength, to be in everlasting battle with it, and to remain content to be always getting the worst of the battle.

Speaking of the Duke of Beaufort merely as a man, I do not think he is blameable for unfair treatment of the tenant. He is seldom in Monmouthshire, save when with the hounds or with his agents—when either hounds or agents, or both, fill his ear to the exclusion of any farmer's voice. But as a landlord he is blameable. He does as a landlord, from mere negligence, or permits to be done, what he would not do as a man.

Nor does it follow that the agents are intentionally unjust and hard bargaining men. They are expected to pay in a certain amount of money into the duke's account at the bank. On the vast estates, in the absence of everything like systematic management, repairs to farm buildings are only done in a patchwork style, all are needing to be renewed, and most are getting some patches put on. Where least money is received, most is often taken to do those imperfect repairs. Thus money must come from some other part of the estate; and the agents are driven to the necessity of getting the most money out of those who can pay best.

It is a miserable kind of management, and makes the duke and his agents sink in the esteem of those with whom they should stand well. It makes the duke, who is reputed to be a generous man, seem to be a hard man. It makes the agents do what, if kept to their natural inclinations, they would scorn to do; and it need not be surprising if a long practice of this kind at last leads some of them to be insensible to wrong.

The Marquis of Worcester, and his father, who sent him to Parliament to uphold what they call protection, are thoroughly wrong as to what is protection, and fatally wrong for the sake of their own property, in allowing their tenantry to suffer for the want of real protection—for the want of secure tenures. But this is the time, and we are now in the midst of the events, when and through which it is proper to turn their attention to what protection is, and what it is not.

For this purpose have these remarks been written, and given for the public perusal.

MR. RASHLEIGH.

This gentleman is one of the members for Cornwall. He was one of four or five who jumped to their feet simultaneously to address the house on Tuesday night about 9 o'clock. That is the time of the evening when there is most competition for the "Speaker's eye;" in other words, when there is most desire to speak. In the early part of that evening, after Lord Pollington, who resumed the debate, sat down, nobody rose for some minutes, so sure was every one of having an empty house to speak to, if speaking between 6 and 8 o'clock. And the members did thin away to fewer than 40 before 7 o'clock. But no one had an interest in moving that the house be counted; so it was not counted out; and Mr. Plumptre, an elderly man, of spare figure, who was the first to rise after Lord Pollington, made a long empty-belly speech to an empty house. The man, the speech, the purpose of the speech, the place, the time—all were suggestive of famine.

Towards nine, when the house began to fill, the desire to speak increased. Sitting where I was, the faces of all who sprung upon their feet were not visible, and if they had been visible, I am not sufficiently acquainted with them to know their names. All I could see and understand was, that one of the bodies which had sprung up, remained up, that the others sat down, and that this one threw itself round about in a violent twirl, with its face to where its back was at first, and then righted itself, as if it had been a cable in a stormy sea; that the same instant it threw out its arms and dived forward, and bent itself down, and screamed at the highest pitch of its voice something about feather-beds. Then it stretched itself up, and shook its head, and clenched its teeth, and spoke while its teeth were clenched; then it threw its arms forward, somewhat in the manner of a windmill which has almost stopped, but which bounds on afresh with a new gust of wind, and pointing to somebody opposite it, said, "No; I live among the green fields, not among your smoky chimneys." It then twisted round, and spoke with its face where its back had been, and wheeled round again, and continued so to do, until its voice sunk from exhaustion, and it spoke feebly and low, and told of the time when it would have willingly lost one of its limbs for Sir Robert Peel, but that it would not do so now; and so it sat down. Next morning I found by the newspapers that this curious exhibition had been made by the gentleman whose name stands at the head of this paragraph.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE.

Previous to the wild man of Cornwall's exhibition, and during the time when the house might have been said to be at low water—the tide being run out, and the shallows left bare on the protection benches, a dignified personage, with a sonorous and finely modulated voice, rose from the front seat, and spoke in favour of protection—proof that whatever appearances may have been, the tide, which awhile before swept the members from the house, had not left shallows, and shallows only on the protection seats. He was the most fluent speaker, and delivered the arguments for protection in the best-arranged style which it has been my fortune to hear. I did not know until next morning who this speaker was, as no one near me could tell his name; but that name, I saw by the newspapers, is Sir John Trollope. Sir

John is one of the members for Lincolnshire, and is, I hear, reported to be a man of talent. He may be so, and be greatly in error on the subject of the Corn Law. He evidently clings to it from other causes than a belief in its indispensableness. Towards the conclusion of his speech he said that rather than suffer the taunts applied to the landowners by opponents of the Corn Law, he, for one, would give it up; if its existence depended on his will, it should at once cease to exist. There is no shame conveyed in a taunt to a sensible man if the taunt is not deserved. Such a man as Sir John Trollope must feel the sting all the more that he knows the monopolists, who rob the working bees of their honey, lay themselves open to the sting, and should be stung, and will be stung.

THE EARL OF MARCH, LORD GEORGE, AND THE "LITTLE PATRIOTIC BAND."

Neither so sensitive, nor sensible, is the heir of the house of Lennox. Whatever merits he may have, he has not the merit of Sir John Trollope, of being ashamed of a bad cause. Extravagant self-esteem is the leading characteristic of his ducal parent, and a goodly share of it is his. Allied with Lord George Bentinck in horseracing, betting, and "hedging," the Lennoxes, like his lordship, are "up to a dodge or two," and are not particular as to what people will think of them. Laws which have been made to suppress gambling, some of them wilfully break; and having broken them, they "protect" themselves by their legislative influence in getting an act passed (the qui tam actions act) to save themselves from the consequences. In the annals of barefacedness there is no parallel to that act. For law-breakers to associate in Parliamentary strength, and pass an act of indemnity for themselves, may be quite in accordance with the spirit of what they call "protection;" but if the phrase "unconstitutional" means anything, it means that the legislature is not to be perverted to save delinquents from the consequences of delinquency. The Duke of Richmond was the mover of the qui tam actions bill in the Lords, and it was supported in the Commons, and carried through, chiefly by that "little patriotic band," as Lord George Bentinck calls himself and co-obstructors of the Government sitting below the gangway. There is a delinquent to be hanged on Monday morning, at the Old Bailey; and he, doubtless believing that a man may be put to better uses than that of hanging, would be very glad if he could get into Parliament, and have friends enough there to hasten a bill through both houses before Monday morning, to save him from Jack Ketch. It was alleged in favour of the qui tam actions bill, that the persons who were proceeding against the honourable and noble delinquents who sought the "protection" of their fellow legislators, were persons of indifferent reputation; but Jack is not remarkable for his high reputation; and in that respect the man now in Newgate would go to Parliament for "protection" on equal terms with those who have gone before. Not that it is insinuated for a moment that gamblers, "bonnets," "legs," "hedgers," &c., &c., &c., are to be compared in guilt with an assassin—far from it. The cases are only mentioned together to enable us to say, that all law-breakers would pass acts of indemnity to "protect" themselves from the consequences of breaking the law if they could; and that it is, therefore, the interest and the duty of the moral and the well-disposed of mankind to prevent them, when, by some mischance, such happen to have the Parliamentary power. There are some men—let us hope many—to whom shame would be a sufficient preventative, even if they were inclined to protect themselves by legislative influence from the consequences of breaking the law. But with that "little patriotic band," of which Lord George is the centre, below the gangway, and to which he now stands godfather, shame, or even a moderate amount of modesty, is not an attribute.

Of course, in this remark, men of respectable moral character—such as Sir Robert Inglis, and Sir John Trollope—are not included, though they are below the gangway, and sit upon the skirts of the "little patriotic band."

LORD EBRINGTON.

This young nobleman spoke in favour of Free Trade on the same evening that the members, whom I have mentioned, spoke on the other side. His lordship is not an effective speaker. His matter reads well, but he is so unready as to be at times painful to listen to. He deprecated the three years of a sliding scale which is proposed by the Government, and pointed out some burdens—real burdens on land, which neither the Government nor the monopolists have taken into consideration—the legal expenses on the transfer of property. The barrier which such expenses have raised against the acquisition of small freeholds has been, and is, detrimental to national progress in a high degree—so far as national progress depends on an extension of the franchise in the counties to the men of intelligence, industry, and small means, who have hitherto been shut out from it, but who, instructed by the League, are now associating to obtain the franchise by obtaining small properties. Altogether Lord Ebrington's speech contained valuable suggestions. But it is nothing new in this paper to show that the heaviest burdens on agriculture are the lawyers and agents, who being paid servants of the landlords, ride on the backs of the farmers like so many old men of the sea, and will not be shaken off.

MEMORIAL TO SIR R. PEEI.

GLoucester, MAR. 21.—Moved by Mr. Councillor Kimberley, and seconded by Mr. Alderman Taylor, that an address be transmitted to Sir R. Peel through the Town-clerk, and that the city seal be attached thereto:

"TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR R. PEEI, BART., FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY."

"The Address of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the City of Gloucester, in council assembled."

"We, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the City of Gloucester, in council assembled, impressed with a deep sense of the importance of the Government measures, now before Parliament, for relaxing the duties on corn and provisions, with a view to their eventual abolition, as well involving a general reduction in our commercial tariff, avail ourselves of these means respectfully to tender you, as their responsible projector, our cordial and entire approbation of the principle on which these measures are founded."

"Comprising, as this corporation does, individuals of various shades of political opinion, we are nevertheless unanimous in our admiration of the boldness, justice, and equity of the proposed changes, and of their complete adaptation to the spirit of the age, and to the ends thereby proposed—namely, the increased happiness, and comfort of all classes of her Majesty's subjects."

"It is not the practice of this corporation, as a body, to identify itself with general political questions, but there are occasions which seem to justify a departure from the usual course; and we deem the present an opportunity which our strong sense of the immense importance of the Government proposals will scarcely allow us to forego, of testifying our high approval of them, and of cheering on the first Minister of the Crown in his glorious yet difficult career of carrying them forward to a successful issue."

"We are fully sensible of the many painful struggles which must have preceded the proposal of measures involving principles in direct opposition to the views of a large influential section of the Government supporters; but we offer our respectful homage to the moral courage and independence which could disregard that support, and appeal to the higher tribunal of public opinion, dispassionately expressed through its representatives in Parliament. It is our anxious hope that these measures may speedily become the law of the land. We believe their tendency to be, to secure at home social and political contentment, active employment, health and wealth; abroad, to annihilate prejudice, to increase goodwill towards this country, to remove the barriers to a free exchange of labour and natural products; and thus, by promoting a universal treaty of amity and commerce, to secure that which must almost inevitably flow from it—the blessings of universal peace."

THE PROTECTION CHIEFS.—Among the many delusions of the present day, there is no one, unfortunately, more prevalent than that the protectionist party in Parliament, however compact in itself, is without leaders. We believe we are in a position to say that this supposition is utterly devoid of foundation. In the House of Commons the question is already settled. Lord George Bentinck has shown the truth of what we have often urged, that circumstances produce men. Those who have only served in the political ranks are called into command by some sudden emergency, and contrary, perhaps, to their own previous belief, are found capable of leading, and of doing so in a manner that throws into the shade the former conventional leaders of party. The speech of Lord George Bentinck—the first in which he took a prominent place in debate—on the 27th of last month; the numerous occasions on which he has since spoken; his patience in wading through the most uninteresting of all reading, Parliamentary blue-books; his skill in extracting from these volumes of mere words, for the most part, all that they contain of facts; his arrangement and combination of the truths to be found in them; his skill in bringing such truths to bear on the subject under consideration; and the thoroughly English spirit with which he declares that "he is not ashamed to hoist the colours of protection;" all concur in establishing Lord George's claim, or rather that of his friends on his behalf, to the position of leader of the British party in the Commons. But this point is tacitly admitted, even by men opposed to the protectionists. It is in the House of Lords that we are hourly taunted with having no leader. Even the most virulent of the Whig journals allow that we have a party—a strong and resolute party—in that House; but they lose no opportunity of throwing it in our teeth, that there is no noble lord, of talent and energy, suited to the crisis, to give direction to the power that we possess. We feel authorised in declaring that this insinuation is perfectly groundless. Lord Stanley is able and willing to lead on his noble phalanx to the victory that British industry will yet achieve in the House of Peers. The few words that his lordship delivered on Friday night are conclusive evidence of what he believes may be done; and we think we know enough of what other noble lords feel on the subject to say, without fear of contradiction, that they are content to leave the mode in which it shall be done to the zeal and ability of Lord Stanley.—Morning Post.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTH LANCASHIRE.—We think it right to state, for the information of our readers, that there is considerable probability of an early election for the southern division of this county. Within the last few days, rumours which had previously been in circulation of an intention on the part of Government to create several additional peers, have acquired greater probability and consistency. It is now pretty generally believed, that after the bill for altering the Corn Law has passed the House of Commons, several individuals, now or recently in that house, including Lord Francis Egerton, Lord Lincoln, and Lord Ashley, will be called to the upper house, in order to assist in carrying the great measure through that assembly. We give the statement as it reaches us; not vouching for its truth, but, at the same time, with a strong impression that there is at least some foundation for it.—Manchester Guardian.

AGRICULTURE.

THE "PROTECTED" LABOURERS.

With effrontery surpassing that of the roguish horsedealer, who pointed out the lame leg of a horse for sale as one of the animal's best points, the monopolists have lately pretended that "protection"—that is, dear grain and short crops—was essential to the welfare of the agricultural labourers. Nothing is further from the truth, but it serves to divert attention from the real objects and effects of the Corn Laws; and therefore monopolist after monopolist reiterates the oft-exposed falsehood.

Perhaps there is no county in England where the farmers have so entirely relied upon the Corn Laws as in Wiltshire. A large portion of the county consists of light but fertile land, held generally in large farms, the occupiers of which, though often men of considerable capital, almost without exception hold too much land for the capital they employ; their profit, therefore, according to the actual system, is derived from a moderate acreable produce on a large breadth of land. They thus produce grain at considerable cost, and require high prices to "remunerate" them. They have a large surface of land to plough, to manure, and to sow. They pay rent—and Wiltshire rents are high—tithes, rates, and taxes, for many acres. Their outgoings, calculated at per acre, are as great as if, with one exception, the highest and most elaborate system of culture prevailed. Indeed, more so, for more seed is required to be sown on the Wiltshire system than would be necessary if the land was more highly cultivated. If the Wiltshire farmer with the same capital had less land, the only additional outlay per acre he would make would be in extra labour. He must raise better turnip and green crops; he would feed some bullocks, or milch cows, or breed neat stock; and he would fatten off some of his wether sheep.

Root-hoeing, manure drawing, cattle serving, and so forth, which such a change implies, would undoubtedly require the employment of more manual labour than the Wiltshire farmer now deems necessary, but that would be a most profitable outlay, for the increased produce per acre would much exceed the increased cost.

Now, when "protection" shall be finally abolished, the Wiltshire farmers must, and will, rely less upon the price, and more upon the quantity of their crops, and they will necessarily adopt a higher system of farming.

Both landlords and tenants will probably be less anxious for large occupations. To put the difference in a tangible form, let us contrast the high and the low farming. The Wiltshire farmer has a capital of—say 4000*l.*, and he takes a farm of 800 acres, thus employing 5*l.* per acre. Throughout the county, for one farmer who has more capital than 5*l.* per acre, there are five who have less. But take 5*l.* per acre as representing the average of Wiltshire farming, and it will be obvious that by means of that capital—in the case we put—the rent, tithes, rates, and taxes of 800 acres must be paid, that quantity of land must be ploughed, manured, sown, and harvested; and we know that, practically, the only means by which it can be manured at all by means of a capital of 4000*l.*, is with a flock of sheep kept on "the downs" in the day, and folded at night on the arable land. No beasts will be fed or bred, no sheep fattened, the turnips will not exceed 4 or 5 tons to the acre, and the number of labourers employed will be comparatively small. The acreable produce of grain will be small, very small, compared with what the land under a different style of farming is capable of producing. The witnesses examined before the various agricultural committees have never set the Wiltshire produce of wheat at more, upon an average, than about 22 bushels per acre, and other grain in proportion. Had the farmer with a capital of 4000*l.* taken four instead of eight hundred acres of the same kind of land, he would have saved half his outgoings for rent, tithes, rates, taxes, seed, and ploughing; and let him employ the same number of men upon his smaller farm, and he may not only in many instances grow nearly or quite double his present produce per acre, but he may grow grain more frequently on the same land than he can with the larger farm. Besides, there will be the profit upon stock. As far as the farmer is concerned, he will carry on his business with much greater success as soon as the necessity of growing large produce shall have taught him not to take too much land.

But if such a change of system as Free Trade will inevitably introduce is best for the farmer, how is it for the labourer? Why, with provisions at lower prices, there will be a greater demand for his labour, and, as a necessary consequence, his wages will rise. The Wiltshire labourers seem to be aware of this. Nothing has been more remarkable, during the progress of the Free Trade agitation, than the meetings of Wiltshire labourers to petition Parliament, or memorialize the Queen, for a Free Trade in corn. The peaceable, rational, earnest demeanour of these humble men, gathered together by the hill side, or under the broad oak, in the moonlight of a winter's night, to raise their voices for untrammelled industry, is a spectacle of no ordinary import. When the truths of economical science are thus practically enforced, dare the Government disregard the signs of the times, in blind obedience to the selfish suggestions of an ignorant landocracy? To that question Sir Robert Peel has given the statesman's only answer—No; emphatically, No.

The following paragraph records a meeting of labourers which took place a week or two ago, in Wiltshire:

"MEETING OF LABOURERS ON LOCKERIDGE DEANE.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of 'protected' Wiltshire labourers took place on Lockeridge Deane, near Marlborough. Many of the cottagers in the neighbourhood of Kennet, Lockeridge, and Overton, having lately received printed papers issued by the Protection Society, setting forth the evils of Free Trade, and having been told by the farmers that protection was for their benefit, and therefore ought to be continued, decided on holding a meeting to discuss the subject, and requested Mr. Edwards, of Marlborough, and Mr. Westell, schoolmaster, of the same place, to attend and explain to them the true bearings of the question. Accordingly, on Tuesday evening, at one o'clock, the Deane, which is a hollow, spotted over with those singular stones, which, at a distance, from their resemblance to sheep, are called 'grey wethers,' was thronged with hundreds of men, whose white smockfrocks literally glittered in the bright moonlight, and made an impressive picture among the old grey stones—memorials of bye-gone days. The addresses of Messrs. Edwards and Westell were listened to with intense interest, the labourers every now and then breaking on the solemn stillness of the night, which was otherwise only interrupted by a single human voice, with loud shouts of approval, which were caught up by echo on the other side and sent back again, reverberating over the Deane. The strongest feeling in favour of Free Trade was manifested, and it is not too much to say that, in this neighbourhood, the 'Glory of Protection has departed,' never more to return."—Wiltshire Independent.

If the reader knows the district, he will understand the picturesque effect of such a meeting. If not, let him imagine a hollow between the Chalk hills, filled with masses of grey "Sarsen" stone, protruding through the short natural turf, surrounded by wide tracts of "downs," used only as sheep walks, though capable of being highly and profitably cultivated, and by open arable fields which every labourer in the district knows to be only half cultivated. Let him recollect that 7*s.* and 8*s.* a week form the ordinary wages of an adult labourer; that there is little employment for women and children, and that this state of things arises from a low, an unnaturally low system of cultivation, occasioned by a law passed by a legislature of dominant landowners, to increase their own rents by enhancing the price of the labourer's food, and diminishing the demand for his labour. Will he wonder at shouts of approval which greeted the Free Trade speakers? May the echoes reach the ear, and act upon the minds of those of the English Oligarchy, who still struggle to maintain their artificial scarcity! On these very spots, according to local tradition, the aborigines of this Island were accustomed to assemble under the guidance of the Druids for worship, and to concert resistance to the Roman invaders; and from that hour to this, hundreds on hundreds of acres of land have been untouched and unimproved by the hand of man. Now the peasants assemble there to demand the removal of those laws which restrict the freedom of British industry, and retain the soil in a state of nature.

We understand that the Wiltshire labourers are about to celebrate at Avebury, where their first meeting occurred, the partial triumph of sound principles which Sir Robert Peel's measure affords. We shall look with great interest for the proceedings of that meeting, for it is plain the Wiltshire labourers, by a reaction from the very extremity of their depression, are about to take the lead in the elevation of their class.

A DUKE ON POTATOES.

It has pleased the landed aristocracy to take our potato grounds under their especial protection, and to examine, with all the acumen of hereditary wisdom, the symptoms of the potato disease—its causes and its remedies. The why and the wherefore of such condescending beneficence it boots not now to tell. Perhaps the failure of potatoes, upon which so many of our agricultural labourers live, has somewhat unmasked the position of those "who withhold corn from the people," who pass laws to create an artificial scarcity of grain to keep up rents. But let that pass. Dukes and lords do care for our potatoes; and perhaps we, the commonalty of England ought not to inquire too minutely into the source of such "a crowning mercy."

It seems that the monopolist Duke of Portland has been experimenting on potatoes; and, as the result of his investigations, promulgated to the world "that quicklime is a protection against the consequences of the disease;" and of course such an authority could not be gainsaid. Quicklime preserves potatoes: it is so, there can be no question, for the Duke of Portland has said so. It matters not that scientific men, or practical men, quicklimed their potatoes without staying the disease; their experiments go for nothing. What can such things weigh against the authority of a duke? But then another duke, the Duke of Rutland, has also failed to protect potatoes by the use of quicklime. Now the Duke of Rutland should know something about potatoes, for he declared publicly, at an agricultural meeting, that he "highly relished" the humble esculent. The question therefore assumed a serious aspect. So long as there was a duke on the one side, and only all the trading potato growers and men of science on the other, the truth could not be in doubt; it must be with the duke. But when the popular experience became fortified by that of another duke, who could decide the question? This state of things was awful to contemplate. The potato-fed community was about to be split into two factions; the pelting of decayed potatoes might have been fearful; when, lo! "Scott Portland" relieves the public, startled by this collision of authorities, with the following truly ducal explanation:

"As I know that my authority has been extensively circulated in favour of quicklime as a protection against the consequences of the disease which has prevailed in the potato-crop, and I heard yesterday from the Duke of Rutland that his experiments have not been equally successful, I feel it a duty to society to prevent persons from being misled by the general terms in which I have circulated the result of the experiments conducted here."

Mark, reader, the peculiar conditions under which quicklime will stay the progress of the potato disease. The magnate of Wellbeck says:

"It is quite true that the lime used here has been invariably successful, but it is the MAGNESIAN LIME which abounds in this neighbourhood. In its caustic state it is fatal to vegetation. Barren spots are to be seen in many places on the forest, where lime heaps were placed more than thirty years ago. It is therefore easy to account for the effect of this lime in stopping the propagation of the disease."

And of vegetation together, his grace might have said. His grace then proceeds:

"The lime used by the Duke of Rutland I understand to have been the Crichton lime, which is very pure lime, and has no such destructive qualities. It is, therefore, only necessary to state the distinction to account for the difference. Charcoal is quite as effectual as the magnesian lime."

The explanation as regards lime is quite satisfactory, for it shows that both dukes are right. Of course it was impossible that a duke could be wrong when all was known, but we fear his grace of Portland had forgotten his logic—if he ever condescended to learn logic—when, having discovered that some quicklime "stops the propagation of the potato disease" by destroying vegetative power, he promulgated, in "general terms," that "quicklime is a protection against the disease."

If the faith of the British commonalty in dukes had been less steadfast than it is, this might have shaken our national belief that dukes are infallible. The fault, however, is that of the "rascal commons," who ought to have known intuitively what the ducal oracle meant. And it is with a view to prevent future misconstructions of the "authority" of the lord of Wellbeck that we venture to ask, with all humility, whether, when the Duke of Portland says, "charcoal is quite as effectual as the magnesian lime," he means ignited charcoal? for, should charcoal fail, and no duke discover the failure, the potato-growing community may be again apparently at issue with a duke.

THE GAME LAW.

The important events which have recently occurred have to some extent diverted our attention from the pressure of the game laws and game preserving on the agricultural community; but there has been no diminution of that pressure. Here and there a landowner, more reasonable than his fellows, is giving up the game nuisance; but upon the whole we apprehend the evil to be on the increase.

A few are throwing the hares and rabbits overboard, in the hope of lessening the public demand for the repeal of the game laws; as, for instance:

"The youthful Earl of Stamford and Warrington has, much to his credit, given the tenantry on his extensive estates permission to destroy the hares and rabbits."—Provincial Paper.

But, independently of the indirect and social evils produced by the existence of a system of game laws, the actual destruction caused by pheasants is very great, as witness the following:

"A brace of pheasants were lately killed in the parish of Bradwell, near Coggeshall, Essex, the crop of one of which contained 756 grains of wheat and barley, the other 928 grains, besides other small seeds."—Essex paper.

On many farms the pheasants which are daily fed at the tenants' cost, must be counted by hundreds; let a simple multiplication sum be worked on these dates, and let the public note the result. Farmers know it, and write under the infiction. The following extract, from the Mark Lane Express, shows the opinions of farmers on the subject:

"DAMAGES CAUSED BY HARES AND RABBITS.—The farmers of the Isle of Wight are quite in ecstasies at the Duke of Richmond and Lord Ashburton having declared 'that hares were vermin, and alike injurious to the crops of the tenant and the trees of the landlord.' It is calculated that a farm of 500 acres keeps at least 1000 hares, which will eat as much as 200 sheep, at 17s. 6d. each, or onesheep to five hares, at 3s. 6d. £175 0 0 Waste caused by hares in feeding equal to one quarter 43 15 0
£218 15 0

Every hare on a farm eats and wastes the value of 4s. 6d. at least, and every rabbit costs the farmer at least 2s. per annum."

THE ELECTRICAL MINISTER.

A great sensation has lately been produced at Paris by the wonderful feats of a young lady, a Mademoiselle Angelique Cottin, who appears to be a sort of torpedo in petticoats. Chairs and tables fly across the room on a touch from her apron, when she is charged with the fluid, and she can be attracted or repulsed at will by the magnet.

It is, perhaps, not generally known that we possess a similar but much more wonderful phenomenon amongst us. What is Mademoiselle Cottin's performance in this way to Sir Robert Peel's?

The following detail of experiments proves his infinitely greater powers of attraction and repulsion:

EXPERIMENT I. The Premier, after being very heavily charged indeed during the late debate, being placed on the Conservative benches by a single speech, succeeded in violently throwing from him one-half of the Conservative members, quite to the opposite side of the house. Notwithstanding the tremendous efforts made by Sir Sidney Herbert and Sir James Graham to hold these gentlemen in their places, the shock was so great that they were almost knocked over themselves by the violence with which the protectionists flew across. Mr. Ferrand was flung with a tremendous shock against a knot of Free Traders, and talked so very widely that it was feared he had sustained a concussion of the brain. He is not yet quite recovered.

EXPERIMENT II. Sir Robert, being again charged the night after, was found to possess the power of attracting the League members, in the same proportion as he repelled the gentlemen of the Central Agricultural Society in Bond-street. Mr. Cobden was drawn right across the house, apparently without the least power of resistance.

EXPERIMENT III. Sir Robert, being again charged, was put en rapport with Lord George Bentinck and Mr. D'Israeli by means of silk (generally a non-conductor). Notwithstanding he drew the honourable members into a slough of absurdity, and fixed them so tight in a dilemma, that they were quite unable to get out of it—until Sir Robert left the house.

EXPERIMENT IV. Sir Robert being again charged, and a quantity of arguments presented to him by the member for Northamptonshire, these, though considered particularly strong by those who selected them, were at once broken to pieces, one after another, by a single sentence of Sir Robert's. A gentleman of great scientific acquirements, who has watched these experiments, assures us that Sir Robert is quite as powerful as the electric eel, and if possible, more slippery.

Encouraged by the success of the Premier, Mr. D'Israeli has announced his possession of similar powers. He attempted, when fully charged with sarcasm, and facts from McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary, to electrify the House. The attempt was a total failure, and Mr. D'Israeli is accordingly pronounced to be an impostor.—Punch.

REPRESENTATION OF BRIDPORT.—A petition, duly recognized, was presented on Monday night in the House of Commons against the return of Mr. Cochrane for the borough of Bridport. The petitioners allege gross bribery, and pray a scrutiny. It appears the majority of one will little avail the honourable member, as numerous cases of barefaced corruption of votes have come to light. The most confident expectation prevails in Bridport that Mr. John Romilly will be, within a month, what he ought to have been originally, the "sitting member." The acts of bribery are reported to compromise seriously some of the chief partisans of Mr. Cochrane.—Morning Chronicle.

THE SEASON.—While the European papers are filled with paragraphs containing evidences of the extraordinary precocity of the season, there are letters from North America which exhibit a singular contrast with the former statements. In certain States of the Union, we are informed, and principally in North Carolina, Massachusetts, and Kentucky, the weather has been more severe than any experienced at the same season since 1712.

We are glad to announce, that at a numerous assembly of the Oxford Circuit bar mess, on the 18th inst., the resolution against reporting was sustained by a very large majority.—Morning Chronicle.

REVIEW.

Contarini Fleming, and Alroy. Romances by B. D'Israeli Esq., M.P. London: Colburn.

The republication of these admirable works, in which genius seems to revel in its own exuberance, and the creative power of a poetic mind to have called worlds of thought into existence with greater facility than the slaves of the lamp raised their gorgeous palaces, has led us to contemplate the political position of the author, and to contrast the high principles developed in Coningsby and Sybil with the very inferior practice of the member for Shrewsbury. Like his own Alroy, Mr. D'Israeli has proved false to the star of his own destiny; having appealed to the best feelings of the country, and proclaimed that the sublime of morality ought to be the essence of sound policy—having shown that the system of protection was a device of the tricksters that endeavoured to pass themselves for statesmen—having pointed to the vacillations in Lord Boringbroke's career which deprived of all influence the greatest amount of talent that had ever centred in the person of an English politician, he has declared himself an infidel in his own mission by becoming a partisan of the system he condemned, and an expounder of the principles which he denounced.

There is no greater mistake than that which is made a prominent rule of action in Vivian Grey, one of the author's earliest and most successful works, that tact and cleverness in forming a party are essential to success in political life. True genius is independent of party; Grattan paid Lord Chatham the highest compliment that a statesman could receive when he declared that "he stood alone." Moral power in his case was quite independent of numerical strength; he commanded majorities, for there was a severe dignity in his independence, a wizard power in his strength of will, which for a time gave to his behests the resistless force of Fate. He too fell beneath the trammels of party. The Lilliputians chained down Gulliver; Chatham's second administration was the sad exhibition of the convulsive throes of a giant, cribbed, cabined, and confined, by the most ordinary of mortals; he was a Sampson, making sport for the Philistines.

The greatest of philosophic poets, and the most dramatic of satirical writers, could conceive no punishment more severe for the tyrants of his day than that they should have a full conception of the moral excellence which they had abandoned for ever. Persius rising to a height of ethical dignity unmatched in the whole range of classical literature, pronounces as his anathema on the Neros, the Domitians and the Caligulas:

Virtutem videant, intabescantque relicta.
"May they see Virtue and pine for her deserted."

But the inconsistency between sublime precept and erratic practice, has consequences that extend beyond the individual. It is an unjust, and a dangerous trifling with the moral elements of public opinion. Eternal truths are proclaimed with all the dignity belonging to conscious power; delinquencies of past and existing statesmen are exposed with a fearless severity which implies the assertion of innate superiority. The voice of the prophet stirs all the sympathetic emotions by which intellectual sublimity and moral excellence are appreciated; we look for the voice of the prophet, and we hear the conventional tones of the advocate. We expect some eternal maxim, and we receive a fugitive epigram; we seek the teaching of the philosopher, but we find only the patent fallacies of the sophist. "O Lucifer, son of the morning, how art thou fallen!"

Long and fondly as we have admired the Tale of Alroy, the greatest impersonation of the theocratic principle developed in a human personage which the history of fiction can display, we rise from our last perusal of its pages with a conviction that it is one of those conceptions predestined to immortality. David Alroy, the prince of the captivity, becomes lord of Asia by appreciating and holding fast to the eternity of principle with which his destiny is involved; but he barter principle for a low, mean, and miserable existence—his star culminates in the horizon, and he sinks into the despised captive of a dungeon. But this is a moral as well as a historical truth. There is an iron which enters into the soul, more torturing than the chains which manacle the body; there are fetters for the mind, more galling and more degrading than those which the jailer rivets on the hands and wrists; they are linked indissolubly to the inner man, when integrity parts from genius, and consigns the high trust to the hazards of a temporary and paltry expediency—

And the clankless chains have bound thee,
And the silent spells surround thee;
And the curse hath gone together
O'er thy heart and brain—now wither.

It is painful to see the author of Alroy lending himself to the advocacy of monopoly; and to say the truth, there is a little of the ludicrous in the incongruity between his cultivated powers and that strange development of intelligence, called "the agricultural mind." We cannot see him in the midst of the protectionists without thinking of Nebuchadnezzar grazing among the oxen. When he is cheered by his anomalous supporters, we expect him every moment to turn round and enquire, "What meaneth this bleating of sheep, and this lowing of oxen in mine ears?" and in spite of all that has happened, we look back to his perpetrating some such severance of the unnatural connection in the course of the session.

Free Trade and Artistic Design, from the Art-Union, for April 1846. (Unpublished).

We have been permitted to use this article, from which we shall make a few extracts, which require neither introduction nor comment. The following is a good description of the protection system:

"The object of protection is to prevent competition, and the consequent diminution of profits. We do not say the diminution of prices, because high prices are very far from being identified with high profits; before price can be a measure of profit we must know the cost of production, for profit is obviously the difference between the cost of production and the price obtained for any given article. Cheapness of production is, therefore, an important element in the estimate of profits, and, therefore, in the estimate of wages. For it is quite clear that wages must be paid out of profits, since they could not possibly be paid out of losses. Now, let us for the sake of argument grant that a system of protection can be so stringently maintained as to prevent all foreign competition, and that the operations of the smugglers can be effectually prevented by a revenue police, we say that there are two evils necessarily resulting—the loss of markets abroad, and the raising up of formidable competition at home. Protection is a virtual abandonment of the foreign market, for how can we meet those on neutral ground with whom we declare ourselves unable to compete in our own markets? We can export no articles except those which we produce cheaper than foreigners, unless we choose to buy and sell, and live by the loss; a process which is recommended in schools of sentimental economy, but which political economy discards as preposterous. If, on the other hand, we can so diminish the cost of production as to compete with foreigners in neutral markets, we must be far more than a match for them at home, and protection is utterly useless—it becomes a mere idle mockery.

"Take it, then, either way, so far as export trade is concerned, if protection enhances the cost of production it is mischievous by excluding us from foreign markets; and if it does not enhance the cost of production it is utterly and wholly unavailing."

We are pleased with the following remarks on the subject of wages:

"Whatever raises the cost of production enhances the price of an article, and whatever raises price must of necessity diminish the consumption, and, consequently, the demand. Now, as goods are produced only to be sold, it is evident that a combination to raise wages in any branch of labour is a combination to limit the demand for labour in that branch of industry; and, therefore, the unionists must go a step farther, and limit the supply of labour. Now, they have done so in several instances, but they have never succeeded, and they never can succeed. If they fix such a tariff of wages as to leave little or no margin of profits for the manufacturers, no capitalists will embark in their business, so far as the power of the unionists extends. But Great Britain is not a single town, and no trades' union can exercise the sway of imperial legislation; the capitalists prevented from embarking in trade on the banks of the Thames may seek the banks of the Irwell, the Derwent, and the Mersey. In point of fact the competition from which the weavers of Spitalfields now suffer most is not that of Paris or of Lyons, but the competition of Manchester and of Macclesfield.

"We have now shown that the effect of protection is to destroy the foreign market and to provoke a most injurious competition in the home market; but this is not all: in the insensate struggle to maintain the rate of wages by artificial means, the natural means—that is, the artistic improvement of the manufactured article—is entirely neglected. The natural constituents of a rate of wages are skill, time, and toil, and of these skill must always bear the highest price. The unfortunate condition of the frame knitters and the hand-loom weavers is chiefly owing to the fact that the mystery of their art can be learned with great ease, and that the employment is of such a nature as to be possible to the young, the infirm, the sick, and the untrained. It is not long since some scores of Irish labourers, coming over to reap the harvest and failing to obtain employment, at once became hand-loom weavers, and thus largely added to the numbers and the misery of that unfortunate class. When, therefore, we urge the importance of raising the artistic standard of instruction for the operative classes, we are also contending for their obtaining higher wages and more permanent remuneration."

We shall conclude by extracting a portion of the remarks on the silk trade:

"It is but justice to say that the immense majority of the manufacturing classes have shown at this crisis that confidence and self-reliance which we have endeavoured to recommend. There is probably no class of operatives to which the withdrawal of protection might have been expected to appear more formidable than the watchmakers of Clerkenwell, and yet they all joined in a petition for Free Trade. There has indeed, been one exception to this rule; petitions for protection being continued have been presented from a minority of the persons engaged in the silk trade, and yet there is no trade in England that has suffered so severely from prohibition and protection.

"The silk trade has suffered from two schools of sentimental economy: the Spitalfields school, and the Macclesfield school. When the facilities of weaving by the application of machinery, as in the jacquard loom, were so increased that the time and toil required for producing any definite length were reduced to one-third, the economists of Spitalfields believed it possible to maintain the price of production in spite of the immense change in the cost of production. But two could produce, and the result of the attempt was to drive a large proportion of the silk manufacture into the north of England. The Macclesfield economists took a still more absurd dogma for their guidance: they held that it was the duty of Government to provide them a market, irrespective of the value or the merit of their goods; Mr. Brocklehurst, who is the leading professor of that species of economic science, which has no disciple beyond the limits of the borough of Macclesfield, can confirm our assertion, that wherever this aboriginal school had influence, artistic design was not merely unknown, but was deliberately rejected. Had not Mr. Brocklehurst taken the unfortunate step of opposition to Sir Robert Peel's tariff, on the ground of the inequality of Englishmen to compete with Frenchmen, we should never have dreamt of making any direct reference to him or to his establishment. But he has challenged an inquiry which he must meet. We ask, then, what artists has he employed? What reward has he paid? What original taste has he developed? What design has his large establishment developed? The fact is that on original design several large establishments which we could mention do not together expend one-half of the sum which is paid to artists by some of the smaller manufacturers of Paris, Lyons, and St. Etienne. They ask to be protected in a systematic discouragement of British progress in the art of design, and they have the hardihood to declare that they speak in behalf of British industry. We tell them, what indeed they know full well, that skill is a greater element than toil in the profits of British industry, and that those who discourage the development of skill are the very worst enemies of the operative.

"We can relate an illustrative anecdote, and appeal to the Macclesfield economist for the truth of the facts, which came within his own knowledge. A certain West-end house, obtained a design from Paris, and sent it to be realised at a large English establishment; the design was one which required very little skill to adapt it to the jacquard, but it was done so clumsily and so badly that the result was perfectly detestable. Complaints were made, and the answer was, 'You can get no better article without smuggling.' Now, the answer was simply a downright falsehood: in the establishment of the late Mr. Schwabe, at Manchester, we have seen patterns five times more complex placed on the jacquard without difficulty. There may be some undiscoverable advantages in a system of protection, but assuredly it is no advantage to maintain noodles as heads of houses, and botches as operatives.

"The plain fact in the silk trade is, that we do not fail so much in backwardness in design as in the realizing of design; the existence of protection was a constant incentive to avoid preliminary expense, and to slur over difficulties. The quantity of the work turned off, not its quality, determined the character of the workman. The operative was protected, not from the competition of low wages, but of high wages; in the economy of Spitalfields and Macclesfield it was a crime to be too industrious, too skilful, and too intelligent. We have long felt weary of such mischievous nonsense, and we are glad that it has come to an end. We have been paying a premium on the import of foreign designs, and establishing a prohibition on the production of native designers. We have been sacrificing the real interest of British Art to the pretended interest of British Industry. Art now takes its fair stand in a free market. We say to the British manufacturers,—You can only meet foreign designs by English designs,—you must cease to be imitators,—you must begin to be originators,—you have felt the snuggler to be more than your match while you depended on France for patterns, but a more complete competition will drive you from the field, unless you develop the resources which are notoriously at your command.

"It is neither our duty nor our object to vindicate the policy of Sir Robert Peel—political considerations come not within our peculiar sphere. But we have long felt that the restrictions on the importation of artistic excellence from abroad furnished at least a pretext for discouraging artistic ambition at home, and that the opening of our ports to foreign rivalry must force the encouragement of domestic powers to meet the contest. Few years, probably very few months, will elapse when the excellence of the British school of design will not be far behind the excellence of the British schools of engraving, of painting, of modelling, and of sculpture.

"If fashionable consumers in England have evinced an unpatric preference for ornamental articles of foreign manufacture, they can plead in excuse that our prohibitory and protective laws proclaimed the inferiority of our own productions. Our legislation fostered a desire for foreign silks and foreign paper-hangings, not merely by creating the perverse longing which all feel for what is forbidden, but by tacitly admitting that the exclusion was a proof of superior excellence. English Art was thus doubly discouraged: relying on protection, the producer refused to stimulate design; deceived by exclusion, the consumer regarded the inferiority of English patterns as an article of national faith incorporated in acts of Parliament. It would lead us too far away from our immediate subject to show the connexion between the system of excise and the system of protection, but what we have elsewhere said on the glass trade will sufficiently prove that the injuries, which being subjected to the excise brings on any branch of manufacturing industry, cannot be compensated by any amount of protection, however excessive. We have been legislating against art, enterprise, and invention, and it is assuredly high time that we should seek to advance on some road less dangerous."

In consequence of the press of matter, we are compelled to defer our notice of the Compound Atlas until next week.

INDIAN CORN BREAD.—Bread baked from Indian corn (maize) is coming rapidly into vogue in our city (Glasgow), and several bakers are doing a brisk business in it already. At the meeting of the Philosophical Society, on Wednesday night, Dr. R. D. Thomson read an able paper on the nutritive qualities of Indian corn, which he ranked very high; and at the same time exhibited various kinds of bread and biscuit which had been baked from it by Mr. Wilson, Gordon-street. Some of the specimens were mixtures of maize and wheat, and maize and rice, in which state the loaves can be better fermented than when the maize is used alone. The bread and biscuits were very palatable and pleasant. Various uses to which Indian corn flour may be applied in domestic cookery were described, and some of them illustrated, on the occasion. In any form it is incomparably more nutritious than potatoes, and may with the smallest amount of trouble and expense be made an agreeable dish.—Scottish Guardian.

A paragraph has appeared in one of the Newcastle papers, stating that William Brown, Esq., of Liverpool, had purchased the estate of Ford Castle, Northumberland, from the Marquis of Waterford, for the sum of 300,000*l.* We have the best authority for saying that Mr. Brown, of Liverpool, has made no such purchase, though it is quite possible that the estate may have been sold to a gentleman of the same name.—Liverpool Times.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

MEMBERS.
A. W. Paulton, Esq., Richard B. Esq., William Leaver, Esq., William Wilson, Esq., R. W. Wood, Esq., Sidney Smith, Esq., Charles Swaisland, Esq., Crawford.
TRUSTEES.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace, Islington.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Trafalgar place.
Captain Cogan, Upper Mill, Hammersmith.
BANKERS.
Messrs. Prescott, Groat, & Co.
RECEIPTS.
Josh. Viney, Esq., 25, Chancery-lane.
SECRETARY.
Mr. Frederick Farrand, Priory Villa, Parkham.

Prospectuses may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Office, East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street. The Rules (6d. each) are now ready, and may be had as above.
Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately.

The Society's Offices will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A TOUR: A SUMMER RAMBLE IN BELGIUM, GERMANY, AND SWITZERLAND.

By J. W. Massie, D.D., M.R.I.A. (of Manchester), author of "Continental India," "The Irish Church and Ireland," &c. &c.
London: J. Snow.

Dr. Massie is a Nonconformist minister: his health having failed in the discharge of his duties, change of scene was prescribed by his medical attendant. The doctor, however, at the wishes of the patient, but the "resuscitation" often did not obstruct till removed by the affectionate solicitude of a generous and kind flock. Dr. Massie therefore started on his trip, made the usual tour through Belgium, visited the Spa adjacent to the Rhine, and passed on as far as Geneva, by way of Switzerland and its return was through Germany, to the Rhine, and thence to the sea. He accompanies the reader no further than Leipzig, from lack of space; the volume having swelled to upwards of five hundred pages, and the latter portion being briefly dismissed, except a few reminiscences of father. On returning to his flock at Lower Broughton, Dr. Massie gave them an account of his tour, and of the various scenes and persons which he had seen. He would seem, after the fashion of Mr. Buckinghams's sermons, to have given abstracts, rather than full descriptions, in some journals, and finally, Dr. Massie, at the request of friends, undertook to write an account of his tour, which forms the portion of volume before us. In a preface the author states that the book is not a mere book-nugget, but a record of his own experiences. The book is not a mere book-nugget, but a record of his own experiences. The book is not a mere book-nugget, but a record of his own experiences.

The more proper topics of the tourist—incident, description, and remark—Dr. Massie is able to give some variety to an exhausted field, by his peculiar object, which was to "indicate how these (foreign) scenes and associations strike a Christian." His comments on the facts he observed he makes the vehicle of his lecture, but he has not the position naturally introduced him to a class with whom the ordinary run of tourists have nothing in common; and he exhibits a good deal of information respecting the condition of the Protestant congregations in Belgium, Germany, and Geneva (which stronghold of Calvin is now a pure Unitarian establishment), and of the various persons and scenes which he saw. His object was to indicate how these (foreign) scenes and associations strike a Christian. His comments on the facts he observed he makes the vehicle of his lecture, but he has not the position naturally introduced him to a class with whom the ordinary run of tourists have nothing in common; and he exhibits a good deal of information respecting the condition of the Protestant congregations in Belgium, Germany, and Geneva (which stronghold of Calvin is now a pure Unitarian establishment), and of the various persons and scenes which he saw.

The author says that, from the first, he meant to indicate how the scenes and associations strike a Christian. He has not the position naturally introduced him to a class with whom the ordinary run of tourists have nothing in common; and he exhibits a good deal of information respecting the condition of the Protestant congregations in Belgium, Germany, and Geneva (which stronghold of Calvin is now a pure Unitarian establishment), and of the various persons and scenes which he saw.

Many publications have recently issued from the press which once read may be laid aside. The volume before us will be one of permanent interest, as it is one of valuable information and of pleasing instruction. By the casual reader it will be approved, but by the student it will be highly prized. It is a work, apart from all adventures, possessing great intrinsic merit. It is in every respect worthy of the author. His strong faculty of discrimination, his sound judgment regulated by the best principles, his historical knowledge, and his love of research, have enabled him to put his finger on the work to which reference he has made with confidence. He has represented the historical facts which took place in the towns and cities through which he passed with a vividness of description which cannot fail to establish a strong association in the mind of the reader. Dr. Massie's love of research and his love of truth have enabled him to put his finger on the work to which reference he has made with confidence. He has represented the historical facts which took place in the towns and cities through which he passed with a vividness of description which cannot fail to establish a strong association in the mind of the reader.

The Examiner (Glasgow), January 24th.
Despite the nausea induced by the task recently, we dared to hope when we saw the author of Continental India among the travelling hosts, that he would give us something pleasing and profitable, and, accordingly, we set to his volume at a devoted time in right good earnest, and with an excellent appetite, which increased as we proceeded. Our readers will recollect that, about a year ago, we gave some extracts from lectures delivered by Dr. Massie on his return from his travels. We continue to be gratified by the good, by medical advice, for the benefit of his health. The volume before us, amongst a host of other facts, contains the substance of these lectures, but in a new and greatly improved form. We do not mean to say too much of the volume at present, as we intend to give occasional extracts to our readers, and to put it to the test of their own judgment. We must say that we have never read a book of the kind with greater delight. Indeed, so much were we satisfied that we were in extreme danger of losing sight of its small defects and the sterling excellencies which it contains, that we were obliged to pause and reflect. The admiration of curiosity, whether there are any others, is not bounded. He has surveyed the countries described with the eye of the Christian philosopher, and, without introducing his remarks, he at once rebukes idolatry and sorcery.

The Witness (Glasgow), March 14th.
The observation of our author was given mainly to those things which the common run of tourists are apt to overlook—the trade, the manufactures, and the religious condition of the countries he passed through, so far as he had opportunities of observing it. He is a sincere and a true worshipper of truth, and he is not a mere observer of the things which he sees, but he is a student of the things which he sees. He is not a mere observer of the things which he sees, but he is a student of the things which he sees. He is not a mere observer of the things which he sees, but he is a student of the things which he sees.

The Univers, February 5, 1846.
In the midst of a crowded and noisy city, it is most refreshing to stumble over something so solid and sterling, and we are truly glad to have been much gratified with the perusal of Dr. Massie's interesting volume. He is an acute observer of men and things, and his reflections are of the very flowings of a philosophic mind, imbued with a deep and widespread benevolence. His descriptions are always in a deep and earnest, and sometimes glowing and graphic. Of the truth of this the following extract, taken at random, will be a sufficient proof, and we have chosen it in preference to the equally equally of the present condition of the great world, which is the present condition of the great world. We are now everywhere existing—Another very interesting feature in the work is, the very apt, topographical description which is so beautifully woven into the work of the author, giving a richness and variety to the account, and making it so interesting and instructive. Our author, too, has frequently brought his graphic descriptions to bear upon the subject of his narrative, standing out as so many rays of light, and thus avoiding any thing like a wearisome monotony either of style or matter. Our ill-fated space will not allow of a more lengthened notice, but we cannot close our remarks without recommending our unqualified praise of this very interesting and instructive volume, and we feel assured that the scholar and the unlettered will alike be benefited and gratified by its perusal. We cordially wish it a large circulation: we are sure it deserves it.

The Liverpool Mercury, February 18th, 1846.
A most interesting volume. The author has accurately observed the points of interest, not only in the places, but the people among whom he has "rambled." The chief value of this book consists in the estimate which it enables the reader to form of the present condition of the great world, which is the present condition of the great world. We are now everywhere existing—Another very interesting feature in the work is, the very apt, topographical description which is so beautifully woven into the work of the author, giving a richness and variety to the account, and making it so interesting and instructive. Our author, too, has frequently brought his graphic descriptions to bear upon the subject of his narrative, standing out as so many rays of light, and thus avoiding any thing like a wearisome monotony either of style or matter. Our ill-fated space will not allow of a more lengthened notice, but we cannot close our remarks without recommending our unqualified praise of this very interesting and instructive volume, and we feel assured that the scholar and the unlettered will alike be benefited and gratified by its perusal. We cordially wish it a large circulation: we are sure it deserves it.

The author is well known to many of our readers as the highly-esteemed minister of a Congregational Church of Independents, and as a patriotic, liberal, active, ardent man, who devotes himself to the advancement of the rights of the oppressed, and the amelioration of the condition of the labouring poor. Dr. Massie has in many instances judiciously availed himself of the labours of other tourists in filling up his own admirably accurate sketches, and has interspersed a considerable amount of civil and ecclesiastical historical information. The present state and past history of the countries which he has travelled through, he has suggested many interesting topics, on which, as a Christian philosopher, an ardent friend to civil and religious liberty, and an opponent of the awful desolating butchery of war, he has made characteristic and suitable remarks. The account which Dr. Massie has given of the places particularly connected with the history of Luther is highly interesting, and is the whole of the volume. The route which he took was rich with scenic beauty and historical associations; and he appears to have had his mind vividly impressed with the diversified beauties of the countries through which he travelled, and his memory stored with important facts relating to their history. It was not without justice, we think, that he has not only, but with the zest of an intelligent mind, determined to enlarge its boundary of knowledge to the utmost which opportunity and capacity would allow. Thus he has been able to produce a work which must be a favourite with all classes of readers, containing admirable graphic descriptions of beautiful scenery, and of the most interesting historical and religious associations, and the descriptions are such as none but a person of taste and genius could describe. It also abounds with notices of public buildings, remarkable places, pleasing incidents, historical recollections, and vivid representations of the most interesting scenes and persons. We predict for this work a very favourable reception and extensive circulation.

The Methodist New Connexion Magazine.
It is therefore with cordial satisfaction that we welcome the volume of Dr. Massie. He has traversed some of the most interesting portions of Europe, and he has not only seen the most interesting scenes, but he has seen the most interesting people. It is with the impressions that such an observer as Dr. Massie receives, that we want to be acquainted with, and we feel a peculiar interest in the statements which he makes in reference to the moral and religious condition of the people, a topic of infinite moment, viewed in connection with the history of the Christian Church. But, whilst such matters are so much before us, we beg to assure our readers there is an abundance of materials of a more earthly character. An insight is given into the temporal circumstances of the people, their occupations, and especially the extent of their manufactures, are exhibited in their due proportions. Dr. Massie is not only a minister, but he is a writer of a Christian minister, he is not ashamed to avow his love of freedom, of political, commercial, and religious. Continental scenery is also graphically described; as are also continental towns, their churches, their antiquities, and their institutions. The volume is a most interesting and valuable work, and we predict for it a very favourable reception and extensive circulation.

The League, March 11, 1846.
Dr. Massie is a zealous minister of the Congregationalist persuasion, the first sect which proclaimed liberty of conscience, but he carries his hatred of intolerance to an excess which renders him intolerant in his turn. We regret that he has not been more judicious in his selection of his subjects, which ought to have been selected from such a connection. Dr. Massie is a shrewd observer, and a clever describer; to the descriptive part of his work we shall therefore confine our attention, and have others to debate with him on the points of his intolerance. He has seen the most interesting scenes, and he has seen the most interesting people. It is with the impressions that such an observer as Dr. Massie receives, that we want to be acquainted with, and we feel a peculiar interest in the statements which he makes in reference to the moral and religious condition of the people, a topic of infinite moment, viewed in connection with the history of the Christian Church. But, whilst such matters are so much before us, we beg to assure our readers there is an abundance of materials of a more earthly character. An insight is given into the temporal circumstances of the people, their occupations, and especially the extent of their manufactures, are exhibited in their due proportions. Dr. Massie is not only a minister, but he is a writer of a Christian minister, he is not ashamed to avow his love of freedom, of political, commercial, and religious. Continental scenery is also graphically described; as are also continental towns, their churches, their antiquities, and their institutions. The volume is a most interesting and valuable work, and we predict for it a very favourable reception and extensive circulation.

The Liverpool Courier, Wednesday, Feb. 18, 1846.
Dr. Massie is already favourably known as the author of "Continental India." His reputation is not likely to suffer by the publication of the present volume, which is a most interesting and valuable work, and we predict for it a very favourable reception and extensive circulation. The volume is a most interesting and valuable work, and we predict for it a very favourable reception and extensive circulation. The volume is a most interesting and valuable work, and we predict for it a very favourable reception and extensive circulation.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, March 28, 1846.

From all quarters of the country we receive complaints of the depressed condition of trade and commerce, and of the diminution of employment in almost every branch of British industry. The gloom over all the markets continues to increase, and the chief cause of the depression is the uncertainty produced by the delays which have been interposed to the passing of the ministerial measure. Every one is weary of an interminable debate dragging its slow length along without eliciting a single new fact, or producing any variation of thread-bare fallacies. Voltaire is said to have lent the same volume of a work to a French nobleman eleven times in succession, and at length to have inquired how he liked the perusal. The nobleman, who believed that he had been all the time studying a continuous series, declared that he had found it very amusing; but added, il me semble, qu'il se repete quelquefois. The protectionists se repentent with a vengeance! Even though like Finch, they have to address empty benches, or like the magnanimous Borthwick, they have to encounter significant hints of impatience, they still continue to pour forth the same "weak, washy, everlasting flood," until the diluted stuff has quite sickened our stomachs. Now this may be sport to them, but is death to us. The business of the nation ought not to be suspended that lordlings should indulge in small talk, or agricultural orators prove that they differ from their sheep and oxen in possessing the faculty of speech, though in few other particulars. The leading merchants of Liverpool and Manchester have applied to the Premier to put an end to a dull farce, which renders the British legislature the mockery of Europe, and exposes the British empire to the perils of a commercial crisis.

It is true that the debate has rendered the old fallacies of monopoly utterly odious and contemptible. Even the monopolist press has ceased to hound on the aspirants to oratorical fame, after the lamentable exhibitions which have taken place. But when it is manifest that we are merely witnessing a "talking against time," and that no other object is sought than factious delay, we must protest in the name of common sense, and common decency, against such a scandalous waste of public time, and such egregious trifling with public patience.

We have had the "mad Parliament," the "pensioned Parliament," and the "puzzled Parliament," recorded in our annals, but the "prating Parliament," is worse than any of the three, and deserves to be indicted as a common nuisance.

THE NEAPOLITAN TARIFF.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)
We announced on Wednesday last, on the authority of a letter from Naples, the speedy issue of a new tariff, by which the duties on English manufactures would be considerably reduced, and the commercial intercourse between the two countries greatly extended. We have now the satisfaction of stating, that this first step by any foreign power, in imitation of the course pursued by the British Government, in the amelioration of fiscal and commercial legislation, has now been made. The royal decree announcing the new tariff was made public on the 11th inst.; and it establishes, as we expected, very considerable reductions in the duties on the leading articles of import from this country into the kingdom of the Two Sicilies.

The following particulars are derived from a letter received by a house in this town, dated Naples, March 12:
"The question of the tariff is at last decided; and yesterday the royal decree was made public."

The following are the reductions in the tariff on textile manufactures, as deduced from the amount of duty, as stated in Italian money:

The duty on cotton yarns is reduced one-third.
On cotton cloths, grey and white shirtings, &c., the duty is reduced about one-half.

On printed cottons, the reduction of duty will amount to about 6s. per piece, or one-half the existing duty.

On mixed cotton and worsted goods, and on worsteds, the reduction will amount to about 5s. per piece.

On silk goods, and goods mixed with silk, the duty will be reduced one-third.

We are indebted to another letter from the following particulars of the new duties on a few of the most important articles of export from this country. As the duties were stated only in Neapolitan measures and money, which are rather difficult to reduce to English denominations, we may have made some errors, and therefore give them both ways:

Prints (including handkerchiefs), 80 grani per square canna = 4d. per square yard.
Bleached cottons, 45 grani per canna = 2½d. per square yard.
Plain linens, 100 grani per canna = 7½d. per square yard.
Figured linens, 110 grani per canna = 5½d. per square yard.
Fustians, velveteens, &c., plain or striped, 170 grani per canna = 7½d. per square yard.
Cotton twist, 17 ducats per cantar = 3½d. per lb.

It was stated in the letter from which we derived our information last week, that the proposed reductions would prove a serious blow to the Neapolitan manufactures. As it might be supposed that these manufactures, for the benefit of which the Neapolitan government and people have sacrificed so much, were of great importance, we copy the following notice of them from Mr. GREGGON'S Commercial Statistics:

"We scarcely know of any country where the manufactures of woven goods, unless it be silk, are less adapted either to the genius of the people, or to local circumstances. The kings and governments of the kingdom, allured by specious statements made, not by Neapolitans, but by English, French, and German adventurers, have, however, enforced a system of commercial legislation for the purpose of creating and maintaining woolen, cotton, and other manufactures, for which the whole country has paid dearly, and by which the contrabandists, foreigners as well as Neapolitans, have gained enormous and regular profits."

"A mere enumeration of factories on paper will appear important to those who do not comprehend the comparative value of such establishments, and of the circumstances under which they are maintained. We know of establishments in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Staffordshire, and Lancashire—in Westphalia, and we may include Switzerland, which, according to our knowledge personally, and the best information obtained in England and the continent, and in Naples and Sicily, are singly of more importance, not in the number of pieces, &c., produced, but in their intrinsic value, independent of premiums and protective duties, than all the woolen, cotton, linen, and hardware manufactures respectively, of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. We believe from our estimate the ordinary course cloths made by the peasants for themselves, and the ordinary works of blacksmiths and other tradesmen."

All the preceding duties are subject to a discount of ten per cent.

THE PORTUGUESE TARIFF.—We learn, by letters recently received in this town, that a commission is sitting in Portugal, for the purpose of revising the commercial tariff of that kingdom. In what spirit, or with what particular views, this revision has been commenced, we have no means of judging. It can scarcely be intended to make more stringent that tariff which is rapidly ruining the wine-growers of the Douro; and yet the present statesmen of Portugal are so far personally interested in manufactures, that we feel no confidence in their intentions to promote a more liberal commercial policy. Probably the lapse of a short time will develop their intentions.—Manchester Guardian.

A GAME LAW HERO.—At the Leicestershire Assizes, on Monday, two men named Rolleston and Hales, were charged with being on land in the parish of Evington, during the night, armed, for the purpose of destroying game; and as the evidence was distinct, they were sentenced to twelve months, hard labour each. Fouldes, game-keeper to G. A. L. Keck, Esq., of Houghton, during his cross-examination, was asked by Mr. Kenneth Macaulay, who defended the prisoners, how many offenders against the Game Laws he had taken? He does not appear to be more than 40 years old, if so much, but his reply was, "Two hundred and twenty." This Mr. Keck is a staunch monopolist, and rigid game preserver. He seldom resides at his seat here; and neither farmers nor labourers speak well of him, but the Petty Sessions are continually being occupied with his game cases, and the county is put to immense expense in their punishment of the offenders.

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. Mar. 21	MON. Mar. 23	TUES. Mar. 24	WED. Mar. 25	THUR. Mar. 26	FRI. Mar. 27
Bank Stock	212½	210	210
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.
3 per Ct. Con. Ann. ..	96½	96	96
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	96	96½	97½
Long. An. Ex. 1860	103	103	103
Cons. for Acct.	96½	96	96	96	96
Exc. Bills, pm.	25	25	27	28	30
Ind. Bds. m. 1000l.	28	30	30	..	28
Venezuela 2 per Ct.	41	44	..
Do. deferred.
Belgian 4½ per Ct.
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	84	83
Chilian	90½	..	90½
Columb. ex. Venez.
Danish	80	80
Dutch 2½ per Cent.	59½	..	59½	59½	59½
Dutch 4 per Cent.	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½
Mexican	31½	31½	31½	..	31
Peruvian
Portug. conv.	57½	57½
Russian 5 per Cent.	108½	..	108½	109	..
Spanish 5 per Ct.	25½	25½	25½
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.	37	36½	36½	36½	36½

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, MARCH 21.—Of Wheat, Barley, and English Oats, the arrivals during the past week have been only moderate, nor are they much increased this morning. The choicest samples of English Wheat fetch 1s. more money, but inferior samples are dull of sale and no demand. The quantity of Foreign Wheat continues to increase; 26,782 qrs. have come to hand in the week: there is no alteration to notice in the value of it, but the trade is dull. Barley barely supports last week's prices, but quotations remain the same. About 17,400 qrs. of Irish Oats appear in the return, and in addition there are two or three vessels fresh up to-day. Altogether the show of samples is large, but the attendance of buyers is pretty good, and stocks being low in the hands of consumers and dealers, holders ask more money than last Monday, and the sales are at full prices; a very considerable business might be transacted at the rates of this day's week. Beans and Peas are in short supply, and fully as dear.

S. H. LUCAS.

BRITISH.		Per Imperial Quarter
Wheat, Essex,	Red 54 to 60	White 58 to 66
Kent, & Suffolk	49 58	56 63
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire ..	47 54	54 62
Scottish
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feeds	22 24
Ditto	22 25
Ditto	22 26
Scottish Feeds	25 26	Potato 28 29
Limerick	24 25
Ditto	Fine New 27 29	Old Fine none
Cork	24
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	21 23
Sligo	22 24
Galway	19 21
Barley	26 33
Beans, Mazagan	New 31 33	Old 38 40
Harrow	33 37	..
Small	39 40	..
Peas, White	Boilers .. 38 42
Grey	30 32	Maple .. 32 34
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs. 45 50
Norfolk and Suffolk	43 46

FOREIGN.		FREE. IN BOND.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	58 to 66	54 60
Rostock	56 60	54 54
Stettin	52 58	50 54
Hamburg	52 57	50 52
Odesa	48 50	..
Odessa Polish	50 51	..
Russian
Ditto
Spanish	54 60	..
Blangillo	56 62	..
Australian	60 69	..
Barley, Grinding	27 28	..
Distilling	29 31	..
Oats, Archangel	24 25	..
Danish
Swedish	22 24	..
Stralsund
Dutch Feeds	22 23	20 21
Brew	26 27	23 25
Polands	28 29	24 25
Black	22	..
Beans, Egyptian	34 36	..
Peas, White
Ditto Boilers	42	..

Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 100 lbs.	31	36
United States	39	37 38	39
Dantzic
Australian, per sack of 20 lbs.
Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Mar. 15 to Mar. 21, 1846, both days inclusive.
Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Peas.
English	5925	632	1016
Scotch	9	211	..
Irish	1743	..
Foreign	26782	690	1300
Flour, 4000 sacks; 1287 barrels.

FRIDAY, MARCH 27.—There has been again a short supply of every kind of Grain since Monday; not a single article, the trade generally has been in a panic. The demand for English Wheat is fully equal to the supply; and the statement made by the Duke of Wellington in the house last night, that the Corn Bill will not come before the Lords before the end of April, makes holders of fine dry Wheat firm at rather over Monday's prices. In Bonded Wheat there was no more passing on Wednesday than for some time before; but to-day the demand is not quite so brisk. There is no attention to notice in the Barley trade. A shilling more money than on Monday is asked for Oats, and in some instances is obtained; but for the most part an advance of more than 6d. cannot be made. Sellers at smaller improvement have done a very fair business. Beans and Peas the same as on Monday. A cargo of Indian Corn has been sold to-day at 3s., for shipment to Ireland. There was no alteration in the duties yesterday.

S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 23rd of March to the 27th of March, both inclusive.
Wheat	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Barley	2190	..	5020
Oats	1990
..	2160	1360	..
Flour, 1680 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending March 24, 1846.
	Qrs.	Price.		Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	4381	58s. 3d.	Rye	95	35s. 2d.
Barley	3366	31s. 5d.	Beans	1290	34s. 0d.
Oats	13554	23s. 5d.	Peas	604	34s. 1d.

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending
		Wheat.		Barley.		Oats.		Rye.		Beans.		Peas.
		s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.	s.	d.
14th Feb.	54	9.31	6.21		9.32	7.34	9.35	7.
21st	"	55	0.29	11.21		6.32	10.34	9.34	3.
28th	"	54	6.29	7.21		5.33	4.34	2.35	2.
7th March	54	10.29	3.21		10.33	6.34	11.33	7.
14th	"	54	3.29	4.21		9.34	2.35	2.34	9.
21st	"	55	1.29	10.22		0.33	10.34	4.33	4.

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 54s. 9d.; Barley, 29s. 9d.; Oats, 21s. 9d.; Rye, 35s. 4d.; Beans, 34s. 8d.; Peas, 34s. 5d.

Duty. Wheat, 18s. 0d.; Barley, 9s. 0d.; Oats, 6s. 0d.; Rye 9s. 6d.; Beans, 8s. 6d.; Peas, 8s. 6d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Mar. 5, 1846.
	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.	Flour.
							Ctals.
In London,	442560	17299	61192	..	6144	3492	112976
Unit. King.	1138950	82919	96983	..	13413	8127	897355

MEAT MARKET.
Trade upon the whole dull, although prices were maintained.
PER STONE OF 14 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.
Prime Beef ..	4s 0d to 3s 8d	Middle Mutton 4s	2d to 3s 10d
Middling do.	3s 6d to 3s 4d	Veal, from ..	5s 0d to 4s 4d
Plain, or inferior Beef ..	3s 2d to 2s 10d	Small Pork ..	5s 0d to 4s 8d
Prime Mutton 4s	6d to 4s 4d	Large, or inferior Pork ..	3s 8d to 3s 0d

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, MARCH 20.

BANKRUPTS.

James Kirkup, Rotherhithe, coal merchant. [Mr. Hodgson, Broad-street-buildings.
William Collins, Rugby, Warwick, tailor. [Mr. Burbidge, Hatton-garden.
James Bryant, Mafelford, Sussex, draper. [Messrs. Seles and Turner, Aldermanbury.
Isaac Harris, Croydon, Surrey, clothier. [Mr. Jacobs, Winchester-buildings, Great Winchester-street.
Henry Ward, Widdford mill, Gloucestershire, paper manufacturer. [Mr. Bond, Leeds.
William Stone, Wood street, Freeman. [Mr. Lloyd, Milk-street, Cheapside.
Richard Ellison and John Goodworth, Barnsley, Yorkshire, linen manufacturers. [Mr. Bond, Leeds.
Joseph Whalley and Charles Whalley, Liverpool, seed-men. [Mr. Neal, Liverpool.
Richard Barnes, Preston Leigh, Gloucestershire, coal dealer. [Messrs. Newman and Co., Cheltenham.
Cornelius Brady, Ashton, Birmingham, commission agent. [Mr. Harding, Birmingham.
Richard Edwards, Huddersfield, woollen draper. [Mr. Bond, Leeds.

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

Thomas Fairbairn, Edinburgh, banker.
William Davison, Glasgow, smith.
James Sharp and John Thompson, Meadowside, Lanarkshire, calico-printers.
John Cromie, Glasgow, baker.

TUESDAY, MARCH 24.

BANKRUPTS.

J. Giro, Moorgate-street, City, merchant. [Mr. Peile, Great Winchester-street.
C. H. Waters, Queen's-row, Picnic, dealer in pictures. [Mr. Burbidge, Hatton Garden.
J. Thompson, Norwich, grocer. [Mr. Storey, Gray's-inn-place.
W. Morphey, Sevenoaks, Kent, draper. [Messrs. Reed and Langford, Friday-street, Cheapside.
J. Perkins, North-place, Gray's-inn-lane, jeweller. [Mr. Clark, Finsbury-place.
Thomas Peirson, Warwick-cott, Holborn, money-scrivener. [Messrs. Bell and Co., Bow Churchyard, Cheapside.
J. Brett, Luton, Bedfordshire, sheep-salesman. [Mr. Wilkinson, Nicholas-lane, Lombard-street.
R. Ellis, Richmond-street, Soho, carpenter. [Messrs. Carlton and Haynes, Palace-chambers, St. James's-street.
A. B. Innell and A. Cooke, Little Queen-street, Holborn, varnish-manufacturers. [Mr. Stuart, New-inn, Strand.
M. Cubitt, High Holborn, builder. [Messrs. Smith, Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane.
G. Prince, Romsey, Hampshire, wine-merchant. [Messrs. Watson and Co., Falcon-square.
W. Bull, Adde-street, City, cloth merchant. [Messrs. Sudlow and Co., Chancery-lane.
J. Riding and J. Fielding, Leyland, Lancashire, cotton manufacturers. [Messrs. Milne and Co., Temple.
J. Rishton, Huddlesden, Lancashire, cotton-spinner. [Mr. Fox, Finsbury-circus.
J. Gibson, Manchester, veterinary surgeon. [Messrs. Williamson and Hill, Verulam-buildings, Gray's Inn.
J. Riddall Wood, Manchester, varnish maker, Manchester. [Messrs. Milne and Co., Temple.
J. Taylor, Hereford, carpenter. [Mr. Greenwood, Birmingham.
M. Smith, Birmingham, iron-founder. [Messrs. Smith and Co., Bedford-row.
P. Crispin, Bristol, carpenter. [Mr. Hinton, Bristol.
E. Williams, Northop, Flintshire, draper. [Messrs. Vincent and Sherwood, Temple.
J. McAlister Houston, Paisley, commission-agent.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 132.—Vol. III.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1846.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE NEW PROGRAMME OF ENGLISH STATESMANSHIP.

"My object has been to mitigate monopoly—to increase the demand for industry—to remove restrictions upon commerce—to equalise the burdens of taxation—to ameliorate the condition of those who labour."—Sir Robert Peel's Speech of March 27, 1846.

In another part of our paper we give the admirably earnest and powerful speeches with which, on the night of yesterday week, Sir ROBERT PEEL and Sir JAMES GRAHAM terminated the otherwise weary and unprofitable debate on the second reading of the Corn Bill. When we say, that we have rarely felt equal gratification in placing upon record any spoken words of public men, we are confident that we only express the sentiments with which those speeches have already been read by many thousands of our countrymen, and will be read again and again by all who are capable of appreciating clearness of thought, generosity of feeling, and manly force of utterance, and who know the immense value of official advocacy in giving diffusion and permanence to sound principles. The importance of those two speeches cannot possibly be over-rated. The doctrines expounded by the Ministerial champions of industrial freedom may be already sufficiently familiar to a large portion of the public—but they are comparatively new to a vast number of persons in the ruling and influential classes of English society, to whose minds economical truth has only begun to find access since it has borne the stamp of official authority. It is most cheering to contemplate the wide and rapid diffusion ensured to sound principles of social and political science, when thus enunciated from a quarter where words are "great facts"—where the thought of the individual has power to shape itself into national enactment, and exerts a sensible sway over the opinions and the destinies of the mass of mankind.

The characteristic feature of the two ministerial speeches of last week is the sympathy they evince with the wants and interests of the industrious classes, and the broad, hearty recognition of working men's rights, as constituting a governing element in the deliberations of the legislator, and the policy of the statesman. The Premier and the Home Secretary show that they understand and feel their true position as champions, in this grand national controversy, of the rights of the many against the selfish and insolent aggressions of the few. They rise to the heights, and go down to the depths, of their great argument. In a tone and spirit worthy of men who are fighting the battle of over-taxed and "peculiarly-burdened" labour, against titled, privileged, and usurping idleness, they boldly identify themselves with the policy that would lighten the poor man's toils, untax his hunger, multiply his resources, and widen his command over the means of comfort, enjoyment, and improvement. This is their Cabinet question—"TO MITIGATE MONOPOLY, TO INCREASE THE DEMAND FOR INDUSTRY, TO REMOVE RESTRICTIONS UPON COMMERCE, TO EQUALISE THE BURDENS OF TAXATION, TO AMELIORATE THE CONDITION OF THOSE WHO LABOUR." This is the test to which they submit existing institutions and enactments—their operation on the every-day interests and enjoyments of the many. "Why," asks the Home Secretary, on behalf of his clients, the working and eating millions of the British people, "should the consumer and the receiver of wages be required to pay for their daily bread a larger price than, if the trade were free, they would have to pay? And he reiterates, with the increased emphasis arising from strengthened conviction, his assertion of that foundation-truth in social economics which was already so much indebted to his able and enlightened advocacy—the beneficial operation of cheap bread on the wages, the health, and the morality of the working classes:

"The manufacturing population of this country are quite right in believing that high prices produce low wages, and artificially enhance the cost of provisions. I could produce abundant evidence to show that the opinion is no longer confined to the manufacturing classes alone. The agricultural labouring population begin to be of the very same opinion. I could produce, were it not that I fear to trespass too far upon your attention, the clearest evidence to show the diminution of crime as prices fall, and its rapid increase as they rise; and, what is of the greatest importance of all, I could show you that MORTALITY increases in the same proportion as the price of bread, while, vice versa, when provisions are cheap, mortality declines."

In the same generous and statesmanlike tone, Sir Robert Peel dwells on the social and moral aspects of commercial reforms that tend to the cheapening of the poor man's food. His landlord and aristocratic auditors "may laugh at it if they please," but he is in earnest; official experience has taught him certain great, all-pervading truths, to which he must enforce the homage that they have already exacted from himself:

"I know I am appealing, and I appeal with confidence, to your generosity; do you not admit with me, that the social condition of those millions, whether manufacturing or agricultural labourers, who earn their subsistence by the sweat of their brow, is, in the present condition of this country, of the very first importance—that it is an object of the deepest moment? Have you read the report of the health of towns commission? Are you not deeply convinced that some effort must ere long be made to improve the social condition of that great mass of the population who earn their bread by labour in the manufacturing districts? Believe with me, that the first foundation of social improvement is abundance of food. Believe with me, that make what efforts you will to implant habits of cleanliness, to improve education, to purify the dwellings of the poor—believe with me that the first step towards permanent social amelioration is abundance of provisions. Wherever there is suffering from scarcity, or the apprehension of scarcity, either the suffering or the apprehension so depresses the spirits of those who have to earn their bread, that it is in vain to inculcate cleanliness or to improve habitations, without doing what we can to ensure abundance of food. I say this, you may laugh at it if you please, but the experience of the last three years, and the experience of the three preceding years, read a lesson to us which we ought never to forget, as to the effect produced on the social condition, the habits of life, and the happiness of the working classes, comparing the years of abundance with those of scarcity."

And these are not mere sounding generalities, of the sort that run so glibly off the tongues of the dilettante philanthropist. The Premier gives, not eloquence and sentiment only, but thought to the rights and interests of those whose cause he so impressively pleads before the tribunal of legislation and opinion. He has taken pains to realise to his own mind—and he would have the legislature realise to its mind—the actual details of those hard conditions which pervade and environ the labouring man's life. He goes into the statistics of the peasant's case; opens the budget of toiling, struggling, and enduring poverty; gives us, from "the actual return of the consumption of a labourer having a wife and one child, and receiving ten shillings a week in the summer, and nine shillings in the winter," the facts and figures of that painful cottage economy which has to work the problem of making out life on these scant resources. So much for rent—so much for candles and soap—so much for bread, bacon, salt beef, butter, and cheese—so much for tea and sugar—leaving so much for "shoes and necessaries of that kind, which must have been difficult enough to obtain." And then, after enumerating the heavy deductions to which a well-nigh omnipresent taxation subjects this meagre revenue and parsimonious expenditure, the soap is taxed, the butter is taxed, the tea is taxed, and the sugar is taxed." Our poor man's financier dwells with kind-hearted satisfaction on those alleviations of the burden which his own policy has effected, and appeals to the human sympathies of his auditors, to include further among the exemptions, the chief article of all:

"We have now removed the duty on the bacon and the salt beef; we have diminished the duty on butter, and we have diminished the duty on cheese;—can you repent having done this?"

But—

"You will find, where wheat does enter into the subsistence of the people, that by far the greatest portion of the weekly income is expended in the purchase of wheat and flour. There is something for tea and sugar, a little for tobacco perhaps, but more than half the earnings is consumed by wheat. Well, supposing the effect of your measures is to cause some reduction in the price of wheat, JUST ASK YOURSELVES THE QUESTION—ARE YOU NOT MOST MATERIALLY ADDING TO THE COMFORTS AND ENJOYMENT OF MILLIONS? Let me assure you this is by far the most important part of the question."

There is no withstanding this. A policy which thus boldly and broadly bases itself on the first elements of social and political justice, and appeals direct to the common human sense of right, is irresistible. No mere majority of an oligarchical land-owning legislature—though it happens, by the way, this time, that the majorities are thus far all on the right side—can make head against the statesman who, in the sight and hearing of an intelligent and instructed people, puts the rights of industry and hunger in the foreground of his political philosophy. We feel deeply grateful to Sir R. Peel for this speech. It is a speech in the highest degree honourable, both to himself individually, and to that spirit of the age of which, in reference to some of the most vital questions of our domestic policy, the Premier may be regarded as the exponent. After all, England does successfully assert her old prerogative of "teaching nations how to live." These lessons of the English Premier will go far and last long—longer, in their silent, world-wide operations, than the fame even of the Indian victories. They are lessons for the world, and the world will hear them. There is no measuring that vast futurity of good which lies enwrapped in the simple, but great and quickening truths of economical science, which the voice of the Prime Minister of Great Britain has now stamped with a title to universal empire over the mind of nations and the policy of Cabinets.

A SPORTING STATESMAN.

"The hour finds, or makes, the man," say certain philosophers on history; and whenever there is work to be done, somebody always turns up to do it. The aphorism is, it must be universally felt, strikingly illustrated in the present condition of the protectionist cause. The task of spinning out, by interminable factious delays, the last expiring moments of a vicious monopoly, which the united statesmanship of the empire has condemned, and which the House of Commons, by majorities which no possible or conceivable casualty can reverse, has ordered for execution, is not one that every English gentleman would undertake. The Mileses and Bankeses, the O'Briens and D'Israelis—the men who have social, political, or intellectual reputations to take care of—naturally enough decline the mean and miserable office of obstructing, for mere obstruction's sake, a measure whose fate, so far as one House of Parliament is concerned, has been already superabundantly decided. They have fought their very best for the principle of protection—the day has gone against them—and they have the grace and sense, the respect for public opinion, and the self-respect, to abstain from a frivolous and vexatious squabbling about details. Accordingly, the Mileses and Bankeses, the O'Briens and D'Israelis have no alternative but to submit to be superseded, and resign the vacant leadership of the "country party"—with what mingled emotions of shame, indignation, and contempt, we have not data for exactly analysing—into the hands of Lord GEORGE BENTINCK.

"Who is Lord George Bentinck?" all the world have latterly been asking—as this man's audacious and mischievous extravagancies have fastened public attention on a name strange to such newspaper readers as do not happen to be in the habit of consulting the column of "Sporting Intelligence." The most convenient and comprehensive answer, perhaps, that one could make to this now highly interesting query is,—inquire at Tattersall's, inquire at Newmarket, inquire at Epsom and Doncaster; ask the jockeys, ask the trainers, ask the stewards of races and clerks of race-courses. Only, as it is, in all probability, a thing quite out of the way of some 99 out of every 100 of our readers to follow up this line of investigation for themselves, we must be a little more explicit. Lord G. Bentinck, then, be it known to all whom it may concern—that is, to the whole commercial, manufacturing, farming, shop-keeping, and artisan public of the United Kingdom—is the recognised head of what is dimly known to, or imagined by, industrious and sober-minded people, as the "sporting world." His racing stud, we have always understood, is considered by competent persons to be about the finest in Great Britain. A more perfect judge of horse-flesh is probably not to be found within the four corners of the empire. His betting book is universally reputed to reflect the utmost credit on its noble author's skill and science in that department of literature. As an employer, and remunerator of native jockey industry, his name stands proudly pre-eminent above all his contemporaries. To which may be added, that as an umpire in all difficult cases of sporting honour and conscience, he bears, we believe, the very highest character for judicial intelligence and impartiality. Take him all in all, we may say that Lord George Bentinck is to the British turf what Mr. Hudson is to railways.

To affairs of State, this eminent and accomplished sporting character has, until quite recently, been a stranger,—as is, indeed, sufficiently evident to any one capable of the mental and moral exertion of critically studying those remarkably silly, and blundering, and coarsely vituperative harangues which have signalised his lordship's entrance in public life, in this nineteenth year of his Parliamentary existence. For eighteen years and more, that the new protectionist chief has had a seat in the House of Commons, his name has never been before the public in any political capacity. Catholic emancipation, negro emancipation, Parliamentary reform, church reform, education, Poor Laws, Irish questions, foreign questions, colonial questions—all have failed to present themselves to his lordship's mind in a sufficiently interesting shape to furnish a counterpoise to the attraction of more congenial occupations. At length, the needful stimulus is applied in the form of a Ministerial scheme for giving industry its own; and the king of the race-course and the jockey club finds scope and exercise for his higher powers in the last desperate defence of a condemned and falling monopoly. Landlordism in extremis calls him out, and makes a new man of him. All at once, the affairs of the stable are postponed to those of the State—

Newmarket and Epsom are forsaken for St. Stephen's—the betting book gives place to the blue book—the interest of the turf yields to that of the tariff—and an ambition which had, for half a life time, contented itself with the honour and glory of running the best horses in England, aspires to the nobler task of keeping the trade and industry of the country for a few weeks more in a syncope of uncertainty and unsettlement.

Pleasant, this, to the people of England—the sober, industrious, regular, frugal, and moral, middle and working classes, who make and keep England—to be obstructed and harassed in their honest callings, for weeks and months together, because a sporting lord takes it into his head to play at politics, instead of attending to his proper line of business! Seriously, we do not wonder that the older and more respectable protectionist leaders seem ashamed of their self-elected "guide, philosopher, and friend." They must heartily wish the business over, and be anxious to have done for ever with the disagreeable necessity which compels their temporary endurance of political chieftainship that is enough to ruin any cause, and to bring irreparable disrepute on any party.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Eleventh Week, ending Saturday, April 4.

This has been literally a lost week, so far as Free Trade and the commercial measures of the Government are concerned. The Corn Bill having passed its second reading, might have gone through committee this week, and been read a third time before Easter, for the protectionists have begun to exhibit some symptoms of a consciousness that the public—even the agricultural public—are getting impatient for a determination one way or the other. But with an obstinacy worthy of something better, Sir R. Peel has chosen to force on the first reading of the Irish Coercion Bill. Monday was passed in its discussion. On Tuesday, "no house." On Wednesday there was another debate on Ireland, on a pet scheme of Mr. Poulett Scrope, who, in a humane spirit, wished to read a second time and carry a bill for the relief of the indigent poor in Ireland; but which he withdrew, finding the general feeling to be against him. Thursday was occupied by votes of thanks, in both houses, for the great victories on the banks of the Sutlej, by which the Sikh power has been broken up, and the Panjab placed within our control; and after that was disposed of, there was a mass of miscellaneous matters. And Friday is fixed for the Irish Coercion Bill, with little prospect of a termination of the debate.

The second reading of the Corn Bill was carried, as our readers are aware, on Friday night week, or rather on Saturday morning, by a majority of 88, in a smaller house than that by which the Government measures were originally affirmed. The diminution of the majority arose simply from the fact of there being fewer members present, the ratio of proportion being maintained. In the February division, the numbers were 337 to 240, majority 97; in the division of last week the numbers were 302 to 214, majority 88.

There were three good speeches delivered on Friday night, the orators being Sir James Graham, Sir R. Peel, and Lord Palmerston. Sir James Graham very skilfully directed attention to the fact of the increasing number of applications daily made to the Commons' Inclosure Commission for liberty to bring under cultivation large tracts of waste land—a practical conclusion against the allegation that the repeal of the Corn Law will throw any portion of the soil out of cultivation. And he had a happy hit at Lord George Bentinck. A bill has been introduced into the House of Commons to empower a company to reclaim from the sea a large portion of the estuary of the Wash; and on the back of the bill, which provides for the application of half a million of money, is to be found the name of Lord George Bentinck! It is really amazing how men can have the presumption to come forward and babble night after night, and week after week, on ruin to the landed interest, at the very moment that they are interested in speculations, on which they fearlessly propose to expend large sums of money, in order to rescue land from the sea, and add it to that already under cultivation. Lord George Bentinck smiled, like one trying to wriggle impudently out of a "fix," as Sir James Graham turned to him, and asked him what was his estimate of the future probable price of wheat, when, in the face of a repeal of the Corn Law, he was concerned in an adventure like this.

Sir Robert Peel made another of his able and elaborate speeches, from which it may be gathered that he is determined to carry his measure, if possible, and that he looks forward to its being the last act of his present official career. "Sir," said he, addressing the SPEAKER, and alluding to the probability of his removal from office, "when I do fall, I shall have the satisfaction of reflecting that I shall not have fallen because I have shown subservience to any party. I shall not fall because I have preferred the interests of party to the general interests of the community. I shall carry with me the satisfaction of reflecting, that during the course of my official career, my object has been to mitigate monopoly, to increase the demand for industry, to remove the restrictions upon commerce, to equalise the burden of taxation, and to ameliorate the condition of those who toil."

Lord Palmerston closed the debate in an able, skilful, and effective speech, in which he strikingly indicated the influence which perseverance and success in the advocacy of the repeal of the Corn Laws has had on the more liberal of the Whig party. The leaders of the Ministerial or the Opposition divisions of the House of Commons are usually in the habit of referring to their supporters as friends—"my honourable friend," the member for So-and-so. A ludicrous instance of this habit was given by Mr. Bankes, when he first went into opposition this session. He was always accustomed to term Sir Robert Peel "my right honourable friend, the First Lord of the Treasury." But on the proposition of the Government measure for the ultimate repeal of the Corn Law, Sir Robert Peel was no longer the political friend of Mr. Bankes. Yet so strong was the effect of habit, that Mr. Bankes, in his first speech, kept continually saying "my right honourable friend"—"the right honourable gentleman at the head of her Majesty's Government!" The house smiled, Sir Robert Peel smiled, and at last Mr. Bankes was obliged to laugh himself. Lord Palmerston gave another illustration, not ludicrous, but significant. Formerly Mr. Cobden or Mr. Bright were referred to as "the honourable member for Stockport," or "the honourable member for Durham." On Friday night week, Lord Palmerston said that the change of opinion and policy on the subject of the Corn Law, which the Government have so practically exhibited, was to be traced, not so much to the experience of the last three years as to the effect of the debates of the last four sessions; and—turning round to Mr. Cobden, who sat behind him,—to the exertions of "my honourable friend, the member for Stockport."

Mr. Stuart, the Queen's Counsel, whom it has pleased the Duke of Newcastle to return for Newark in the room of the Secretary for the Colonies, Mr. Gladstone, made his first legislative appearance on Friday night, and spoke a speech which fully justified the ducal discretion. Mr. Stuart is a Scotch member of the bar, retaining a strongly marked Scotch accent, though he has been long in this country, and is advanced in years; and has succeeded so well in his profession as to be very well off. He certainly will not wreath a laurel for himself by his efforts in the House of Commons. You can perceive that he is a kindly sort of man, fluent, dexterous in making mere legal points, but without the smallest capacity for generalisation. He made a long speech, of which it may be said, truly and positively, that the gist was this:—Mr. Cobden once called the landed aristocracy "boobies." To repeal the Corn Laws will be to overthrow the preponderance of the landed interest, and therefore will effect the object of Mr. Cobden, which is to "terminate the empire of the boobies" (Mr. Stuart's own words, which convulsed the house with laughter). But to "terminate the empire of the boobies" is Jack Cade legislation. The House of Commons should never listen to a mob. It should be calm, dignified, and impartial, &c. &c. &c. &c.!

The second reading of the Corn Bill being carried, the next stage is that of committee. This should have come on in regular course on Monday night; but, unfortunately, the Irish Coercion Bill, which has come down from the House of Lords, stood in the way. The Government were determined to press the first reading, and the Irish Liberal members were as determined to resist it. It was urged on Ministers that the Corn Bill was of far more importance. The greater portion of Monday night was spent in discussing whether or no the Corn Bill or the Coercion Bill should be taken first. Sir Robert Peel seemed uneasy and fidgety, as if he had placed himself in a false position by the obstinacy of adhering to the determination of bringing on the Coercion Bill. Lord Worsley, the son of the Earl of Yarborough, and a staunch supporter of the agricultural interest, stated that the delay of the Corn Bill was injurious even to the farmers—"it was the duty of the house," he said, "towards the agriculturists, in particular, and also towards the trading interest, that there should be no further delay in the settlement of the long agitated question of the Corn Laws." Mr. Cobden also deplored the determination of the Government as a calamity both to England and Ireland. He gave Sir Robert Peel full credit for sincerity in his desire to convey his measures; but his present resolve held out little hope of seeing the Corn Bill pass through the house before Easter. All this must have had some effect; at all events, the debate on the Irish Coercion Bill was adjourned, and on Tuesday there was "no house!"

In consequence of the peculiar interest and importance attached to Friday night's discussion, we subjoin at full length the speeches of the Home Secretary and the First Lord of the Treasury, with a summary of the others.

DEBATE OF FRIDAY, the 27th ult.—SPEECHES of SIR J. GRAHAM and SIR R. PEEL.

In the House of Commons, the adjourned debate on the second reading of the Corn Importation Act was resumed. Sir J. GRAHAM said: I am very unwilling to prolong needlessly a debate which has been thus protracted, and which, I believe, the public at large are most desirous to see concluded by some decision, be that decision what it may (hear, hear). But, having failed in the course of yesterday evening to obtain that opportunity of addressing you which I was desirous of obtaining, I do not think it would be proper that this discussion should be adjourned without my advert- ing to some of the observations and arguments made and ad- duced during this debate. And, in the first place, I will notice the petition which has just been presented by the hon. member for Stockport. I can assure the house that I was not cognisant either of that petition or of the petition presented by the noble lord the member for Lynn, before they were presented, having emanated from a portion of my tenantry taking different views of this question. I may be permitted to assure the house, that neither directly nor indirectly have I, myself, or by my agents, interfered in the slightest or in the remotest degree with the free expression of opinion among my tenantry (cheers); and that I have never attempted to fetter the exercise of their own independent judgment—feeling, as I do, that they as tenants, have as deep an interest in this matter as have the landlords; that they, equally with myself, are entitled to the freest expression of their honest opinions (cheers). I will now, with the permission of the house, at once proceed to advert to the speech which closed the debate of last night—I mean that of the noble lord the member for Lynn (Lord G. Bentinck). I will dispose of the peroration of that speech with but one remark. It appeared to me, when stripped of the metaphor which accompanied it, to consist almost entirely of that personal and violent invective which, I regret to say, marked the greater portion of the speeches delivered on this side of the house against the measures of her Majesty's Government ("hear, hear," from the Opposition benches). Now, having plainly avowed a great change in my own opinion on this subject, I should not be guilty of the presumption,—I will not say, I might say, of the impertinence,—of commenting, with anything like irony, on the maintenance, on the part of hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the house, of the opinions which at one time I sincerely, in common with them, entertained, and which, up to a late period, I advocated. Neither will I say, for I could not say with truth, that I am not deeply grieved by the expression of the loss of esteem on the part of hon. members with whom I have acted for so many years, and in whose support and friendship, under trying circumstances, I have often rejoiced (cheers). When I made up my mind, from a deep sense of public duty, to act in concert with my right hon. friend at the head of the Government, and upon consideration of a pressing public necessity, as it appeared to me, to present these measures to Parliament as a servant of the Crown, I did anticipate, I foresaw with pain, all and everything that has taken place on this occasion with reference to the conduct of my hon. friends on this side of the house. But the necessity demanded the sacrifice, and I made it (cheers). I was prepared, I am prepared, on public grounds, regardless of all the taunts, regardless of all the obloquy which might be attempted to be heaped upon me, to meet the present emergency by my co-operation in the maintenance of the measures which are under discussion, and which, in my conscience, I believe are indispensable to the public good (cheers); and although it would be affectation and useless to deny that I am and have been moved by many of the observations made by gentlemen and noblemen whose former friendship I have valued, yet, steadily, firmly, and fearlessly, I hope to be enabled to discharge that public duty which I have undertaken (cheers). I shall unflinchingly persevere in that course, consoled for present mortification by this single reflection,—that the time, as I believe, is not far distant when the country gentlemen of England will be satisfied, and will acknowledge that her Majesty's Government has not betrayed their interests (cheers); and that those interests will hereafter be reconciled, in fact and in opinion, with the interests of the great body of the community, whose peace, whose welfare, whose prosperity, whose more easy means of subsistence, it is the object of this bill to promote—an object which, as I conscientiously think, this bill, if it receive the sanction of Parliament, will not fail to accomplish (cheers). I will now advert to some of the arguments of the noble lord, and I may be wrong, but certainly it does occur to me, that the arguments which he adduced in opposition to this measure are precisely the arguments, the most cogent, the most stringent and unanswerable, which the opponents of the sliding scale have, from time to time, urged against that system (hear). I will begin with the position first taken up by the noble lord; he is very anxious to gain some opinion from the Treasury bench, and failing in that, he stipulates, himself, as to what will be the prices of wheat with a Free Trade in corn. With a view of forming an estimate, he went through this extraordinary process; he takes certain seasons when the prices of wheat were, in England, remarkably low, being, I think, in 1830, somewhere about 45s., and in 1835, 39s. a quarter; and then in these circumstances he takes the prices of wheat on the Continent at the same moment, and from this estimates at what wheat could have been imported into this country with a profit. Now, the great argument against our restricted Corn Law was, that whilst there was an unsteadiness in its operation in varying times and varying seasons, the demand was most unequal and uncertain, and it is quite clear that the price of wheat on the Continent of Europe mainly depends on the demand in the British market. The price in 1835 and 1836 being unusually low in England, the effect on the Continent was this—a glut was produced in the foreign markets, from which our supplies were usually drawn, and the price there also was consequently low; and the noble lord under these circumstances draws the inference that wheat might then have been imported at a price of something like 30s. a quarter. I leave it to the house to say whether it is a safe inference that, in communibus annis, such would be the case. A great argument in favour of a steady annual demand on the Continent of Europe, our supply being deficient, is this—that while, in this country, from our increasing population, there is an increasing difficulty in finding an adequate home supply, the demand from abroad is annually increasing, and the result will be not so much to lower in this country as to raise the prices on the Continent, thereby equalising the prices here and abroad, and effecting this great object,—securing the people of England in years of deficiency against a sudden and extravagant rise in price (hear, hear). Their commercial rivals will, at the same time, not only have an extended trade with England, by means of an exchange of commodities, but steady prices and a guarantee against any ruinous fluctuation. What had been the fact in the years 1835 and 1836 was therefore no groundwork for estimating the prices then as the uniform prices at which wheat could be imported into this country. It is only a demonstration of the uncertainty of the demand here and the effects of that uncertainty abroad. The noble lord then proceeded to argue with reference to steadiness of prices, and he produced a table which I think remarkably illustrates another great defect which, as has been pointed out by the enemies of that sliding scale, is inherent in the present system of Corn Laws. That table demonstrates more clearly than I have ever yet seen it shown, that the great fluctuation in prices on the Continent depends on the demand from England. The table of fluctuations he brings forward shows, unequivocally, that exactly in proportion to the proximity to England, and the uncertain demand in England for wheat, has been the fluctuation in foreign corn. The table of fluctuations in the markets of Antwerp, Amsterdam, Dantzic, Hamburg, and Odessa, which are the ports from which we draw the required supplies almost wholly, prove the case; and to complete the demonstration, the noble lord dwelt upon the fact that in Bordeaux the fluctuation was least. Now, it is notorious that we have no trade whatever in corn with France. Is not the inference to be deduced from this as I have stated (hear, hear)? And what is the consequence of this? We convert our natural, our best customers, not only into commercial rivals, but into enemies. When they have abundance their markets are glutted, and they find ruinously low prices; and under other circumstances the uncertainties of the corn trade are such that they come to the conclusion that they can place no reliance on it. They then form hostile tariffs; they impose high duties on our manufactures, and they relinquish our corn trade in despair, as not only not producing to them good, but as inconsistent with their national safety. I say again that our Corn Law legislation has solely tended to create these fluctuations in the foreign markets, and that has always appeared to me the strongest reason why the system should be altered (cheers). The noble lord then proceeds to comment on what he terms the evenness of prices in England since the passing of the law in 1842. I have already stated to the house that that very evenness of prices in the present year appears to me delusive. It is well known that in no one year, in the memory of the oldest farmer, was there such inequality with respect to the quantity of corn as in the present year (cheers). I do not exaggerate when I say that the price of wheat of last year varies from 48s. to 72s., and, knowing that this variation in our markets was on account of the slow and imperfect operation of the sliding scale in a great national emergency, I for one was distinctly persuaded that an alteration in the system was called for (cheers). The noble lord has said he was sorry to observe that the importation of foreign corn which has taken place was generally in foreign ships. Why, that is one of the leading objections on the other side. There is no disputing that British ships are not to be had; as the noble lord remarked, the freight of British ships for the conveyance of corn is higher than of foreign ships; and the corn trade being uncertain and irregular, the inevitable consequence is that the importation of corn is more usually in foreign than in British ships. This very circumstance, therefore—this encouragement of foreign shipping at the expense of British shipping—is, among other reasons, why the existing Corn Laws have been condemned (hear, hear). The noble lord then goes on to state that the farmers throughout Great Britain look with dread and consternation upon this measure (cheers from the protectionist benches). The petition which has this evening been presented by the honourable gentleman, the honourable member for Stockport, clearly shows that the statement of the noble lord is incorrect, inasmuch as it demonstrates that all the farmers do not so regard it (cheers from the Opposition). Many hon. members, with equal confidence, have declared that the result of the adoption of the bill must be to throw immense tracts of land out of cultivation, and the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment (Mr. Yorke) has asserted that another effect of the passing of the measure will be that drainage will be suspended, and that agricultural improvement will be brought to an end. Now, I must beg leave to observe, that to the best of my knowledge the panic to which the hon. member for Cambridgeshire has adverted is much more confined to within these walls than hon. gentlemen are ready to admit (hear). I do not believe that either landlords or farmers, if they be not exposed to the dangerous atmosphere of this house, at all partake of this panic (hear, hear). An hon. gentleman opposite referred recently to the case of a gentleman in Somersetshire, who had, in consequence of the announcement made by Government, offered to all his tenants to release them from their engagements; and the 60 tenants to whom that offer was made, with one exception, at once rejected it. This criterion, by which to judge of public opinion is a very satisfactory one; and when men, having large capital involved in the cultivation of land refused the offer which would enable them to withdraw that capital, they gave very conclusive evidence of their satisfaction with the change which late events had conspired to make in their prospects (hear, hear). I must contend, on the other hand, that when, at the present moment, farmers enter into new contracts, upon no reduced terms, they evince that they have no alarm whatever as to the probable effect of the Corn Law now under consideration (hear, hear). And as it is a matter of very great importance that the statements of the existence of apprehensions should be refuted, and that no such impression as that spoken of should continue on the public mind, the house will, perhaps, permit me to lay before it some facts which have come within the range of my own observation. If I were to mention any of the farmers of Great Britain as especially distinguished for sagacity, and skill, and intelligence, I would assuredly name, without hesitation, the farmers of the East Lothian of Scotland (hear). Now I have the permission of Lord Belhaven to read to the house a letter, dated February 25th, containing information from the Earl of Wemyss. Lord Belhaven writes thus:

"I have been on a visit to Lord Wemyss for some days, and have had an opportunity of learning the opinions of the East Lothian and Berwickshire farmers to a considerable extent. Lord Wemyss's property in this county is, with one exception, the largest in it; and his factor, a clever sensible man, tells me that there is not a farm in this county or Berwickshire now to let that there are not more offers, and higher offers too, than he ever saw made for it, and by men of skill and capital. I asked how he accounted for this? His answer was, 'the corn question is now considered as settled, and the prospect held out of getting the land drained by the landlords instead of having to lay out the money themselves as formerly, has created a general feeling of confidence among all intelligent farmers.' One gentleman of this county stated, that on a property in Berwickshire, on which he was trustee, he had five offers from men of known character as first-rate farmers, the amount of which was 100 per cent. above the present rent. (This is since the introduction of this bill by my right honourable friend.) These are facts which are worth all the arguments one hears, coming, as they do, from the greatest corn-growing district in Scotland."

Now I heard somebody behind me allude to East Gloucestershire, East Gloucestershire, it is said, has unequivocally declared itself. But I understand that my right hon. friend, Sir George Warrender, had intended to bring forward the protection question in East Lothian; but he wrote a letter withdrawing the protection candidate, and that East Lothian has declared itself against the Corn Laws there can be no doubt (hear, hear). Now, with regard to the Isle of Ely. I have heard it argued that this is a proposition for throwing land out of cultivation. The hon. member for Huntingdon said that fen land must relapse into its primitive wildness, and the hon. member for Cambridge said that the effect of the panic which the measure has created will be, that improved cultivation must be suspended. Now, for idem (as we understood) has likewise given me permission to read the following letter:

"I received a letter from the Duke of Bedford, a day or two ago, with the following postscript: 'I received a letter this morning from my Cambridgeshire steward, to inform me that he had just let two farms for me, to very intelligent men, father and son, with ample capital, at an increase of 1800 a year on their present rent. The agreement has been made since Peel's measure was introduced.' Such facts as these seem to me to be worth more than hosts of figures and columns of statistics."

Now we have been hitherto looking only at the tenants and occupiers of land; but what will be its effect upon the fee simple of the land if the measure should pass? I know that land surveyors have mentioned extravagant offers to me, and have avowed opinions that have astonished me with regard to the effect which would be produced upon the value of land. I am told by a noble lord that there is a farm within 30 miles of his property, without a residence, and not in very good condition, the rental being 650*l.*, and under the circumstances of its position and its proximity to a railroad, it was supposed there would be an increase in its value, and he had been advised to ask 32 years' purchase for the farm. For five years he never got any one to make any offer to purchase; but within the last three weeks an offer had been made for the purchase, coming up to the full demand; and it is expected that the bargain will be struck. Then will any land be thrown out of cultivation? It is very difficult to ascertain this point; but there is a fact which goes beyond all speculation. If it is probable that land will be thrown out of cultivation, no man out of Bedford would go and purchase land. Is the house aware of the working of the Enclosure Commission? Last year, in the early part of it, there were few applications for enclosures, and to a small extent. Now I will read to the house what have been the applications to the Enclosure Commissioners for the last six months; and I repeat that no man in his senses could make an application to enclose land, if land was expected to be thrown out of cultivation. Now, in September last, the applications were for 2290 acres, and in October the number of acres was 4588. That was under protection, and at that time there was no idea of any alteration in the Corn Laws. But, in November, there was pregnant evidence in many quarters that a proposition would be made to Parliament for a material alteration in those laws. Did that circumstance check applications to the Commissioners of Enclosure? I have stated that the number of applications, in October, were for 4588 acres; in November, they were 7147; in December, 7205; in January, 5600; in February, 3595 ("hear, hear," from the protectionists). In March, down to the 7th of the month, there has been one application for 150 acres, and within the last fortnight there has been an application from the county of York to enclose Bowes Moor, a common of inferior land, very inferior land, to the extent of 14,000 acres; and another application has come from Taunton Dean, Somerset, to enclose 2500 acres; that is, within the last fortnight, applications have been made to enclose no less than 16,500 acres (hear, hear). So much for land being thrown out of cultivation. Now, I beg the attention of the house to a bill now in progress and before Parliament; it is entitled, "A bill for enclosing and reclaiming from the sea certain tracts of land, forming part of the great estuary called the Wash" (laughter, and cries of "hear, hear"). This is not a question of throwing land out of cultivation, or of enclosing waste or common land, but it is a question of getting property out of the sea; and, by industry and the application of capital, bringing land into cultivation out of the sea itself. Whose names are at the back of this bill? Why, I find the first name is that of Lord George Bentinck (a laugh); the second that of Viscount Jocelyn; and the third that of Mr. Bagge, one of the members for the county of Norfolk. This bill was brought in in the present year, when the plan of the Government was known, by the noble lord himself. The capital sought to be invested in this undertaking is 500,000*l.*, the power being taken of borrowing 200,000*l.*; and amongst the subscribers, the first name I find is that of "William George Frederick Cavendish Bentinck, commonly called Lord George Bentinck; and of the Directors of the Company, the first is William George Frederick Cavendish Bentinck, commonly called Lord George Bentinck; the others are Sir William John Henry Browne Folke, the mayor of Lynn, and others. Now, on another occasion the rights of the Crown interposed an obstacle, and there was a negotiation between the parties on this point; but the issue did not lead to a satisfactory conclusion; but here, in this bill, there is an admission of the rights of the Crown, and there is a clause charging the property of the company with the payment of 1 per cent. to the Crown upon all outlays and expenses, which is expressly stated to be intended as compensation for 30,000 or 40,000 acres. Now the noble lord will permit me to put a question to him, which he has often put to my right hon. friend. What is his estimate of the price of wheat under the new measure? (hear, hear). I have no doubt that he must have made a most perfect estimate of the price of wheat; and he will, therefore, allow me to ask him what is his estimate of the future price of wheat which has induced him to embark in this enterprise? It is now, Sir, my painful duty to turn to a more serious part of the great question; the house will anticipate that I allude to the state of Ireland. I heard with great pain, and with surprise, the statement of the noble lord (Lord G. Bentinck), that, in his opinion, in which every day's experience confirmed him, the potato famine in Ireland was a gross delusion; he said, I think, that a more gross delusion had never been palmed upon the country by any Government (hear); and the noble lord proceeded to argue, that because the average price of potatoes throughout Ireland was only 4*d.* a stone, there could not be any famine in that country. Now I must have failed in my endeavour to show the house what is the real state of Ireland, if it can believe that the average price of potatoes is any criterion of the state of destitution in that country. I may observe, in passing, that 4*d.* a stone in Ireland is nearly double the price of potatoes at an ordinary period; and that when you take the difference between 2*d.* and 4*d.* a stone for potatoes, it is an increase in the price of an article of food of 100 per cent., a difference between plenty and want, I might almost say, between life and death. Now the noble lord also commented upon the fact of some small imports from Ireland. What is the inference from that? He seems to draw the inference that there is no destitution in Ireland. But it is a consequence of the high price of potatoes in England and Wales, where the failure of the potato crop is almost as great as in Ireland itself. High prices will attract the supplies to the richer from the poorer country, and it is quite sufficient to account for these imports by the desire to gain something from the small remnant of the crop whilst it remains good. But the view taken by the noble lord may have been taken under an imperfect acquaintance with the condition of the country. He is, however, supported by the high authority of an Irish member, the member for the University of Dublin, and the recorder of Dublin, recently returned from Ireland, and who has told the house that the accounts of the scarcity are the grossest exaggerations.

Mr. SHAW: No, I said, "Great exaggerations."

Sir J. GRAHAM: Well, great exaggerations. I hope the house will bear with me if I detain it by reading some extracts upon this point, which assume an aspect of peculiar importance, for I must confess it was reading these details in October which convinced me then, as I am convinced now, that a discussion of the Corn Laws in the present session of Parliament was inevitable (hear). The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Shaw) referred to the statements made by Mr. Lindley and Dr. Playfair, in November, consisting, in his opinion, of gross exaggerations.

Mr. SHAW: Great exaggeration.

Sir J. GRAHAM: Great exaggeration, I beg pardon of the right hon. gentleman; that report was made to the Government in November. That report, however, was not the circumstance which first alarmed me. I happened, in October, to be residing in Cumberland, and I received a letter from the secretary of the Agricultural Society in Ireland, which includes a great number of the nobility and gentry of the country. Now that letter which I received from the secretary of this society was dated October 23d, and the house will see how far Dr. Playfair's report (which the right hon. gentleman accuses of great exaggeration) corresponds with this letter:

"Sir,—I beg leave to send you an extract from a Dublin morning paper, which will give you a correct account of the measures which the council of this society have adopted, respecting the prevailing disease in the potato crop. I beg leave also to state that when I issued a circular, about a month since, to the secretaries of 120 local societies in connection with the central one, I got several answers from persons stating that the disease was not then apparent in their immediate neighbourhood, but I have since received letters from most of them, stating, that upon digging the crops, they found the disease in almost every quarter, and I may safely say at present that there is not a county in Ireland that is not more or less affected by it. Since my return from the cattle-show at Ballinasloe, my office has been filled with specimens of the diseased potatoes from all quarters, which prove not only the similarity of the disease, but the great and uniform extent of it. The council of this society have directed their labours to two objects. First, to obtain the latest and most accurate information respecting the actual nature and extent of the disease, in the different localities, through the machinery at our command, and to transmit the same from time to time to the Irish Government at the castle; secondly, to institute the series of experiments within described, under the direction of Professor Kane, for the purpose of deciding upon saving the remnant of the crop, which now undoubtedly appears to be in the greatest jeopardy. The result of these experiments shall be carefully matured and communicated. I shall barely add, Sir, that the greatest panic appears to exist in all parts of the community, and those who know the country best are most puzzled how to act. One thing, however, I think is certain, that enough has already transpired to justify the most prompt and energetic measures on the part of the public and the Government."

(Hear, hear.) Now this gentleman says he was very much alarmed; and I ask the house, was it not the duty of the Government to take measures for regulating the supply of corn to the United Kingdom? But this was not all; there came, enclosed in the letter from the secretary, another from the co-league of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Hamilton). That letter, which is addressed to the secretary to the Agricultural Society, is dated the 18th October, and was forwarded to me, if I mistake not, in the letters from the secretary:

"My dear Sir,—I am sorry it will not be in my power to attend the special meeting of the council this day. If, as I apprehend, the accounts from the different parts of Ireland concur in representing the failure in the potato crop as at all general, I think it would be advisable that the council should take means for bringing the subject before the Lord-Lieutenant, in the hope that Government might take some steps to make provision against the imminent famine. I am aware that some time since inquiries were made through the constabulary by Government, but the character of the disease is so peculiar, and the mode of its operation so unexpected, that the apparent state of the crop of potatoes a fortnight ago affords very incorrect information as to its real state at the present moment. Probably the council could not do better than to instruct you to prepare a digest of the information which may have come in from the local societies, such as could be presented to Government; and if they were to meet again next week, say on Thursday next, they might then enter into communication with the Government on the subject. I name Thursday, for I think during the next few days when the people are beginning to dig their crops, much accurate information will reach you; and it is most desirable that when we communicate with Government the fullest and most accurate information should be afforded to them."

This representation was made in the month of October last by the secretary of the society, and such was the urgency of the cases that that gentleman thought it necessary to address himself personally to me on the subject in the letter which I have just read. Having gone through all that I think it necessary to bring under the notice of the house in the way of information received during the autumn, I propose shortly to state the most material portions of the information which has recently reached our hands. The noble lord the member for Lincolnshire (North, as we understood) has told the house that there could not be a grosser fabrication than that which represented the danger of society as immediate and pressing. In my opinion, one of the best answers which can be offered to that broad and sweeping assertion is to read a statement which is dated the 19th of March, and was addressed by the Commissary at Waterford to the Commissary-in-Chief at Dublin. It is in these words:

"The price of potatoes is so high, and they are of so bad a quality, that they are no longer used in the poorhouse here, bread being substituted. Nearly all the potatoes on the quay come in coasting vessels from the county of Wexford, where it appears the soil is sandy, and where the mayor informs me the disease has done very little injury; but the price is 6d. per stone of 14lbs., which is quite beyond the reach of the poor. I can bear witness to the fact, that in the immediate vicinity of this place a proportion of one-third to one-half—and in some cases, the whole—has been found totally injured, festid, and fit only for the dung-hill."

This, I am sure, the house will agree with me in thinking forms a most important part of the documents which I have to lay before them; and I have now to call attention to that which discloses the most formidable portion of the whole evil—namely, the probability that not only the produce of the past year has failed, but the seed deposited in the ground already shows evidence of being tainted.

"Some of the crops of potatoes planted in January have been examined, and the seed has been found to have generally rotted. The ground will most probably be turned up in April, and sown with oats or barley."

I will now, with the permission of the house, direct attention to the condition of the people in the island of Achill. The information derived from that place is founded upon the statements made by one of the coast guard, resident upon the island; his communication is dated the 1st of March, and these are the terms in which he writes:

"I regret to have to report to you a further unfavourable account of the potatoes in this district, in the southern part of which, I may say, they are, literally speaking, totally gone, the peasantry having now discovered, on opening their pits, the true state of them. I witnessed on Friday last that in many, instead of picking them by hand, they actually shovelled them out. On my return from Keel yesterday evening I found a great number of persons (from 50 to 60) waiting to complain to me of their misfortunes, which I assure you are great indeed; one person, with a family of six children, stated his crop to be now reduced to about six creels (8 cwt.)"

Now, there we have a document which to my mind speaks volumes. But this is not all; we have reports from 2000 electoral districts belonging to unions, and these being made up to the 15th of February, state that there is every prospect that the whole of the forthcoming crop will be seen to be in a state of decomposition. The house will now, I trust, permit me to read this statement, which is very brief, but, in my opinion, extremely important:

Proportion of the Potato Crop Lost.	Number of Electoral Divisions in which the annexed Proportions of the Potato Crop were returned lost, condensed from Constabulary Reports of
	Jan. 15, 1846.	Feb. 15, 1846.
Between 8-10ths and 9-10ths ..	3	2
" 7-10ths and 8-10ths ..	97	123
" 6-10ths and 7-10ths ..	124	184
" 5-10ths and 6-10ths ..	11	14
" 4-10ths and 5-10ths ..	640	673
" 3-10ths and 4-10ths ..	613	657
" 2-10ths and 3-10ths ..	283	252
" 1-10th and 2-10ths ..	156	137
Not exceeding 1-10th ..	113	102
No loss ..	9	6
Not returned ..	3	2
Total number of Electoral Divisions ..	2032	2052

In the whole, then, of those electoral divisions, more than half of the entire crop has been absolutely destroyed. I am aware how often it is said that there has been no increase of this taint amongst the potatoes, and therefore I should wish, if the house will allow me, to advert to some fresh evidence of the fact from another part of Ireland. I find in a letter from Sligo, addressed by Col. McArthur to the commander-in-chief of the forces in Ireland, which bears date the 14th of March, that the scarcity in that neighbourhood is of the most alarming character. From the statements of Col. McArthur it appears that the supply of food for the people in the neighbourhood of Sligo is at the present time one-third less than it was at the corresponding period of last year, and that the prices of potatoes in the towns between Sligo and Dublin had risen 25 to 50 per cent., clearly establishing the fact of a deficiency. Accounts from Carrick-on-Suir, dated the 1st of March, give the same melancholy picture of the existing state of things, and prove, beyond a doubt, that the progress of the rot is in every point of view most alarming. In one case there were 1500 barrels of potatoes in pits, and with the exception of two barrels they were all putrid. I now propose to read an extract or two from the report of a meeting which took place in the county of Cork, when Lord Mountcashel presided. At that meeting the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, that the local committee be requested to use their utmost diligence in ascertaining the funds necessary to support the people in their respective districts until the 10th day of August next, and that the landlords be called upon to meet the exigencies of the case, by subscribing a rational proportion, according to the value of their respective estates, based on the Poor Law valuation."

The following letter, addressed to Lord Mountcashel, was also read at the same meeting:

"My Lord,—I have examined the potatoes in the pits, and find them getting worse every day since the beginning of the month; I may say, nearly one-third gone. On examining those in the lofts, I find them worse than those in the pits—nearly one-half gone. I am sorry to say, on examining four different kinds planted on the 13th of February and following days, they are getting into a state of decay faster than the above—even those shooting out are puny and stunted. If all now growing come to maturity, they will not be above one-third of a crop."

"March 10, 1846. "D. M. Kissick."

At this meeting the following observations were made:

"This was very serious indeed, and brought them to the consideration of the future. What was to become of them next year? It would appear that the potatoes were gone. If they planted rotten potatoes, they would not grow, and the consequence would be the total failure next year of what the Irish people depended on for food."

I do not wish to prolong the present discussion by referring to any more documents; but I have before me one statement from Mountmellick, which I cannot refrain from reading to the house. It consists of resolutions agreed to at a meeting of the Board of Guardians, held on Friday, March 20th:

"That at the meeting of the board this day a number of decent poor married women made application for relief; their families amounted to the number of 80 human beings, without food or sufficient employment; those poor people have houses or cabins, and, if their whole families were to accept of temporary relief in the workhouse, their residences and furniture would be lost to them. Feeling the pressure of want and destitution now so general in this populous town and neighbourhood, we feel it our bounden duty to bring this matter under the consideration of the Executive Government and the Poor Law Commissioners, in order that some mode may be devised or pointed out, whereby relief may be given by a supply of cheap food, either gratuitously or at a cheap rate, to meet the present exigency. The poor persons who applied to the board this day form but a very small portion of those who we know are now in great distress, and actually subsisting on food made from the wash of a starch-yard, only suited for, and considered indifferent, food for pigs."

Mr. SHAW observed, that this proved nothing with respect to potatoes.

Sir J. GRAHAM resumed: Does it not show the utmost degree of want? Try it by any other test you please, but, do what we may with the statement, we can arrive at no other conclusion than this, that it proves an extreme condition of human suffering; an amount of suffering not limited to any one district in Ireland, but spread over the whole of the country. So recently as last Monday a deputation from Limerick waited upon the Lord-Lieutenant. That deputation consisted of the Mayor of Limerick, of Mr. Roche, Mr. Monson, and others. The deputation was of high respectability, and their statements deserved the most serious attention. They represented that there was the utmost distress not only in Limerick, but in Clare, and though, contrary to all principle, they solicited aid at the hands of the Government, they did so upon this simple ground, that the people were actually starving, and that if relief were not immediately given, the most fatal results must ensue. This, be it remembered, is in the month of March;—already the city of Limerick is asking for money out of the public purse, and at a moment like this the Recorder of Dublin tells us that the distress is not so great as we imagined. But then the learned Recorder makes a fearful admission. He tells you that things are not much worse than they usually are at this time of the year; that is, that dysentery, fever, and famine are in all years prevalent at this season. Well, then, this is so true that the right hon. and learned Recorder, acting upon a deep conviction of that which he thought would be the best for his countrymen, takes credit to himself for supporting a measure calculated to afford temporary relief by a grant out of the British Treasury, while he informs you in the same breath that the evil is of a uniform and permanent character—that, in fact, it returns year by year. He tells you that he cannot comprehend the connection between the Irish case and the proposition of the Government, although year by year the condition of the people in Ireland reaches a fearful point of fever, dysentery, and death. Notwithstanding all this, the Recorder of Dublin would say that no extraordinary case has been made out on behalf of the people of Ireland, and that the whole difficulty might be met by a grant out of the public purse. Now, I confess that I am, for one, not prepared to recommend that the people of England shall be called upon to bear the whole expense of this calamity. The people of England suffer already from the rot in the potato, though that rot does not constitute their sole food (hear, hear). This is a subject regarding which we talk much of authorities. Now, I assure I need not cite instances to show that in cases of great pressure the practice of the executive Government in this country has been to relax the laws which regulate the importation of food; and, though I am not prepared to quote the exact words of Adam Smith, yet we all know that his opinion is in favour of a perfectly Free Trade in corn (hear, hear). Then there is also the authority of Burke, from whom no one is more entitled to the respect of those who desire to legislate upon sound and comprehensive principles. The passage which I should wish to quote is contained in Mr. Burke's Dissertation on Scarcity, and though an hon. member in the course of this debate favoured the house with several extracts from that work, yet he avoided that to which I should like to call attention. He quoted round and round it; but he did not give us the passage itself. I shall merely attempt to quote from memory, for I have not furnished myself with the exact words of the author. The following is the passage to which the right hon. baronet referred:—"So that, in my opinion, there is no way of preventing this evil, which goes to the destruction of all our agriculture, and of that part of our internal commerce which touches our agriculture the most nearly, as well as the safety and very being of Government, but manfully to resist the very first idea, speculative or practical that it is within the competence of Government, taken as a Government, or even of the rich, as rich, to supply to the poor those necessities which it has pleased the Divine Providence for a while to withhold from them. We, the people, ought to be made sensible that it is not in breaking the laws of commerce, which are the laws of nature, and consequently the laws of God, that we are to place our hope of softening the divine displeasure to remove any calamity under which we suffer, or which hangs over us." Those are noble principles, and those principles amongst other grounds lead me to defend the principle of the bill. But the learned Recorder of Dublin says, that we have betrayed our party, and that we are inexcusable for that. I do not blame hon. gentlemen for adhering to opinions which we have given up; but the learned Recorder, in consequence of our having given up those opinions, thinks himself entitled to cast our horoscope. He tells the world that we are a falling Government, and, sitting behind us, he acts upon a conviction that we are falling, and therefore he kicks us. If a protection Government be hereafter formed, then I hope that the right hon. and learned gentleman will obtain for himself a more satisfactory settlement of the Recordship (cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear, hear"); and a retiring allowance, such as it would not be in my power to support (Oh, oh). The learned Recorder of Dublin often said that he never looked for Parliamentary place or patronage; but yet, if a protection Government were formed, the vision of the Irish Secretaryship might again flit across his fancy; and, should he obtain that office, I hope that under the benign influence of his administration the people of Ireland may enjoy all the advantages of which their condition is susceptible. At all events, whether now, or at whatever time the learned Recorder may give utterance to any reproaches of us, I cannot fail to know the feelings which animate him (hear, hear); and, knowing those feelings, his censure sits tight upon me. I infinitely prefer his open hostility to his smouldering resentment (hear, hear). Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman the member for the University of Oxford, stated his opinion that this measure was inconsistent with the interests of the tithe-owners. Nothing could be more accurate than the statement which the hon. member made, that under the Commutation Act, that tithe is an invariable quantity, though the price is variable. In my opinion, the very accuracy of the statement disposes of the question so far as the tithe-owners are concerned. Under the Tithe Commutation Act an invariable quantity is secured; whatever may be the change of cultivation, the only variation is in the price. Now, observe: before the Tithe Commutation Act, the tithe-owner was not only exposed to a variation of price—because, if he took his tithe in kind, he was liable to the variation of price—but also to a great variation in quantity; whilst under the Tithe Commutation Act, he is free from that variation in quantity to which he was before exposed, and he is liable only to that variation of price from which he was not before exempt (hear, hear). That is my answer to the objection of the hon. gentleman the member for the University of Oxford. But let us consider the case of the tithe-payers, and if there be any hardship in the case, the tithe-payers are more affected than the tithe-owner. Unlike the tithe receivers, the tithe-payers have to pay a fixed quantity, and even if the land be thrown out of cultivation, the quantity they have to pay will not be affected though the variation in price will be provided for in a measure, since there is every year an adjustment of price, based on the averages of the last seven years. I am free to confess, Sir, that my answer to the tithe-payers is not so complete as my answer to the tithe-owners; but upon the whole, I believe they will both find that they have had an equitable settlement; and it must be remembered that the Tithe Commutation Act is greatly in favour of the landed proprietors. Till the passing of that Act, whatever was the increase in the quantity of produce, the tithe-owner partook of it; the title-owner was in fact copartner with the owner of the soil, and partook of the increased produce without sharing in the outlay necessary to make that increase. Prospective under the Title Commutation Act that copartnership is dissolved, and the landowners now enjoy exclusively the permanent advantages arising from the outlay of capital. On the whole, then, I think that the arrangement may be regarded as equitable to all parties, and I do not see why the title-owners should offer any obstacles to the progress of this measure. But the hon. member for Oxford put the case as a dilemma. If the prices should not fall, he asked, what is the object of this bill? and if the price falls, where is the equity of this measure? Now the Corn Laws are always open to another dilemma:—the present Corn Laws either affect the price of one of the first articles of necessity, or they do not so affect it. If they do not affect prices, I wish to know why is there all this resistance to any change? It cannot be denied that they turn our foreign customers into rivals—that they cramp our foreign trade—that they disorganise the home market—that they cause internal commotion—that they set class against class—that they cause heartburnings amongst a large portion of the community; and that they produce, I may almost say, an endless interruption of domestic peace. If they do not affect prices, wherein consists the injury done to the landowners (hear, hear)? But if they do cause a permanent enhancement of price, then arise the interests of the consumers and of the receivers of wages; and they may say, "Why do you make us pay a larger price than we ought, and then we should otherwise pay for our daily bread, whilst at the same time you diminish our means of purchasing food" (hear)? I will now refer to the damage likely to arise to agriculture, and I must here say that the prosperity of the home trade has been almost invariably concurrent with the improvement of the land, with the prosperity of agriculture, and, speaking generally, with the reduced price of food; and upon this point I cannot resist quoting to the house a short passage from a work on this subject, in which the writer states the argument upon this point so tersely and so ably, that I cannot hope to present it in so effective and so clear a manner. In the neighbourhood of the manufacturing towns the importation from distant places has received a great and a progressive increase. Manchester and Liverpool now draw their supplies of agricultural produce from Ireland, from Scotland, and from the northern counties of England; and simultaneously with that increased importation of produce from a distance, there is an increased price in the neighbourhood of the towns; and so far from its being a consequence that the value of land in the neighbourhood of the towns should fall, the very reverse is the fact. The case, however, is so ably put in the work of Mr. Wilson (hear, hear) on the influence of the Corn Laws, that, with the permission of the house, I will read what he says:

"Of late years the facilities of steam-navigation have enabled the producers in Ireland, Cumberland, and elsewhere, to send the fruits of their industry at cheaper and easier rates to Liverpool, Manchester, &c.; but, while we find that, in the former places, these facilities have tended to improve the value of property, and the general condition of the producer, yet they have in no way tended to reduce the value of property or the condition of the producer in the neighbourhoods of the latter places. Without these additional supplies, the consuming ability of the large towns would have been abridged to a smaller quantity of food; but, with such additional supplies of such articles as can be best brought from a distance at a cheaper rate, a largeness of ability to consume other articles, which are not so easily transported, is obtained by the community, in the production of which the immediate producers find an occupation as profitable as before, and thus the whole community of producers and consumers is equally benefited."

And here he gives an application, to which I would call the especial attention of hon. members:

"There is no more reason why the consumer in Great Britain should not be benefited by the producer of the Continent, without injury to our own property, than that the consumers in Liverpool and Manchester should be benefited by the producers in Ireland and Cumberland, as has been shown, without lowering the value of land in the immediate neighbourhood."

This argument, I confess, appears to me to be conclusive and unanswerable (hear, hear). Now, Sir, there is only one other point to which I am anxious, with the permission of the house, to direct the special attention of hon. members; it is the important question of the bearing of the price of corn on the rate of wages. I have stated on former occasions to this house my deep and firm conviction with regard to the manufacturing population, and there has been strong evidence to confirm my views,—that so far from high prices producing high wages, the very converse was true, and that low prices produce high wages, and high prices produce low wages. I allude to the evidence given before the Hand-loom Commissioners, and I can refer to evidence given in Scotland, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, by the hand-loom weavers in the county of Warwick, and last of all by the silk-weavers. The first evidence to which I refer is that of a Scotch witness, taken by Mr. Symonds, the assistant-commissioner, in the south of Scotland, for inquiring into the condition of the hand-loom weaver; and on the result of that evidence Mr. Symonds reports, that the only measure desired by the weavers, and thought desirable by the manufacturers, was the repeal of the Corn Laws. They considered the continuance of that tax, by increasing the price of food, and diminishing the amount of employment, as grievous and impolitic. Next let me refer you to the evidence of two hand-loom weavers themselves, given to Mr. Chapman, the assistant-commissioner in the West Riding. Charles Fletcher was asked, "Have you considered the causes of your distress?" and his reply was, he had, and that he attributed the decline, in a considerable degree, to the operation of the Corn Laws. He was then asked, "In what way did you come to that opinion?" and his reply was, that they prevented the exchange of our commodities with other countries, and that their repeal would open the woollen trade to the whole Continent. He was further asked, "Is there any other way in which the weavers are affected?" and he replied, he thought the weavers were peculiarly affected, for the less income they had, the less they could spend on bread. When was then 3s. 4d. a stone. A man with a family required two stone or two stone and a-half. Now, he had known it occasionally as low as 2s. a stone; and it ought not to be so high. James Cormack declared that there was more than one cause; but the chief he should say was the Corn Laws, for the duty on foreign grain tended to cramp commerce, and it also caused them to eat bread dearer than they ought to do and than the people of other countries do, and obliged them to consume more of their small earnings in buying bread, so as to leave little for the purchase of anything else. And this, Sir, has been the effect on the home market; high prices have destroyed the demand for many manufactured articles.

This has been followed by the mills working short time, by the suspension of labour, and by universal distress throughout the manufacturing districts. The hon. member for Rutlandshire last evening felt the force of this so cogently that he proposed, as an act of justice to the working classes, that there should be, and he declared there ought to be, a sliding-scale of wages as a relief from the sliding-scale in the Corn Laws (hear); and not only that there should be fixed a minimum rate of wages, but that the rate should be adapted to the high price of corn; such was the proposition gravely made by the hon. member for Rutlandshire, who thought it unjust to enhance the price of corn without establishing a scale of wages. I am ashamed to trouble the house any longer, otherwise I could cite much more evidence from the report of the hand-loom weavers' commission of workmen in various trades, whose evidence is given in their own words; but I am certain that I do not misrepresent the character of that evidence when I say that the manufacturing population generally look upon the Corn Laws as enhancing the price of food, and at the same time diminishing the rate of wages. And now, Sir, I come to the consideration which I own operates most powerfully on my judgment. I cannot overlook the fact, that the Government of this country, is, in practice, vested mainly in the landowners, ("hear," and "Oh"). The other house of Parliament is composed almost exclusively of landowners; and there is in this house a great preponderance of the landed interest, (hear, hear). A Government so based and so conducted cannot long maintain any influence in opposition to the great body of public opinion; such a Government to be safe, must make it evident to all that its rule has been impartial legislation (hear, hear); and now, when we consider the concentration, the union, the intelligence, the growing numbers, and the increasing proportion of the manufacturing population, who have, if not a universal, a very general opinion deeply seated in their mind, that the Corn Laws do enhance the price of bread, and do at the same time lower wages—that they make the manufacturing workmen pay more and receive less. If you persist in maintaining such laws, you may depend upon it that the population will not place confidence in the impartiality of your legislation. The people, upon this point of their daily food, will not at all times listen to reason; they cannot be cajoled by fallacies (cheers, and counter-cheers from the agricultural members); and I am satisfied in my own judgment, that they are not wrong in their opinion. They are right in their opinion, that with the manufacturing population of this country high prices are concurrent with low wages, and they are placed in a most unfair position when the price of bread is artificially enhanced, and at the same time the means of obtaining it are decreased (cheers). If, Sir, time would permit, I could give you conclusive evidence, which I have before me, that this opinion is no longer confined to the manufacturing population. I could show that the agricultural population are beginning to be of the same opinion (hear, hear). I could produce evidence to show that there is a diminution of crime when prices fall, and that there is an increase of crime when prices rise. I can show that distemper and mortality also increase in proportion to the rise in the price of food, and that they decrease as the price of food diminishes. It has been already proved that though the wages in agricultural districts do to a certain extent rise with the price of corn, they never rise in the same proportion as the price of food (hear, hear). I have shown, then, the unanswerable opinion of the manufacturing population. I have said that the same opinions prevail in many districts among the agricultural and rural population. I am bound to say that I cannot declare the conclusions drawn by the manufacturing population to be unsound and untrue (hear, hear, hear); and believing them to be sound and true, and that it would be dangerous to the permanent domestic peace of the country, and that it would not be safe to resist all consideration for this opinion, I shall give my hearty and my unhesitating support to the bill now before the house (loud cheers). But I think it necessary, perhaps, that I should say, with reference to our domestic peace, there is no time to be lost (hear, hear), and that with reference to our foreign relations the measure and the time are decidedly politic. Nations trading with each other are bound over in heavy responsibilities to keep the peace. Governments may be prone to war, but if commerce be free, and if there be extended ramifications promoting the social enjoyment of each, they will consider their common good; and whatever may be the disposition of Governments to war, a people whose daily comforts are ministered to by other nations will be the friends of peace; and thus the peace of the world will be best preserved, when commerce shall extend her benefits to the great body of the people (hear, hear). The hon. gentleman who moved the present amendment made a quotation from a modern poet, and then sat down. I will, following his example, of ending with a quotation, and though mine will not be exactly from a modern poet, still it will meet the tone and the spirit in which this measure is proposed (hear, hear). In Pope's Windsor Forest there are some lines so beautiful and so appropriate to the subject of this freedom of trade, and so real a description of the measure we propose, that I may be excused for quoting them. Looking forward as he then did to the happy days when London should be a free port, he apostrophises that noble river, the Thames, which is the channel to bring to this metropolis the commerce of the world, in these words:

"The time shall come when, free as seas or wind,
Unbounded Thames shall flow for all mankind;
Whole nations enter with each swelling tide,
And seas but join the regions they divide;
Earth's distant ends our glory shall behold,
And the new world launch forth to meet the old."

(Loud cheers). That is a real description of the measure which we are now discussing; and I say again, let that vision be realised, as I am convinced it will be, by giving a second reading to this bill (loud cheers).

Mr. STUART had heard with the deepest regret the attack which Sir James Graham had so unfairly made upon that right hon. gentleman. He was not surprised at hearing Mr. Cobden express his opinion that the Government of this country was so overridden and oppressed by the landed interest, that it was unable to bring forward measures which were deemed expedient and wise; but he did not expect to hear the same doctrine avowed by a Secretary of State; and that, too, for the purpose of coercing the opinion of the House of Commons. He then proceeded to argue that there was no necessity for passing this bill, but a strong necessity for throwing it out. Hitherto, the whole course of our legislation had been devised for the protection of agriculture. What valid reason had been advanced for the abandonment of that protection? Sir J. Graham had said that the landed interest must yield on this subject, because public opinion was against them. He denied the fact. The repeated iteration of the fallacies and falsehoods of the Anti-Corn Law League ought not to be mistaken in that house for the opinion of the manufacturing districts; and he complained that Government had given its sanction to so mischievous a mistake (hear). Mr. Cobden had succeeded in his mission of terrifying the Government; and the proof of it was visible in the introduction of this bill to cut down the influence of the landed interest. Mr. Cobden had declared his intention of putting down the empire of hoobysism. What did that mean? What else than that the house should be subservient in its legislation to the clamours, but not to the sober judgment of the manufacturing population—the very advice which Sir J. Graham had intimated that night with so much warmth and eloquence. He called upon the house to resist this Jack-Cade system of legislation, and not to take their laws from the mouths of mobs in fustian jackets.

Mr. BOUVIERE was opposed to the existing Corn Laws, because they were unjust in themselves, and produced scarcity, pauperism, and crime, and should gladly support the present change in them, which was required by every consideration of wise policy and sound benevolence. A due regard to their own interests, as well as to the peace and harmony of society, ought to induce the landlords of England to accede to this measure; for the agricultural labourers, on whose well-being their own well-being mainly depended, were much worse off now than they were before these Corn Laws were enacted. He proved this by quoting Arthur Young's description of the condition of the peasantry of Wiltshire in his day, and by comparing it with their condition at present.

The Marquis of WORCESTER and Mr. D. GARDNER expressed their intention of voting against the Ministerial measure, on account of its injurious effects on British agriculture.

Mr. MILDMAJ urged, that this bill was not necessary, and, if necessary, was not safe. As a merchant, well acquainted with the shipping interest, and the condition of trade in foreign ports, he could not express the astonishment which he felt at the extraordinary proposition of Sir R. Peel, for the annihilation of all duties on the importation of foreign corn. He must oppose it because it was not accompanied, to use the words of her Majesty's speech, "by such precautions as would prevent loss to the revenue, or injurious results to any of the great interests of the country."

Sir R. PEEL: Sir, I think the hon. gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Mildmay) appears to have repented of the neutrality which he observed on a former occasion, and resolved to make up for that neutrality by the sharpness of his present attack. In the course of this evening I was told by a young member, the representative for Newark, that so far as this debate has been concerned, I have been treated with particular forbearance (a laugh). Well, then, I think I might have expected that, at any rate, I should have escaped attack for the simple action of presenting a petition to the house. I did, it is true, present two petitions—one from Manchester—another from Liverpool; and the hon. gentleman is so capacious, that he finds occasion from their presentation to make an attack on me (hear, hear). All I did was to state the prayer of those petitions, and who the parties were from whom they proceeded. Those parties are connected with the manufacturing and mercantile interest, and I think the hon. gentleman, on the ground of community of occupation, might have allowed them quietly to speak for themselves (hear, hear). The petition from Manchester was signed by the President of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, a body entertaining very strong political opinions (hear, hear), and many of the members of which have been connected with that agitation which has been proceeding on the subject of the Corn Laws; but in order to show the unity of opinion upon this subject, whatever the difference of political opinion, that petition was also signed by the President of the Commercial Association, a body entertaining political opinions of an opposite tendency (cheers). They also came to the same conclusion as did all the bankers of Manchester, I think, without exception (cheers), and as did the vast majority of the manufacturers of that town connected with great manufacturing establishments (cheers). They concurred in petitioning this house, not attributing the stagnation in trade, which the hon. gentleman says exists, to the delay which has taken place in this house in passing these measures exclusively, but stating that stagnation and embarrassment in trade do exist and will continue until the decision of this house shall be finally pronounced, and praying, therefore, that this house, at as early a period as may be consistent with mature deliberation, will pronounce its final judgment on this measure (cheers). Sir, the hon. gentleman is a proof of how exceedingly difficult it would be to devise any measure connected with the Corn Laws which shall please all parties (hear, hear). But I think the hon. gentleman stands almost alone in this house upon this question. The hon. gentleman who so violently attacks the measures of the Government says, if we had proposed a cautious measure of this nature,—that the scale of duties which I propose to exist for three years should be carried into execution, and at the end of that period there should be a fixed duty,—he would have been inclined to vote for such a proposal. He has not quite made up his mind whether he would vote for it or not, but still he is so favourably disposed towards it that he thinks he should have been inclined to adopt it. Well, I think he is the only man in the house who would have supported that proposition. Then the hon. gentleman made another charge against me which I am surprised at—he says, that every Irish member ought to be indignant with me on account of the delay that has been interposed in affording relief to the Irish people. Indignant with me, indeed (loud cheers)! Sir, I am not conscious of having omitted any opportunity of providing that relief which I thought the natural and efficacious relief (loud cheers). Circumstances may have opposed obstacles in the way of the fulfilment of my own desire; but that the hon. gentleman can have any right to rouse the indignation of Irish members against me, individually, for interposing delay, is what I could hardly have expected to hear from any member in this house (cheers). Sir, I am exceedingly unwilling, in the present stage of this protracted debate, to trouble the house with any matters partaking at all of a personal nature. If I were a private individual, I would pass by all the accusations that have been preferred against me. I am so conscious of having acted throughout from pure and honourable motives (loud cheers from the Opposition benches)—I am so supported by the conviction that I have abandoned no duty and betrayed no trust—(continued cheers from the same quarter, followed by ironical shouts from the protection benches). Well, if it is your impression that I have (turning to the protectionists), at least, after the accusations that have been preferred, you will concede to me the privilege of defence, and listen with patience to the answer

I have to make to them (loud cheers). Observe, throughout these debates I have not quarrelled with any one for offering his decided opposition to the opinions I now profess. I have respected in others the maintenance of their former opinions. I knew not by whom the measures I proposed would be supported on this side of the house. I can say, with truth, I tried to influence no one. I have listened to the attacks made on me with sorrow, but not with anger. I think it natural that hon. gentlemen should retain their former opinions; if they do not respect in me that privilege which I concede to them, at any rate, I entreat them, from a sense of justice, to hear with patience my defence against the attacks which have been made against me (loud cheers). As I said before, if I were a mere private individual, strong in the conviction that I have acted from nothing but a sense of duty, and from pure and honourable motives, I would have let those accusations pass by; but I am not in the situation of a private individual, and it is right that, as a minister of the crown, I should vindicate the course taken, as a minister, from the charges which from time to time have been brought against it. Sir, I know it is not regular to refer to former debates, and I will not make express reference to them; but I am sure the house will permit me to refer in general to questions that have been put to me, and charges that have been made, since I had the opportunity of last addressing them on this question. It was said in the course of the last debate that I had expressed an opinion that the charge of this measure for the adjustment of the Corn Law would have been committed with much greater propriety to other hands than to mine, and yet it was observed that I had proposed to the cabinet to undertake the conduct of this measure, and that if the cabinet had been unanimous the conduct of it would have been committed to my hand—that there was an apparent inconsistency between the opinion that it would have been better to commit it to other hands and my undertaking, had the cabinet concurred with me, to make the permanent adjustment of this question a consequence of the suspension of the law. Sir, the facts are correctly stated. I did give an opinion that it would have been infinitely better, under all ordinary circumstances, that others more entitled to the credit of the success of this measure should have had the conduct of it; and yet it is perfectly true, that in the Cabinet I did propose, if the Cabinet had concurred with me, to undertake the proposition of this measure to Parliament. I did so under these circumstances:—On the 1st of November, in concurrence with my right hon. friends the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Secretary at War, I proposed, on account of the reports from Ireland, to take the precaution against impending danger which I thought was the natural precaution, namely, the suspension, either by order in Council or by Act of Parliament, of those laws which prohibited the import of foreign grain. I renewed that proposition towards the close of the same month. I believe if the measure proposed to the Cabinet had been simply a suspension of the law, with a guarantee that the existing scale of duties should revive, I do not believe that there would have been any serious difference of opinion in the Cabinet—at least I am not certain there would. I think there might have been a difference of opinion as to the extent of the danger in Ireland; but I think it possible that if the measure proposed had been merely suspension with a guarantee on my part that I would at the termination of the suspension propose the continuance of the existing law, I am not sure there would have been any difference of opinion. But I did distinctly refuse, and I admit it here, I did distinctly refuse to undertake to guarantee the revival of the existing law at the termination of the suspension, and I did it on grounds which I will now state. As I said before, I thought suspension was a becoming and necessary measure. The right hon. gentleman the member for the University of Dublin says we were deluded by accounts from Ireland, and yet he admits that he himself was alarmed by the accounts in October, and the prevailing feeling in Ireland was that of alarm, representations having been made by bodies connected with the agricultural interests of that country setting forth the danger. It is very easy for individuals to neglect those reports; but what is a Government to do that is responsible for the well being of the country—deeply responsible, if famine and disease should come and no precautions taken—what is a Government to do receiving such reports from all quarters, from the highest authorities, from private individuals, from parties the most disinterested? The alarm may be unfounded—precautions may be superfluous; but do you think that when there is good ground for expecting general and wide spread famine, Government ought to neglect to take precautions under such a state of affairs? I, for one, would not undertake the responsibility of Government if I thought I was compelled to neglect the precautions which such a state of things required. The right hon. gentleman says we were deluded. I deny the fact altogether. I have the firmest conviction now that the impressions under which I acted in November will all be realised; but suppose we are deceived,—why, are we to sit calculating in Cabinet how much of diarrhoea, and dysentery, and bloody flux, a whole people can bear without making it necessary to provide a remedy (loud cheers)? The precaution may be superfluous; but what is the danger, should the precaution be required (hear, hear)? Is it not better to err on the side of precaution (hear, hear) than on the side of the neglect of it? I say now, that with the reports that were received by the Government, we should not, in my opinion, have been justified in neglecting that precaution, and therefore I advised it (hear, hear, hear). Of course, the question arose, what will you do when the period of suspension shall have terminated? And it was a most important question; it was, will you, on that termination, undertake to guarantee the revival of the old law? I said at once I could not, and for many reasons. In the first place, in the last session of Parliament, I expressed a decided opinion that you could not long continue to apply different principles with respect to protection to agriculture from those you had applied to other interests. I am told that I surprised every one with the present measures (hear, hear). I say that in the last session of Parliament, I spoke in the debate on the resolutions of the hon. member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers). I opposed those resolutions, but I stated that I could not defend the existing law upon many of those grounds on which it had been defended; I could not say that I thought the rate of wages had varied with the price of corn; I could not defend the existing law on the ground that we ought to be independent of foreign supply. I stated expressly then, that in my opinion the same principles which governed your ordinary commercial policy must be applied at no remote period to agriculture. I was followed by the noble lord then the member for Sunderland, the present Earl Grey, and he stated expressly that I had made no objection to the first two resolutions; but I will quote his own words. "The noble lord said, 'There was not a word in the speech of the right hon. baronet contrary to the two first resolutions, and had the last resolution been worded to the effect that it was expedient all restrictions on the importation of corn should be gradually abolished, the right hon. baronet's speech would have been an unanswerable one in support of the motion." That was the statement of Lord Howick; but what was the resolution of the Protection Society in the month of December last? Was the declaration of opinion on my part so sudden and unexpected? I find the Protection Society in December last coming to this resolution, which was embodied, I think, in a petition:—"That in consequence of the declarations made by several of the leading members of her Majesty's Government in the last session of Parliament, indicating that further reductions will be made at no distant period in the already greatly diminished amount of protection to agriculture, and in consequence of the interpretation put upon those declarations, an impression has been created, whether well or ill founded, calculated to destroy all confidence in the stability or existence of the present Corn Law, and to arrest the progress now making in the permanent improvement of the inferior soils of the country. That was the resolution of the Protection Society before they were aware of the measures of her Majesty's Government. (Mr. Hudson here was heard to make some observation, which was followed by loud cries of "Order.") The hon. member for Sunderland will have an opportunity of speaking during the debate, and I hope he will abstain from interrupting me (loud cheers). I repeat therefore that when the question was put, whether I would undertake to guarantee the revival of the existing law on the termination of the temporary suspension, I distinctly said I could give no such guarantee. The revival of the existing law on the termination of the suspension must have implied the permanent continuance of that law; it must have aroused every energy in defence of it. Lords, Commons, and constituencies must have united for the permanent continuance of the existing law. It was impossible that I could have been a party to any such attempt (loud cheers). Another ground on which I declined to guarantee the revival of the existing law was this: I thought the very fact of the suspension of the existing law would make it almost impossible to induce Parliament to consent to the revival of it. The law had worked tolerably well during the three preceding years, but in the first period of pressure it is suspended; on the proposal being made to revive it, the suspension would operate as an impeachment of the adequacy of the law itself on similar emergencies (hear, hear). It has been justly said, that when the noble lord (Lord John Russell), seeing the difficulty there might be in maintaining a fixed duty in the event of scarcity, proposed to lower it, or to give the Crown the power of suspending it by an Order in Council, I made a decided objection to concur in such a vote; I said it would be futile, because the Crown having once exercised the power of suspending the fixed duty on the importation of food, I felt assured in the present state of public opinion on the subject of the Corn Laws, it would be most difficult under any circumstances again to impose that duty (hear, hear). In this case the difficulty would have been exactly the same, or only with this difference—that the fixed duty being much lower, the impeachment of that duty would not have been so great (hear, hear). In this case the proposal would have been, the sliding scale having failed on its first exposure to a severe trial, after its suspension, to have re-enacted the principle in all its details. I do not believe that this proposition could have been maintained (hear, hear). And at what period was this revival of the existing law to have taken place? The duty might have been suspended till September next; in the month of July, a month before Parliament separates, what would have been the state of the house when the question would have been asked, whether the suspension should continue, or the old law be revived? Suppose there should be apprehensions which I have entertained, and do still entertain, that this potato disease is not a mere temporary calamity; suppose we have good, if not certain grounds, suppose we have probable grounds for believing that the potato crop of next year will be affected; supposing there was, as there will be, disease in Ireland in July next in consequence of this disease, could the proposal under such circumstances be made in July next that the old law should be revived (hear, hear)? And suppose you have such a July next year as you had last; suppose you have continued rains, a cold unfavourable season, such a July as you had last year, one that made "the boldest hold his breath for a time" (hear, hear), could you, under such circumstances, guarantee the revival of the old law (hear, hear)? Sir, I am not insensible to the progress of public opinion (loud cheers). I do not say you ought to yield to that public opinion if it is against your own convictions; but I say that that man is utterly unworthy of holding office who would disregard the progress of public opinion, in considering the question whether or not the existing duties should be continued after such a suspension of them, or who, upon such a question as the Corn Laws, thinks that the state of public opinion can be utterly disregarded (hear). It has been stated that the Corn Laws were suspended in 1765, and again in 1793, and that they were afterwards re-enacted, and that the precedents are all in favour of their re-enactment. But can any man be so blind to the progress of public opinion on the subject of the Corn Laws since 1765 as to suppose that we can exactly apply that precedent, as to suppose that because the Legislature could re-enact the Corn Laws after a suspension in 1765, therefore we can do so now (cheers)? If you were to act upon that principle, if you were to rigidly apply such Parliamentary precedents without reference to the state of public opinion, you would involve this country in the course of a month in inextricable confusion (hear, hear). I am unwilling to make any statement now; but as I foresaw, when this proposition was made, it would break up the Government, and as I have the permission of her Majesty to give any explanation with respect to the causes which led to that dissolution of the Government, I will, rather than enter into any statement, read to the house the declaration I made of the ground on which I acted, and which, as I foresaw it would be of great importance, I made at the time in writing; that statement of my opinions I will now read. This was on the 26th of November, after the Government had instituted an inquiry into the apprehended scarcity, and taken precautions against the spread of fever that might be the consequence of that scarcity; in the instructions then issued, my right hon. friends cordially concurred. But I foresaw that the issue of those instructions would compel a suspension of the law restricting the importation of food. This is the very point: did I undertake after that suspension to propose to Parliament the adjustment of the Corn Laws? I did, and under these circumstances: I could not propose the revival of the existing law, and I thought some slight alteration, some new sliding scale with small modifications of the old one, would be utterly unavailing. I believe that the adjustment of the Corn Laws was the legiti-mate consequence of the suspension of it, and I did undertake to do that which, under ordinary circumstances, I thought might be better done by others; I did undertake to meet the existing emergency, and to become responsible for all the consequences of the suspension; and I read this statement to my colleagues previous to the dissolution of the Cabinet:

"I cannot consent to the issue of these instructions, and undertake at the same time to maintain the existing Corn Law. Slight modifications of the existing law, as the consequence of these instructions, or immediately following them, would in my opinion answer no good end. The proposal of them would add to the difficulty of defending that portion of the Corn Law which it was sought to maintain. I think we ought to suspend the operation of the existing law for a limited period. There is conflicting evidence as to the degree of pressure from the scarcity of food, but there is that probability of severe pressure a few months hence that would in my opinion amply justify the precautionary measure of unrestricted import. We have written authority which would justify it; written authority which, should the anticipations of those from whom we receive it prove correct, would impose on us a heavy responsibility for having neglected a precaution which has been taken in former periods of scarcity in this country, and by some countries in Europe within the last few weeks. But, independently of these considerations, the issue of these instructions fully justifies, if it does not require, the temporary removal of impediments to the free import of corn. They contain a proof not only that the crisis is great—not only that there is the probability of severe suffering from the scarcity of food, but the proof that we are ourselves convinced of it. It appears to me that the suspension of the Corn Law would be the course most consistent with these instructions. I will not refer to the preceding discussions in the Cabinet, but the issue of these instructions placing on record our deliberate conviction as to the possible extent of the evil with which we may have to contend, is a new event. By acting now, the lapse of time since we last met in Cabinet would be accounted for. I am prepared for one, to take the responsibility of suspending the law by an Order in Council, or of calling Parliament at a very early period, and advising in the speech from the throne the suspension of the law. I conceal from myself none of the difficulties that attend a suspension of the law. Suspension of the law will compel a very early decision on the course to be pursued in anticipation of the period when the suspension would expire. Suspension will compel a deliberate review of the whole question of agricultural protection. I firmly believe that it would be better for the country that that review should be undertaken by others. Under ordinary circumstances I should advise that it should be so undertaken, but I look now to the immediate emergency, and to the duties it imposes on a Minister. I am ready to take the responsibility of meeting that emergency, if the opinions of my colleagues as to the extent of the evil and the nature of the remedy concur with mine."

(Cheers). I therefore thought that the adjustment of the Corn Laws was the natural consequence of the suspension; I felt that it would be inconsistent with my duty to suspend the law and then run away, leaving others to deal with the consequences of that step (cheers); and I was prepared, seeing the natural and legitimate consequence, notwithstanding my declaration that under ordinary circumstances it would have been better for others to have undertaken it, to undertake the responsibility of that adjournment myself. If there be any inconsistency, therefore, in the declaration of opinion as to the course which I should have thought it best to pursue under ordinary circumstances, and the course which I was ready to pursue in order to meet the great and pressing difficulty, I forbear from saying more on that inconsistency, but I confess I think the course I took was the natural and fitting course for a Minister to take (cheers). Well, I was in a minority in the Cabinet; I despaired of success; and therefore the Cabinet was dissolved (hear). My honourable friend the member for Dorset blamed me very much for addressing a letter to her Majesty, after resigning, stating the course I intended to pursue on the appointment of another Government. He says that was a most unconstitutional and a most unusual act. Unusual I admit it to be, but the circumstances were altogether unusual (hear, hear). Unconstitutional I cannot admit it to be (hear, hear). That a Privy Councillor should state to his Sovereign what course under very peculiar circumstances he was prepared to pursue I cannot admit to be unconstitutional. A peer has a right to seek an audience of her Majesty, and tender his advice; a Privy Councillor has a right to do so also. True, my official relation to her Majesty had terminated; I was no longer a Minister; but being a Privy Councillor I conceive I had a perfect right to intimate to her Majesty—I did it with a view of preventing embarrassment—having advised certain measures, having been prepared to propose them as a Minister, I had a right to state what those measures were, and that, as a private member of Parliament, I would give to them a cordial support (hear, hear). And what were the circumstances under which that assurance was conveyed? My hon. friend says that I prevented the formation of a Conservative Government—of a protection Government, I mean. I did no such thing. [Mr. G. Banks.—"What I said was, that you prevented a dissolution of Parliament."] The circumstances under which I wrote that letter, which my hon. friend complains of as unconstitutional, were these—(Mr. G. Banks.—"I beg pardon, I did not say unconstitutional.") Oh, then, the whole matter falls to the ground, (A laugh.) [Mr. G. Banks.—"I said it was unprecedented and dangerous as an example."] Well, that is very like unconstitutional (hear, hear, and a laugh). An hon. member, I think, told the house that he did not say "gross exaggeration" but "great exaggeration" (laughter), and now my hon. friend tells us, that he did not say "unconstitutional," but "unprecedented and dangerous." Unprecedented! and were not the circumstances unprecedented (hear, hear)? I felt it my duty—my right hon. friends around me took the same view, and felt it their duty—to quit her Majesty's service; it was distinctly intimated to me that those of my colleagues who differed from me were not prepared to form a Government themselves, nor yet to advise the formation of a Government upon the principle of protection; the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) and Lord Lansdowne declined to undertake the Government, until they had an assurance that others, who must be presumed to have a majority, were not ready to undertake the Government. Her Majesty sent for the noble lord opposite; the noble lord was in a minority of 90, and it was proposed by her Majesty to him that he should undertake the formation of a Government;—the circumstances were unusual; but I ask any man to judge whether, under such circumstances, the course which I took in giving an assurance to her Majesty that the measures on the subject of the Corn Law which I was willing to propose as a Minister, I would cordially support as a private member of Parliament, was either justly blameable or dangerous to the State (loud cheers). Of course the noble lord was entitled to ask, "What are my prospects, I do not say of carrying on the Government permanently, but of adjusting the Corn Law? Nothing could induce me to undertake it excepting the prospect of success; what is the support I may expect?" I anticipated any such question, by enabling her Majesty to inform the noble lord of the course I had myself taken; and as others were not prepared to form a Government, I felt it my duty to intimate to her Majesty that I would cordially support the measures I had advised in office. If it is unprecedented, it is because the circumstances are unprecedented; but I see nothing in it either blameable or dangerous in the slightest degree as an example (hear, hear). But my hon. friend says, he did not object to it as impeding the formation of a protection Government, but as preventing a dissolution; and my hon. friend, and others have blamed me for not advising a dissolution of Parliament. In my opinion it would have been utterly inconsistent with the duty of a Minister to advise a dissolution of Parliament under the particular circumstances in which this question of the Corn Law was placed. Why should it be so utterly impossible for this Parliament to deal with the present proposition? After its election in 1841, this Parliament passed the existing Corn Law, which diminished protection; this Parliament passed the tariff, destroying altogether the system of prohibition with respect to food; this Parliament passed the Canada Corn Bill; why should it exceed the functions of this Parliament to entertain the present proposition (cheers)? But, upon much higher ground, I would not consent to a dissolution. That indeed, I think, would have been a dangerous precedent (hear, hear, hear), for a Minister to admit that the existing legislature was incompetent to the entertainment of any question; that is a precedent which I would not establish (loud cries of "hear, hear"). Whatever may have been the circumstances that may have taken place at an election, I never would sanction the view that any House of Commons is incompetent to entertain a measure which is necessary for the well-being of the community (hear, hear). If you were to admit that doctrine you would shake the foundations on which many of the best laws are placed (hear, hear). Why, that doctrine was propounded at the time of the union between England and Ireland, as it had previously been at the time of the union between England and Scotland; it was maintained in Ireland very vehemently, but it was not maintained in this country by Mr. Fox. It was slightly adverted to by Mr. Sheridan at the time when the message with regard to the union was delivered. Parliament had been elected without the slightest reason to believe it would resolve that its functions were to be fused and mixed with those of another legislature, namely, the Irish Parliament; and Mr. Sheridan slightly hinted it, as an objection to the competency of Parliament. Mr. Pitt met that objection, at the outset, in the following manner. Mr. Pitt said:

"The first objection is, what I heard alluded to by the hon. gentleman opposite to me, when his Majesty's message was brought down; namely, that the Parliament of Ireland is incompetent to entertain and discuss the question, or rather, to act upon the measure proposed without having previously obtained the consent of the people of Ireland, their constituents. This point, Sir, is of so much importance that I think I ought not to suffer the opportunity to pass without illustrating more fully what I mean. If this principle of the incompetency of Parliament to the decision of the measure be admitted, or if it be contended that Parliament has no legitimate authority to discuss and decide upon it, you will be driven to the necessity of recognising a principle the most dangerous that ever was adopted in any civilised state—I mean the principle that Parliament cannot adopt any measure new in its nature, and of great importance, without appealing to the constituent and delegating authority for directions. If that doctrine be true, look to what an extent it will carry you. If such an argument could be set up and maintained, you acted without any legitimate authority when you created the representation of the Principality of Wales, or of either of the counties palatine of England. Every law that Parliament ever made, without that appeal, either as to its own frame and constitution, as to the qualification of the electors or the elected, as to the great and fundamental point of the succession to the crown, was a breach of treaty and an act of usurpation."

Then, Mr. Pitt asked, if they turned to Ireland herself, what would they say to the Protestant Parliament that destroyed the exclusive Protestant franchise, and admitted the Roman Catholics to vote, without any fresh appeal? He went on:

"What must be said by those who have at any time been friends to any plan of Parliamentary reform, and particularly as have been most recently brought forward, either in Great Britain or Ireland? Whatever may have been thought of the propriety of the measure, I never heard any doubt of the competency of Parliament to consider and discuss it. Yet I defy any man to maintain the principle of those plans, without contending that, as a member of Parliament, he possesses a right to concur in disfranchising those who sent him to Parliament, and to select others, by whom he was not elected, in their stead. I am sure that no sufficient distinction, in point of principle, can be successfully maintained for a single moment; nor should I deem it necessary to dwell on this point in the manner that I do were I not convinced that it is connected in part with all those false and dangerous notions on the subject of government which have lately become too prevalent in the world."

Mr. Pitt contended, therefore, that Parliament had a right to alter the succession to the throne, to incorporate with itself another Legislature, to disfranchise its constituents, or associate others with them. Why, is it possible for a Minister now to advise the Crown to dissolve Parliament, on the ground that it is incompetent to entertain the question, what this country shall do with the Corn Law (hear, hear)? There could not be a more dangerous example, a more purely democratical precedent, if I may so say, than that this Parliament should be dissolved on the ground of its incompetency to decide upon any question of this nature. I am open to the charge, therefore, if it be one, that I did advise her Majesty to permit this measure to be brought forward in the present Parliament (hear). Now I am not aware of any other matter of mere personal character brought forward against me; there is no one part of my personal conduct, of which I am not ready to give a full explanation (cheers); if I have omitted any, it has been unintentionally, and if any honourable member has any question to put to me, I will answer it (renewed cheers). Then I come to the question itself—Is it for the public interest—is it advisable, that, under the present circumstances of this country, in the present state of public opinion, we should now either refuse to modify the law, in order to meet the case of Irish distress, or that, having modified it, we should have a new Corn Law, or that we should try to adjust permanently this question? The hon. gentleman who spoke last says, "You might have dealt with maize and nothing else; maize is the food the Irish people require, and why not admit maize and nothing else?" Why, if you want to undermine this Corn Law effectually, it will be done by taking such a course as that—by holding out to a people suffering under severe privation that maize is food good enough for them, and that the law as to maize shall be altered; but that as to wheat, barley, and oats, you will not permit a letter of the law to be touched (hear, hear). If you were to venture to make such an experiment upon public opinion, you would rouse a storm of indignation against the law you attempted to maintain such as would make it impossible to maintain it (cheers). And what is it you would do with respect to maize? There is a duty of 8s. on it now. Our doctrine is, that the Government cannot support the people of Ireland; that we can do nothing without earnest local exertions; we all say that those local exertions ought to be made, that the duties of charity are imperative though they cannot be legally enforced, that it is the duty of the landlords of Ireland, and of all classes possessing property, to co-operate with us in mitigating the evils of this great calamity. It is all very well for us to pay the duty upon maize or oats, paying with one hand and taking with the other, as we distribute it to the people; but what are we to say to those whom we are inciting to acts of charity? Are we to say to them, that potatoes are failing, and other food must be supplied, but that they shall pay an 8s. duty upon maize, and an 18s. upon wheat, and there shall be no relaxation of that law? Say what you will about this Irish distress, mitigate it as much as you please—do you think it would be possible (even with the extent to which you cannot deny that it exists), to vote half a million of money from the English treasury for the support of the Irish people, and to incite Irish proprietors to acts of charity, and to the purchase of food for the support of the famishing people, and yet, in the face of every country in Europe that is at this moment threatened with scarcity, Holland and Belgium, the Russian provinces, and within these four or five days the whole kingdom of Bavaria, and after they have adopted that which the heart of every man tells him is the natural precaution to take, namely, the removal of impediments to the free import of food; yet you say that you will make no relaxation whatever in the existing Corn Laws (cheers)? I believe that would be hardly possible. The right hon. gentleman, the member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Shaw), says he cannot deny that there does exist a great scarcity in Ireland. I took down his words. What said he? He said, "I cannot deny that there is a great scarcity, and also that there is great danger of disease; but these are common things in Ireland,—this is the normal state of Ireland" (hear, hear). "A large portion of the Irish people," said he, "are always living on the verge of destitution. There has been no year in my recollection when the same statement as to disease might not be made" (hear, hear). Well, be it so; that, you will say, goes some way to nullify the argument in favour of the present proposition. But, in the face of that declaration, will you tell me that this is a labourer's question? Will you say that the maintenance of protection is for the benefit of the Irish agricultural labourer, if protection has brought him to this (hear, hear)? In that part of the United Kingdom which is almost exclusively agricultural, which may be said to depend on agriculture, has protection brought you to this—that, speaking of the agricultural labourers, a large portion of the Irish people are "always living on the verge of destitution"? Is it true, "that there has been no year within your recollection when the same statement might not have been made"? Well, be it as you say. Admit that this is the permanent, the usual state of Ireland,—does that afford any strong argument for the maintenance of the existing Corn Laws (cheers)? But you will answer, if that has been the permanent state of Ireland, why did not you introduce this measure before (hear)? Surely, however, that is no reason against our doing it now (cheers). You are so pressed by the force of the argument, that the only answer you can make is, "Why did you not do it before?" Well, no doubt we might have done it before. Perhaps we have neglected at former periods our duty; but is that any reason why we should neglect it at present? If you have a potato-fed people, and consequently many millions depending on the supply of an article of food like the potato, subject to such diminution of quantity and deterioration of quality as we have been visited with in this year,—if that be the permanent state of Ireland, does it not afford a paramount reason for attempting to effect some permanent change, and not merely supplying a temporary remedy (cheers and cries of "hear")? I think to do nothing would be impossible (hear, hear). To modify the existing law—to propose as a permanent system such a change in the law as that proposed by the honourable member for Southampton—a sliding scale for three years and then a fixed duty—such a change as that would only encourage agitation on the one hand, while by the agricultural body it would be rejected with scorn—laughed at—scouted. Such an arrangement would effect no good, produce no benefit. Then what is left? Is there any alternative but trying to lay the foundation for an ultimate adjustment by repealing those laws (hear, hear)? My firm conviction is, that it is for the interest of all, of the agricultural interest in particular, that this in the present state of affairs is the safest course (hear, hear). The hon. member for Newark asked me repeatedly whether I meant to ruin the agricultural interest? Sir, I attach the utmost importance to the prosperity of the agricultural interest (a general cry of "oh!" and ironical cheers for the protection benches). Why, I don't know for what reason I have not as much right to feel an interest in the prosperity of agriculture as any of those who received that sentiment with scorn (hear, hear). Why, what possible interest can I have to injure that interest (loud cheers)? I attach the utmost importance to it. I think, for great political reasons, it is of the utmost importance that the agricultural interest should have great weight and authority in the government of this country. I think, with Burke, that land is the safest basis of political power in this country. He says, "All the writers," and he quotes Aristotle as speaking of the Grecian States, and Cicero as speaking of Rome, "all the writers on politics have attached the utmost importance to land, and have declared that it is the safest basis of a sound and permanent Government." I concur in that opinion, and deeply should I deplore the day when the landed interest of this country would be excluded from its full share in the councils and the legislation of this country. But Burke adds, with equal truth, that fortunately for this country, land has directed its councils, the reason being that the landed aristocracy and landed proprietors have never been as a class dissociated from the general interest, but subjecting themselves to the influence and the progress of public opinion, and proving their unity of interest with all (loud cheering). Why, that is just the question. By what means shall we secure the continuance in their just influence of the landed interest in this country? Is it by maintaining your privileges on the ground of the exclusion of food (a cry of "Oh!" from the protection benches, answered by cheers from the Opposition)? Well, then, on the ground of taxation on the importation of foreign corn (hear, hear). I will call it by which name you wish; it is not, certainly, the "exclusion" of food (hear, hear). But the question is, will it more conduce to the permanent, just, and legitimate influence of the land in this country than these Corn Laws should at length be repealed, or that they should be continued in all their integrity (hear, hear)? Now, my firm conviction—accuse me of treachery if you please—is, that you will fortify and maintain the influence of the land by this arrangement, rather than, in the present state of public feeling, by insisting on maintaining the present laws (cheers). Look, by way of instance at the tax on butter. That, at any rate, is not a tax of 100 or 500 years' standing. The taxes on butter and cheese were introduced within the last 20 or 30 years. Why should the removal of those taxes be construed into any assault on the privileges of the landed interest (hear, hear). Let us consider the bearing of this question of the Corn Laws on the great interest of this country, upon the land and the landed aristocracy, the legitimate influence of which I hope to see maintained for ever. We have to deal with a population which by the last census, that of 1841, consisted of about 10,000,000 of people. I am excluding Ireland, though, if I took in the population of Ireland, it would greatly fortify the argument. Our population, now increased to more than 20,000,000, was in 1841 19,000,000. Now, how is that population divided? You have of the agricultural interest about 1,500,000 persons, not including women and children. You have of landed proprietors, of farmers and occupiers, and male and female labourers above and under 20 employed in agriculture, about 1,500,000. You have of labourers employed in other occupations 761,000, including all those classes of labourers, the miners and quarriers, and so on. Then you have of persons engaged in commerce, trade, and manufactures, 3,110,000; 200,000 belonging to professions, or educated persons following miscellaneous pursuits; 511,000 returned as independent persons, living on their own property; and 200,000 paupers, lunatics, and so on. Well, now, what a large proportion of that great mass of population of 19,000,000 consists of persons who earn their subsistence by the land. Of those, what an enormous proportion there must be of persons whose families subsist on wages below 30s. a-week! Now, just consider how taxation, apart from food, bears on that class of the people (hear, hear). You raise about 32,000,000*l.* by the Customs and Excise. Let us take the articles which enter into the consumption of a family living on less than 30s. a-week. I have returns here of the articles in weekly use by families of that class. What are they? They are, butter, cheese, a little meat, bacon, lard, candles, soap, and a little tobacco. Now, it cannot be denied that there is scarcely one of these articles that is not taxed. It is, in my opinion, inevitable that you should raise a great portion of your taxes by indirect taxation, and whilst you do that the burden must be unequal (hear, hear). It is my belief that you have established a great claim upon the confidence and the gratitude of this country by the course you took some time since as respects the public burdens. You did take on yourselves the annual contribution of 5,000,000*l.* by means of the income-tax, that you might relieve the labouring classes (hear, hear). Now, in order that I may be perfectly accurate, I have here an account of the consumption of a labourer receiving 10s. a-week in the summer and 9s. a-week in the winter. It is an actual return of the consumption of this man and his family—he had a wife and one child. It appears that he bought four gallons of bread, a pound and a-half of cheese, some bacon, some salt beef, some butter, some tea, some sugar, some, candles, some soap. Now, with the exception of candles, the duty on which we removed recently, every one of those articles is subject to taxation (hear, hear, hear). By the present tariff we have removed the duty on bacon and on salt beef, and we have diminished the duties on butter and cheese. I ask you, can you repent of having made these alterations (cheers)? The man of whom I am speaking died; he left a widow, and the child survived. The widow earned 4s. 6d. a-week, and the guardians allowed 1s. 6d. a-week for the child. Now, this was her weekly expenditure.—She paid for rent 1s. 6d. a-week; candles and soap, 4s. 4d.; butter, 2s. 4d.; tea, 1s. 4d.; sugar, 2s. 4d.; leaving 1s. 8d. for firing, shoes, &c., which it will be admitted it must be very difficult to buy out of such a sum. Even here we see the pressure of taxation on this woman. Soap is taxed, butter is taxed, tea is taxed, sugar is taxed (hear, hear). Now, I will also take the weekly expenditure of a person spending more wages,—of a Yorkshireman,—living more comfortably, and spending more money. These from which I am quoting are bona fide instances of expenditure. This man earned 15s. or 16s. a-week, of which he spent 14s., and it was thus applied:—Meat, 2s.; sugar, 7d.; yeast, 3d.; candles, 3s. 4d.; butter, 8d.; soap, 3d.; tea and coffee 1s. 6d.; oatmeal, 7s. 4d. These items of expenditure amount together to 6s. 1d. per week. And in wheat the weekly expenditure was 8s. out of the 14s. Every week he has to buy 3 stone of flour, which would cost of late years 2s. 8d. per stone, making the weekly expenditure in flour 8s. The remainder, therefore, is 6s., for we find that, in the class of which I speak, where wheat is the chief food, by far the greater portion of the weekly expenditure is in the purchase of wheat alone. There will be something in tea, something in oatmeal, something in tobacco; but always more than one-half is in flour. Well, then, supposing the effect of this law is to cause some reduction in the price of wheat, pray let us ask ourselves this question:—supposing that such is the effect, are you not thus materially adding to the comforts and to the enjoyments of millions of your fellow-subjects (cheers)? Let me assure you that this is by far the most important part of the question (cheers). It is impossible to deny—you know that I gave you credit for it—the real sympathy which you have for the interest and the condition of the working classes of this country. Yes, I don't agree at all with those who make imputations against you—against your humanity; and I do believe, that among the gentlemen of England there is sincere sympathy with the suffering of the poor, and much of an honest desire to make better the condition of the working classes. I would almost say that there is more than among any other class (cheers). And I do ask you to follow me in this calculation, and to consider this question in the light in which I have put it. You cannot increase direct taxation with any very great effect. I believe you would if you could (hear, hear). You raise 7,000,000*l.* on stamps, 5,000,000*l.* on the property tax; you raise 4,000,000*l.* from the assessed taxes, and there are limits to raising more. If you add to the Income-tax, you are not benefiting the poor (hear, hear). You may easily increase the taxation on capital, but in thus burdening the rich, may you not be injuring the poor more than by indirect taxation (hear, hear). Adam Smith says, "The first maxim with respect to taxation is, that every man contributes to the taxation of the state in proportion to the revenue which he enjoys under the protection of the state." Can we now say that we are able to act on that principle? I doubt it. I doubt whether, in that case, taxation as we have does not fall heavier on the poor than it does upon us—the richer men (hear, hear); and it is because they have not the same means of avoiding it; they cannot leave the country, as we can. They cannot resort to a country where the rate of taxation is less. They are fixed to the soil, to the labour from which they can alone derive subsistence; and, therefore, I say the burden of such a taxation does fall more heavily upon them than upon us (hear). If you increase your assessed taxes, or your stamp duties, or your income-tax, it by no means follows that you are thereby doing a benefit to the poor; and, therefore, indirect taxation, in reference to these circumstances is more advantageous than direct taxation. But, then, look how many of the articles which enter into weekly subsistence are already highly taxed. And then comes the question of rent. It consists of more than one-fourth of the whole; and, certainly, when you say that there will be a reduction in rents—and the danger is, there will be also some reduction in the prices of wheat—you do not express a very extended sympathy with those with whom corn is an article of such primary importance. The noble lord the member for Lynn (Lord George Bentinck) would have me say what was my calculation with respect to the future price of corn; I had repeatedly declined (hear, hear). I know not how it is possible for any human being to make a calculation of the probable price of corn hereafter (hear, hear). But the noble lord said, as you would not answer that question, there is another which you shall answer; and he said that in the year 1835 the price of wheat on the average for the year was 39s. a-quarter. I may have made a mistake in mentioning the year, but, of course, I meant the year in which the average was 39s.; that was in 1835. And the noble lord says that he insists on telling me what would have been the price at which corn could have been imported, supposing that there had been no duty, in the year 1835. I then said to the noble lord that I am not prepared to admit that in that case there would have been a reduction in the price of corn; I am not prepared to admit, as a necessary consequence, if there had been established for some time previously a Free Trade in corn, that there necessarily would have been in the year 1835 a lower price than 39s. That was my statement; and does the noble lord think it a monstrous one, because he has got a list of some quarters of corn which have been brought into this country at 39s. (hear, hear)?

Lord G. BENTINCK: They were returns which I read. Sir R. PEEL: I do not doubt the accuracy of them; but it is completely beside the question (hear, hear). It is no sort of proof whatever, because in the year 1835 you bought at Danzig certain quarters of corn at this price, that, therefore, had Free Trade existed, it could have been imported at less than 35s. (hear, hear). I will give the noble lord my reasons for maintaining my proposition, in opposition to his. I say there is no arguing, on this point, from the prices of corn upon the Continent in any given year when the markets of this country have not been freely opened (hear, hear). The noble lord relies on Parliamentary returns; I also rely on Parliamentary returns. You say that Mr. Jacobs, a man of great knowledge and of great experience with regard to the Corn Laws, was sent, in the year 1827, to the Continent to report upon the state of the foreign markets. You will find in Mr. Jacobs's report this principle laid down. He says, that in consequence of your excluding foreign corn by your high duties there was an accumulation in many ports (hear). He then goes on to say, "It is this accumulation, not the supply which would regularly reach us, were no prohibition in existence, that depresses the agricultural interests by the exaggerated representations of its amount when we have abundant harvests, and by the too rapid influx whenever the harvests here are deficient. I cannot think that in the year 1822 and 1823 wheat would have sunk so low as 38s. per quarter, if the ports had been opened to foreign grain, and the surplus of Continental Europe had been sent to this country each year as it arose. The penning up of wheat in countries of small extent soon creates a glut in such countries, although the quantity really accumulated there may be very minute, and such as if distributed here would produce no sensible decline in price. A few thousand quarters of wheat, for instance, in Holstein, Mecklenburgh, or Denmark, for which there was no foreign market, would reduce the price even below half the cost. Needy sellers must take what is offered, and reluctant buyers will offer a very low rate. A small sale fixes a price in such cases." Then the British consuls were required, in 1841, to state what quantity of grain of each kind could be exported to England from the countries in which they respectively resided, if the trade in corn were made constantly free at a moderate duty. What were the answers upon those returns? The general average was 40s. 6d. free on board; the general average of freight was 4s. 3d. At these four ports the average price, free on board, and the average freight per quarter, were as follows:

		Average price free on board.	Freight per quarter.
		s. d.	s. d. s.
Petersburgh	..	39 1	4 5 to 5
Dantzic	..	40 0	3 6 to 4
Stettin	..	40 0	4 0 to 5
Hamburg	..	35 to 40 0	2 6 to 5

Relying, then, on the opinion of Mr. Jacob, and on these returns, I again repeat I am not prepared to admit that with Free Trade in corn the price of wheat would be reduced below that of 39s., which was the price in 1835. In the year 1822, of which Mr. Jacob speaks, and in the year 1835, what were the facts? You had no foreign imports whatever (hear, hear). You completely excluded foreign corn. It was not foreign competition that depressed your prices; but, with full protection, you had in 1822 prices at 38s., and in 1835 at 39s. In 1822 you moved for a committee on agricultural distress. You stated that the agricultural interest was suffering so severely that it was necessary to inquire what remedies could be applied; and therefore observe the complete exclusion of foreign corn does not insure you either from depressions of prices, or from agricultural distress requiring Parliamentary inquiry. In 1835, also, there was no foreign competition; but the depression of price to 39s. was caused entirely by the abundance of your own harvest. In 1836, as in 1822, it being impossible in either case to allege that the competition of foreign corn had either produced depression or caused distress, a Parliamentary committee was appointed to consider what remedies could be devised. Looking at the population, looking at the taxes imposed on articles of daily consumption, considering what immense masses of people are dependent for the subsistence of their families on earnings amounting to less than 30s. a week, how great a part of their expenditure was on bread, and of what great importance the price of wheat was as regards their domestic economy, could you do anything more to benefit their social condition than to give them the assurance that they shall have provisions at a moderate price? There might be no great depression of price; but if Free Trade in corn give you a guarantee against such variations in price, that guarantee would be an inestimable advantage. Supposing the price of corn not depressed below 50s. or 54s., yet if you take a guarantee by extending the means of supply that the price will not rise above 70s. or 80s., you will confer an inestimable advantage upon the working classes (loud cheers). The honourable gentleman cannot surely share in the alarm which has been expressed on this point, because he has himself proved that a more extended supply of cotton and indigo tends to steadiness of price. Supposing, it is said, our supply of wheat should fail, and other countries should combine to refuse to supply us with food, what should we have to rely on? But other interests will arise, and if the new tariff and the new Corn Law should pass the legislature, I think it is impossible to apprehend that there would be a combination of foreign powers. I doubt the fact. Taking the whole of the measures together, I do not apprehend the existence of a scarcity from a combination of foreign nations. It is said that I have in view the interest of the manufacturing classes. I think you cannot deny that those who are connected with our commerce and manufactures, and who earn their subsistence by their daily labour, have a direct and immediate interest in a moderate price of corn. But the fair claim of the agricultural labourer I also admit. I say the farmers and agricultural labourers have an equal interest in this question with those engaged in commerce, and with the other classes of the community, and if we continued under a system of protection, could we expect a prosperous and contented class of agricultural labourers in this country? Can we say that throughout the country the condition of our agricultural labourers is such? ("Yes," from Colonel Sibthorp). I say "No." But it is said that the wages of the agricultural labourer vary with the price of food in the same way as those of the manufacturing labourer; I deny it altogether (hear, hear). In the case of the manufacturing labourer his wages are more likely to vary inversely with the price of food; and as to the agricultural labourer, there is no direct connection between his wages and the price of wheat. If it is not so, account for this:—If the wages of the agricultural labourer vary in a direct ratio with the price of wheat, why should wages be 13s. 10d. in Kent, and 13s. in Lincolnshire? In the purely agricultural district of Wilts wages are about 13s., I think; in Kent, the wages of the agricultural labourer are high—not less than 13s. Now come to districts purely agricultural, and the most removed from the influence of manufactures; take the counties of Somerset, of Wiltshire, of Cornwall; I say as you advance from these purely agricultural districts towards the manufacturing districts, you will find the price of agricultural labour increase (hear, hear). You will say that there is a sympathy between the agricultural and the manufacturing interests (hear, hear). In the south-west of England, which is purely agricultural, the wages of labour are extremely low; as you advance towards the midland counties,—in Nottinghamshire, for example, the wages are 14s. In Warwickshire, Staffordshire, Yorkshire, Lancashire, you will find they vary. What stronger proof can you have, that the prosperity of our manufactures not only create a demand for agricultural products, but seem to affect the wages of the agricultural labourer? But take the agricultural districts of Norfolk and Suffolk, and the south-west of England, and tell me whether there is any direct ratio between the price of wheat and wages. [An hon. member said "Lincolnshire."] There great skill is required; it is not naturally fertile, but brought into fertility by mere skill and capital, and skill and capital have had there the same effect as in the manufacturing districts; they have raised the price of agricultural labour. That is what I want to show. Two circumstances affect the wages of the agricultural labourer, skill and capital, as applied in Lincolnshire, and as they are applied in the manufacturing districts. [Colonel Sibthorp made some remark.] In Wilts, Devon, and Dorset, with a protection of 18s. a-quarter, corn does not vary, and yet the ratio of wages varies; and I think the gallant member, without much exertion of his logical faculties (a laugh), must see that there are other causes for the increase of the wages of labourers. But can you say that, in the purely agricultural districts, the condition of the labourer is as we would wish it to be? I appeal to you, and I feel confident that you will answer the appeal,—do you not admit that the social condition of millions, agricultural or manufacturing, is one of paramount consideration in the present state of the country (hear)? Have you read the sanitary reports? Are you not convinced that some efforts should be made to improve the social condition of the great mass of the population? Our first object should be their social improvement, and whatever efforts you may make by promoting increased cleanliness, by education, by providing comfortable cottages, the first attempt at social improvement should be by providing abundance of food (hear, hear). If there be either the suffering or the apprehension of scarcity, you cannot expect that people who have to bear that trial will come to be educated, or will improve their dwellings. The first decision you must come to is to increase the supply of food. The experience of the last three years and of the three preceding years do read a lesson to us, which we ought never to forget, as to the effects which are produced upon the social condition and the moral habits of the working classes, comparing years of abundance with years of scarcity. Now, in the purely agricultural districts, is it possible to say that the rate of wages bears any direct ratio to the price of wheat? ("It does," from Col. Sibthorp). I will demonstrate that it does not. I do not mean to say that there is not some variation; that where wheat is high, there is not an occasional increase of wages; but I will demonstrate to you that the rate of wages does not vary in any proportion to the variation in the price of food. Take all the counties. I will quote no figures which I shall not be ready to communicate to any gentleman connected with the county referred to. Now let us take the seven years from the year 1837 to the present time. I requested to have an account, drawn up from actual payments for particular farms, of the wages actually paid to agricultural labourers from 1837 to 1844 inclusive. I will begin with the prices of agricultural labour from 1837 to 1844 inclusive, at Sudbury Union in Gloucestershire. The labourers there received during that time money and also beer. Here I have the account of their wages for a summer week and a winter week during each of those years. Now, since 1837, the price of corn has varied very much. Even in the present year the price of wheat has varied from 45s. 1d. to 58s. 3d., and the variation in the prices since the year 1837 has been very considerable. The price of wheat in 1837 was 55s. 10d. a quarter; in 1838, it was 64s. 7d.; in 1839, 70s. 8d.; in 1840, 66s. 6d.; in 1841, 66s. 4d.; in 1842, 57s. 3d.; in 1843, 50s. 1d.; in 1844, 51s. 3d.; in 1845, 55s. 10d. (hear, hear). Therefore the price of wheat varied in this period from a minimum of 50s. 1d. to a maximum of 70s. 8d. Now I know that writers on political economy have said that the ultimate tendency of wages is to accommodate themselves to the price of food, but

I do not believe it (hear, hear). At any rate they only say the ultimate tendency, but I should like to know what consolation that is for a man who is passing 10 years of his life without any variation of his wages for the better, in proportion to the rise of the price of food, that the ultimate tendency of the two things is to approximate (hear, hear)? What consolation is it to find the price of corn 70s. 8d. in 1839, and 50s. 1d. in 1843, but that he must not despair; and that his wages will approximate in time to the price he pays for his food? What is the use of such a tendency to him? But I do not believe in the tendency even (hear, hear). I think the tendency is rather a tendency to substitute potatoes for wheat as the food of the working man (hear, hear). I am not trying to answer acrimony for acrimony, but to lay before you what I believe to be the real state of things in this country. In this view, what is the allotment system which we adopt, and many of us put in practice so benevolently? Taking individual cases it is, no doubt, productive of great advantage to the labourer. I believe every one of us is trying to introduce it so far as he has the means, and undoubtedly the system is a great comfort to the labourer—a comfort to him independently of other considerations, such as that it attaches him to the soil, it makes him a landed proprietor, it awakens him to the value of peace and social order. But what is it as a system? Is its effect to raise the price of wages? Is it not rather to substitute an Irish peasantry for the English labourer? To substitute potatoes as his food instead of wheaten bread? You will find it will be so—that potatoes are substituted for wheaten bread as that system increases, and that you will have here that great calamity which you have in Ireland, though in an ameliorated shape. I should think it a great calamity that potatoes should be substituted for wheat as the food of the labourers in this country; and I believe that to imbue the labouring population with a taste for better food would be to confer on them a much greater advantage (hear). I therefore think that the allotment system may be productive of evil effects if it increases too much. But, mark this, just in proportion to the depressed condition of the labourer is the sum he has to pay for wheat. The labourer who has an allotment has, as we know, so much the more to help out his wages with, and to pay for his wheat with. Allotments, therefore, have a tendency to benefit the labourer. I have only been speaking as to what is the ultimate effect that the system may have to substitute potatoes for wheat, as the food of the labouring classes. I have taken the variations in the price of wheat; I will now take the variations in the rate of labour for the same period as before, the last ten years, but I must remark that the tables I am about to cite do not show the whole amount of wages earned, for in harvest time some additions are usually made by the labourer to his earnings. These, however, are made every year, and therefore may be struck out of the table for the purpose of considering the variations in the rate. From the same union of Sudbury, in Gloucestershire, I have an account of the prices for winter and summer averages. In 1837 the average payment was 9s. in money and 1s. in beer per week. The total average of weekly wages for winter and summer, in 1837, was 10s.; in 1838, 11s.; in 1839, 11s.; in 1840, 11s.; in 1841, 11s.; in 1842, 11s.; in 1843, 10s.; in 1844, 10s. Therefore, while the price of wheat varied from 75s. to 51s. a quarter, the rate of wages varied only from 10s. to 11s. in this union. From Blandford, in Dorsetshire, we had this reply:—"The statement on the other side was given me by four different yeomen. It is only the first-rate labourer that gets 9s. in these parts, unless at piece work or extra times; and then if the extra hours were reckoned up which the men work at piece work, I do not think it would average more than 8s. to 9s. with the best men." Now, at that place the average wages were in 1837, 7s.; in 1838, 8s.; in 1839, 8s.; in 1840, 8s.; in 1841, 8s.; in 1842, 8s.; in 1843, 8s.; in 1844, 8s. Therefore, whilst the price of corn had varied from 70s. 8d. to 51s. 1d., it was 48s. 6d. in 1836; wages have only varied from 7s. to 8s. a week (hear, hear). There were extra earnings, such as piecework, harvesting, &c., as I am aware; but those, for the reason I have given, I do not reckon; they might probably amount to 1s. more each week. That is the statement of one of these yeomen near Blandford. Another farmer states that wages in 1837 were 7s.; in 1838, 7s.; in 1839, 8s.; in 1840, 8s.; in 1841, 8s.; in 1842, 8s.; in 1843, 8s.; in 1844, 8s.—a variation of only 1s. in the rate of wages, notwithstanding the great variation in the price of wheat during the same period. I will take the rate of wages again. In Cornwall, in the union of Bodmin, a person writes, "In reply to your letter of the 8th inst., I beg to state that the rate of wages in this union has not varied from 1837 to 1844. Labourers have been in the habit of receiving 8s. or 9s. per week during the whole of this period. Those who have had 9s. per week have been supplied with wheat by their employers at 8s. per imperial bushel, and barley at 4s.; whilst those who have received 8s. per week have had to pay 6s. 8d. for wheat, and 3s. 4d. for barley, whatever may have been the price of grain" (hear). Then from Barnstaple there is this communication:—"I have inquired of several farmers residing in various parts of this union the amount of agricultural wages during the years from 1837 to 1844 inclusive, and have ascertained that, in general, the sum paid was 8s. per week; some few farmers gave 9s.; but a much greater number only 7s. No rise or fall appears to have taken place during the eight years in question, except that in very dear seasons some employers supplied their labourers with corn at a reduced price; but I am inclined to think that they were not very numerous." I will now take East and West Suffolk; and first, East Suffolk. "The variation of wages in this neighbourhood has been from 8s. to 10s. a week from 1835 up to the present time; and within that period the price of flour has varied from 1s. 3d. to 2s. 10d. the stone of 14lbs." That is to say, the wages increased one-fifth, while the price of flour had more than doubled. The communication proceeded, "The supply of labour is greater than the demand in this neighbourhood; and the price of labour is, in fact, what the farmer chooses to give; but he invariably raises his wages and lowers them with the price of corn (cries of "hear"), though never in the same proportions. Consequently the poor are better off with low than with high prices. You will at once see that 8s. a-week with flour at 1s. 3d., is better than 10s. a-week with flour at 2s. 10d., supposing the man's family to require from two to three stone of flour weekly." Now that is the state of things in East Suffolk. Next I will give you West Suffolk. The writer says, "The general wages paid by the farmers of this parish have fluctuated from 9s. to 10s. per week, but the men employed at task work, such as threshing, &c., have earned from 1s. to 2s. per week in addition. This variation in the rate of wages has certainly been caused by the fluctuations in the price of corn, but when wheat was selling at 20s. per comb—a comb is half an imperial quarter—"I do not remember that wages were below 9s. per week, and when the farmers were realising 35s. per coveb, 10s. per week was generally the amount of wages given. The result of my experience is, therefore, to show that although wages fluctuate in a trifling degree, with the price of corn, yet they do not rise or fall in proportion to such price, and therefore, that the labourers are best off when the prices are lowest" (hear). There are occasionally extraordinary additions made to the labourer's earnings, and in harvest time his earnings are always increased; but these additions apply to all years alike, and therefore I have not reckoned them. Have I not then proved that it is impossible to gainsay that the present generation—the existing race of labourers—cannot be benefited in any way by a direct ratio between the price of food and the rate of wages. Again, I say, I doubt the position that ultimately even there is any tendency between the two to approximate. But if I have shown that in these eight years—a great period in a labouring man's life (hear)—no rise at all in wages has taken place proportionate to the rise in the price of corn, I think I have shown so far that the rate of wages has no such connection with the prices of food as to rise with them, but rather directly the reverse (hear). I think I have succeeded in demonstrating that the low price of wheat operates almost immediately in favour of the agricultural interest. I put this to you in perfect good faith and sincerity. Do you think that you can maintain this system of protection much longer? and above all things are you not assured that we cannot maintain the existing law upon the ground of its being advantageous to agriculture? Adam Smith, whose name has been too often mentioned in the course of these discussions, tells his readers, and proves to the satisfaction of every impartial and intelligent man, that the rate of wages depends upon the country being in a prosperous condition. When there is abundance of capital, large profits, an active and healthy condition of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, then will the rate of wages be high, and when the opposite state of things happens to prevail, then will the rate of wages be in a depressed state, and the working classes reduced to comparative poverty. General prosperity and not legal enactments produce a practical effect upon the rates of wages. It is by removing restrictions on manufactures and commerce that you create a demand for labour, and not by raising the prices of food. Make the subsistence of mankind difficult of attainment, and you take a guarantee against the rise of wages. But remove restrictions upon agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and then you save yourselves from the necessity of constant interference for the purpose of regulating the supply of food. I do not overlook how, in some quarters, it has been alleged that there exists a panic about taking land. It has been shown that in England no such panic exists. In many parts of Scotland it has also been shown that nothing of the sort prevails. Even very recently as many as eleven farms in Roxburghshire were let at an increase of rent. In those parts of the country, where agriculture is most skilfully pursued, there does the least alarm prevail. For bad farming this protection ought to be permanent; but where skilful farming exists nothing of the sort is necessary. Of course, in some parts of the country there must be suffering, and in certain places there will be tenants without sufficient capital; but compare the advantage of protecting so very small a minority with the general happiness and prosperity of the nation, compare it also with the comfort to your own minds which must arise from the consciousness of your not being responsible in times of distress for the food of the people. Adopt a course of unrestricted legislation, and then you need not fear that the operations of nature will be imputed to any other than their true origin. Leave trade free and you will not be held responsible for untoward events over which we have not and of necessity cannot exercise any control. Looking, then, at the compensation which this measure furnishes—I do not mean compensation in the way of small equivalents, but on the contrary, I refer to the security and the permanency of the law—looking to the advantages which the change now proposed must confer upon the labourer; looking to the benefits it will confer upon yourselves; I mean not merely the more obvious advantages likely to arise to your estates, but the less evident effects in the improvement of your position—seeing that you will be elevated by making this concession—I think I am not acting as the enemy of that interest, with which my own is so intimately connected when I recommend this bill to the acceptance of the house (hear, hear). I repeat that that which I advise is for the true interests of every class. I ask you, do you feel secure; and if you foresee that the present system cannot long be maintained, why will you not take advantage of a favourable time for effecting a change that very soon must come? You say that the present time is one of prosperity. Is not that a most powerful reason for making this concession? At the present moment you are free agents. An hon. member said, that there was nothing to apprehend this year, nor anything next year. Then you will not go the length of saying that you are safe for more than two years. Can there be a better proof that the present is not an unfavourable moment for effecting the alteration which this measure is intended to accomplish? Again I ask you how long do you think you can maintain the system of protection? I know, and we all know, that it cannot be made permanent consistently with that degree of good-will and harmony without which a nation cannot be happy and prosperous. No doubt the immediate cause of this measure is the sad calamity which has befallen Ireland. It has forced upon you the consideration of the corn question. But suppose that you suspended the Corn Laws, what could you have done when the time of suspension was at an end (hear, hear). I have not overlooked the circumstance that respecting this Bill it has been said to be a good political manoeuvre on my part. The letter of the noble lord the member for London has been described as a good political manoeuvre on his part. Now I ask what possible advantage can a bill like this confer upon me as an individual. I know that I have been taunted, and have more than once been told, that my days as a minister are numbered. But I have introduced this measure, not for the purpose of prolonging my ministerial existence, but for the purpose of averting a great national calamity, and for the purpose of sustaining a great public interest. I am quite aware of the fact that more than once I have been asked how long I can reckon upon the support of those honourable gentlemen opposite, without whose votes I could not hope to carry this Bill through the house—how long, in fact, I can reckon upon enjoying their support with respect to other subjects (loud cheers). I know, as well as those who taunt me, that I have not any right to the support or confidence of those hon. members. I acknowledge and admit that my prospects of accomplishing this measure are owing to their support. If it be passed it will be by them. But then they give it their support on public grounds, and I feel and acknowledge my public obligations to them as a public man. I admit this, and I have studiously avoided admitting anything beyond this. I am aware of the differences subsisting between those honourable gentlemen and myself. I have no right to claim any protection or support at their hands, and I have never sought to obtain that support by any departure, in the slightest degree, from the principles I have always professed. I know that 112 members constitute the full number of those who, thinking with me on subjects of general policy, support me on the present occasion; these 112, not being above one-sixth part of the House of Commons. I am therefore not surprised that you consider my tenure of power to be doubtful. But let us pass this measure, and while it is in progress let me request of you to suspend your indignation. This measure being once passed, you on this side and on that side of the house may adopt whatever measures you think proper for the purpose of terminating my political existence. I assure you I shall deplore the loss of your confidence much more than I shall deplore the loss of political power. The accusations which you prefer against me are on this account harmless, because I feel that they are unjust (loud cheers). Every man has within his own bosom and conscience the scales which determine the real weight of reproach, and if I had acted from any corrupt or unworthy motives, one-tenth part of the accusations you have levelled against me would have been fatal to my existence as a public man (hear, hear, hear). You may think that we took too great precautions against Irish famine in the month of November. You are mistaken. Events will prove that those precautions were not superfluous; but even if they had been, as our motive was to rescue a whole people from the calamity of possible famine, and consequent disease I should be easy under the accusation (hear, hear). I do not say whether this measure will do so or not. I speak only of the motive (cheers). What weight would your accusation have even if the precautions be superfluous? I am saying, with the information we had, and the prospects which were before us, repeat the accusation that we took superfluous precautions, and I say, as Mr. Burke said when labouring under similar obloquy, and in circumstances not dissimilar, "In every accident in life, in pain, in sickness, in depression, in distress, I called to mind that accusation; and was comforted" (cheers). No, never—no reproach will attach to me even if we should have proof that the precautions will be superfluous. Before the month of July ("May" from the Opposition), it will be established to the conviction of every man, that the precautions we took were not superfluous, and that our motives were not impure. I am not speaking of a temporary measure; I am speaking of a permanent measure. When I do fall I shall have the satisfaction of reflecting that I do not fall because I have shown subservience to a party (loud cheers). I shall not fall because I have preferred the interests of party to the general interests of the community (cheers); and I shall carry with me the satisfaction of reflecting, that during the course of my official career, my object has been to mitigate monopoly (cheers), to increase the demand for industry, to remove restrictions upon commerce (cheers), to equalise the burden of taxation, to ameliorate the condition of those who labour (great cheering).

Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN contended that Sir Robert Peel had not made a candid declaration of the causes of his future fall from power; for it was attributable to far other causes than his desire to mitigate monopoly, and to equalise taxation. He complained that Sir Robert Peel had not stated his case fairly, because he had not stated it fully. He also protested against the unfairness of the Minister's coming down to the house and quoting a vast variety of statistical documents relative to agriculture, which nobody could answer off-hand, and which, if of any value at all, ought to have been placed before the house at the commencement of these discussions. The protection party had acted with the greatest sincerity during these debates. They had mooted the question of protection, or of no protection; and if they should be defeated upon it, nobody could accuse them of having resorted to unworthy artifice. He expressed his determination to resist this bill to the utmost.

Lord PALMERSTON observed that there had been two questions involved in this debate—one whether the Corn Laws should be repealed, and the other, whether Sir R. Peel and his colleagues were justified in departing from certain engagements which they had contracted with the Conservative party. He took the last question first, and declared that, however important political connection might be to the working of the British Constitution, he held that, if public duty pointed one way and party considerations another, an honest man was bound to stand by his country. Reverting, however, to the first question, he expressed his opinion that Government had placed the defence of their new commercial policy on too narrow grounds. They attributed their change of opinion to the experience of the last three years; he thought that they ought rather to have attributed it to the debates of the last four sessions, and especially to the able and eloquent speeches of his friend Mr. Cobden. His astonishment was not that Ministers had not changed their opinions now, but that they had not changed them sooner. He then proceeded to remind the house that years ago he had expressed a wish that the word "protection" was erased from our statute book, and his reason was, that protection meant injury to the many for the benefit of the few, with this addition, that the injury was real, but the benefit was illusory. He stated at great length the reasons which induced him to support this bill, and concluded by declaring that our example in establishing practical Free Trade in this country would be more beneficial in obtaining it throughout the world than all our past negotiations.

The house then divided, when there appeared—

For the second reading .. 302
Against it .. 211

Majority .. 88

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

THERE IS GREAT VIRTUE IN AN "IF"—The Liverpool Courier informs its readers that the Duke of Portland has offered to head a subscription list with 25,000l. "If an active plan can be devised to thwart the unconstitutional proceedings of the League" In other words, his Grace has wagered 25,000l. to nothing, that the League is irresistible.—Notts Review.

According to a return from the Mint, the amount of the gold coined in 1845 was 16,929lb.; the silver, 617,658lb.; and the copper, 69,144.

*. Several members of the Council of the League are desirous of making complete their sets of the Anti-Corn-Law Circular, which was printed in Manchester, prior to the commencement of the LEAGUE paper. They are deficient of the following number:

93,

Any reasonable sum will be paid for the numbers, or any of them.

They may be addressed to the care of Mr. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, and should be accompanied by a letter from the senders, which shall be promptly replied to, with payment.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, April 1, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
Harrison, Thomas, and Sons, Staleybridge	..	80	0
*Earnshaw, John, Mount Pleasant, Bacup	..	10	0
*Collier and Phyllian, Well-street, Shude Hill, Manchester	..	10	0
*Kay and Fletcher, Radcliffe, near Manchester	..	5	0
*Johnson, John, Conington	..	5	0
*Fielden, H., Great Hampton-street, Birmingham	..	2	0
*Hamer, Jas., brewer, John-street, Ancoats, Manchester	..	2	0
*Miller and Mitchell, Alton-street, do	..	2	0
*Mayo, Wm., 13, Market-street, do	..	1	0
*Hooper, Edward, Medlock Inn, Brook-street, do	..	1	0
*Yates, John and Charles, New Mills, near Stockport	..	1	0
*Moorcroft, Wm., Brinksway, do	..	1	0
*Alsop, Alfred, Lea Bridge, Worsworth	..	1	0
*Blews, T., Bartholomew-street, Birmingham	..	1	0
*Whitfield, S., Oxford-street, do	..	1	0
*The Workmen of ditto do	..	1	0
*M. M. S., per Edwin Chapman, Guildford	..	1	0
*Wilson, John, Wine Wall, near Colne	..	1	0
*Rowcroft, John, Tenterife-st., Broughton, Manchester	..	1	0
*Blackburn, Robert, Grabsby-row Saw Mills do	..	1	0
*Pinder, Wm. and Sons, 67, Travis-street do	..	1	0
*Duxbury, George, 28, Cable-street do	..	1	0
*Ingham, James, 28, do do	..	1	0
*Seaton, James, 28, do do	..	1	0
*Stevenson, Alfred, Umston, near do	..	1	0
*Walker, L., Shakspeare Tavern, Windmill-st., do	..	1	0
Redfern, Samuel, Stonemason, Worsworth	..	0	6
*McGregor, John, agent	..	1	0
*Love, Wm., do do	..	1	0
*Barr, Peter, grocer, do	..	1	0
*Green, Wm., Steeple-street do	..	1	0
*Wilson, George, innkeeper do	..	1	0
*Campbell, Wm., surgeon do	..	1	0
*Kirkland, Robert do	..	1	0
*Hardie, Stark, and Co., Locherfield do	..	1	0
*Crawford, Archibald, merchant do	..	1	0
*Standers, Thomas, Park-street	..	20	0
*Wills, Wm., 2, Portland-square	..	20	0
*Wills, H. O., 12, Somerset-street	..	20	0
*Fry, J. S., and Sons, Union-street	..	20	0
*Thomas, Alfred, Charlotte-street	..	20	0
*Lang, Samuel, and Sons, Bridge-street	..	10	0
*Terrell, Wm. and Sons, Wench Back	..	10	0
*Tobill, Chas., and Co., Temple Backs	..	10	0
*Thomas, Frigg, & Thomas, Broad Plain	..	10	0
*James, Staple, and Shoard, Counterslip	..	10	0
*Hall, James, Broadmead	..	4	0
*Workmen of Thomas, Frigg, and Thomas, R. Phillips, foreman	..	3	0
*Langdon, A. N., Old Market-street	..	2	0
*Halsall, Edward, Norfolk-street	..	1	0
*Nash, Henry Shute, Gt George-street	..	1	0
*Tucker, J. W., 7, Lower Green	..	1	0
*Hodges, Wm., Broad Quay	..	1	0
*Benden, George, 26, Mary-le-port-st.	..	1	0
*Rowe, Richard, 6, Prince-street	..	1	0
*Bale, Thomas, Broadmead	..	0	10
*Clay, Joseph Travis, Raistrick, near	..	20	0
*Leppington, S., Brookfoot, Brighouse, nr	..	3	0
*Firth, B., do do	..	3	0
*Butterworth, Joshua, Norwood Green do	..	3	0
*King, John, Brighouse, near	..	1	0
*Turner, Clarke, Booth-town	..	1	0
*Batty, Samuel	..	1	0
*Blakey, Henry	..	1	0
*Blackburn, Thos., jun., Brighouse, nr	..	1	0
*Simpson, Lewis	..	1	0
*Blackburn, Joseph	..	1	0
*Ainsley, Daniel	..	1	0
*Dunn, Thomas, Richmond	..	10	0
*Frith, Francis, Alton, or Liverpool	..	10	0
*Hunter, Michael, son, Wicker	..	4	0
*Broadbent, C. E., solicitor	..	2	0
*Bramley and Gainsford, Paradise-sq.	..	2	0
*Ashforth, Joseph, Bridge-street	..	2	0
*Hunter, Michael, jun., Wicker	..	1	0
*Frith, Brothers, Arundel-street	..	1	0
*Fox, Benjamin, do	..	1	0
*Wolstenholme, Josh., Park	..	1	0
*Bramall, Godfrey, South-street	..	1	0
*Johnson, David, Campo line	..	1	0
*Ellison, Joseph, Allen-street	..	1	0
*Nelson and Co.	..	10	0
*Gibby, Brothers, Cowgate	..	5	0
*Small, David	..	5	0
*A Friend	..	4	0
*Lowe, Alexander	..	4	0
*Turnbull, Wm.	..	4	0
*Shiell, John	..	4	0
*Christie, Wm. and Son, Panmure-st.	..	2	0
*Mill, J. and A.	..	2	0
*Shaw, Wm. and Son	..	2	0
*Baxter, Wm. B.	..	2	0
*Chalmers, Charles	..	2	0
*Molvo, Herman	..	1	5
*Smith, Silvester	..	1	0
*Sturrock, John, jun.	..	1	0
*Sturrock, Robert	..	1	0
*Tyrie, Alexander	..	1	0
*Storrier, Andrew	..	1	0
*Oakley, Wm.	..	1	0
*Malcolm, James	..	9	10

	Graham, Col. David, of Micklewood ..	5	0	0
	M'Farlane, John	5	0	0
	*Smith, Robert	3	3	0
	*Henderson, James	3	3	0
	*Sawers, John	3	3	0
	*Steel, Bailie	2	2	0
	*Mathie, J. and J.	2	2	0
	*McRobbie, Daniel, Bridge of Allan ..	2	2	0
	*Stevenson, G. and J.	2	2	0
	*Gallbraith, Wm.	2	2	0
	*Wortie, Wm.	2	2	0
	*Taylor, Robert, and Son, manufacturers	2	2	0
	*Robertson, John	2	2	0
	*McGregor, Robert	2	2	0
	*Kidston, John	2	2	0
	*Sawers, Robert	2	2	0
	*Monteath, James	2	2	0
	*Morrison, Bailie	2	2	0
	*Traquair, J.	2	2	0
	*Gibb, Alexander	2	2	0
	*Thomson, Wm. and Co.	2	2	0
	*Kerr, James	2	2	0
	*Monat, A. and G.	2	0	0
	*Hankene, Wm.	1	1	0
	*Prentice, James	1	1	0
	*Taylor, W. G., Hayford Mills	1	1	0
	Gillies, Thomas	1	1	0
	Mathie, James	1	1	0
	Thomson, George	1	1	0
	Craigie, John	1	1	0
Stirling.	Reid, John	1	1	0
	Copland, John	1	1	0
	Scott, Alexander	1	1	0
	Graham, Wm.	1	1	0
	Miller, James	1	1	0
	Christie, John	1	1	0
	Ferguson, Thomas	1	1	0
	Lemox, John	1	1	0
	Gentleman, Ebenezer	1	1	0
	Boyd, Alexander	1	1	0
	Burden, John	1	1	0
	Yellowlees, David	1	1	0
	Graham, Thomas	1	1	0
	Geddes, Henry, Bannockburn	1	0	0
	Burden, James	1	0	0
	Irving, John	1	0	0
	M'Lauchlan, Daniel	1	0	0
	Harvey, Wm.	1	0	0
	Robertson, Wm.	1	0	0
	Colville, Thomas	0	12	0
	Henderson, J. and G. and Co	0	12	0
	McNab, Duncan	0	8	5
	Smith, Wm.	0	8	5
	Morgan, D. and G. and Co.	0	8	0
	Kane, James	0	8	0
	Paton, John	0	4	0
	Fraser, Alexander	0	4	0
	Niven, Wm.	0	4	0
	M'Naughton, John	0	4	0
	A Friend, per A. Fraser	0	4	0
	Sundry small subscriptions	0	5	11
	*Rooke, Charles, Westwood House, near Colchester ..	20	0	0
	*Phillips and Smith, McKisshum	5	0	0
	*Strode and Ledger, 4, Huguenot-lane	2	2	0
	*Morris, W. R., Mill-lane, Deptford	2	2	0
	*Leaman, A. V., 89, John street, Tottenham Court-road	2	2	0
	*Allen, Edward, Hambrook-street, Southsea ..	1	1	0
	*Bateman, Henry, 6, Islington Green	1	1	0
	*Honnell, E., Queen-street, Bridge-road, Borough ..	1	1	0
	*Foster, C. J., 5, Stone-buildings, Lincoln's Inn	1	1	0
	*Taylor, Thomas, Duke-street, Tooley-street ..	1	1	0
	*Hussey, W., Green Farm, High Wycombe, Bucks ..	1	0	0
	*Dewar, W., Green-street, Sunderland	1	0	0
	*May, Charles, Norwich	1	0	0
	*Manton, Henry, 110, Great Charles-st., Birmingham	1	0	0
	From a Poor Man	1	0	0
	*Hilditch, Miss, King-street, Wrexham	1	0	0
	*A Few Lace Makers in the Isle of Wight, per James
	Smythers	1	0	0
	*Cutting, John, 271, Oxford-street	1	0	0
	*Cutting, Mrs., 268, do	1	0	0
	*Wood, Richard, 78 and 79, Newgate-street	1	0	0
	*Read, Henry, 27, Austin Friars	1	0	0
	*Bellamy, Samuel, Clarence-place, Cumberwell ..	1	0	0
	Collinson, W., 14, York-street, St. Luke's	0	10	0
	Brooks, Benjamin, 100, Curtain-road	0	5	0
	Down J., 179, Strand	0	5	0
	A Friend	0	1	8
	Miall and Company, Market-street	2	0	0
	Tripe, Cornelius, Ker-street	1	0	0
	Foster, John, St. Aubyn-street	1	0	0
	Oram, Richard Robt., do	1	0	0
	Pyer, Rev. John, Stoke	1	0	0
	Nicholls, John, George-street	1	0	0
	Burnett, James	1	0	0
	Woolcombe, Thomas, Ker-street	1	0	0
	May, Joseph, St. Anbryn-street	0	10	0
	Dymond, Thomas H., 29, Granby-st.	0	10	0
Devonport.	Horton, Rev. Thomas, Stoke	0	10	0
	Pickens, Edward, James-street	0	10	0
	Tucker and Pearce, Pembroke-street	0	10	0
	Closter, John, Town-square	0	10	0
	Dymond, Mr.	0	10	0
	Smith, R. C.	0	10	0
	Tomson, John, Fore-street	0	5	0
	Gibson, John, Catharine-street	0	5	0
	*Young, George	1	1	0
	*Blackwood, Robert, Wellington-street..	1	0	0
	*Wilson, Hugh, Bailie	1	0	0
Kilnarnock.	*Bishop, Robert	1	0	0
	*Brown, John, Bells Crae Cottage	1	0	0
	*Andrews, David R., Portland street ..	1	0	0
	*Mack, Thomas, Titchfield-street	1	0	0

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

ERRATA.

In LEAGUE, No. 131, for Thomas Howitt, Dean-street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, 14, read 34.; for A. Anderson, Scarborough, 504., read A. Anderson, Norwood, Surrey; and in Stockton-on-Tees list of subscriptions, for Henry Sharp read Henry Thorpe. In list of promised subscriptions, for Geo. Gibson and Co., 1001., read 1237.

THE NEW SLIDING SCALE—ITS EFFECT ON AGRICULTURE.—What the agricultural interest (meaning thereby the real cultivators of the soil) have really most to fear, is a delay in the final settlement of this question. There will be no readjustment of rents and leases while the change is in process. All the disadvantages of a sudden repeal are thus insured to the farmer, without any of its corresponding advantages to himself or the community. The evil may not be felt during 1846, because scarcity throughout Europe, preventing under any circumstances extensive importation, may prevent its operation. But during 1847-8, stocks of foreign corn, prevented by the sliding scale from gradual importation, will in all probability accumulate in foreign ports, and, on the sudden fall of duty in 1849, be poured on the market, unnaturally lowering the price, to the great injury of the English producer.—Report of the Liverpool Anti-Monopoly Association, 1845.

A THIRD GLANCE AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

By REUBEN.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM AND MR. SHAW.

When one stands upon a bridge which spans a ravine, in some woodland solitude, looking over the side of the bridge upon the leafy tops of trees, which rise up like platforms for the sunshine to light upon, as it peeps below to see what the water is doing, which is heard, but not seen; and when we look down upon the jackdaws which hover upon the tree-tops, clusters of them sitting on branches sedately, while a single one balances itself upon a twig, extending first one wing and then the other to preserve its balance, calling, "cacaw, cacaw," or "jackdaw, jackdaw;" then darting off in an instant with a dozen followers to join in a thicket of flapping wings and "ca-cawing" voices, from amongst which some birds disappear into holes in the side walls and re-appear again, and call "cacaw, jackdaw," and take their seats on leafy twigs, and there continue the cry, or listen to others uttering it; looking down upon this fraternity of jackdaws, the human spectator on the bridge, who is a kind of "stranger in the gallery," cannot for the life of him tell what all the flutter and noise is about, though he is a believer in the natural truth that all creatures by their motion or their sound express some sensation or meaning, no matter whether they be jackdaws on trees or gentlemen in Parliament.

Thus it was with me, one evening this week, at that time of the evening when there is too little daylight left to see the members of Parliament distinctly, and the bude lights are not yet turned on in full strength. Knowing nothing of what had been done, or what was doing, what had been said, or what was saying, I reached an elevated position, and looked down upon the House of Commons, and saw it more than usually full of members, and the members all in commotion. Rows of them were sitting aloft in the side galleries, looking over the front, moving their heads excitedly, and uttering sounds like "cacaw, cacaw," or "jackdaw, jackdaw;" while below, the same sounds were uttered from all sides and all seats, while some members darted up and darted down again, while others were vehemently wagging their heads and vociferating "cacaw," or "jackdaw," or some sound which my unparliamentary ears believed to be those. A few members sat gravely still, and seemed to say nothing; but only a few. Some emerged hastily from doorways, and listening, or seeming to listen, for a moment, joined in the cries. I had just caught a glimpse of a tall dark figure—a gentleman in black, whose bald head, with the black edging of hair combed up to hide a little of the baldness, as remnants of a good reputation are sometimes brought up to cover spots where character is bare,—I had just caught a glimpse of this tall figure as it sat down, and knew it was that of Sir James Graham. This down-sitting of the Home Minister was the signal of commotion; something he had said about somebody was the cause of it.

At last the tumult of sounds ceased; the members sat still; and another member of high stature, not far from the place of the first one, who had been standing for some minutes, but whom I had not seen in the dim light, began, with a strong voice, to speak. I was soon informed that this was Mr. Shaw, representative in Parliament of the Dublin University. I also discovered now that I had made a mistake in supposing that in the tumult of the house the members had been calling "cacaw," or "jackdaw," they had been calling "Shaw Shaw," "Mr. Shaw, Mr. Shaw!"

This Mr. Shaw, it seems, has declared himself bitterly against the Government, but particularly against Sir James Graham. According to what has transpired, he, at the end of 1834, when Sir Robert Peel returned from Italy and took a short hold of office, was offered a place of some kind. He declined to take any judicial place that would exclude him from the House of Commons. His ambition to be a great statesman has never been concealed; and he might have been a respectable second-seat man, at least, had he not been a bigot, and the worst of bigots, an Irish political bigot—and had he evinced some regard for other persons than himself. He is a ready speaker, with a good voice.

Nor could he, he says, take any political office which would deprive him of his Recordership of Dublin; he could not afford to lose its income. But it seems he planned a scheme by which he might get its income—and something more—and be relieved from its duties, free, able, and willing to take political office. The Whigs, however, were in power; the Tory tenure of place having been very short in 1834 and beginning of 1835. It was not until 1842, shortly after the return of the Tories to power, that he brought his scheme before them. He gave an account of it the other night, and from the way in which he gave it shape and colour he was loudly cheered, for he made its history tell against Sir James Graham. He called it an arrangement of the office of the Dublin recordership, and several other small judicial appointments in that city, "whereby a saving of between 3,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* a year" was to be made to the public. But Sir James Graham, on rising a second time, gave the affair another shape and colour. Shaw's scheme was to get an increased allowance fixed for the recordership of 3,000*l.*, with a retiring pension equal to the present income, the salary for the office being now about 2,000*l.*, that he should, therefore, cease to receive the 2,000*l.* a year, for doing the work, and get the retiring salary of 2,000*l.* without the work to do, but to be at liberty to remain in Parliament and take any political office which Sir Robert Peel, or political fate, or even Sir James Graham might put in his way.

The job was too bad for Sir James, and he wrote to Mr. Shaw and told him so; and on Monday night told him he was at full liberty to read that letter to the house. But neither the Home Minister, nor the Recorder of Dublin, in their disputes, have said a word about the Dublin jury lists. There were people in the House of Commons on Monday night who almost expected to hear the "cat let out" about the jury lists in the O'Connell trials.

Be that as it may, Sir James Graham during last session had called Mr. Shaw his right honourable "friend." Whereupon the latter retorted angrily that he had never been his friend; that more than political and parliamentary acquaintance he knew nothing of him. And when the present session of Parliament came, and the Free Trade scheme was divulged, Shaw ranged himself with the protectionists, denied the the Irish potato disease, and accused the Ministry. Sir James Graham hinted that he was bitter on the question of the Corn Laws, because disappointment in one direction excited his hopes in another. This led Shaw to give a history of his hopes and disappointments, and make strong asseverations to the house that there was not one word of truth as to his having been disappointed in not being made secretary for Ireland. Sir James explained, however, that he had only spoken of a "prospective" secretaryship; one which he may safely count upon as his own, should the protectionists form a new Government.

When an hour and a half, or thereabout, had been consumed in such personal bickerings, the question before the house proceeded. That question was corn or coercion. After much debate, a division took place, and coercion carried the day; while corn was for a time set aside.

Had a division taken place an hour or two sooner than it did, the majority, it is thought, would have been for proceeding with corn; and it is believed that Sir R. Peel would, if thus strengthened by a vote of the house, have been quite willing to shelve the Coercion Bill for a few weeks. But so many members spoke, and some of them so long, that a considerable number left the house, and chiefly from the side where corn strength against coercion strength was ranged. Ultimately, the coercion debate was adjourned to Tuesday.

NO HOUSE—THE BATTLES IN INDIA.

But, though Tuesday was appointed for the resumption of the debate on coercion, to the exclusion of the question of corn, the debate was not resumed. There did not assemble members enough to form a house; one circumstance tending to which might be the promise of the Irish liberal members to occupy the house for at least three nights, with the defence of Ireland, even if no other members should speak, and the aversion which a large body of the English aristocracy and squirearchy have to listen to the tale of Irish wrongs, or have anything to do with Ireland, save to receive rents or tithes from it, or hold commissions or commands in its armies of occupation; or vote coercion for it to compel it to pay its rents and tithes quietly, or with only as much grumbling as shall be in a whisper; to compel it to sell its last bushel of corn, last pig, and all but its last potato, to go without a shirt, without a coat, with a straw wisp in its hat, and with barely half a pair of breeches to its limbs, that it may pay rents and tithes, the one to a landlord who pockets the money, buttons his pocket, and walks away, and says, "If the Irish grumble, pull down their houses, eject them from my estate, and hang them if they refuse to submit;" the other to a parson who also pockets the money, does not button his pockets, perhaps, but says, "I will spend it only with good Protestants—I will spend none of it upon those idolatrous Papists who pay it to me, unless it be for Protestant sheriff's officers to distract on them; Protestant constabulary to protect the sheriff's officers; Protestant soldiery to back the constabulary; Protestant witnesses to swear against the idolatrous Catholics who do not submit quietly: Protestant juries to convict them; Protestant hangmen to hang them; Protestant curates to assist me in heaping curses on them when they are hanged—all that Ireland may be Protestantised in the great principle of paying tithes to a priesthood it does not believe in!"—

Save to vote for coercion to Ireland, to obtain from Ireland submission to such aggressions as these, the English owners of Irish land and their political friends in Parliament have little inclination to sit on either side of the house to listen to the wrongs inflicted by them and their agents in Ireland. And this may have been one reason why the attendance was so thin on Tuesday, at four o'clock, as to muster only 31 members, 40 members being requisite to form a house.

But this was not the chief reason. The telegraphic despatches, published early in the day in second editions of the London morning papers, prepared London to expect before many hours details of one of the most terrible scenes of carnage known in the history of India. In a few hours the first of the details from India arrived, and every man, and woman, and, I may add, child, who had a friend or brother there, were eagerly running to the offices of the newspapers and to the newsmen to learn some particulars, however scanty, or, if possible the names of those who had fallen in the carnage.

From the fact becoming known that the Morning Herald had been the first to publish the details at much length in a third edition, and that the Standard would repeat their publication in the evening, the rush of people of all degrees to the offices of those papers was most intensely exciting. At one period towards five o'clock, it being rumoured that the Standard was to give the names of the officers killed and wounded, though every newsman and newsman's boy in the metropolis was commissioned to get papers with all speed for the clubs and reading rooms and reading people, there were in Bridge-street alone as many members of Parliament in carriages, on horseback, or on foot, competing to get papers, as would have made up the number deficient at the House of Commons for a house. Many more must have been at their clubs anxiously waiting for the papers, or running, riding, driving over the town to tell persons interested in India, or in the fate of the armies of India, what was not yet generally known.

The scene in Bridge-street, Blackfriars, was suggestive of reflections of deep import; not alone that some of the carriages which drew up there contained what were evidently the whole, or nearly the whole, of a family, none of whom had patience to stay at home after the first rumour while one came out to get tidings of father or brother, but who came all off in painful anxiety to ascertain if the names of the slain had yet arrived; not alone that beating hearts, which had no carriages to carry them in search of the news of battle and the names of friends supposed to have been in the battle, were as anxiously contending for the printed sheets; not alone that the friends of the lives and happiness of all mankind were eager to learn how many and whom of mankind had been destroyed, even though they had individually no relatives in the war; not alone that the greatest part of all who assembled at the Standard office, or any other office, to learn the news did so because they were pleased, and gloried in the rumours of the slaughter because of its very magnitude; not alone for any of these reasons, nor for all united, nor for the additional and more satisfactory one, that this action had terminated the war, was it that reflections of deep import were suggested, though all or any of those considerations were suggestive of grave reflections.

Meditative thought turned almost involuntarily from the certainty that war had been upon the Sutlej in India, to the possibility of its being upon the St. Lawrence in America; and that with an army, not composed of the half-barbarians of the Punjab, but with brothers of Saxon blood, Saxon courage, perseverance, and endurance. And what so intimately allied to such reflections as the great question of commercial freedom, of national brotherhood, for which we are struggling? What is there of equal value in that question to the certainty that it is the forerunner of universal peace? the only sure preventative of war? Let us commit some of those thoughts to paper.

THE WAR OF NEIGHBOURS—WHAT WOULD IT BE LIKE?

Standing in Bridge-street, Blackfriars, looking upon the crowd who press to get the names of the killed and wounded in India, from a newspaper supposed to be about to publish the names, it will be deemed very absurd to look along Blackfriars-bridge and imagine the London side and the Southwark side at war; the bridge the central point of the battle, the one army driving the other across the bridge, and over the bridge, into the Thames; the artillery of the strongest scattering grape and canister shot among the flying crowds of the weakest; the lancers with lances, the swordsmen with swords—riding upon the disordered rear, hewing down those that have not yet fallen, trampling to death those that are already down; rushing across to Blackfriars-street to set it on fire, bringing up heavy cannon to batter down buildings that will not burn; retreating to their own side (supposing the citizens to have been the most powerful, and to have chastised the Southwarkians for an invasion) and breaking down or blowing up the bridge in their retreat to prevent the Southwarkians from coming over again; proceeding upon the river to scuttle, sink, or burn, or fetch away by force of arms, and call them their own, every barge, wherry, boat, or raft of timber upon which the Southwarkians could venture upon the water again, either for war or peaceful business. It would be absurd to stand in Bridge-street and suppose all this; but why? Simply because such occurrences are impossible. And why are such occurrences impossible? Because the people on the one side and on the other are one people. The traffic of the one is the traffic of the other; the bridge of the one is the bridge of the other; the barges, wherries, boats, and rafts of wood of the one, are the barges, wherries, boats, and rafts of wood of the other; the preservation of the property of the one side is equally important to the other side. It is so impossible that the two sides of the Thames could go to war and destroy each other's shops and houses, butcher each other's bodies, lay each other's streets in ashes, and make a population of widows and orphans and wounded men, to inhabit the streets of ashes and desolation, so utterly impossible is it for such a thing to happen, that it may appear supremely ridiculous to put the case even hypothetically.

Yet there was once war, even between the two sides of the Thames. The river was a division of kingdoms at a time when there was a belief not yet so dead in the English mind as it should be, that war is a glorious thing, and is only dishonourable when not successful. That was at a time when there was no oneness of interest between the dwellers on the left bank and on the right. It was at a time when the ruling principle of such commerce as was known was piracy. But even now, in the age called civilised—between nations who are the pioneers of civilisation, England, America, France, all three, or any two of them, it is quite possible for war to arise.

It is not possible that the ships of the Messrs. Baring, trading to America, could be attacked, boarded, plundered, burned, or sunk in the London docks by an armament from Rotherhithe; but it is possible that they may be attacked, boarded, plundered, burned, and sunk on the shore of America when trading there; and if so, the loss would be as great to their owners, or their insurers in London, as if they had been destroyed upon the Thames.

Then, if, in retaliation, the ships of war of England should go out, and lay themselves alongside of Boston, and throw rockets into it, and shells to blow it up, and set it on fire, and to tear the limbs from the bodies of the inhabitants, all of whom, it might be, were in favour of peace; some of whom, it might be, were the sellers or the buyers and consumers of the goods which the Barings had before carried there; some of whom might be the owners of ships lying in the ports of England, or at that moment going to the bottom of the sea, sunk by the cannon-balls of England;—if Boston should be bombarded and laid in ashes, its inhabitants left houseless, or thousands of them lifeless, the ships burned, and the docks filled only with wreck, what redress would that be to England? The English merchants would not be paid for the ships and cargoes lost. On the contrary the Americans would be still less able to pay them, even if the war was ended.

But the trade between Liverpool and America, if suspended by war, would be an act of national suicide by both countries, far exceeding in disaster anything here hinted at in regard to the port of London, or anything known in the history of warfare. To depict its consequences would be an unwelcome task; and for the present, in this paper, an impossible one.

Let it suffice to say that the inhabitants of America, who are in the closest commercial intercourse with England, and the inhabitants of England who are holding intercourse with them, are jointly as averse to war as are the inhabitants on the Southwark side and the city side of the Thames to a war between Middlesex and Surrey.

Those in America, who would not so immediately feel the consequences of war in their worst form, are the people of the Western States, who have little commercial intercourse with England, but with whom we are seeking to establish it, by getting food from them in return for our clothing and furniture, of which they are in need.

Repeal the Corn Law at once, and the Western States of America are converted into peacemakers. Defer the repeal, and let the excitement on the Oregon question proceed, and the time for joint occupation cease, and war may become unavoidable. And, if it does begin, all the battles on the Sutlej are as holiday powder fired away, compared with the results of a war with America.

Not that it is denied that the Indian battles are great ones; they are greater, probably, than any pitched land battles that would be fought in America. A war between England and America, would be one ceaseless naval battle; the separate engagements being nothing more than a small part of the whole. It would be fought along a coast of six thousand miles, and upon an ocean field extending from the English Channel to the shores of China.

America might disable England, and England might disable America. What would be the gain to either? Let two neighbours who have lived in peace—the blacksmith and the miller—fall out and fight, and try to stab each other, and cut each other's hands off, and burn each other's houses; the miller who used to get the blacksmith's skill and iron and tools to mend his mill, trying to cut the sinews of the blacksmith's arm, so that he shall not be able to wield his hammer again, and trying to sink his hammers and his iron in the mill-pond; the blacksmith battering the head of the miller with his hammer, breaking the mill, throwing the flour into the mill-pond. What would be the gain to either if completely victorious over the other? If equally matched, would they not fight until they each cried "enough," and begin their respective business again in the mill and the smithy much poorer men, more helpless men, less useful men, less amiable men than they were before they fell out, and quarrelled, and fought, and battered each others heads?

That miller and that blacksmith are not fictitious. They may fall out. They are not now such friendly neighbours as they might be. The smith has refused to take the flour; the miller refuses to take the smith's iron-work. They dispute about a small piece of common land, of little benefit to either; and it is possible they may go to blows about it. But they would not fight—could not; their domestic households would not permit them, if the smith dealt with the miller, and the miller with the smith.

Nothing prevents that dealing but our Corn Law. Off with it at once.

THE NORTH LANCASHIRE PROTECTIONISTS AND THEIR PETITION ON THE CORN LAWS.—A paragraph, under this head, appeared in the Guardian of Wednesday last, stating, in substance, that a few weeks ago R. W. France, Esq., of Rawcliffe Hall, had declined to sign the North Lancashire petition in favour of protection, when requested to do so by R. Townley Parker, Esq., along with a few other protectionist landowners. In reference to this paragraph, we have received the following polite epistle from Mr. Parker, which we presume he intended for publication:

"Cuerden Hall, 22d March, 1846.
"Sir,—The inclosed paragraph has been sent to me, and, I am informed, appeared in the Preston Guardian. If it be correctly copied from your paper, I have to inform you, that the statement you have made is false.—I am, sir, yours, &c.

"R. TOWNLEY PARKER.

"To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.
The particular expressions of this letter are quite beneath our notice; and we shall therefore content ourselves with a word or two in reference to the facts to which it relates. What it is in the paragraph that is "false," Mr. Parker does not explain, and we cannot supply the omission. Whether the call was made upon Mr. France a few days instead of a few weeks ago,—whether Mr. Parker called upon him alone, and not along with a few other protectionist landowners,—or whether Mr. France conveyed his refusal to sign in a different form of words from that detailed in the paragraph,—or upon what other incidental point the loose general denial turns,—we are left to conjecture as best we may. At all events, we may safely presume, that if Mr. Parker had not called upon Mr. France for the purpose stated,—or if, when so called upon, Mr. France had consented to sign the petition,—Mr. Parker would have had discernment enough to see, that the real fact should be distinctly stated in his letter.—Manchester Guardian.

BRISK TRADE, PROVISIONS LOW, A.D. 1765.—Mr. Wm Smellie, F.R.S. and A.S., late printer in Edinburgh, Secretary and Superintendent of Natural History to the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, &c. &c. intimate with Principal Robertson, David Hume, Dr. Blair, Dr. Adam Smith, Lord Kames, Lord Hailes, Lord Elibank, Robert Burns, poet, Remodeller and composer of Dr. Buchan's Domestic Medicine, Translator of Buffon, &c. &c. in a letter to Dr. Buchan, author of Domestic Medicine, dated Sheffield, 1765, writes thus:—"Extreme dearth of trade, and consequent want of money, at present in these parts; high price of provisions of all sorts—these two latter are reasons of much greater weight than you are aware of, and greatly influence the sale of anything here (Sheffield). You must know, when trade is brisk, and provisions low, we are all brisk as larks in this trading country; but when the contrary happens, we are poor as rats or beggars."—Memoirs of the Life, Writings and Correspondence of Mr. Wm. Smellie, by Robert Kerr, F.R.S. Ed. Edin. 1811, in 2 vols. Mr. Kerr elsewhere observes of Dr. Adam Smith, the immortal author of the Wealth of Nations—"A book greatly more celebrated and admired than understood; and the principles which it inculcates and establishes, though almost universally acknowledged to be just and irrefragable, are still successfully opposed by the narrow mercantile system of monopoly, and the bigotted terror which actuates many respectable characters against every appearance of innovation and reform." Mark, this was penned in 1811.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE.—The requisition to Messrs. Villiers and Brown is progressing towards completion; already upwards of 7000 of the electors have appended their signatures, and this is exclusive of those received in townships which have not yet sent in their returns. It will be recollected that at the last contested election Mr. Brown only polled 6973 votes.

There were no potatoes in the Limerick market on Friday.—Limerick Examiner.

AGRICULTURE.

REAL AGRICULTURAL PROTECTION.

A MODEL LEASE.

That the real friends to agriculture are to be found amongst the Free Traders is now scarcely denied by any but the politico-monopolist landlords. All, except those who regard their estates as sources of political influence rather than of revenue, are following the natural direction of agricultural improvement, and seeking, with more or less of effect, to amend the tenures of their tenants. Amongst the landowners who deserve honourable mention for their sound and practical views of the requirements of agriculture, Mr. Holland, of Dumbleton, a Free Trader and a Leaguer, stands high; for to that gentleman and his condutors of the Vale of Evesham Association, the farming interest is indebted for the simple and equitable model lease which we now present to our readers.

It appears that about a year ago, a resolution was passed at a meeting of this Society, "that security of tenure is essential for the prosperity of the farmer, and will tend to the welfare of all other classes;" and a committee of landlords and tenants was appointed to draw up a form of lease, under which a tenant might hold his farm with the greatest advantage to himself, and with due justice to his landlord. The committee so appointed issued and extensively circulated a series of inquiries addressed to agriculturists in all parts of England; and after a due consideration of the answers obtained, the following form of lease has been submitted to the members of the association and the agriculturists at large, as one framed with due regard to the interests of both tenant and landlord. It is suggested that the lease may be altered to suit local or personal circumstances; and the committee believe "that the form will be found capable of adoption upon any land, and in any part of England."

This Indenture made the _____ day of _____ one thousand eight hundred and forty _____ in pursuance of an Act to facilitate the granting of certain Leases, between A. B. of _____ of the one part, and C. D. of _____ of the other part,

Witnesseth—that the said A. B. doth demise and let the farm unto the said C. D. his heirs, executors and administrators, all the dwelling-house, buildings, and several closes of land mentioned in the schedule hereunto annexed, and containing by admeasurement A. B. P. or thereabouts, to hold from the day of for the term of twenty years thence ensuing; yielding therefore during the said term the rents hereinafter mentioned. Except and always reserved out of this demise all coals, mines, minerals, quarries of stone and beds of gravel, timber, and trees likely to become timber, with full liberty for the said A. B. his agent or others by him authorised, with or without horses, carts or other carriages, to enter upon the said premises or any part thereof, for the purpose of working any of the said mines or quarries, or of felling or taking away the timber, or planting other trees, or for any purpose whatsoever; making reasonable satisfaction to the said C. D. for any injury or damage which the said A. B. may cause in so doing.

1. And the said C. D. doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators and every of them, covenant, promise and agree to and with the said A. B. his heirs and assigns, in manner following: that he the said C. D. will pay to the said A. B. by two equal half-yearly payments in every year, the first being made on the 25th day of March and the other on the 29th day of September in each year the following rents, that is to say, in the first year the sum of £ _____ which sum constitutes the value of _____ bushels of wheat, according to the average price of wheat for the seven years ending on the 1st of January next preceding the date of this demise, made up and published as required by law for the purposes of the Tithe Commutation Act; and in every other year during the continuance of this demise the value of a like number of bushels of wheat according to the average price, in like manner made up and published for the seven years next preceding; the rent for each year varying with the average price of wheat during the preceding seven years.

2. And the said C. D. covenants with the said A. B. to pay all taxes chargeable upon the said premises during the said term, landlord's taxes excepted.

3. And that the said C. D. will at his own proper cost and charge repair all the house and buildings hereby demised, and also will keep in good repair all the gates, rails, pales, siles, hedges, ditches, fences, banks, bridges, mounds and drains on the said lands, the said A. B. his heirs and assigns furnishing on the said premises or within _____ miles thereof all rough timber, brick, lime, tiles and all other materials whatsoever for making such repairs.

4. And that the said dwelling house and other buildings having been valued by persons of skill at the entry on the said premises by the said C. D. at the sum of £ _____ which valuations are included in the schedule hereunto annexed, the said C. D. shall and will at the expiration of the said term or at the time of his leaving the said premises, whether it be before or after the end of the said term, deliver up to the said A. B. all the buildings so valued in good repair, and shall and will pay to the said A. B. the whole sum by which the said buildings shall have become lessened in value by reason of his neglect to repair the same; and in case any dispute shall arise with respect to the decreased value of the same, such dispute shall be referred to the decision of two arbitrators or their umpire, chosen as hereinafter provided; but the said C. D. shall not in any case be liable for any damage caused by tempest, and a reasonable deduction shall be made for the natural decay and wear and tear of the premises while occupied by him.

5. And that the said C. D. shall not sell or assign over this lease nor underlet the lands hereby demised or any part thereof unless with the written consent of the said A. B. and shall use his best endeavours to protect from injury by cattle or otherwise all trees or quickset hedges growing upon the said lands, and shall not lop or cut any of the trees so growing, pollard trees excepted.

6. And it is hereby agreed that at any time in the sixteenth year of this demise, or in any subsequent year, the said A. B. may require the said C. D. to grow such crops on every portion of the said lands as shall be prescribed by the said A. B., he the said A. B., delivering in writing to the said C. D. the course of cropping prescribed by him; and in case the said C. D. shall object to crop the land as proposed by the said A. B. the point in dispute shall be referred to the decision of arbitrators or their umpire, chosen as is hereinafter provided.

7. And that the said A. B. shall, at all times, have power for himself, or his agent, to go upon any part of the said demised lands for the purpose of inspecting the state of repair of any part thereof, and of ascertaining the state of the management and cultivation thereof; and in case the annual renting value of the said demised lands shall have suffered decrease by reason of the said C. D.'s failing to repair or to cultivate the said lands according to the rules of good husbandry, the said A. B. may give notice to quit to the said C. D. at any time before the 25th day of March in any year, and the said C. D. shall quit and deliver up possession of the said lands on the 29th day of September next ensuing after such notice has been received by him; and in that case arbitrators, or their umpire, appointed as hereinafter mentioned, shall assess the damages to the land and buildings caused by such breach of covenant, which sum so assessed the said C. D. shall pay to the said A. B. And in case the said C. D. object to quit after receiving such notice, he may require that the dispute shall be referred to arbitrators or their umpire, chosen as hereinafter provided; and if they shall decide that the said lands have not been materially deteriorated by the management of the said C. D., such notice shall be void; and if they shall decide otherwise the said C. D. shall quit, and shall pay to the said A. B. whatever sum the said arbitrators, or their umpire, shall judge to be a reasonable compensation for the injury done to the said lands by the said C. D.

8. And that in the event of the said C. D. becoming a bankrupt or insolvent, or of his making any bill of sale or assignment of his estate or effects, or refusing to pay in full the rents herein reserved within one month after the same shall have been lawfully demanded, the said A. B. shall have power immediately to re-enter and repossess the lands herein demised, paying to the said C. D. reasonable compensation for such improvements effected by the said C. D. as have increased the annual renting value of the said lands, the amount thereof being adjudged by arbitrators or their umpire, chosen as hereinafter provided.

9. And the said A. B. covenants with the said C. D. for quiet enjoyment of the herein demised lands; and that the said A. B. shall insure all the buildings upon the said premises, provided always that in case such insurance shall be rendered void by the said C. D. having on the premises goods of a hazardous nature, or by other circumstances caused by the negligence of the said C. D., he, the said C. D., shall pay to the said A. B. the whole amount withheld by the insurance office.

10. And that the said A. B. will effectually drain at his own cost and charge every part of the said lands which require drainage, and that the said C. D. covenants to pay an additional rent after the rate of 5s. for every 100s. expended by the said A. B. from the time of the completion of the whole or any part of the drainage and during the continuance of this demise.

11. And that the said C. D. shall and will, during the time he holds the said lands under this demise, farm them in a good and husbandlike manner, and shall not break up or convert to tillage any of the land marked in the schedule annexed as pasture or meadow land without the written permission of the said A. B. or of his agent lawfully authorised.

12. And the said A. B. and C. D. mutually covenant and agree that any dispute arising in settling their respective claims in respect to any matter contained in this demise, as well as the several matters herein declared to be referable to the decision of arbitrators, shall be settled and decided by persons of skill, appointed in the following manner:—that is to say, the said A. B. shall choose one such person, and the said C. D. shall choose another to be arbitrators, who shall upon being appointed forthwith choose an umpire, whose decision, in case the said arbitrators disagree, shall be final; and should either the said A. B. or the said C. D. refuse or neglect to choose his arbitrator within a month after being required to do so by the other, then either the said A. B., or the said C. D., shall have power to choose and appoint two arbitrators, who shall decide by themselves, or their umpire; and such decision shall be equally binding on both parties, as if each had appointed one arbitrator.

In witness whereof, these presents written on this and the preceding pages are subscribed by the said parties at _____ in the county of _____ and in the presence of _____

This is indeed a great step towards "agricultural protection." It is one of the most simple and even-handed leases which has come under our observation, and deserves to be adopted as the groundwork of that reformation in the frame of leases, which is now indispensable. The forms of leases now commonly in use are practically adapted only to the state of husbandry fifty years ago. From the year 1792 till 1814, the value of land was constantly rising, and the competition for its occupation increased year by year—consequently, the object of farmers was to get farms, and the frame and technicalities of the leases entered but little into their consideration. Hence, during the period of high prices, little substantial alteration or amendment in the common forms of leases was made. In 1815, the blight of the Corn Law fell upon British husbandry; and from that time leases have almost fallen into disuse in England. Tenant and landlord have been alike afraid to bind themselves by permanent contracts under the fluctuations and uncertainties of "protection."

From this cause first commenced the yearly-tenant system, which has of late become one of grievous oppression and loss to the tenant farmers of England. Under this system, however, in the exceptional cases where leases have been granted, the old forms have been adhered to; tenants, if determined to improve their land, being too glad to escape from the perilous condition of yearly tenants to scan very closely the terms of the lease by which they obtained protection against the caprices of landlordism.

The time, however, is now come when a new system must be adopted. Farming, it is admitted, can only be conducted with success by a due application of skill and capital; and skill and capital will only be applied where the tenant is secured in the full possession of the fruits of his own enterprise and industry. Leases, therefore, must become the rule instead of the exception, and the settlement of the preliminary question of what is a fair and practical lease has thus become a necessity. The form promulgated by the Vale of Evesham Association goes far towards the settlement of that question, for it contains provisions which will amply secure the landlord against the deterioration of his property, unless through his own negligence; but we think that somewhat less of restriction on the tenant is required for the full development of the capacity of our soil for increased production.

We have numbered the provisions of this form for the purpose of ready reference, and for the sake of brevity. First, although the reservation of existing timber is not perhaps to be avoided in the actual state of farms, the power to enter to plant other trees is decidedly and seriously objectionable. The object of modern management of land should be to remove all hedgerow timber with as little delay as is consistent with securing to the owner the fair value of his trees. But all new plantings should be made upon portions of the land especially agreed upon and defined for that purpose, and which would naturally be arranged so as to afford shelter and protection to the farm, instead of, as now, obstruction to light, air, and nutriment. This is a most important point in all enclosed and timbered districts.

The next point of objection occurs in provision No. 5, by which the tenant is restricted from assigning or underletting the farm.

This opens a wide question, upon which some of our best managers of land have doubts. But a little consideration will show that the restriction is an injury, not an advantage, to the landlord; whilst it greatly lessens the value of the tenants' interest in the farm. That the tenant or his assigns should be restricted from subdividing the farm is most reasonable and proper, but where the landlord is protected against the deterioration of his property (as we shall show presently he may effectually be, by a slight addition to the form before us), into whose hands soever it may come, the restriction on assigning the farm can only tend to prevent the application of capital to the land.

Let us suppose a farm taken in moderate or ordinary condition, and the tenant to have expended in bringing it at once into a state of high cultivation so much of his capital that he is cramped and pinched for want of floating, ready-money capital. He is a man of substance, for he has invested—sunk, if you please—a large sum of money in his farm, in such acts of husbandry that, unless prevented from following out his plans of culture, he is certain to get back his money with a fair profit during the currency of his lease; but his substance is unavailable as the means of credit. His outlay has much increased "the annual renting value" of his farm, but he can't avail himself of that value to obtain a needful supply of ready money, for he can't pledge his lease. His substance cannot be made a security to his friend or his banker. An additional ten, fifteen, or twenty per cent. on his previous outlay might give a most profitable return upon his total expenditure; but he has no security to give for such addition. Like Tantalus, he starves in the midst of plenty; the profit, which is almost his, eludes his grasp, because his interest in the farm cannot be assigned.

Or, take another case, the farmer has sufficient capital for the usual routine of his business, but he has no surplus; if an opportunity of making an advantageous purchase of extra stock, of a cheap quantity of cattle provender, of straw, or of manure should offer, there can be no doubt of the advantages direct or indirect both the farmer and the farm would derive from the transaction; and, had he the power of assigning his lease, he might, in depositing it with his banker, give security of ten or twenty times the value of the accommodation he receives. Again, the farmer or his family desire to sell the leasehold interest in the farm; and the same offered in the market, unfettered by previous negotiation with the landlord for his acceptance of the new tenant, will attract the attention of farming capitalists. In short, leasehold interests in land must become marketable, in the same way that leasehold interests in house property are now marketable, before capital will be applied to agriculture to the extent that would be most profitable to the farmer and landowner, and advantageous to the community. The provision, No. 7, seems to be effectual to guard the landlord against waste, into whose hands soever the land might come; and therefore the provision, No. 8, which is in fact a simple robbery of the creditors of an insolvent tenant, should, upon the principle that the leasehold interest ought to be marketable, be dispensed with.

The provision for arbitration, contained in No. 12, requires the addition, "that the submission or agreement to refer the matters aforesaid to arbitration, may be made a rule of the Court of Queen's Bench, or other Court of Record, upon the application of either of the parties to this demise." If this provision be omitted, and one party should refuse to refer, the other has no means of enforcing the award, except by a suit in Chancery. The provision we have added gives a summary power to enforce it, under the statute 9 & 10 Wm. III., ch. 15. This should never be omitted.

MONOPOLIST PROPHECIES.

We have again and again had occasion to remark upon the utter hollowness of the monopolist landowners. They are not faithful to their own political creed. They have not, in most instances, the excuse of mere ignorance for the foolishnesses they have palmed upon their tenants upon the subject of Free Trade. Now, there is no one who has given vent to more direful predictions as to the ruin Free Trade would bring upon agriculture, and the danger of driving land out of cultivation, though the free importation of foreign grain, than that genuine monopolist, the Marquis of Salisbury.

This marquis, although not amongst the least ignorant of his not very enlightened class, has a keen and, in a narrow point of view, an accurate regard to his own interest—that is, he knows how to turn a penny under a system of moderate farming, though he has no conception of the real capacity of land for production, and he is too hard and feudal as a landlord to give an enterprising tenant that full possession of his farm and security of tenure, which are essential to profitable farming.

However, the Marquis of Salisbury is a living instance that Mr. Cobden, usually so accurate, erred, when he said that the monopolist landocrats, by whom the industry of the nation has hitherto been trammelled, have not sense enough to enable them successfully to manage a chandler's shop; because the marquis is just fitted for that department. Had fortune and descent not made him a landed magnate, he would, unquestionably, have been eminent in the huckstering and chandlery line, for he has a quick perception of the prospect of an immediate return for a given outlay. Now, we find in the following paragraph from the Herts Mercury the most complete demonstration of the Marquis of Salisbury's own want of faith in his own monopolist prophecies. Let farmers remember, that the Marquis has been one who professed the most extreme apprehension, that with a Free Trade in corn, poor land must go out of cultivation, and moreover that the land referred to in the subjoined paragraph, which, now Free Trade is inevitable, he is bringing into cultivation, is not merely poor, but cold and stubborn land, difficult to cultivate, and they will hereafter know what faith to put in the pretended alarm of these protectionist landocrats:

"CLEARING OF LAND FOR AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES.—On Wednesday last, Mr. Kimpton superintended an extensive sale of timber, at Hoddesdon, comprising 2,647 oak timber trees, and 6,667 oak saplings. The timber and saplings were standing in the following woods:—Mimms Great Wood, near South Mimms, Middlesex; Cloth Hall Woods and Springs, near Baldock; Lady Grove and Wood Hall Wood, near Hatfield; Box Wood, Wormley Wood, Cow Heath and Barnoudsday, Westfield Grove and Spring, near Hoddesdon. We understand that the object of the noble owner, the Marquis of Salisbury, in disposing of this large quantity of timber, is to clear the land for agricultural purposes. We have heard that seven farms are to be created out of the land which will be thus cleared. It is scarcely necessary to inquire whether the noble Marquis can be of opinion that Free Trade will depreciate the value of arable land, when he adopts these measures on the very eve of the downfall of 'Protection.'—Herts Mercury.

In the same district, other landlords are clearing woodlands for the purpose of cultivation. This is a wise proceeding, and it strongly shows that they have no real apprehension from Free Trade.

INDIAN CORN BREAD.

We confess we have always regarded Indian corn as food for stock rather than for man, and we have therefore hailed its free introduction as the means of indirectly increasing the people's food. This it will do in an eminent degree; for it is said we shall ultimately get it at a very cheap rate, and the cheaper the more stock can we keep on our land, and thus reduce the price of wheat by the increased fertility of our own fields. But we learn that maize, or Indian corn meal, makes excellent bread, and that it is coming into extensive use as an article of human food. We are glad of it; and this we say as occupiers of land, especially if not exclusively adapted for the growth of wheat.

We believe no one worthy of the name of "a farmer" has any fear of that competition which excites the sham horror of Mr. Miles and his scarcity-loving band in the House of Commons. We have been led to these remarks by a little tract we have received on the advantages of Indian corn as a cheap and nutritious article of food, by Dr. Bartlett, the Editor of the New York Albion, which gives ample directions for using maize in the various modes common in the United States; and we propose on a future occasion to give some extracts from it.

STATE OF TRADE AT LIVERPOOL.—The only point in connection with the corn trade of this port indicative of the opinion of dealers respecting Sir Robert Peel's measure is the growing indisposition to purchase cargoes of bonded wheat on speculation. This would seem to evince a fear for the ultimate fate of the bill now under discussion in the House of Commons, though, in the present state of the money market, it is rather difficult to judge accurately of the motives of those whose enterprises, in more healthy times, give so much animation and impetus to business. The prevailing malady no doubt depresses the energies of men in all departments of trade, and merely speculative designs are entertained with caution, or held in abeyance till affairs assume a more settled aspect. There has, throughout the past week, been an increased demand for foreign wheat for present use, and buyers from the country have continued to make large purchases at this port for transmission to their respective districts. The purchases of Irish wheat have been so considerable as to cause an advance of price to the extent of threepence to fourpence per bushel. This strengthens the belief lately entertained, to which we alluded last week and the week before, of the low state of the stocks in the principal corn-growing districts of the country. We alluded last week to the increased demand for Indian corn, consequent on the Government order for the release of that article at the low duty proposed under the new tariff. The orders for that description of grain last week were very extensive; floating or forthcoming cargoes being in great request, principally for Ireland. The reputation of Indian corn is, in fact, rapidly increasing, and there is every prospect of this and many other descriptions of nutritious and wholesome food, hitherto almost unknown in this country, coming largely into consumption. Our American brethren, who are considerably anxious to relieve our wants, and at the same time reap legitimate advantage from our necessities, have recently sent over a cargo of red kidney beans, of which not only they, but, we believe, the French and Dutch, are in the habit of cooking substantial and highly nutritious messes. These beans are, when properly prepared, exceedingly palatable, and they can now be obtained at a very low price in many of the shops of this town. Our transatlantic friends must have conceived that we were really on the verge of famine, for some smart denizen of the States has transmitted to us a cargo of lupins—a bitter, unpalatable sort of pulse, of which we do not pretend to know the use or properties, and we believe the consignee of this novel adventure is equally unenlightened. We have not yet had any arrivals of buckwheat, though we know that orders have been transmitted to Hamburg for a quantity to be sent over to this country forthwith by steamer.—Liverpool Albion.

SIX BUSHELS OF SPEECHES.—It appears that our member, Lord George Bentinck, during the 20 years he has occupied a seat in Parliament, for this borough, has been hiding his talents under a bushel. We had no idea his abilities extended beyond the necessary sharpness for making up a book for Newmarket. The Free Trade measures of Sir Robert Peel, however, apparently suddenly have developed them in an extraordinary degree, and his lordship may now be considered the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. That his constituents may be perfectly aware of his attainments, and the place they will in future occupy in the estimation of the country, as the returners to Parliament of so great a statesman, his lordship has furnished a corrected copy of his speech of the 27th of February to the Morning Post, which was published in that paper of the 23d instant, and to the dismay of the letter carriers of Lynn, no less than six bushels arrived by Tuesday morning's mail, directed, we presume by his lordship's orders, to the voters of the borough.—Correspondent of the Cambridge Independent.

PROSPECTS FROM THE REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.—On Tuesday, the grass parks attached to the mansion-house of Barr, the seat of Colonel McDonall, Lochwinnoch, were let by public roup, and the yearly rent obtained for the same amounted to no less than 125*l*. above the sum for which the same ground was let last year. Similar advances have taken place in various parts of the country.—Edinburgh Witness.

A Mr. Smith demanded compensation from the Cork and Brandon Railway Company, for the injury which would be done to the milk of his cows by reason of the noise, steam, and smoke of the locomotives in their transit.

THE DEBATE OF FRIDAY.

(From the Times.)

Friday night went far to reduce the intolerable dulness of the week's debate. The distinguished speakers set to work like men on their subjects, and laid for the pending measure a broad foundation of reason and facts which a House of Lords will find it easier to neglect than overthrow. Novelty, of course, there could be none. What more could be said? What new thing that would not be untrue, what true thing unless it no longer was new? There is, of course, but too much truth in the sarcasms with which the late Foreign Secretary took care to spice his adhesion to the ministerial measure. All has been said times and times before. The League has said it all; Peel himself has said it. "I think," said his lordship:

"That the Government have placed upon somewhat too narrow grounds the justification they have advanced for the change that has taken place in their conduct. They have ascribed that change to their experience during the last three years. I think they would have justly explained the cause if they had imputed it to the debate of the last four sessions. I think it is not merely their experience of their own truth which has altered their opinions, but that the change may be attributed to the speeches of my hon. friend the member for Stockport, and other hon. gentlemen who have advocated, session after session, with an eloquence unanswerable, and with arguments which could not be disputed, those principles of freedom of commerce upon which the measures of Government are founded."

After a preparation which has really been years in progress, and which the crisis, if crisis it be, has only brought to a head, all that remains is the summing up of the argument. It must be rather tedious, after the splendid harangues of the counsel, the dexterous examination and cross-examination of witnesses, the elaborate arguments, the sudden surprises, the diverting episodes of a long and important trial, to listen to the very same things, collected, stuffed, and dried by the judge. Wonderful as his memory and skill may be, nothing but a caput mortuum of barren recapitulations can now be extracted from the cause. The harvest has been secured by the League, the gleaming is all that is left for her Majesty's ministers, or, indeed, for the statesmen of either party. Such is the rightful meed of original spirit and genius; and such, on the other hand, the penalty of those who are slow to learn, and still slower to act on their growing convictions. They may at last master the whole argument, and what is more, they may triumph over the hostility and suspicion that inevitably dog the path of the convert. They may seem not only to speak the truth, but also to believe it; yet all has been said before. The freshness of the thing is gone. The more the speaker proves his new system, the more he condemns his own long resistance. Others have discovered the new world, and deservedly given it their name. Peel and Graham are only the settlers who securely cross the well explored ocean, and comfortably squat on the now familiar shore.

One topic there was, however, which assumed a new and peculiar interest in Sir Robert Peel's hands, chiefly on account of the practical comments with which it is in his power to illustrate it. Sir R. Peel can not only enunciate principles of taxation, he has the power of following them up, and therefore every word he drops on that subject, whatever its truth, cannot fail to be important.

The Premier's first feeling on the subject is to relieve the classes whose incomes are, as he expresses it, under 9*s*., 12*s*., 15*s*., or 30*s*. a week. He points out that the expenditure of these classes is almost entirely on articles which are heavily taxed. In the lowest rank of this census, the larger part, a half, or two-thirds of the pittance goes for bread. So large a place does the staff of life occupy in the labourer's budget, that if its price rises but a little, it swallows the whole of his earnings. Sir Robert Peel, without committing himself to the opinion that the repeal of the Corn Laws will really reduce the price of bread, asks for the labourer and operative the chance of this result. What if bread should fall, he says, why should we hesitate to give so great a boon to the poor man, at so small a cost, if any, to the rich?

"Well, then, supposing the effect of this law is to cause some reduction in the price of wheat, pray let us ask ourselves this question:—supposing that such is the effect, are you not thus materially adding to the comforts and to the enjoyments of millions of your fellow-objects? Let me assure you that this is by far the most important part of the question. It is impossible to deny—you know that I gave you credit for it—the real sympathy which you have for the interest and the condition of the working classes in this country. Yes, I don't agree at all with those who make imputations against you—against your humanity; and I do believe that among the gentlemen of England there is sincere sympathy with the suffering of the poor, and much of an honest desire to make better the condition of the working classes. I would almost say that there is more than among any other class."

Nothing can be more honourable, or, we will add, more safe, than such a wish as a ruling motive of policy. A mere anxiety, however, to lighten the expenses and hardships of the poor may be misdirected, as Sir R. Peel himself takes care to intimate in this passage. As a statesman he is bound to give us a principle as well as a sentiment; and the principle which he does give, and adduces in behalf of his present measure, is quoted from Adam Smith, who says, "The first maxim with respect to taxation is, that every man contribute to the taxation of the State in proportion to the revenue which he enjoys under the protection of the State." Sir Robert then proceeds to express his opinion that we have been violating this maxim by pressing with undue severity on the poor—by taxing them beyond the proportion of their revenue.

The principle, however, is one so impossible of express application that we very much question whether it is worth anything except as an occasional check. There are times when it becomes very manifest that taxation does directly or indirectly press upon the poor, if not by adding to their expenses, yet by curtailing their means. Such is undoubtedly the case now. As the taxation of the country now stands, the poor are the sufferers. Causa latet, res est notissima. A burden, a fetter, a blight, is on the condition of the poor. Adam Smith's maxim, therefore, becomes a startling truth—a beacon, a rule, which, intricate and impossible as its rigorous application may be, now at all events, testifies against the actual system of the day. The poor are the least protected, and their difficulties the greatest. Taxed or not taxed, they are by position the least able to better themselves.

Nothing, however, can be more hazardous than to rest an argument on a principle of such difficult application. It will of course be said, and prima facie with much plausibility, that the surest way of taxing all parties according to their revenue is to tax the articles of the most universal consumption. It will be argued that the most practical plan is to levy a tax on bread, and if it should happen that any particular class will gain by the impost, we can equalise matters, and do in fact equalise matters, by charging them with some special burthens. It may also be said, with still greater plausibility, that a tax on food must reach all classes with proportionate force, because the expenditure of the wealthy is, in fact, only an aggregation of less expenditures, the employer being the great paymaster of the employed.

Space will not permit us now to repeat the arguments by which this alleged system of fiscal equivalents has often been confuted. We only wish to deprecate any attempt to apply this maxim as a ground either for direct or for universal taxation. Sir Robert Peel himself has saved us the necessity for saying anything as to its direct application. The Income-tax, which, as far as it goes, aims at carrying out the principle, he admits to be a severe tax on the classes expressly exempted from its direct force. As for universal taxation,—that which aims to reach all classes with a sort of arithmetical fairness,—we believe that to be equally certain to disappoint itself. Eccæ signum. The most universal tax, that on bread, cannot be maintained, for it is found to press with double force on the labouring classes. It both directly increases their costs, and indirectly exhausts their means. A tax on food is a tax on labour, and therefore on production. It strikes at the very root of prosperity. Tax unproductive expenditure; tax luxuries, as far as they are luxuries, within certain reasonable limits; but spare the very sinews and strength of the country. Do not tax industry itself.

"PROTECTION" PETITIONS.

(From the Carlisle Journal.)

We have this week the opportunity of presenting to our readers a very "remarkable" petition.

In the House of Commons last week, a petition for "Protection to British Industry" was presented by Lord George Bentinck, purporting to be from "3000 persons engaged in the cultivation of land in the eastern division of Cumberland; and amongst those who had signed it Lord George asserted that, " (with the exception of those engaged on one farm, Cubby Hill)" it had received the signatures of "every one of the tenants of his right hon. friend, the Laird of Netherby Hall (Sir James Graham), praying the House to reject the measures of the Government." The accounts add that "the presentation of the petition created a considerable sensation."

Well, when we consider that the eastern division of Cumberland contains upwards of 5000 electors—that the petition had been hawked from farmstead to farmstead to catch the important signature of each stable-boy—that every village school had contributed its quota of names—the wonder is, not that there were 3000, but that there were not 10,000 signatures. The result which the fact furnishes—supposing the 3000 were bonâ fide signatures—is, that not one-tenth of the electors had signed the petition. But, when we show, as we shall do presently, that in innumerable instances the signatures were not bonâ fide—that they were either forgeries, downright frauds upon the legislature, or had no existence at all—the utter worthlessness of the petition as a representation of public opinion or public feeling must be manifest. Of course, Lord George Bentinck merely followed his brief—stating only what he had been told by those who instructed him; but his instructor must have known the falsehood he was trying to play off upon the house and the country; and if Lord George be an honest man, he will denounce his betrayer to the world. Some time previous to the protection petition being sent off, we heard of the fraudulent way in which signatures had been attached to it; but we could not believe that any one who had the least value for his character, as a man of honesty and truth, would venture to instruct a Member of the House of Commons to proclaim a falsehood; and we therefore declined noticing what we had heard until the proof was undoubted. That proof we have now before us, in the form of a petition to Parliament, signed by 114 of Sir James Graham's tenants, praying for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and denouncing the statement of Lord George Bentinck as an untruth!

The tenantry on the Netherby estate is probably one of the most intelligent bodies of agriculturists in the kingdom, and the indignation with which they read Lord George Bentinck's misrepresentation of their feelings and opinions may easily be conceived. To be held up to the world as selfish monopolists, caring only for their own interests, and as so ignorant as not to know that in freedom of trade is their only true protection, must have been galling beyond measure. A meeting was immediately held amongst a few of the most influential of them, and a petition drawn up which received the signatures of not less than 114 of the tenants in less than two days. There was not time to see the farmers in what are called the "out manors" of Sir James Graham's estate, or the number would have been swelled considerably. A few of the parties who have signed have attached to their names the amounts which they pay in rent. These amounts will speak for themselves as to the interest which the petitioners possess in the land, and show how little intelligent men fear competition with foreigners. The total amount of rental paid by the petitioners is, we believe, somewhere about 15,000*l.* per annum—nearly three-fourths of the whole rental of Sir James's estate.

Here, then, is ample proof of the grossness of the frauds practised upon the house by what are called "protection" petitions; and we shall be much surprised if this exposure of the utter worthlessness of the East Cumberland petition in favour of "protection to native industry" do not create a "sensation" much more "considerable" than that created by Lord George Bentinck's most untruthful statement.

We subjoin a copy of this remarkable petition, with a few of the names attached to it; and it is proper we should add that neither Sir James Graham nor his steward had the slightest knowledge that such a petition was in agitation. The first intimation Sir James will have of its existence will be its presentation to the house by Mr. Cobden, who was selected for this honour, not less as a compliment to him for his great services to the country as a real "farmer's friend," than to show that it was by no influence or dictation of their landlord that the farmers on "the Laird of Netherby Hall's" estate have thus come forward to vindicate their claim to be considered men of common sense and intelligence.

The petition was sent to Mr. Cobden on Thursday, and would probably be presented to the house last night. The following is a copy:—

"TO THE HONOURABLE THE COMMONS IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

"The petition of the undersigned the tenants of the Right Honourable Sir J. R. G. Graham, Baronet, M.P., on the estate of Netherby, in the County of Cumberland,

"Sheweth,—That your petitioners are a class of men not accustomed to dabble in politics, but at the same time in this most important crisis cannot refrain from expressing their undivided opinion on the great measure now before your Honourable House: that they view the measure of the Government with the greatest satisfaction, but cannot refrain from saying that total and immediate repeal would still more heartily have met their approval.

"We beg also to state to your Honourable House, that the assertion made by Lord George Bentinck on the presentation of a petition from East Cumberland in favour of protection to agriculture, that the whole of the farmers on the Netherby estate, with one exception, had signed that petition, is erroneous and unfounded in fact.

"That some few of such farmers did sign the petition is true; but they now regret having done so, and admit that they were induced to sign it in an unguarded moment; whilst the names of others were attached to it without their knowledge or consent.

"That your petitioners look upon the great measure proposed by Government as wise, generous, and leading; and therefore pray your Honourable House to pass it into a law as speedily as possible.

"And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

	Rent.
"William Reed, Mead Farm	£600 0
William Graham, Cubbyhill,—farms 390 acres of land.	207 9
John Corrie, Fould Mill	145 0
Irvine Reay, Brisco-hill	240 0
Frances Stockbridge, Bush-on-Lyne	350 0
John Wilkin, Randalston	330 0
Archibald Thomson, Parcels-town	440 0
Richard Carruthers, Hornick-hill	350 0
Joseph Johnston, Stone House	200 0
Mary Baxter, Fould	507 0
Jane Little, Guards' Mill	280 0
John Birrell, Guards' Farm	558 0
John Fawkes, Smalshaw-town	600 0
Robert Gibbons, Mosshead	325 0
Herbert Wilkin, Bush Farm	730 0
William Armstrong, Batimush	292 10
John Ferguson, Glinger Mill	75 0
John Johnston, Milles Braehead	160 0
Robt. Ferguson, Glinger Bank
J. Plenderleath, Rea Clough
W. Johnston, Shadwell Crook
Ann Ridley, Shadwell Crook
W. Graham, Crow's-yeat
Wm. Nichol, Duffstownrigg
Barbara Little, Glinger Burn
John Atkin, Beck
Geo. Johnston, Bogburn
Thos. Graham, Franks-town
Wm. Beattie, Bogburn
Charles Graham, Bogburn
Wm. McVitie, Bogburn
John Beattie, Beatt's-town
George Graham, Hills-town
John Beattie, Moss-side
George Bell, Calve Ilpeth
Simon Johnston, Nether Beck
John Blaylock, Beckside
Robert Wilson, Beckside
John Beattie, Croft
John Parish, Becksides
Thos. Graham, Beck Common
Jas. Brown, Brown-rigg
Lucy Wilson, Looming
Jas. Irving, Close-gap
Richard Peel, Braehead
Frances Graham, Braehead
John Livingstone, Braehead
Richard Byers, Braehead
George Graham, Pattenstown
John Robson, Pattenstown
Andrew Ward, Longtown
Francis Lamb, Longtown
Wm. Graham, Longtown
Wm. Hayton, Plump.

REVIEW.

The Quarterly Review, No. 154, Postscript. London: Murray.

We thought that we had done with Rigby—"Time was when the brains were out, the man would die"—but that time is not the present, for this veteran defender of abuses has again put forward his exploded fallacies, and has once more expounded the policy of preferring the exigencies of party to the interests of a people. The purpose of the article is to urge the protectionists to keep something—to grasp the rags when the robe is torn from them—to retain even the diminished sliding scale of Peel's measure rather than allow total Free Trade. He does not any longer require that no alteration should be permitted. The visions of county meetings and agricultural petitions have faded from his view. Even in his opinion, the doom of the existing Corn Laws is sealed; but he thinks that delay might afford opportunity for capitulation. He cannot bear to surrender at discretion, seeing that discretion, either moral or political, has never been the attribute either of himself or his party.

One of Rigby's recommendations has been adopted. Delay is granted. Sir Robert Peel has interposed the Irish Coercion Bill between the stages of the Corn Bill; and the result must be a long and fierce series of debates, with fresh incentives to violence, and fresh facts to be disputed brought over by every mail. We are not about to discuss the Irish Bill; the extermination of tenants and the assassination of landlords are subjects far too painful for us to quit our prescribed course to examine; but we must say that, whether viewed as a part of political expediency or national policy, the appearance of the Coercion Bill in the House of Commons at this crisis is a calamity deeply to be lamented.

Rigby's text is the speedy dissolution of Sir R. Peel's Ministry. The country has survived greater calamities, for the principles of the Ministerial measure would survive the Ministry. There are two great elements of hope presented to the Conservatives—the probability of war, and the formation of a Cabinet by Lord Stanley. There is about as much chance of the one as the other. No sane man receives the possibility of either contingency. The plain truth is, that at home and abroad Free Trade is received as un fait accompli. The question is fairly placed in issue between a protectionist party and a commercial nation—between the preservation of monopoly and the existence of trade. The tactics of the protectionists have tended to bring the question to this simple issue. They demand a dissolution at a moment when all the monetary arrangements of the country would be thrown into perilous confusion by the suspension of the progress of the railway bills now before Parliament. They interpose delay, and nothing but delay, when all the great interests of the country demand an immediate settlement of a question in which not only their prosperity but their very existence is involved. Does Rigby suppose that this unparalleled exhibition of utter recklessness and undisguised selfishness is unnoticed and unknown? He has been too much accustomed to measure the moral tone of the country from the exhibitions of such patrons as a luxurious marquis surrounded by French mistresses. We tell him that neither Hertford morals nor Castlereagh principles of policy are applicable to existing circumstances; and that he but lures to their doom those whom he invites to follow him in either the one or the other. He seems to the existing public like a creature of the court of Nero, attempting to regulate the Government of Titus.

It is, however, gratifying to find that he is humiliated. The insane miser in the old picture is represented as satisfied with hoarding farthings, when his gold was consigned to the care of his legal guardians. Rigby declares that he will be content with the beggarly scraps of protection which Peel has flung almost contemptuously from the agricultural budget to gratify a greedy and a yelping pack. "Keep up, at least, a show of Corn Laws," he says; "for if that question is settled, you know not what may be hidden behind it." Now, we very much question the policy or the prudence of hinting that there are profitable abuses and lucrative corruptions veiled by the Corn Laws. To a corrupt party that may be a valid reason for retaining them; but, to an uncorrupt people, it is a further incentive to remove them as soon as possible. Taking Rigby's favourite and characteristic ground of paltry and selfish expediency, we are convinced that his recommendations would be far more ruinous to his party than injurious to the nation. He believes that "a vigorous demonstration of opinion in the Lords" would render the passage of the bill in the Commons "problematical." Perhaps so; but might there not be "a vigorous demonstration of opinion," outside the precincts of the palace of Westminster which would solve the problem very decisively?

Compound Atlas of the Ancient, Middle, and Modern Ages. London: Hall and Gower.

Although this truly national work has not yet been issued to the public, sufficient progress has been made in its preparation to enable us to form some estimate of its importance, both historically and commercially. We could wish that a less dubious name than the "Compound Atlas" had been given to the work; it should have been called the Historical and Comparative Atlas, for its distinctive merit is to set before the student at one view the ancient, the mediæval, and the modern names of countries and places. It has the further merit of setting forth more clearly than is usual in ordinary maps the natural features and geographical characteristics of the countries delineated,—particularly the course of mountain ranges, the fluvial system, as determined by declivities, and the arrangement of islands on the coast.

Students of history have long felt the want of such a work. The changes of name frequently compel them to consult several Atlases in succession before they can identify the localities to which they desire to refer; and there must, consequently, be a great saving of time when they are enabled to effect this identification at a single glance. But there is a still more important advantage arising from a comparative Atlas: the changes of name are very often our best, and not untruly, our only clue in tracing the migrations and the conquests of races, which have left few written memorials of their vicissitudes. In the Celtic, the Teutonic, and the Slavonic history, philology applied to names must ever be a most important element in determining the course of their migrations, and the extent of their conquests. Thus the first England was in the peninsula of Jutland, and the first France in the circle of Saxony.

We may also notice the importance of such an Atlas in tracing the progress of maritime and inland discovery. There are many interesting and perplexing problems connected with claims to priority of discovery which can only be solved by the accurate determination of the names which the place bore in the earlier maps. The history of civilisation is so connected with the progress of discovery, that the problems to which we have alluded cannot be regarded as mere matters of antiquarian curiosity, but as affording most useful aid in fixing the landmarks by which we are to estimate the general progress of humanity and of human knowledge.

It is only within the last few years that the importance of mediæval history has been appreciated. In the last century, the middle ages were regarded as a long period of intellectual degradation, during which the course of civilisation was retrograde, and the triumph of barbarism all but complete. We have learned a better lesson: we have discovered that the civilisation of the old world had become effete, and that it sunk into decay from sheer decrepitude, but that there was growing by the side of this expiring system new and vigorous elements of civilisation, which, like the infant Hercules, won signal triumphs while yet in the cradle; and heralded the glorious maturity, of which we have not yet seen the full and complete development. By smoothing the path for the students of this important epoch in the annals of our race, the proprietors of the Comparative Atlas will have opened to historical students, where they may meet incalculable sources of amusement and instruction.

"Fresh fields and pastures new,"

To a commercial nation, such an Atlas is of inestimable importance. It is a fact that has attracted too little notice, that hardly any of the caravan routes of antiquity has ever been wholly abandoned, and that the overland commerce of Central Asia traverses the same tracks that were used in the days of the Phœnicians and Babylonians. No one can read the twenty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel without being surprised to find in how many instances the merchants of Tyre bartered in the very marts which are now opened to the enterprise of the merchants of London. Steam has brought us back to the Red Sea, and rolled back the revolutions effected by the discoveries of Pasco di Gama. Suez has recovered the importance which it possessed as Arsinoe; and it is not unlikely that the ancient glories of Ezion Geber and Berenice may be revived at Akaba and Cosseir.

So far as we have been able to examine these maps, we must pronounce them most creditable specimens of the engraver's skill. The pains taken to secure cleanness and accuracy in the mechanical execution deserve not less commendation than the labour and research which has been bestowed on the identification of ancient names with modern places. We need not add a word more; such a work must command success, so long as commerce is valued and history appreciated.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Poulton, Esq., Samuel Harrison, Esq.,
Richard Potter, Esq., Dr. James Cardale,
William Levens, Esq., John Gadsby, Esq.,
William Wilson, Esq., H. Hall, Esq., Uxbridge.
R. G. Welford, Esq., Richard Murnet, Esq.,
Sidney Smith, Esq., J. Matson, Esq.,
Charles Swaisland, Esq., Crayford.

TREASURERS.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace, Islington.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place.
Captain Gogan, Upper Mill, Haumervanika.

BANKERS.
Messrs. Prescott, Grote, & Co.

SOLICITOR.
Josh. Ivey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.

SECRETARY.
Mr. Frederick Farrand, Priory Villa, Peshkam.

PROSPECTUSES may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Office, East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street. The Rules (4d. each) are now ready, and may be had as above.

Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately.

The Society's Office will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

As the Second Subscription is about to be called for, parties intending to avail themselves of the benefits of the Association are requested to make application for shares immediately. Until the Second Subscription is called in, shares can be obtained on the same terms as those which have been already taken up. Attendance at the Office, East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from Six to Nine o'clock.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 4, 1846.

The calculations of the probable result of a division on the ministerial measures in the House of Lords are, as yet, very vague, in consequence of the great number of waverers, who have not yet declared to which side they will give their adhesion. Among those who "halt between two opinions," we are informed that a considerable number of the bishops may be ranked; and we are further told that their hesitation has exposed them to considerable censure. We do not join those who attribute the doubts of the right reverend prelates to unworthy motives. It is true, that in the last century, when the Duke of Newcastle had the management of ministerial patronage, it used to be said of a doubtful ecclesiastic—

"Between his two masters, what course can he trace,
On one side his God—on the other his Grace."

But it must be confessed that those in whose hands episcopal appointments have been vested during the last 30 years, have been guided in their choice more by considerations of public benefit than of party exigency, and that there was never a period in our history when the right reverend bench could exhibit such a strength of moral character, talent, and learning, as it displays at the present moment. We know not the causes of the doubts that are said to haunt the minds of many prelates, but we do know that the precepts and example of their Blessed Master inculcate the feeding of the hungry as the first of Christian practical duties, and that the most severe denunciations in the inspired volume are pronounced against those who create artificial famine to gratify their own rapacity.

The established church is based on law; but law derives its validity from public opinion. The alliance of the clerical body in France with an oppressive aristocracy precipitated the French Revolution, and produced that hostility to Christianity, the effects of which have not disappeared from the minds of the present generation. The real strength of a hierarchy is in the hearts and affections of the people. A church is not a fortress, to be covered by bayonets and protected by artillery. It must appeal to the feelings, not to the fears of the nation; and any clerical member of the establishment who gives support to the Corn Laws, is an enemy to religion and a traitor to his order.

We cannot believe that any such will be found on the episcopal bench. We cannot be persuaded that any of our venerable prelates will be callous to the precepts of sacred, and the warnings of profane history. They have not one duty as barons, and another as bishops. Their secular rank is subordinate to their spiritual functions, and they should therefore, in such a case as is now offered to their consideration, decide as pastors, and not as partisans.

Mediæval history relates many anecdotes of bishops who preferred their politics to their pastoral care. One of them, who headed an army in an unjust attack upon his neighbours, declared he made war as a prince, not as a bishop; upon which it was shrewdly asked, "when Satan claims the prince, what will become of the bishop?" We live in different times; the continuance of the church must mainly depend on the conduct of its ministers; the establishment must rest upon its character; and if those by whom it is directed mistake its purpose and pervert its object, they incur for the institution to which they belong the penalty denounced against the school of false prophets, and bright exceptions will not atone for general delinquency. "Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should save but their own souls by their righteousness."

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. Mar.23	MON. Mar.30	TUES. Mar.31	WED. April 1	THUR. April 2	FRI. April 3
Bank Stock	210½	shut.	shut.	shut.	shut.	shut.
3 per Ct. Ann.	Shut.	shut.	shut.	shut.	shut.	shut.
3 per Ct. Con. Ann.	96½	96½	96½	96½	96½	96½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	96½	shut.	shut.	shut.	shut.	shut.
Long. An. Ex. 1860	102	102	102	102	102	102
Cons. for Acct.	96½	96½	96½	96½	96½	96½
Exc. Bills, pm.	27-30	30-27	27-10	30-28	25-29	96½
Ind. Bds. in 1000f.	27-30	30-27	27-10	30-28	25-29	96½
Venezuela 2 per Ct.	..	28 pm.	22	30-28	30	..
Do. deferred.	..	13½	13	..
Belgian 4½ per Ct.	..	98½	..	99
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	82½
Chilian	..	97	..	96
Columb. ex. Venez.	16	17	..
Danish	87½
Dutch 2½ per Cent.	..	50½	50½	50½	50½	50½
Dutch 4 per Cent.	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½	94½
Mexican	..	31	31½	31½	32½	32
Peruvian
Portug. conv.
Russian 5 per Cent.	109½	108½
Spanish 5 per Ct.	25½	25½	25½	25½	25½	25½
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.	37	36½	36½	36½	..	36½

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, March 30.—Up to Saturday night the arrivals of every kind of grain into this port were very moderate. This morning a good show of Wheat samples, both by land-carriage and coastways, is made on the Essex, Kent, and Suffolk stands; and fair quantities of Barley and Oats have also come to hand since Saturday. In the morning, last Monday's prices were asked for English Wheat, but millers had very cautiously, and the market closed 1s. to 2s. cheaper than this day week. Bonded Wheat remains the same as last week, without much inquiry. Barley is a heavy sale, and last Monday's rates are with difficulty obtained; the heaviest descriptions of Chevalier meet a ready sale. The chief part of the show of Oats consists of English samples, which continue to come, as they have done all this season, very light; 1s. more is asked than on Monday last, and 6d. is obtained, but the advance checks business, and the trade is flat. Beans are in fair supply, and fine qualities rather dearer. No alteration in Peas.

S. H. LUCAS.

BRITISH.		Per Imperial Quarter
Wheat, Essex,	Red 54 to 60	White 58 to 66
Kent, & Suffolk	49 58	56 63
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	47 51	54 62
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	25	25
Ditto	Black	23 6	26
Ditto	Polands	New 27
Scotch Feed	25 26	Potato 28	29
Limerick	25
Ditto	Fine New 27 29	Old Fine	none
Cork	24 25
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	23 24
Sligo
Galway	19 21
Barley	26 33
Beans, Mazagan	31 33
Harrow	33 37
Small	39 40
Peas, White	Boilers	38 42
Grey	30 32	Maple	32 34
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs.	..	45 56
Norfolk and Suffolk	43 46

FOREIGN.		PER IMPERIAL QUARTER.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	58 to 66	54 60
Rostock	56	60 50 54
Stettin	52	58 50 54
Hamburg	52	57 50 52
Odessa	41 50
Odessa Polish	50 51
Russian	soft
Ditto	hard
Spanish	54	60
Blanquillo	56	62
Australian	60	69
Barley, Grinding	27	28
Distilling	29	31
Oats, Archangel	25	26
Danish
Swedish	23	24
Stralsund
Dutch Feed	22	23 20 21
Brew	27	29 23 24
Polands	25 26
Black
Beans, Egyptian	34	36
Peas, White
Ditto Boilers	42	..
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 196 lbs.	34	36
United States	36	37 28 30
Dantzic
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Mar. 23 to Mar. 28, 1846, both days inclusive.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	2576	1580	2784	664	209
Scotch	553
Irish	6395
Foreign	5044	..	8	2115	..

Flour, 1919 sacks; 1300 barrels.

FRIDAY, APRIL 3.—Only a moderate quantity of Wheat, Barley, and Oats has come to hand since Monday; most of the Essex Wheat was sold on that day; but there are still some samples exhibited on the Cornish stands, which factors find it difficult to sell, though offered on Monday's terms. There is so little business passing in Barley, Beans, and Peas, that no attention in any of them can be noticed. The supply of Oats consists chiefly of English; the market is decidedly more heavy than on Monday, but both on Wednesday and to-day, buyers have been exceedingly cautious; the prices of Oats have undergone no alteration this week. The inquiry noticed on Monday for Indian Corn does not continue with much briskness. The duties remain the same as last week.

S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 30th of March to the 3rd of April, both inclusive.

	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	6020	..	3910
Barley	6540
Oats	7560	3030	2410

Flour, 5630 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending March 31, 1846.

	Qrs.	Price.		Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	7962	60s. 2d.	Rye	134	35s. 5d.
Barley	1733	32s. 5d.	Beans	1409	33s. 10d.
Oats	2884	23s. 6d.	Peas	423	39s. 0d.

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.
s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d.
21st Feb.	55	0.29	11.21	6.32	10.34	9.34
28th "	54	6.29	7.21	5.33	4.34	2.35
7th March	54	10.29	3.21	10.33	6.34	11.33
14th "	54	3.29	4.21	9.34	2.35	2.34
21st "	55	1.29	10.22	0.33	10.34	4.33
28th "	55	5.30	2.22	1.34	0.35	0.33

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 54s. 10d.; Barley, 29s. 8d.; Oats, 21s. 9d.; Rye, 33s. 7d.; Beans, 34s. 9d.; Peas, 34s. 1d.

Duty. Wheat, 18s. 0d.; Barley, 9s. 0d.; Oats, 6s. 0d.; Rye 9s. 6d.; Beans, 8s. 6d.; Peas, 8s. 6d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Mar. 5, 1846.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.	Flour
In London, 442560	17299	61192	..	6144	3462	112976
Unit. King. 1138950	82919	96983	..	13413	8127	837355

MEAT MARKET.
Trade upon the whole rather declining, except for a chosen lamb or calf.

PER STONE OF 8 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.		BY THE CARCASE.
Prime Beef. 3s 10d to 3s 8d	Middl. Mutton 4s 2d to 3s 8d	Prime Pork 4s 4d to 4s 0d	Small Pork 4s 0d to 3s 8d
Prime Beef. 3s 10d to 3s 8d	Prime Pork 4s 4d to 4s 0d	Small Pork 4s 0d to 3s 8d	Prime Mutton 4s 4d to 4s 0d
Prime Beef. 3s 10d to 3s 8d	Prime Pork 4s 4d to 4s 0d	Small Pork 4s 0d to 3s 8d	Prime Mutton 4s 4d to 4s 0d

THE LORDS' COMMITTEE ON SPECIAL BURDENS.—We hear that the committee on special burdens have alighted on curious information; and some of those who at last consented to the inquiry, which they had so long and so astutely resisted, begin to repent of their rashness. Perhaps the disclosures may have the effect of justifying some more conversions to the new policy.—Spectator.

If fresh brewer's grains be put down in handfals here and there about the borders on mild nights these heaps will be covered with slugs, which can be readily destroyed by a dusting of powder, quick lime, or salt.

Potatoes this week at Croom had reached the enormous price of 10d. per stone, by retail.

Fisher, Son, and Co., the Caxton Press, Angel-street, Newgate-street, London

THE LEAGUE.

No. 133.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1846.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

WHY COMPROMISE IS IMPOSSIBLE.

This week exactly completes the seventh year of that portion of our movement which has been conducted by the agency of the periodical press. On the 16th of April, 1839, appeared the first number of the Anti-Corn-Law Circular—subsequently enlarged into the Anti-Bread-Tax Circular, and since continued in this journal.

The present is scarcely the fittest season for taking a leisurely and comprehensive retrospect of the labours, sacrifices, and successes, that have crowded this eventful period. With our great work still unfinished—still exposed to delay, obstruction, and (as regards immediate results) to the risks of political accident—we cannot afford to take our eyes off the present, and that part of the future which lies nearest to us. In alluding, on the suggestion of this interesting anniversary, to the past history of our question, our purpose is simply to enforce a lesson of present and practical application, the need of which is, we fear, even yet not altogether gone by.

Throughout the entire term of the existence and operations of the Anti-Corn-Law League, we have steadily and undeviatingly pursued one, and only one object—the TOTAL abolition of that monopoly, our antagonism to which is indicated in the style and title of our organisation. For this have we, the Free Traders of the United Kingdom, banded ourselves with a compact unanimity, and laboured with a continuity of exertion, and a zeal and prodigality of sacrifice, unexampled in the history of popular movements. To this we are irrevocably committed. With nothing short of this can we, for an instant, be satisfied. Anything and everything short of this is, to us, as nothing. Until this be realised, in an Act of Parliament, we are as we were—with our work all to do.

This totality of our demand is no mere piece of dogmatism or self-willedness on the part of those whom the country recognises as the leaders of the League. There is nothing arbitrary or wilful in it. It results from the very nature of the intellectual and moral elements that constitute the League's life and soul. It is the inevitable product and expression of those diverse, yet harmonious, principles of action, which have combined in this movement a larger amount of the intelligence and moral feeling of the country than were ever before leagued together in one common cause. This will immediately appear if we attempt to discriminate the classes of which the League is composed, with reference to the ruling impulses by which they are severally actuated. These are mainly two. There are the Free Traders who regard the question from what may be called the commercial and politico-economical point of view—and there are Free Traders to whom it is chiefly interesting as a moral and religious question. There are those who seek the total abolition of the Corn Law, as logically implying and practically necessitating the extinction of the whole of the protective and restrictive system—and there are those with whom it is an affair of conscience and religion to protest against a tax on food, as intrinsically oppressive and iniquitous. There are those who intelligently deprecate, as fraught with national loss and injury, every violation of the common-sense rule of commercial interchange, "Buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest"—and there are those whose moral and religious sense is outraged by the impiety of wilfully intercepting heaven's answer to man's prayer for daily bread. Neither of these two points of view, we need scarcely say, excludes the other. Our best Free Traders take both—with an habitual preference, however, of that which most accords with the profession, the circumstances, the range of experience and observation, the cast of mind of the individual. The two classes we have indicated run very much into one another. The commercial statesman, whose thoughts dwell mostly on the impolicy of fettering trade, is likewise indignant at the cruel injustice of taxing the poor man's ways and means of life; and the religious philanthropist, whose conscience is revolted by the injustice, is likewise cognisant of the impolicy. On the whole, however, the distinction is sufficiently exact. One or the other of these two principles of thought and action—the commercial and economical, or the moral and religious—is the main actuating impulse of every individual member of our great Free Trade confederacy.

Now, each of these two elements of our movement implies the totality of Corn Law repeal. The smallest remnant of the landlord monopoly violates the sound commercial principle of free exchanges, and affords a plea for a thousand other and minor violations of that principle;—a particle of unrepealed bread-tax offends the moral instinct which demands the unrestricted flow of heaven's bounties to man. Let the Corn Law be but partially repealed; let any sort of compromise be huddled up between truth and falsehood, right and wrong; and the claims of principle remain unsatisfied—the force of a movement that represents and embodies a principle remains unabated. If the League's work is not to be done now, the League goes on, with unspent powers, until it is done. And this, not because Mr. Cobden, or Mr. Bright, or the League Council, says that so it shall be. So it MUST be, in the nature of things. There is no help for it. It lies not in the power of man to deal with the force of opinion and conscience that the League embodies on any other than its own terms.

We commend all this to the especial consideration of those extremely imprudent persons, who, if one may credit the rumours floating about in the atmosphere of the clubs and the lobbies—are still amusing themselves with the fancy that it is not absolutely impossible to "adjust," as they call it, the question now before the country, on the basis of a "fixed duty." Even could one conceive of the possibility of a fixed duty on corn getting temporary possession of the statute book, it would merely leave matters as they stand. Nothing would be "adjusted," except the terms and objects of a new agitation as vigorous, as determined, and as certainly successful, as that which has already beaten down two sliding scales. Nothing would be "fixed," except the sure and swift defeat and extinction of the power that thus linked itself with a fixed absurdity and a fixed iniquity. The commercial and economical intelligence of the country, and the moral and religious sentiment of the country—those two irresistible forces of which the League and its agitation are the expression, would still remain in unabated antagonism to landlordism and landlord law.

Whoever they may be who think of trying this monstrous experiment on the public patience, and on the power of landlordism and aristocracy to crush the spirit of the people, we are sure, at all events, they will find neither support nor sympathy at the hands of the farmers. The farmers want, above all things and before all things, a settlement; and there is not a farmer in Great Britain, whether of protectionist or of Free Trade principles, who will ever dream of this being a settlement. The cheat will be too transparent. The farmers have had more than a "three years' experience" of the value of landlord promises of "settlement;" and they are also, experimentally acquainted with the value of League promises. They know who they are that have always deceived them in the matter of Parliamentary prices and artificial Corn Laws; and they know who they are that have never deceived them. From the hour that protection takes any other shape than that of the "permanent sliding scale of 1842," and the "fifty-six shillings," from that hour will the farmers of Great Britain have but one wish and prayer—the total and immediate abolition of the last remnant of a system which to them has been systematic delusion, betrayal, and disaster.

Nor will the Government have anything to say to such an attempt at falsifying the great principles with which they have so manfully identified themselves. On this point we are quite easy. We do not feel it necessary to recur to those specific objections which the leading members of the present Cabinet—Sir Robert Peel especially—have so strongly and steadily urged, in past years, against that particular form of food tax, known as "fixed duty." We are contented to rest on their earnest adoption, and vigorous and enlightened inculcation of sound and just principles that include the condemnation of every form of a food tax. Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham perfectly understand the PRINCIPLE of our movement, and are thoroughly and heartily at one with it. Their "object" is, "to remove restrictions upon commerce"—and they will not fetter commerce with a new restriction; "to equalise the burdens of taxation"—and they will not charge the poor man with a new burden that has all the cruel oppressiveness of a poll tax; "to ameliorate the condition of those who labour"—and they will not deteriorate the condition of those who labour, by laying an impost on food, which, to the whole extent of its operation in raising prices, operates likewise to the lowering of wages, and the increase of mortality and crime. "Why," asked the Home Secretary, the very last time the Corn Law was debated, "should the consumer and the receiver of wages be requested to pay for their daily bread a LARGER PRICE THAN, IF THE TRADE WERE FREE, THEY WOULD HAVE TO PAY?"—and he will not stultify himself by consenting that the consumer and the receiver of wages shall pay this surplusage of price. "Believe with me," says the Premier, "THE FIRST FOUNDATION OF SOCIAL IMPROVEMENT IS ABUNDANCE OF FOOD;" and he will not consent to narrow, loosen, and weaken that first foundation of social improvement, by artificially restricting the range from which the national supplies of food are drawn. He will not add another "peculiar burden" to those already weighing so heavily on the poor ten shillings a week labourer, whose physical and economical condition he has taken so much pains to master, and with whose rights and interests he has shown so warm-hearted and generous a sympathy. Sir Robert Peel will not legislate, even on the small scale of a "low fixed duty," for the scarcity and dearth of the poor man's food, now that he is fresh from "the experience of the last three years and the three preceding years," and from that lesson "which we ought never to forget, as to the effect produced on the social condition, the habits of life, and the happiness of the working classes, comparing the years of abundance with those of scarcity." Nor will he be willing to deprive himself of any portion of the satisfaction he so proudly and hopefully anticipates from "most materially adding to the comforts and enjoyment of millions—of 'those millions, whether manufacturing or agricultural labourers, who earn their subsistence by the sweat of their brow.'" On this head we have not the shadow of a misgiving.

If there really are men mad enough to take the field, in the name of a fixed bread tax, against Ministers who have thus identified themselves and their policy with the rights and interests of millions, we have only to say, the strait-waistcoat is ready. Never was fever of the brain assuaged by prompter and more efficacious remedies than those which the country will apply to the hallucinations of the fixed-duty protectionists.

THE RAGGED REGIMENT.

If the elements of time were not, just now, of vital and essential moment to all the great national interests awaiting the settlement of the Free Trade question; if months, weeks, days even, of uncertainty and unsettlement had not an appreciable influence on the employment, the wages, and the daily comforts of tens and hundreds of thousands of the people; if this commercial and industrial country could afford to have the business of production and exchange kept at a stand-still, to gratify the selfish vanity or wrath of "the wretched remnant of an expiring faction," we should take it easily, and should have nothing but congratulations to offer to our readers at this holiday season. We should be contented to look at the men who now lead the protectionist party, and read, in their very names, the pleasantest auguries of the certain and the near doom of the protectionist cause. A mere glance at the fallen fortunes of the faction which rejoices in the chieftainship of a Bentinck and a Borthwick, were enough to reassure the confidence which, in some of the more eager of us, may have been damped by a vexing and unexpected delay, and to satisfy the country that all is and will be well.

A come-down indeed! From the "good old English gentleman," whose substantial individual worth, and long-established political influence, gave a sort of respectability to an exploded principle and a vanquished party—to the sporting lord, and the unplaced political adventurer. From Mr. Miles, and Mr. Bankes—to Lord George, and Peter! We do not hold up our hands in amazement, and ask, Who could have thought it? It is the most natural thing in the world. It was to be expected that men like those who have heretofore fought the battle of protection—men with political character and influence to lose—men who had really believed the protectionist principle to be sound in point of policy, and tenable in point of fact—should, on the contest of principle being decided against them, honourably refuse participating in a system of obstruction for mere obstruction's sake, which, on any principle, must be wrong. It is impossible to deny that the present cast of parts in the political drama has a sort of moral fitness. The business and the agents are well matched. Men who never, in all their lives—so far, at least, as the public are informed—put their hands to a piece of useful work, are appropriate instruments for obstructing the industry, and fining down the earnings, of the classes that live by labour, and lengthening out the present dreary season of commercial stagnation and embarrassment. Those much-respected politicians, but for whom the Corn Bill would have passed its third reading before the unhappy question of Irish coercion arose, are indisputably fit and proper persons to preside over the desperate fortunes of a disgraced party, a condemned principle, and a vicious cause.

Of course, they will gain nothing by it—except that momentary gratification of spite, or pique, which is probably all they expect to gain. It only makes sure doubly sure. A cause that has visibly fallen so low can never, in the judgment even of the craziest enthusiast, make head again. The country loses much by the present delay—but landlordism loses more. The commercial and industrious classes can have no forgiveness for a faction that thus mischievously and insolently trifles, for the mere love of mischief, with the most urgent and pressing national interests. The "British farmer," in particular, may be trusted to keep it in mind. Farmers will long cherish the recollection of those "friends" who have impudently used their name to prolong and aggravate that which farmers most abhor—suspense and uncertainty; and for whose over-intimate and obtrusive friendship they will have been mulcted, during certain weeks or months of this spring, of 1846, of many shillings on every quarter of corn that it has been their misfortune to sell under a fictitious and got-up agricultural panic. Friendship of this singularly costly quality is sure to be long remembered, and duly appreciated, with precisely the kind and degree of gratitude that it merits.

THE WIGAN ELECTION CASE.

Soon after the election of the Hon. Capt. Lindsay, son of Lord Balcarras, for the borough of Wigan, a petition was presented against his return, founded on a notorious system of treating and presumptive bribery practised during the contest. That petition has been heard before a committee of the House of Commons, which has declared Captain Lindsay duly elected. We do not mean to impugn the integrity or the propriety of the decision; but if it be conformable to law, we assert that Lord John Russell's Act against treating is nothing better than waste-paper. It was established in evidence that Captain Lindsay's central committee ordered drink to be supplied at public houses in the various wards to those electors who were in his favour; that he was in the habit of attending this committee, and that he canvassed the publicans at whose houses drink was ordered in company with its members. That at one of those houses large quantities of brandy and water were supplied to electors in the presence of Captain Lindsay; that the bill for the liquor consumed at one public house (the Eagle and Child) was paid by Mr. Glover, the steward of Lord Balcarras (father of the candidate) who is not an elector of Wigan; that the treating in nine public-houses, the owners of which were examined, amounted to 269*l.*, and these were but a few out of the number known to be kept open during the election. Finally, Captain Lindsay declined to defend his seat, and, by a printed circular, disclaimed those by whom it was defended. The committee, however, has decided that he was duly elected, no act of treating having been traced to him, or an authorised agent!!! Need we add a word of comment?

A CORN LAW ANECDOTE.—Near the village of Shafton lived Sir Thomas Hamner, editor of Shakspeare, and Speaker of the House of Commons during the reign of Queen Anne. A curious anecdote of this celebrated character is traditionary here:—The Ministry of that day entertained an idea of laying a tax upon wheat; to this measure Sir Thomas was decidedly hostile; and being admitted to an audience, the Queen inquired, with no small degree of solicitude, why he determined to go into the country so early. "That I may prepare my lands, and please your Majesty, for the cultivation of hemp." "With hemp, Sir Thomas! and why with hemp?" "Because, and please your Majesty, I am told your Royal Majesty's Ministers are about to tax your people the very bread they eat. A man can die but once; and please your Majesty, I think we had far better hang than starve them." "I think so too," replied her Majesty; "and I will consult with my ministers, and see that my people shall not be starved. I thank thee, Sir Thomas." The measure was, in consequence, immediately dropped, and never afterwards resumed.

WHEAT IN EAST LOTHIAN.—Winter wheat continues to look well, though the keen frosts have prevented anything like growth either on it or young grass; the latter, where at all stocked, has gone decidedly back. However, this check to vegetation may be considered rather in favour of the wheat than otherwise, provided there is fair growing weather after this.—Scotsman.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Twelfth Week, ending Saturday, April 11.

Three months have elapsed since Parliament was assembled. It was called together earlier this year than usual; and Easter, this year, is later than usual. Yet to Easter we have arrived, without a particle of public business being transacted. Three or four temporary bills have been passed, in order to provide for the destitution in Ireland; and one or two formal votes of supply have been passed, in order to save the public service from embarrassment. But all other public business is at an absolute stand-still. The Government are partly to blame. They have, without any apparent object, interposed their Irish Coercion Bill between the stages of the regular progress of the Corn Bill. No doubt Sir Robert Peel imagined that he could induce the Irish Repeal members to waive their opposition to the first reading of the Coercion Bill; and he as doubtlessly supposed that by paying some deference to the Coercion Bill in the Commons, he may conciliate some portion of the landlord feeling in the House of Lords towards his Corn Bill. In one respect he has been mistaken; he may be deceived, or rather undecieved, in the other also. As it is, everything is at a stand-still; and there is nothing hazardous in the prediction that we are rapidly approaching a period of severe INDUSTRIAL PRESSURE, unless the causes which are producing it are removed.

The House of Lords adjourned on Tuesday, the House of Commons on Wednesday, for the Easter recess. On Wednesday Sir Robert Peel made a speech, which exhibited a consciousness on his part of the false position in which he has placed the Corn Bill and the Tariff. It deserves to be recorded.

Sir James Graham had adverted to the state of distress in Ireland, and laid on the table of the house the returns made to Government by the Scarcity Commissioners, the members of which are Sir R. Brown (the Commissary-General), Sir Robert (Professor) Kane, Mr. Twisleton, Colonel Jones, Sir J. Dombrose, and Mr. Mackenzie. These returns exhibited unequivocally the daily increasing progress of the distress. After some conversation, shared in by several Irish members,

Sir ROBERT PEEL wished to call the attention of honourable members to this, as a subject of vast importance. He hoped that no honourable member would make any immediate answer to what he was about to say, and to the appeal he was about to make; and that neither the one nor the other would lead to any discussion. He did hope that honourable members would give him credit for being influenced solely by his strong impression as to the state of the country at this present moment (hear, hear, hear). It was his belief that a great revolution was beginning to take place in Ireland by the introduction of meal the produce of Indian corn (hear, hear, hear). His belief was that they were giving to the Irish people a new taste for a better and more generous description of food than that hitherto principally consumed (hear, hear). It was found—he would entreat them to remark—that on railways, those who were substituting for the first time, an article of foreign produce, to which they had not been accustomed, for the diet they were hitherto used to—it was found that they would work longer and better than those living on that watery food—potatoes (hear, hear, hear). There had been prejudices to encounter, but these were disappearing; there had been an immense demand for the publications containing directions as to the manner of preparing this new article of subsistence, and he was happy to state that the people had found it, when properly dressed, extremely palatable (hear, hear). At present, however, Indian corn was only admitted into Ireland upon a sort of sufferance, and under the authority of an order issued by the Treasury. The measure which would fully legalize its importation was still waiting for the decision of Parliament, and he was confident that there would be increased confidence shown in the import of the article were the law satisfactorily settled, and were the raisers of the corn in the United States to find that they had the guarantee of an Act of Parliament, instead of the authority of a mere Treasury warrant (hear, hear). Let it not be forgotten, too, that we wanted foreign wheat to mix with our own (hear), at a cheaper rate than the duty of 15*s.*, which at present prevailed, and that if we could get oats and barley meal at a duty of 1*s.*, instead of 5*s.* or 6*s.*, we should have a great and desirable addition to our supply (hear, hear). He believed that there would be an immediate import of oats from foreign parts, were it settled that oatmeal would be allowed to be brought in at a duty of 1*s.* (hear, hear). At present there was no Treasury order except in favour of Indian corn and buck wheat. Uncertainty, then, would attach to all operations in other grains until such time as the house should have arrived at some decision upon the point. Under these circumstances he did hope that Irish members would read the returns about to be laid before the house with the greatest care. He was sure that the hon. members for Clare and Limerick must have received accounts of the distress which prevailed in those localities (hear, hear). He believed that if the decision of the house were known with respect to the Corn Bill, it would greatly increase the available means of supply (hear, hear). All he could say was, that if honourable members connected with Ireland could reconcile it to their sense of public duty, under any protest, and upon the understanding of any opposition to be offered to the bill for the preservation of life in Ireland, at any of its future stages—if those hon. gentlemen could allow the decision of the legislature to be taken on the first reading of that measure, with a view to the Corn Bill being then immediately proceeded with, that in that case they would be conferring a great advantage on many districts of their own country. He did not wish to provoke discussion. He was speaking under strong impressions from having just perused the returns in question relating to certain districts of Ireland, and he only asked Irish members to do the same, and then to judge for themselves, and form their own decisions (hear, hear).

Mr. HAWES remarked, that the reaction which had followed the railway excitement had produced an utter stagnation of trade, and consequent want of employment in many of the manufacturing districts. As to the Coercion Bill, he hoped that Irish members would consider how far they could shorten the discussion upon its provisions. For himself, he opposed the bill, and would continue to oppose it by all fair and proper means; but he did hope that Irish members would have a little regard to the commercial interests of England, and endeavour to conduct the discussion on the Coercion Act so as to allow the consideration of the Corn Bill to be resumed on the very earliest day possible ("hear, hear," from Sir Robert Peel).

A discussion arose, shared in by Mr. Smith O'Brien, Mr. Caleb Powell, Sir James Graham, and Mr. Poulett Scrope, and during which Mr. Thomas Duncombe severely censured the Government for their pertinacity in forcing on the Coercion Bill, thus placing a stumbling-block in the way of the Corn Bill. Their conduct had raised doubts in the minds of the public as to the sincerity of Ministers in their commercial measures. The subject ultimately dropped, and the house adjourned for the Easter recess.

THE REVENUE RETURNS FOR THE YEAR AND QUARTER ENDED 5TH APRIL, 1846.

(From the Times.)

In estimating the finances of the empire at this moment, when the customary termination of the financial year has arrived, the inevitable stagnation of trade, consequent upon the suspended condition of the Corn Laws, and of the many articles included in the tariff, was of course to be borne in mind. This paralyzing ingredient has entered into the material of commerce for more than three months, and we had to expect, therefore, as we anticipated on Saturday, a deficiency in those items which, in the quarter's revenue, represent generally the prosperity of the country. The Customs accordingly show a decrease in the quarter of near half-a-million; and in the whole year, of near two millions and a half. The Excise shows a similar deficiency of about 300,000*l.* on the year, and about 340,000*l.* on the quarter. Against this may be set an increase of near 400,000*l.* in the Stamps, and about 90,000*l.* in the Post-office, both which items may be placed to the account of the railway mania. On the total ordinary revenue there is a decrease for the quarter of a million, for the year of two millions and a half; on the total income, 1,100,000*l.* for the quarter, and 2,327,000*l.* for the year. Of the last-mentioned sum about 300,000*l.* is merely incidental, which, being deducted, leaves an actual decrease of a little more than two millions.

These figures, however, exhibit merely the positive amount of receipts in the quarter and year ending the 5th of April, 1845, as compared with the like period in 1846. The former year was one of unexampled prosperity, great commercial activity, and unprecedented speculation. The present year, although it shows less of these signs of advancement, is nevertheless remarkable for that which is, after all, the true index of national prosperity—an excess of income over expenditure. This excess for the present year is about two millions and a-half.

It would be superfluous to particularise the many important reductions that were made in the Customs' duties in the years 1844 and 1845. Those of 1844 were but imperfectly developed in 1845, and both have produced more or less effect upon the results of 1846. The bold experiment of Sir Robert Peel has hardly yet received a proper trial. Great changes, of course, require a lengthened period to develop themselves, and it cannot be denied that the lapsed interval has been both naturally and politically unfavourable to financial prosperity.

It would be equally superfluous to mention in detail the petitions lately presented to the House of Commons from the great commercial cities of England and Scotland for a proof of the injurious effect which the uncertain state of the Customs' department has exercised upon the relations of trade during the last few months. These, which are by far the most active months of the year in all departments of commerce, have been rendered flat and dull by the protracted decision of the House of Commons on the great question which now agitates the empire. There is ample evidence in the shape of trading circulars and petitions and Parliamentary papers, that the greatest injury has been inflicted upon the ordinary transactions of commerce by the studium immane loquendi that has seized upon the chartered legislators of the lower house. These gentlemen may congratulate themselves upon having put a drag upon the wheels of trade, and stayed the progress of the state machine. If they can find any satisfaction in this reflection, no one, we think, will be found to interfere with their perfect enjoyment of it. But, with a view to check their pride, we must remind them that their power is limited to a temporary check. The progress of improvement will go on in spite of them, and the next quarter will probably evince, by a sudden reaction, that the protectionist vis inertiae is but a momentary gravitation, and that the onward impulse of national prosperity is happily far superior to their powers of obstruction.

THE CORN BILL AND THE COERCION BILL.

(From the Times.)

We cannot but view with dissatisfaction the state of public business in the House of Commons. Two more sittings, and Parliament adjourns for the Easter recess. An idle interval of ten days follows, during which the vanquished hosts of Miles and Bentinck may collect their scattered weapons, and prepare their strength for another and less inglorious field. At the same time the eager patriots of Ireland review their yet unbroken ranks, brighten the unstained armour, and give a keener sharpness to the weapons of attack. Both then, together, though not united, advance to meet their common foe, inspired with a common hatred, a common jealousy, a common spirit of revenge—with every feeling but a common cause. Side by side they fight the deadly battle against the Government of the country; and even though certain in the very moment of the final issue to fly asunder as far as pole from pole, and range themselves as of yore in open hostility, the combined attack may be followed by an unexpected victory.

This apple of discord is the Irish Coercion Bill. Sir Robert's motley band is the Corn Law majority, which, if rightly generated, might ere this have been "crowned with victorious wreaths." It is now resolved into its elements, and may hardly again be combined in compact cohesion. Last week it stood a "battered host," firm and invincible under the standard of Free Trade. What is it now? A scattered remnant of an army, dispersed without a blow, suffering the shame of a defeat without the consolation of a well-contested field. And all this is the doing of their own general. This is the end of high aspirations and bold imaginings. How different from that other consummation so devoutly to be wished!

See what is the position at this moment of the Corn Law measure. It passed the second reading now some ten days back, and then waited only to be committed. And so it might and would have been immediately, but that just at this critical juncture ill-luck sent forth the Irish bill from the House of Lords to trouble the unanimity of the friends of corn. In accordance with Parliamentary etiquette, and on the authority of precedent, Sir Robert Peel resolved that the Coercion Bill should be read forthwith in the House of Commons. We know not whether he imagined this proceeding would pass sub silentio, as a matter of course. If he did, we are sure he ought to have known his opponents better. The Irish "patriots" are not the men to hold their tongues when there is a question concerning Ireland. However this may be, Sir Robert so determined, and having once said it should be so, why, of course, it must be so, and there an end. The corn was shelved—laid up in bond, and the Irish debate began. Sir James Graham made a long speech, and opened his case, not by any means so strong an one, by the way, as the Earl of St. Germans opened to the House of Lords. When Sir James had finished, the evening was somewhat advanced, and for Mr. O'Connell's convenience the debate was adjourned. The case then hung fire for three days, and on the fourth Mr. O'Connell made a long speech, followed by several gentlemen on either side, when there was a very respectable discussion. Hereupon followed two dies non, and again a third debate on Monday night. Last night there was no house, to-morrow will be a half-holiday, occupied probably, as usual, with a thousand subjects. Thursday is not a Government night, not to speak of its being the last before Easter. Friday commences the recess; and thus we shall have arrived at the 10th of April, nearly three months from the beginning of the session, without even a proximate termination to the debate on either subject.

What is it that has thus shelved the great measure demanded by the country? What is it that has made Sir Robert Peel play fast and loose with his own great scheme, and dodge Corn Bill and Coercion Bill backward and forward, like the balls in a juggler's hand? Nothing but a sentiment of courtesy towards the Upper House, and a love of ancient precedent as established in the lower? Now, courtesy is, doubtless, a very amiable virtue, and cannot be too much cultivated by the gay and idle. A respect for precedent, also, is a prudent quality, and useful beyond all measure to the dull and ignorant. But both are sometimes troublesome things, and highly inconvenient in the serious affairs of life. The one is apt to fritter away the energy of action, and the other not seldom clogs the wings of genius. The Premier of England we should have pronounced the most unlikely man in the kingdom to pay homage or tribute to either, to fetter himself by inconvenient forms, or to square his actions by the standard of an idle etiquette. In other days it was certainly not so. This is the first time we hear of courteous Sir Robert or old-fashioned Sir Robert Peel.

It is not, however, too late for him to retrace his steps and disentangle himself from the net of his own weaving. The thing of course cannot be done before Easter, but it may after. Next Monday week let the Government set to work in good earnest, determined to pass the Corn Bill in spite of everything, and to the exclusion of everything. Do not fear the cry of "Ireland in danger." There is no justice in it, for the repeal of the Corn Laws is an Irish measure as well as an English one. You are not disregarding the true interests of Ireland when you offer the boon of cheaper food and unshackled commerce. If the great measure were other than it is,—if it were less humane, less comprehensive, less universal, and, therefore, less Irish,—it might be another matter. But we know that it is all these, and the best proof that it is so is the conduct of the Irish members themselves. Have they not all declared to a man that they will assist the Ministry to pass the Corn Bill, and have they not done so until this one discordant element was introduced amongst them? Indeed, it needs no argument to prove that the repeal of the Corn Laws is of far greater importance to Ireland, in every point of view, than a Coercion Bill, however ostensibly necessary. We, therefore, conjure Sir Robert Peel to abandon, with all speed, an unwise determination. He must see that it is unwise. He has thrust aside the Corn Bill to make way for the Coercion Bill, and now he finds that the latter cannot make way for itself. The Irish debate, he may be sure, will be interminable; Irish debates always are. There is no security for us that, if these are to have precedence, the Corn Bill will be read a third time before this day three months. How ridiculous, then, would be the Premier's position at the end of the session! A broken party, loss of power, loss of influence, loss of character,—and all for nothing.

THE BROCKLEHURST FALLACIES.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

Protectionist fallacies are so soon to become historical that we feel it a duty to enshrine, for the benefit of posterity, the most perfect specimens of the class that fall in our way. The time will come when strong contemporary evidence will be requisite to prove that some of our most familiar argumentative absurdities did really find men to give them a grave utterance in the Parliament of 1846. During the recent debates we notice for preservation some of the choicest of these illustrations of our senatorial wisdom, but there was one which, though especially worthy of attention, was not at the time set as fully in the light as it deserved. We take the first opportunity left us by the pressure of other topics of supplying the deficiency. The argument to which we refer came from Mr. Brocklehurst, and it lies at the bottom of the question now before the country. "The fact was," said Mr. Brocklehurst, "whilst we exported 20,000*l.* worth of silk goods to France, we imported 150,000*l.* worth from the same country. So much for the boasted reciprocity!" This statement, made, it is presumed, on the authority of Custom-house returns, was put forth not so much for its own sake, as for the inference to which Mr. Brocklehurst pointed, viz.: that a country which gives 150,000*l.* to get back 20,000*l.*, is a heavy loser by the transaction.

The announcement of these figures, followed by the exclamation "So much for the boasted reciprocity," was calculated to make an impression on the protectionist mind; and, if we may judge by the cheers it called forth, it did so. "Here are 20,000*l.* worth of goods exported, and 150,000*l.* worth imported; the large sum of 150,000*l.* spent by England in paying French workmen, and increasing French capital, whilst 20,000*l.* only comes back to England to supply the deficiency. The difference is a gift to France—a dead loss to England of 130,000*l.* in the one article of silk; and the official returns of the Custom-house attest the fact. It may be very well," the protectionists go on to say, "for political economists to assert that exports are equal to imports—this may be true in theory, but it is not so in practice." "But pray are merchants' books good in practice?" Our friend Bastiat, to whom we have referred before, and who cannot be too often quoted, asks the same question on a similar occasion; and he answers it, or rather would answer it if he had Mr. Brocklehurst to deal with, in some such way as the following:

"If there is one thing in the world which is entitled to practical authority, it is the entries of profit and loss in the ledgers of a counting-house. Depend upon it no mistake is made there; that which a merchant calls profit is profit, and what he calls loss is loss."

Now it so happened that a merchant of Liverpool freighted a vessel to the United States with Manchester goods of the value of 10,000*l.* Such was the declared value, and such the sum entered at the Custom-house. The cargo on arriving at New Orleans had incurred charges to the amount of 10 per cent., and paid duty to that of 30, making the total amount 14,000*l.* It was sold at a profit of 20 per cent., that is 2000*l.*, and produced altogether 16,000*l.*, which the consignee disposed of in buying cotton. This cotton, too, had to bear charges of 10 per cent. for freight, insurance, commission, &c., so that on reaching Liverpool, on its return, the new cargo amounted to 17,600*l.*, and this too, was the sum entered in the ledgers of the Custom-house; and to conclude, Mr. T. again realised on this return cargo 20 per cent. profit; i. e. 3,520*l.*—in other words, the cotton sold for 21,120*l.*

On Mr. T.'s books may still be seen figuring to the credit of the account of profit and loss, in other words under the head of profits, two entries, the one of 2,000*l.* and the other of 3,520*l.*; and Mr. T. is thoroughly convinced, and is likely to remain so, that he has made no mistake, and that his arithmetic is correct.

But what does the Custom-house ledger say to this transaction? It tells us that England has exported goods to the value of 10,000*l.*, and imported goods to the value of 17,600*l.*; that this country has paid to the United States 17,600*l.* and received back only 10,000*l.* The conclusions which Mr. Brocklehurst would draw from these figures is, that England has lost 7,600*l.* worth of capital, which she has given to the United States.

Some time after, Mr. T. sent off another vessel, which was also laden with 10,000*l.* worth of native produce. But the unlucky ship, after leaving the port, struck against a rock, and went to the bottom, cargo and all, and Mr. T. had nothing for it but to make on his books the two following little entries:—"Sundries. Dr. to X. 10,000*l.*, for the purchase of various articles sent out in the ship N. Profit and loss—Dr. to sundries, 10,000*l.*, final and total loss of the whole cargo."

In the meanwhile, the Custom-house officers had not been idle. They had been recording 10,000*l.* under the head of exports; and as they will never have to make a corresponding entry under the head of imports, it follows, according to the doctrine of Mr. Brocklehurst, that this shipwreck is a clear profit to England of 10,000*l.*

There is another consequence to draw from this—namely, that, according to this doctrine, a country has a very simple way of doubling its capital at any moment. To do so, it is quite sufficient that, after such capital has passed the Custom-house, it should be tossed into the sea. By such means the exports of the country will be equal to its amount of capital, the imports will be reduced to nothing, and be, in fact, impossible, and we shall gain all that the sea has swallowed up.

Besides, observe how directly the shipwrecks would tend to protect British industry. Not only the vessels which carry out English goods would never bring back foreign ones, but as the demand for English goods in the United States will be just as great after as it was before these successive losses, new capitalists would be brought into the field, new mills set to work, new artisans find employment to supply those wants which will never be satisfied. A sunken rock, a sand bank, and a raging sea, may be turned to account, and become a much better and cheaper protection to British industry than high duties and Custom-house officers. At all events, those who are for the latter, to be consistent, should be for the former also.

We would seriously recommend to Mr. Brocklehurst, Mr. Rashleigh, et id genus omne, to go through a course of Bastiat. It would open their minds, and allay their feverish fears; and a little plain and pointed sense in the morning would be an agreeable and useful relaxation after the lively levels of the night.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

(From a Correspondent of the Morning Chronicle.)

In very many places potatoes have already reached a price far above the means of that class of whom they are ordinarily the sole subsistence. If at any period of the year the amount exceeds threepence per stone, while wages are but eightpence a day, it is generally allowed to be verging upon a famine price; but in Galway, Clare, and Limerick, the price now varies from fivepence to sevenpence.

This is no impious fabrication, no profane device of the Free Traders. Such are the current prices of this week, while yet the planting of the ensuing year's crop is scarcely begun. When that operation once becomes general, there will be an increased demand, which will raise the prices considerably; and as soon as it is completed, a great proportion—fully one-half, I should say—of what now remains of wholesome provisions will have disappeared altogether, leaving a scanty remnant of unsound and decaying food to be contended for by the numerous competitors by whom the markets are already crowded with unusual frequency.

It has been stated that in Clare the poor people having exhausted all the rest of their stock, are now consuming what they had reserved for seed. To this fact I can bear testimony from personal observation, having within a few days visited a populous district in that county, where the inhabitants have been driven to that desperate resource. How they are to provide for the supply of the next year they no more know than by what means the evils of the now imminent calamity are to be softened and made endurable. Their actual condition is deplorable; the prospect before them most frightful to contemplate. No wonder that they are flocking in thousands to the seaports and other places of embarkation, to escape from misery, the very existence of which is denied by men who should be the foremost to proclaim it, and arouse the sympathy of the public and the legislature in their behalf.

In the whole of the district to which I refer, divided into small farms of eight or ten acres, and extending over several miles of country, there were not ten corn-stacks to be seen. The oats had been all threshed out, and sold long ago to pay the rent. I do not wish to imitate the Times commissioner, by naming the provident landlords, who have thus taken time by the forelock. Exposure would not mend them, and it is not wanted to prove a practice which is too notorious to call for particular censure on any individual. But let it be remembered that it is for the benefit, and in compliance with the dictates of persons who do such things, that the existence of distress amongst the Irish peasantry is now so audaciously and perseveringly denied.

FREE TRADE ABROAD.

(From the Daily News.)

The Free Trade League is extending its fame in foreign lands, where it meets kindred spirits long imbued with the same principles, and earnestly engaged in applying them at home. It has its allies in France, Germany, and Italy, and though last not least important, in Spain also. The political degradation of that unhappy country has not yet affected them.

There are several patriotic societies established throughout Spain for the encouragement of industry and agriculture, and the dissemination of sound economical doctrines. The Sociedad Economica Matritense deservedly stands at the head of these. The society publishes a monthly periodical entitled El Amigo del Pais, devoted to an account of its sessions, and to the discussion of scientific and economical questions, with practical dissertations and suggestions on the means by which the agricultural and industrial resources of the country may best be developed. It is to be lamented that this otherwise excellent and learned publication should be so extremely deficient in that statistical information, without which the truth of principles cannot practically be tested and brought to bear upon the common sense of peoples and governments.

Several copies of this periodical having been forwarded to the head-quarters of the League at Manchester, the secretary, on behalf of the Council, addressed to Senor Don Juan A. Seoane, its principal editor, and President of the Section of Commerce in the society, a letter of acknowledgment of the compliment in February last. The March number of the Amigo del Pais, just received, contains a copy of this letter, with the eloquent reply of Senor Seoane. We collect from this reply that, far from being behind the age in the appreciation of enlightened economical truths, Spain has been with the foremost in their discovery and propagation. "When," says Senor Seoane, "Smith was addressing these counsels (his 'Wealth of Nations') to the disdain of the aristocracy of England, Jovellanos and Campomanes were repeating them in our country to a clergy, a nobility, and officials, who received them with applause indeed, because they dreamt not of the possible triumph of these theories." Senor Seoane might have added, that these illustrious men did more still. As statesmen and ministers they practically applied them so far as possible in their day. Strange it is, but true, that, since that passing period of a briefly illuminated despotism, Spain has lived on for half a century of retrograde existence, political, financial, and industrial; although, during one half the time at least, despotism has been displaced by the Cortes, by ascendant liberalism, and by constitutions of all shades, to be reckoned only like those of France, by the score. With the exceptions of Mendizabal when in office, and of Mon, the late finance minister, there is no evidence of a single effort being made by any of the so-called liberal and patriot statesmen of Spain, who have figured since 1808, to re-awaken the vitality of those principles which shed lustre on the absolute monarchy of Carlos III., and to the extent of their application diffused prosperity through his dominions. Those principles have slumbered in the tomb with Jovellanos and Campomanes, who had evoked them after a century of oblivion. For liberty of commerce was a fundamental law of Arragon, of Biscay, and others of the federal kingdoms or provinces of Spain; and it may be shown on other occasions how it was contended for in remonstrances against the prohibition of foreign textile fabrics so long ago as 1626. *

THE FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

(From the Economist.)

The causes which have combined for so long a period to maintain the foreign exchanges at rates so favourable to this country, are well deserving the attention both of the merchant and the politician, at this particular time. The investigation of this subject cannot fail to expose the groundless nature of the alarms of some of the opponents of Free Trade, who appear to associate a derangement of the currency with every considerable importation of grain, without any discrimination of the circumstances under which it takes place. It may also be of the highest utility in enabling the merchant to form a correct estimate of the effects which present and coming events are likely to exercise over this important element in all monetarial calculations.

It may, perhaps, be necessary, in order to render our further remarks more intelligible, that we should refer to the general principles which regulate the exchanges, and to the usual causes of their fluctuations. Every country advanced in civilisation, assumes some commodity as a standard of value, in which the prices of all other commodities are expressed. The commodity assumed as such standard of value in this country is gold, an ounce of which represents £3 16s. 10½d. of our money in account. Every sum therefore expressed in sterling money represents as many ounces of standard gold as the sum itself bears a proportion to £3 16s. 10½d.—a pound sterling being in fact a convertible term for 5 dwts. 3½ grs. of gold. In France, and in most other countries, the commodity assumed as the standard of value is silver, of which 3 dwts. 5½ grs. represent a franc, the French money in account. The par of exchange therefore between France and England must be determined by the relative value of silver and gold, and the proportion which 3 dwts. 5½ grs. of the former metal, or a franc, bears to 5 dwts. 3½ grs. of gold, or the pound sterling. Computed at our mint price, this quantity of gold representing a pound is equal to (within an insignificant fraction) twenty-five times the quantity of silver representing a franc; so that the par of exchange between France and England is twenty-five francs to the pound sterling.

There are two ways in which this relation of the franc to the pound may be changed, or, in other words, in which the rate of exchange may be altered: first, a permanent change in the relative value of the two metals, either by being produced or by being consumed for other purposes, in different proportions than formerly, will permanently alter the par of exchange. For example, if an unusual production of silver were to take place, and the supply to be materially increased, while that of gold remained stationary, the intrinsic value of silver, in relation to gold as well as other commodities, would fall, and the quantity of silver represented in twenty-five francs would no longer be equivalent to the quantity of gold represented by one pound sterling. Or if, on the other hand, the consumption of gold for jewellery, plate, or even for coin, were to increase in a greater proportion than the supply, and also in a greater proportion than silver, the intrinsic value would rise, and the quantity represented in a pound sterling would be more valuable than the quantity of silver represented by twenty-five francs. In either of these cases the par of exchange upon France would rise, and the pound sterling would represent as much more French money in account, as the altered relative value of 5 dwts. 3½ grs. of gold bore to 3 dwts. 5½ grs. of silver. The second and more usual way in which the rates of exchange fluctuate, is by the changes which take place in the balance of payments between the two countries. The par of exchange is fixed by the value of the respective metals in London and Paris; and as long as the exports and imports of the two countries, and claims arising from other sources exactly balance each other, the exchange will remain at par. The amount of bills drawn by one country will exactly balance the amount drawn by the other. But if, from any circumstance, the payments due to England by France become larger than those due to France by England, bills upon England rise to a premium, and the pound sterling then represents more than twenty-five francs. It must, however, be plain that no greater permanent change would take place from this cause than the cost of transmitting the metals themselves from the spot where the debt is due to that where it is payable. And thus it is, when the balance becomes sufficiently large to raise the premium upon bills so much above par that the transmission of bullion would be more profitable, that either merchants remit gold instead of bills, or, which is more usual, bankers and dealers in bills of exchange transmit bullion, and draw bills against it, which are supplied to the merchant. The transmission of bullion is, therefore, seldom for the immediate purpose of making purchases, but for the ultimate balancing of merchants' and bankers' accounts after purchases have been made.

The high rate of exchange which has been maintained so long between this country and the Continent of Europe has naturally induced us to inquire if that effect has been produced in any degree by a permanent change in the relative value of the metals. So far, however, we have not been able to discover any evidence that such has been the case. The supply of silver has not been more than usually large; and though the consumption of gold for jewellery and plate has been much on the increase of late years, yet the additional supply, including the new source in Siberia, has probably been quite as great. Mr. McCulloch, in the new edition of the "Commercial Dictionary," states the produce of the gold washings in Siberia, which, in 1830, amounted only to five pounds, to have been, in 1843, no less than 1342 pounds, being equivalent, after adding one-fifth as the quantity which is calculated is not brought to the public account, to £3,298,962. So great an increase of the supply of gold, considered alone, would have led us to expect a diminished value of this metal, and, consequently, a lower permanent rate of exchange; and, perhaps, no fact could speak more strongly to the great increase of consumption of this metal generally, than that such an effect has not been produced.

We are, however, satisfied that there have been sufficient causes of a mercantile nature in operation during the last few years, satisfactorily to account for the state of the exchanges; and it is these we now propose shortly to investigate.

For some years prior to 1839 the trade between this country and the Continent of Europe, showed a steady but slow increase. After the American crisis of 1836-37, which materially depressed the foreign exchanges, and caused a severe drain of bullion, a sudden reaction took place, the exchanges were corrected by the great reduction of our imports in 1837, and the bullion in the Bank rapidly increased from £4,048,000 in March 1837 to £10,126,000 in April 1838. During the whole of 1838 the exchanges remained steady, and there was every appearance of the trade between this country and the Continent of Europe being nearly balanced. For several years, however, prior to the close of 1838, the import of grain from the Continent had formed a most insignificant item in that trade; our entire consumption of foreign wheat having been—

1832	qrs.	1836	qrs.
1833	325,435	1837	30,554
1834	32,346	1837	244,619
1835	64,653	1838	35,207
1835	28,483

The whole foreign wheat taken for consumption in those six years and nine months having only been 821,297 quarters. During this period, it is then evident that the trade between this country and the Continent of Europe must have been adjusted and balanced, without reference to any important shipments of grain. The wool, tallow, flax, hemp, silk, and other produce usually imported by us, were paid for to a certain extent, by our own manufactures, and the remainder by foreign and colonial produce, such as indigo, coffee, and sugar, imported by us in exchange for our manufactures exported to other parts of the globe. In the autumn of 1838, a sudden import of wheat commenced, and continued upon a large scale until the end of 1842. The quantity of foreign wheat imported from that period till the end of 1845 was as follows:

last 3 months of	qrs.	1842	qrs.
1838	1,533,878	1843	2,722,305
1839	2,634,557	1844	940,120
1840	1,999,519	1844	1,100,305
1841	2,409,754	1845	871,443

The imports of wheat which began in the autumn of 1838 amounted to 4,168,435 qrs., in fifteen months, representing a sum of not less than £12,000,000, which sum was thus added to the value of our imports without any equivalent being exported, and the balance of account was thus suddenly turned against us. The payments due by England to the Continent were larger than those due by the Continent to England; drafts on the Continent rose to a premium, and at length it became necessary to transmit bullion to balance these accounts, and to correct the exchanges. On the 6th of January, 1839, the amount of bullion in the Bank was £9,336,000; and on the 5th of December, notwithstanding the loan from the Bank of France, it was reduced to £2,887,000. In 1840, the importation of wheat still continued upon a large scale; but notwithstanding there was an evident tendency for the exchange to turn in favour of England, by means of the increased exports of manufactures, for which a greater demand was soon experienced, partly in consequence of the reduced prices of our goods, and partly from the additional demand created on the Continent by our imports of wheat; and considerable progress would have been made in 1840 towards restoring our bullion, but for a new cause of disturbance which operated for some time in preventing it. The general fear which existed in Europe, in the autumn of 1840, of a rupture between France and England, induced the Continental bankers generally to dispose of securities in the London market, in order to increase their reserves of money. Yet, notwithstanding this circumstance, and a continued large import of wheat, and the partial repayment of the loan from the Bank of France, the bullion in the Bank of England had increased in December, 1840, to £3,511,000. In 1841, the import of wheat was still larger than in 1840, the whole of the advance of the Bank of France was repaid, but yet such was the tendency of our exports to rise up to the amount of our imports, that in December, 1841, the bullion amounted to £4,486,000. In 1842 the largest import of wheat on record took place; but notwithstanding this, our exports had increased so largely, in consequence of low prices at home, and from having created new customers abroad, that at the end of the year the bullion in the Bank had increased to no less than £10,330,000. We had thus become able to add to our usual imports from the Continent a large quantity of wheat, without causing any disturbance in the exchanges. We will shortly examine how this was accomplished, by comparing the amount of our exports to those countries in 1837, the last year prior to the commencement of these transactions, with the same in 1842, when they had continued for three years. The following is a comparison of the exports of British manufactures to the chief Continental countries at these two periods:

	1837.	1842.
Russia	2,046,592	1,885,053
Sweden	101,121	109,313
Norway	72,413	134,704
Denmark	103,448	194,304
Prussia	131,536	376,651
Germany	4,808,016	6,302,700
Holland	3,040,099	3,573,362
Belgium	804,917	1,099,490
France	1,643,204	3,193,939
Total	12,841,276	16,860,416

We thus arrive at the striking fact, that while our entire exports were undergoing a considerable diminution, as they did from 1838 to 1842, our exports to those countries from which we imported grain, increased more than £4,000,000. The exchanges were, in short, corrected by our exports rising to an equivalent to our increased imports.

With the commencement of 1843 we come to the causes which, for the last three years, have operated so strongly in maintaining high exchanges and a large stock of bullion. Independent of the large imports of grain from the Continent, our export trade, especially of cotton manufactures, was materially aided by the rapid improvement of machinery and consequent economy of production, and the low prices of the raw material, which, for the last three years, have created a consumption of those goods without any precedent in extent. In 1843 the import of wheat fell to about one-third of the quantity imported in 1842; an extended market having been made for our manufactures was not suddenly lost, and thus the reverse of the operations which took place in 1839 created a large balance in our favour to be remitted from the Continent, the exchanges became very high in our favour, and at the end of the year the bullion in the Bank was nearly 14,000,000. During the last two years (1844 and 1845) the import of wheat has continued small, compared with the years from 1838 to 1842, while the extreme low prices of our manufactures have enabled us still to sustain an export of those goods, little diminished, to the corn-growing countries, and greatly to increase them to the other markets of the world.

We therefore come to the conclusion that the high rates of exchange which have been maintained for the last three years, have been caused, first, by the sudden reduction of our imports of wheat in 1843 to about 900,000 quarters, after our trade had adapted itself to an annual import considerably exceeding 2,000,000 quarters in each of the four preceding years; secondly, to the great economy obtained in our process of manufactures by improvements during the last six years; and, thirdly, by the extreme low prices of cotton wool, especially during the last two years, the products of which constitute nearly one-half of our whole exports; and lastly, to the general prosperity of our customers on the Continent, who have been enabled to consume our manufactures to so large an extent. In 1837 the exports of cotton goods amounted to £20,598,000, and in 1844, notwithstanding the great reduction of price, they amounted to £25,805,348. In 1837 our exports of all kinds to the Continent of Europe amounted to £19,401,320, and in 1844 to £25,621,185.

The important inquiry in which all are now most deeply interested is, how far the same causes are likely to continue. As far as we can judge from present appearances, we do not think it probable that any such important increase will take place in our imports of grain as will of itself be calculated materially to affect the exchanges. The supply of cotton continues very large, and the prices fully as low as on any former occasion. Our manufactures are conducted upon a scale of perfection and economy never before equalled. So far, then, as these elements of the question are concerned, there would appear at this time little to be apprehended to lead to any reduction in the exchanges. There have, however, been some other symptoms visible of late, which would lead us to fear that some reaction in the course of the present year must be expected. During the last six months our imports of all leading articles have been, and continue to be, very considerable; while at best, our exports up to December last, were stationary; and since then, especially to the Continent of Europe, the demand for our leading articles of manufacture, and more particularly for cotton and worsted goods has been, and continues to be very limited, compared with what it was a year ago. This is to be attributed to the depressed state of some of the chief markets of Europe, partly in consequence of the scarcity and consequent high price of food, and partly owing to the unwieldy speculations into which they have entered, to construct railways to an extent much beyond their means. These causes threaten to diminish the amount of our exports during the present season; while the large proportion of our labour employed in the construction of railways, will maintain wages comparatively high, promote a large consumption of foreign produce, and in the course of time lead to an extent of importation which our exports will not be adequate to meet. There is no immediate danger of such a disturbance as we now allude to; but the whole tendency of our trade, and the distribution of our capital and labour at this time, points to such a result, sooner or late, as highly probable, unless stringent means are used to prevent it.

CORN BILL DEBATES—1815—1846.

(From the Manchester Examiner.)

Up to the session of 1845, nothing was so distasteful to the country gentlemen as a discussion on the Corn Law. It was made a subject of repeated complaint that Mr. Villiers would not let the question rest, however great a majority had defeated the proposition he submitted to the house. During the period of severe distress, from 1838 to 1842, the sufferings of the people were often the subject of debate, and the landlords in Parliament protested against the introduction of the question of corn as one which the legislature had finally settled, and which ought not, therefore, to be re-opened. In the present session we find a complete change. The men who, some time ago, were content with the decision of a Parliamentary majority, are now resolved on a pertinacious and irritating opposition to a measure which has received the deliberate sanction of a majority of 97 votes. So long as majorities were in favour of a policy by which the nation was pillaged, and the fruits of its industry misappropriated, their decision was to be held sacred; but now, when the preponderance of votes is on the side of justice, every means of annoyance is practised which obstinacy and selfishness can devise. It has been a frequent charge against the opponents of the Corn Law, both in and out of Parliament, that they have imputed unworthy and base motives to the supporters of monopoly; and the class of persons whose charity is niggardly enough when speaking of the poor, but overflows when the rich are to be judged, have denied that the landowners have been actuated by other than patriotic, though possibly mistaken, motives in the policy they have pursued. The journals of the Houses of Parliament shall decide the question,—we ask no other evidence than is to be found in the records of the proceedings of the Lords and Commons, in the debates in the year 1815, when the Corn Law was enacted, and in the year 1846, when it will be finally repealed. No one denied that the projected Corn Law of 1815 was a most important measure; its friends said it would save the country; its opponents said that it would injure trade, and produce misery and ruin to multitudes. It was a measure demanding the most mature and unbiassed deliberation, affecting as it did the food and the industry of a whole nation. And how did the Lords and Commons, owners of the soil, treat it?

By reference to the journals of the House of Commons, we find the following narrative of the rate of travelling at which legislation, for high prices of corn and high rents, proceeded. On the 17th of February, 1815, the House of Commons resolved itself into a committee of the whole House, to consider the laws which regulated the importation of corn, and on the same day, certain resolutions were reported. This report was further considered in committee on the 22d, 23d, and 24th of February, and on the 27th nine resolutions were reported to the house. The debate was adjourned to the following day, the 28th, when all the resolutions were agreed to, and a bill was ordered. On the 1st of March, the bill was brought in and read a first time. On the 3d it was read a second time and committed. It was considered in committee on the 6th, and further considered on the 8th, on which day it was reported, and ordered to be engrossed; and on the 10th of March it was read a third time and passed. Thus from the introduction of the resolutions on the 17th of February, to the passing of the bill on the 10th of March, just 21 days elapsed. We now turn to the journals of the House of Lords, and track the progress of this iniquitous measure. It was sent up to the Lords on the 13th of March, and was read a first time the same day. On the 15th, it was read a second time. On the 17th, a motion was made to hear the Corporation of London on their petition against the bill, praying for further inquiry. The Lords ordered the petition to "lie on the table," saying they had information enough, and were prepared to legislate, and on the same day the bill went through committee, and was reported. On the 20th of March, the bill was read a third time and passed. On the 23d of March it received the royal assent, and became the law of the land and of the landowners. Thus, from the introduction of the bill into the House of Lords, on the 13th of March, to the 20th of the same month, when it was read a third time and passed, just one week was allowed for deliberation, on one of the most important measures which ever passed that branch of the legislature. The royal assent was given on the 23d, and the bread of millions was made scarce and dear, by the enactment of an interested and privileged class. It will be seen from this, that just thirty-four days intervened from the first introduction of the resolutions in the House of Commons, on the 17th of February, to the affixing of the royal signature to the Corn Bill, on the 23d of March. It must be borne in mind, that during this period the country was in a ferment; and that manifestations of the hostility of the people to the odious measure, were made in every possible form. On the 6th of March, the Houses of Parliament were surrounded by police and military, to guard the members on their way to the scene of their everlasting disgrace. The lobbies and galleries of the House of Commons were cleared of strangers, with a view to conceal from public view the mode in which the landowners conducted their operations against the public weal.

The proceedings we have just narrated were connected with the passing of the Corn Bill of 1815. Let us contrast them with the doings of the monopolists in the session of 1846.

On the 26th of January last, Sir Robert Peel made a full statement of the intentions of the Cabinet with respect to the Corn Law. At the pressing request of the monopolists, he allowed a fortnight for consideration of the measure, before moving the House into Committee. On the 9th of February he moved for the Committee, and the monopolists continued the debate during three weeks, engaging the time of the House of Commons for no less than twelve nights. At least two nights were spent on the report of the resolutions. The second reading was postponed to the 23d of March, and the debate on the second reading, which commenced on Monday last, has now lasted four nights, and the division will probably have taken place as our paper is going to press. The anti-national faction who are opposing the beneficent proposition of the Government, promise, in addition tion to past discussion, a further debate in the Committee on the Bill, and a great contest on the third reading; and there is no chance of the Bill leaving the House of Commons till just before the Easter recess. What the Lords will do with it is yet uncertain; but of one thing we may feel quite sure—they will not pass it in one week from its reception by them, as they passed the Bill of 1815.

In 1815 the people demanded delay and inquiry: they were refused both, and indecent haste marked the conduct of both houses. In 1846 the people demand that their industry shall be liberated, and starving multitudes in Ireland ask for bread; they are met by delay, by an opposition of the most factious character, and by the contemptuous denunciations of the men who for thirty years have been trampling on their most sacred rights. In 1815 thirty-four days were enough for discussion, and for enacting the Corn Law: in 1846 sixty days are spent before the Corn Law Repeal Bill can proceed to its second reading in one house of the legislature; and it is probable that six weeks more, at least, will have passed before it is read a third time in the House of Lords!

The monopolists in one house are led on by Lord George Bentinck—a member of a family which came over with William the Third, and whose greatest deeds are recorded in the annals of the turf. In the House of Lords they are to act under the orders of Lord Stanley—a man whose incapacity for business, and whose impetuosity of temper, have rendered it impossible for him to work in any administration. We leave it to any right-minded man to determine whether the interests of a great empire are to be thus obstructed by a party who can boast of no services rendered to the nation, but whose career has been chiefly remarkable for the shameless audacity with which they have persisted in pillaging the national industry, and by an unvarying disregard of every duty their position as citizens, or as members of the legislature, has imposed upon them. It may be desirable to have a privileged aristocracy, but if national well-being, and the national liberties, are worth preserving, it is high time the insolence of power manifested by the privileged classes were brought under some efficient control. It will be small compensation for the ruin of a great nation, that the territorial aristocracy should be involved in its downfall.

THE AGRICULTURISTS AND FREE TRADE.—At a meeting of the Newcastle-on-Tyne corporation, on Wednesday last, Mr. Sinton, the keeper and manager of the extensive and increasingly important cattle market at that town, presented his annual report to the town council, which showed that, during the past year, the quantity of stock sold at the market considerably exceeded that sold in the previous year; and that the demand for all kinds is now so brisk that, to use his own words, "prices have risen almost to an extreme," beasts selling at 7s. 6d. per stone, and sheep at 8d. per lb. The report concluded with this emphatic statement: "I may also take the liberty of stating, that a great difference of opinion exists in the agricultural districts with reference to the Free Trade measures now proposed, compared with what prevailed when the Premier introduced his measures in 1842. At that time the graziers became alarmed, and brought their stock to market before it was ready; consequently prices were then very low, and all kinds of stock were a drug in the market. But the Free Trade measures now proposed have not affected the prices of stock in the least. On the contrary, since they came under discussion, prices have had rather an upward tendency. Holders are firm, and no apprehension exists as to any reduction in prices." The author of this statement is in constant communication with all the large stock farmers in this neighbourhood, as well as with dealers from adjoining counties. Sir John Fife remarked that Sir R. Peel could not have a better reply than it afforded to his monopolist opponents.—Daily News.

THE PROTECTIONIST PEERS.—We are informed, on authority which cannot be doubted, that "the die is cast." The monopolist peers have had their meetings, one after another, and the issue is, that the march of Free Trade is to be resisted to the uttermost. Lord Stanley, never deficient in animal courage, and always forward when mischief is to be done, has undertaken so to mutilate and mangle the ministerial measure in committee that it will be quite impossible for the Free Trade party in the House of Commons to accept it when it is returned to them. Our regret, we confess, is greater than our surprise at this information. Their lordships have always been tardy learners in the school of wisdom, and therefore we may not wonder at their preserving this characteristic of their order in the present instance. And what are they to gain by playing this dangerous game with an irritated and angry people? Or rather, what may they not lose by their appalling folly? But, while such is the present intention of the lords, Sir R. Peel, we are assured, is resolute and determined on the subject. He has made up his mind that he will take no measure but his own. It is aut Cesar aut nihil with him. He will have all or none. The monopolists must be prepared to form an administration or face a dissolution of Parliament in the very hour when they give a mortal stab to his proposition. So stands the case at present. We speak on the authority of one engaged in playing the game himself.—Liverpool Advertiser.

FREE-TRADE TESTIMONIAL.—We are pleased to find that the subscriptions to the testimonial to Mr. Symons, the honorary Secretary of the Plymouth Free Trade Association are progressing in a very satisfactory manner. The members and friends of this popular movement appear to think themselves under weighty obligations to Mr. Symons for the spirited, zealous, and unceasing energy which he has always thrown into the cause, and which has kept this Association constantly before the public eye as one of the greater provincial bodies which have been instrumental in furthering the cause of Free Trade. They will therefore, we are assured, come down handsomely on the occasion, and show that they duly appreciate the exertions of their active officer. They now begin to feel, probably, under the slow movement of the Commons, and the threatened opposition to their hopes in the Lords, that they will require his services still further; certainly there is reason to fear that some active demonstration may yet be required to convince our hereditary wisdom that the people of this country will not allow themselves to be trifled with in the full attainment of their just hopes, and that nothing short of unrestricted commercial freedom will satisfy the nation. In obtaining this every one must see the advantages of an organised League, and we hope that this testimonial will be in some measure a handsome recognition of the steady services of the Secretary of our Free Trade Association.—Plymouth Journal.

The Stamford Mercury states that, so exceedingly scarce is copper money in Lincoln, some of the tradesmen have been actually compelled to give change in postage stamps.

BIRMINGHAM FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION.

LEAGUE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

(From the Birmingham Journal.)

On the evening of Tuesday, the 31st ult., a general meeting of the Free Trade Association was held at the Public Office, to receive a report from the committee regarding the League Quarter of a Million Fund, and to adopt such measures relative thereto as might be deemed necessary. There was a pretty numerous attendance.

About seven o'clock, Mr. Alderman Geach was called to the chair, who, in stating the object of the meeting, said that although Birmingham did not occupy so favourable a position with regard to wealth as Manchester or Liverpool, yet he hoped the town would not be dishonoured by the amount of subscriptions it would send to the fund. Taking into account its circumstances, and considering the difference in its capital from those towns he had mentioned, he had little doubt but the liberality of the friends of the cause would be such as to do Birmingham all honour. The report of the committee would now be read, and the minutes of a former meeting relative to the subject, which would put them in possession of the proceedings of the association in the matter.

The secretary, Mr. Clifford, then read the minutes and the report, which will be found in our advertising columns. After reading the report, Mr. Clifford said he might, perhaps, be excused making a few observations. He had heard it generally asked, and by parties, too, from whom they might not have expected it—"Why, what are we to subscribe for? The work is done; Sir Robert Peel has done it for you; and if you will but allow him time, will complete it." Now in answer to that, they had but to point to the opposition Sir Robert's measures had met with; the battling he had to do to carry them, in order to show that he required, not only support in the House of Commons, but backing up out of doors. Not only so, but when they saw fallacies, which had been exposed and put to flight over and over again, repeated with all the pertinacity of new matter, and heard the leading men of the protectionists say that the period of three years, which had been fixed upon as the time the Corn Laws should be wholly repealed, was adopted but to allow them any chance the chapter of accidents might turn up, in order to nullify that decision—when they saw all this, did it become them to slacken in their exertions? Would it be proper for them to cease their work while the matter remained in doubt? On the contrary, their best efforts were yet required in the cause: they were not asked for without reason; and they had a guarantee that these exertions would not be called for, or continued a moment longer than was necessary, in the fact that Messrs. Cobden and Bright, who had given their talents, their money, time, and even health to the cause, and who now considered a renewal of their exertions expedient, would not have done so, unless they felt convinced of its propriety. Then, again, they had the same statements and fallacies to contend against at that moment as they had at the very first. And one, which appeared very material, and frightened many, was the assertion that other nations would not follow the example of England in abolishing restrictions; but already, even in the present most imperfect state of our commercial policy, they saw that assertion refuted by the utmost gratification that had been felt in other countries at the mere announcement of a Free Trade by England; and already, to a certain extent, had France, America, Naples, and Germany, given assent to the principle of that measure. Why, if they did so now, while the plan was in its infancy, he did not think, when in all its details it was perfect, and the abolition of restriction complete, they need fear that other nations would not consult their interests by following the enlightened and honest policy of England (applause). They had heard a great deal also about competition; the fears of it had been great throughout the country, and considerable in Birmingham; but since the enunciation of Sir Robert Peel's policy it had been very much on the decrease. Take, for instance, German goods—more particularly the article of hardware. In one case he was acquainted with a manufacturer, who informed him that he had been afraid of competition; but he saw some of the articles, took them to bits, examined them, and found that they were constructed on a principle at once cheaper and as good as those made in England. What was the result? Why, he altered his mode of manufacture, and can now turn out an article cheaper and better than could be imported, and is regardless of competition from any quarter. In his words, "they had much to learn, but nothing to fear, from competition" (applause). With the talent, the skill, and the capital of England—with the many resources the country possessed within itself—it would be indeed surprising if they should feel afraid of rivalry from any quarter; on the contrary, it would have the effect of stimulating renewed exertion, of opening up new fields for British skill, capital, and enterprise, and would be followed by advantages lasting and important (renewed applause). There was only one other point to which he would allude. Birmingham was late in the field in bestirring itself in aid of the cause (hear, hear). True, other towns were exerting themselves before Sir R. Peel brought his measures into Parliament; but although these measures were carried, their obligations to assist in the work were by no means cancelled. It was never too late to do well; and he trusted that Birmingham would stand as well amongst the list of subscribers to the fund as they wished it, and would occupy such a position as would do it honour.

Mr. GEORGE SMITH then moved the following resolution:

"That the report of the committee be received and adopted, and that the committee be requested to take the earliest opportunity of completing a subscription list in aid of the Quarter of a Million Fund, and thus testify the warm interest taken by the inhabitants of this borough and its neighbourhood in the success of the measures brought forward by her Majesty's Ministers in Parliament for the repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws, and in support of the principles of Free Trade."

Mr. THOMAS GAMMON seconded the motion.

The Chairman, after explaining the conditions of a subscription as detailed in the report, read a list of subscriptions amounting to upwards of £2,500. The reading of the list was received with loud cheers.

The Chairman, in continuation, said that many other persons had expressed their intention to subscribe, but had not determined how much they would give. They had certainly done well; but a great deal more remained yet to do; and to accomplish it every man should act as if all depended on his individual exertions. In fact it was only by this that any great work was done. If this had not been the case, the public mind would never have been enlightened, nor the antiquated fallacies of many years swept away; and if it had not been this, education had never dawned upon the country, information as to all the great questions that inrest-its well-being had never been given, nor would that liberal and comprehensive scheme of commercial policy of Sir Robert Peel be proposed (applause). He would not join in a detraction of the Premier, because he had shown a degree of moral courage in bringing forward this measure that commanded admiration. He had come forward and acknowledged his errors; he had boldly separated from the factions of his party, he had placed in jeopardy even his political power; and had indeed temporarily lost it—all to carry out that measure, for the consummation of which they all heartily longed. He had done all this, and surely he deserved their praise and their thanks (hear, and applause). Mr. Clifford had partly anticipated him in what he intended to say; but he would counsel them to be wary of fancying that the work had been accomplished. But even supposing that it had, would it be right, he would ask, would it be fair or honest, to allow the men of Liverpool, and Manchester, and Leeds, to bear the burden—the time, the trouble, and the expense—and then sit down and say, “why, what more is there to do—the work is done? (No, no). He knew Birmingham better than to suppose they would. He had met with one singular exception, however; he had met with one man who held that it was fair to take advantage of the exertions of their neighbours, and to refuse to assist. He was glad there was only one in this mind—he wished there had been none (applause). As had been observed by Mr. Clifford, they had a great guarantee that their exertions were necessary; but there was also the expectation that this money would not be required. Of this let them rest assured, that unless a necessity existed the League would not survive a single hour. In his opinion, however, that time had not come: circumstances had placed them in a position where energetic exertion was made more imperative than ever, in order to maintain that recognition of Free Trade principles which Sir Robert Peel’s scheme so liberally manifested. It would be impolitic, in the highest degree impolitic, to allow the advantage they had gained to be lost by supineness; and that advantage could only be considered secure after the general election, which could not be far distant. It was not by any means improbable that the Lords, in their wisdom, might throw out the measure, rendering an appeal to the country necessary; but supposing that it was carried, every possible effort would be made by the protectionists to obtain a majority at a general election; and if in this they did succeed, it would not be astonishing if they attempted to cancel the measure of Sir Robert Peel, and again adopt protection. It was at the coming election that the grand struggle would take place: it was there that the Free Traders would meet folly and misstatement by honesty and truth—and there it was that the contest must be decided which should show the protectionists the hopelessness of their opposition (cheers). It was an eternal disgrace to Birmingham to be represented, or rather misrepresented, as it now was (“hear,” and renewed applause). It was dishonourable to them to have one member speaking against the measure and then voting for it, and the other both speaking and voting against it—to have one member continually against them, and the other very little, if any, better (loud cheers). One of these hon. gentlemen had been very eloquent on the question of bronze, and all the bronze men of Birmingham were, according to his account, to be ruined together. Now what, he would ask, was the great interest which was to be affected by the change? Was it large in numbers? But, even although it were, was it to be supposed that they were to be beaten out of the market by a reduction of five per cent., when, while the value was almost nominal, it realised to the revenue in one year 78*l*.—the very handsome sum of 78*l*. per annum (cheers and laughter)! He could not say whether the hon. member alluded to bronze or buttons first (laughter, and “Bronze first”). Well, he thought the reply of the Premier might have proved a settler to Mr. Spooner; but no; the hon. gentleman was up again, and at him with buttons (cheers and laughter). Why the button makers were to be ruined too. Now nothing could be more unfounded. There was a large button manufacturer sitting on his right hand (Mr. George Smith). He was not afraid of competition, nor of ruin—he had not had his orders cancelled, his workmen discharged; nor had he shut up his manufactory. He knew he had nothing to fear, and courted competition (applause). But the honourable member produced instances of German buttons, and told the house, “Here are buttons from Germany, which will put the Birmingham makers out of the market.” Now every one knew that the price of buttons was simply a question of fashion; that when first brought out they fetched a high price, and that their market value varied with the fashion, although intrinsically it remained always the same—so that the German buttons might be as good as those of Birmingham, and they might also be cheaper, merely because they were not fashionable. As for the Birmingham manufacturers being beaten out of the market, the statement was absurd, and the honourable member ought to have known so when he made it (applause). Were they content to allow such a state of matters to go on? Were they by petty differences among themselves to continue to be misrepresented (No, and applause)? The electors were disgusted, and he did not wonder at it, for when a Birmingham man mixed with the Free Traders of other towns, he felt very much inclined to hide his head, when he heard the invariable exclamation, “Why, what a pretty pair of members Birmingham has got” (laughter and cheers)! In the prospect of another election, let them not be unprepared—let them ascertain the men who had the greatest amount of electoral support—and let these men be elected. Let them sink the more paltry distinctions of party and party feeling; and let everything be subservient to this; and then, after they had attained their object, they might again revert to Whig and Tory, or to anything else they might please. It was these petty feelings that at the last election placed them in the position they now occupied; it was these feelings that gave the protectionists a chance, which otherwise they might never have dreamed of. They flattered Mr. Sturge—(laughter)—that he was the man of the people, and the result was the present disgraceful representation. He hoped such an event would never again occur. For his own part, if he thought Mr. Sturge, as a Free Trader, was likely to have the greatest amount of electoral suffrages, he would be glad to support him. He feared, however, that this Mr. Sturge did not possess; but still there was sufficient power in the hands of the Free Traders to secure the return of Free Trade representatives. In conclusion, the Chairman again pressed upon them the claims of the times, and the condition of the country, as a stimulus to renewed active exertion.

The Rev. George Dawson said he would only ask one question—whether, even admitting that the interests of buttons and bronze were affected, this at all affected the principle of Free Trade? It was impossible that any great measure affecting the whole commercial policy of the country could be carried without injuring the interests of some classes; but where the great end was to confer general benefit, this must be borne. He perfectly agreed with all that had been said regarding the members for Birmingham—more especially with what had been said of one of them. It was really pitiable to see that honourable gentleman get up, on any question, to advocate obstruction, and repeat in silly, childish, and factious talk, his bigoted opinions and antiquated fallacies, recommending of hindrance to every great question of advancement—(cheers)—hindrance not only to a supply of food, but obstruction to religion—as he manifested on the late proposition of relief to the Roman Catholics of Ireland (loud cheers). He hoped they would hear no more from the honourable member about bronze or buttons; his statements were ridiculous, and known to be so by every manufacturer in Birmingham. He would thank the secretary to put down his name for £5 (cheers).

Mr. CLIFFORD said it might, perhaps, be as well to mention the mode they intended to pursue in collecting the subscriptions. Now since they had got it started, they intended to send a circular to all the parties in the town and neighbourhood whom they thought likely to subscribe, enclosing a form to be filled up with the sum subscribed; and to save all trouble, this form would be ready directed to the treasurer, so that they had nothing to do but put it in the post-office. This mode they considered preferable to a personal canvass, as it would enable them to reach every one, and to know exactly when the subscription was complete.

Mr. EDWARD COWPER said, perhaps he might be allowed to state what had taken place in Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co.’s works, at Smethwick; and it was cheering, because the movement among the men had been quite spontaneous. About a week or two ago, one of the working foremen intimated his intention of subscribing to the fund, and put down his name for several pounds; his example was followed by the other workmen; and in three days they had collected the handsome sum of £22 (loud cheers).

The Rev. R. MELSON remarked that he had seen in the papers a proposition to request Sir Robert Peel to stand for Birmingham. They might ask Sir Robert; he (Mr. M.) felt certain he would be well supported.

The CHAIRMAN said he was afraid Sir Robert would not come amongst them.

Mr. THOMAS MACKAY said it would certainly be a pity if Birmingham required to go a-begging for men to represent it—good and honest men, too. He might mention that on a recent occasion he went to Mr. Spooner in London, regarding the Friendly Societies Benefit Bill, which was at present pending in the House of Commons. “Well,” said Mr. Spooner, “what do you think of matters now?—that measure of Sir Robert’s will be the ruin of you all. Not only will it be the destruction of the button and bronze manufacturers, but it will ruin the boot and shoemakers as well.” I (Mr. Mackay) told him we were of a different opinion; that I was acquainted with several manufacturers who had now more orders than ever, and feared no competition. “Ah, it will ruin—it will destroy you,” said Mr. Spooner. “At all events, Sir Robert has lost my confidence (great laughter). I can never trust him more” (renewed laughter). After a few general remarks, Mr. Mackay continued: But I almost omitted to tell you one little incident. My friend, Mr. Sansum, who was along with me, addressing Mr. Spooner, said: “I am a very plain and blunt man, and you’ll excuse me speaking my mind. Well, Mr. Spooner, to tell you the truth, I neither like your acting, nor Mr. Muntz’s speaking—there’s the confidence to be placed in neither” (great laughter and cheers).

The resolution was then put to the meeting, and carried unanimously.

A vote of thanks was afterwards given to Mr. Alderman Geach for his conduct in the chair; which having been suitably acknowledged, the meeting broke up.

In the course of the evening several gentlemen contributed liberally to the fund, and at the close the amount of subscriptions was announced to be £2660.

The following is a list of the subscribers’ names, and the sums announced.

	£	s.		£	s.
Henry Smith	..200	0	John Webster	..25	0
Thomas Phillips	..100	0	Keeling, Brothers	..25	0
Josh. Scholefield & Sons	250	0	Samuel Messenger	..25	0
Joseph Giltott	..250	0	Brooke Smith	..25	0
John Wright	..125	0	Samuel Brown	..25	0
Timothy Smith & Sons	200	0	Robert Fletcher	..25	0
John Betts	..100	0	Joseph Collins	..25	0
Charles Clifford	..100	0	William Hayward	..25	0
Charles Geach	..100	0	John Blakeway	..25	0
Harold and Sons	..100	0	Edward Barker	..20	0
Samuel Beale	..100	0	E. W. Fry	..20	0
Thomas Whitfield	..100	0	Joseph Gaskins	..10	0
William Nutter	..50	0	Thomas Wright	..10	0
F. and C. Osler	..50	0	Thomas Prime	..10	0
John Lord and Co.	..50	0	Thomas Pinches	..10	0
Blyth and Graham	..50	0	T. R. T. Hodgson	..10	0
Neustadt and Barnett	..50	0	Rev. R. Melson	..10	0
Thomas Eyre Lee	..50	0	Thomas Walker	..10	10
William Wills	..50	0	F. & W. Southall (Don.)	5	0
W. J. Beale	..50	0	Charles Cowper	..5	0
S. A. Goddard	..50	0	A. Friend, per J. Hayward	5	0
Smith and Kemp	..50	0	George Dawson, M.A.	5	0
George Smith	..50	0	Edward Cowper	..15	0
T. H. Ryland	..30	0	Loach and Clark	..15	0

ANTICIPATING FREE TRADE.—On Saturday, the 20th ult., a fine 600-ton iron ship was launched from the building yard of Messrs. James Hodgson and Co., Liverpool. She is the first of a line of eight, to ply betwixt Liverpool and Rio de Janeiro, touching at Pernambuco and Bahia, South America. She will be fitted with the screw propeller, and a pair of 50 horse power engines as auxiliary steam power. She will be heavily rigged as a ship; her length on the load water line is 175 feet, 26 feet beam, and 17 feet deep. The christening was performed by Mr. Samuel Johnson, of Pernambuco, who gave her the name of “Antelope,” as she glided into her native element, amid the assembled multitude. A splendid entertainment was provided after lunch, at the expense of the owners, and about 375 sat down to dinner, prepared by Mr. Lynn, of the Waterloo Hotel. The vessel is consigned to the able management of Messrs. Mc Tiar and Hudfield, the well-known Rio merchants. Her owners are entirely Free Traders, including some of the staunchest, viz. Messrs. Crook, Finch, and Jevans. Messrs. Hodgson and Co., have also on hand one 1300 ton steam-vessel, iron, to trade betwixt Liverpool and New York, which will be ready for launching in about eight weeks, and it is expected that this vessel will be called the “Free Trader,” although she was to be named the Eagle. They have also just completed an iron steamer for the River Plate, and have the stocks for others for different destinations.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

BUSHELL v. LUCKETT.

Mr. Wellsby for the Appellant; Mr. Grove for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—The rate in this case was made on the 28th of September, the purposes to which the rate was to be applied being referable to the thirteen weeks preceding the 10th day of December, 1844; therefore, the object of the provision was to provide for the exigencies of the parish for the interval from the 16th of September to the 16th of December. Now the question is, whether it was the rate of the parish for the time being? It appears to me to satisfy all the terms of the Act. The rate, independent of the new rate, was a rate still existing for the same purpose. No doubt if the arrears were due upon it, the parish officers might distrain and justify under the rate, if they justified at all, in the interval when the new rate was made; and, therefore, unless there is a justification under this rate, it would fall on the existing rate at the time. I conceive it never was intended in a case of this sort, where the words are general in the beginning of the clause, “every parish in which there shall be a rate for the relief of the poor,” that it should be said because the term for which it was intended to provide has expired, that therefore the rate has expired. I think the words of the act are satisfied.

Mr. JUSTICE MAULE.—I am of the same opinion. To construe the rate for the time being to exclude the rate in question, I think would be inconsistent with the plain spirit of the 30th section of the Reform Act; and would be inconsistent with the directions of that section, and what is to be understood by the words there used. That section enables a party to be put upon “the rate list for the time being;” and therefore it assumes that there always is a rate for the time being in every parish; and probably at the time of passing the Reform Act, there was no parish in England in which no rate had ever been made. In fact there always is a rate in every parish; a rate is made, and until another rate exists it is liable to be enforced at the end of its existence, or at any time. Then, as the section of the act speaks of “the rate for the time being,” it excludes the idea of there being two rates at one time as much as it excludes the idea of there being no rate at any time. It is, I think, very plain that a person under this section has always a right to be put upon some rate, and that rate is the rate last made. It is said here he ought to have demanded to be put, not on the rate made in September, but the last effectually made and published. It is not said he has not a right to call on the overseers to put him on the last made rate, but inasmuch as it was another rate, it did not become operative or capable of being enforced till after the demand made. I think such a rate as that is not a rate for the time being, and in the sense of the Act of Parliament—consequently the demand was properly made, and the appellant was entitled to succeed.

The rest of the court concurred.

Decision reversed

LUCKETT v. KNOWLES.

Mr. Grove for the Appellant; Mr. Wellsby for the Respondent.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—It appears to me this was a case properly for the amendment of the revising barrister, and comes within the 40th section; and I conceive he is right in the amendment he has made on the present occasion. That section, so far as the place of abode of the claimant is concerned, provides for two cases; first, where there is a total omission of the place of abode; and the second, where it is insufficiently described for the purpose of being complete. In both these cases the barrister is to expunge the name; but if, whilst the revision goes on, evidence is brought to his satisfaction of the proper description of the place of abode, then he is to insert it in the list. In the argument it is admitted that there is the total absence of any place of abode; and it is said the second predicament, namely, the insufficiency of the description for the purpose of being identified, must be limited and confined to a description that affords sufficient particularity; but it will not apply and comprehend a case where this description is actually wrong. It seems to me, looking to the object and intention of this power of amendment, the thing may be very safely included within the power given where the place of abode of a party is not sufficiently described for the purpose of being identified. None can say in this particular case, when you find the word Queen in the register, and the proper place of abode is Queen-street, B. oomsbury, that there is a sufficient description on the register for the purpose of identifying the party. I do not see what there is to restrain and narrow the terms of the clause intended to be literal. It seems to me that if the statute intended to comprehend every case of total omission, and every other case in which the description inserted is one by which we could not find the party, this falls within the latter, and therefore I think the decision must be affirmed.

Mr. JUSTICE MAULE.—I think this name was properly retained in the list. The barrister was bound to retain it, unless he had some duty to perform under the power given him to expunge the name. Now, the only object of the name being retained was, that the place of abode should not be called Queen when, in fact, it was Queen-square. There is a list of voters, in which the voter in question appears quite regularly upon the face of it. The barrister is asked to expunge the name, unless there is some reason given for not so doing, or some authority given him by the Act. The voter having been objected to, and notice of objection being given, it was necessary for him to prove his qualification. He did so entirely to the satisfaction of the revising barrister. It has been said that the place of abode is a part of the qualification. I do not agree to that. It means the place of abode at the time he is put upon the list. There is a proviso that he shall not be registered, unless resident within a certain distance from the borough for a certain time. It is by no means required to be put down in the Act of Parliament; so that there is no objection at all to the qualification of the voter here, and it does not fall within the powers of section 40; that requires the barrister to expunge the name of any person, if the barrister finds his qualification is insufficient in law to entitle him to vote. There is no kind of objection to the qualification here; therefore, he is not to be expunged on that ground. If his name is to be expunged at all, it cannot be because there is no qualification. It is not because the qualification is not sufficient in law as stated on the list, because it is sufficient in law. The only power given to expunge is that which arises under the subsequent part of the 10th section, which is that which imposes the duty of expunging the name. Now the objectors here must insist that the voter comes within the description, because if he does not—if he is not a person whose place of abode is wholly omitted or insufficiently described for the purpose of identification, then the power of expunging does not arise, and he is "on the register," because he is rightly on the register. Those two powers have already been dealt with, and the third power is the only one in question. The objector, in order to bring the voter within that power, must say the place of abode is either wholly omitted, or insufficiently described, for the purpose of identification. If he says it is not an error in fact, he has no power to expunge; if he says it is so, then he "shall expunge it," wherever it exists, under the authority given by the powers of the act: that is to say, the power to expunge is not an absolute power, but it is a power to expunge unless the matter so omitted, or insufficiently described, be supplied to the satisfaction of the revising barrister before he shall have completed the revision of the list. Here, undoubtedly, it was so supplied. It seems perfectly clear the revising barrister had no power to expunge. If then he is to have a conditional power of performing that which was performed, here then power becomes void, and no longer exists. I think it is clearly within that part of the section. It is unnecessary to discuss the question, whether, in the event of the name not being supplied to his satisfaction, he had any other power beyond that which is stated: it is clear there is no power given him to expunge, unless it be qualified by supplying that which was supplied on this occasion.

The rest of the court concurred.

Decision affirmed.

IMPORTANT DEMONSTRATION AGAINST FREE TRADE.

In the Parliamentary proceedings of Friday last we find the following most important announcement:

"Mr. Grogan presented a petition from the chimney sweepers of Dublin against Free Trade."

Undoubtedly the League has got its death blow now, and the new allies whom the Richmonds and Buckinghams have enlisted in their cause will prove as effective in putting the anti-monopolists to rout as that gallant Irishman, Sir H. Gough, was in his late triumphant victory over the Sikhs. —Kilkenny Journal.

THE PROTECTIONISTS.—The Augsburgh Gazette just received says:—"In consequence of the anxiety of the public for news from the East Indies, the Or-gon question is in the meantime almost forgotten. At all events, no one takes it ill of the Ministry except the protectionist organs, for making no answer to the swaggering of the Americans, and continuing to offer its hand for an equitable adjustment. Lord George Bentinck, who is all of a sudden, as if by a magic stroke, transformed into a great statesman, and delivers his judgment, in a single speech, on all points of internal and external policy, upon trade, finance, and national education, spoke very freely last week, in the Barambas style, of the destruction of all the American seaports. I assure you, however, that John Bull infinitely prefers buying from his brother Jonathan cotton, corn, salt meat, and cheese, to destroying his towns with cannon balls, and if Jonathan has not entirely lost his senses, he will not thwart old Bull in his peaceable humour. The opposition (behind the Treasury benches) contest Peel's plan step by step; and seem to derive fresh courage from Lord Stanley's declaration that he hopes the House of Peers will throw it out; and yet the result of all their divisions on each individual point of the tariff which they thought proper to oppose ought to have rendered them more discreet; for they were not only beaten every time, but on every division the Ministerial majority was larger, and in the sequel the House of Commons adopted the tout ensemble of the tariff without the slightest alteration. At this moment all the articles therein included are already either entirely free of duty or admitted at the newly-reduced rates. What, however, they should take still more to heart is the almost total silence of the manufacturers and artisans affected by the alteration; even those orators who at first cried out so loudly had partly withdrawn their complaints against the intended alteration in the timber duties (since adopted), and partly ceased to complain at all. Yes, the prevailing silence of the farmers, and even of the landed proprietors, should serve them as a warning that, as these have attained conviction, it would be better to bring the affair to a termination at once, than any longer to depend upon an apparent, but, on account of its uncertainty, a useless protection. All this, however, does not restrain the landlords from continuing to struggle. On the 23d ult. Peel proposed the second reading of the Corn Bill, and a long debate ensued. The result is known. Unfortunately, the Government finds itself compelled to press forward the new Irish Coercion Bill, and on this account the business of the Corn Bill and the tariff must be postponed. There is, moreover, no hope entertained, in spite of all the prayers and complaints of the commercial world, that this affair will be entirely brought to a close before the end of May. What is intended by this delay it is difficult to ascertain, as even amongst the Opposition ranks it appears to be deemed a matter of certainty that a majority is gained in the House of Peers. It suits their purpose, however, to impute to Peel every possible act of treachery in the world; and thus their organs declare, with all the appearance of conviction, that he has already concerted with the Whigs, Radicals, and Repealers the sacrifice of the church in Ireland and the granting of repeal to O'Connell, as soon as the Corn Law battle has been won; and that consequently every bishop who may vote for the repeal of the Corn Laws will really vote for the downfall of the church. I fear, however, that this mingling of corn and church will not much avail either the corn producing aristocracy or the aristocratical church established by law. From the very circumstance that the League is constantly accused that its intention is directed beyond corn and aimed at the church, the latter might easily be enabled to direct its power against an institution the clergy of which are on all occasions pressed upon it as adversaries."

DEATH OF CHARLES SQUAREY, ESQ., OF SALISBURY.—We deeply regret to have to announce the death of Charles Squarey, Esq., of Salisbury, who died on Sunday last, in the 36th year of his age. In him the League has lost an energetic and uncompromising advocate of its principles, and society a man whose talents and exertions have ever been used to advance the intelligence and welfare of his fellow-men.

SCARCITY IN IRELAND.—The price of potatoes in Dublin has now risen to 9d. a stone for good ones, and 6d. for very indifferent ones. This is an advance of at least a hundred per cent. on the prices of last year, and yet the protectionist papers in Dublin have the heartless effrontery to assert that there is no scarcity, and that provisions of all kinds "were never more plentiful or more cheap than at this period of the year." —Liverpool Times.

THE CHELTENHAM ANTI-CORN LAW PETITION.

Mr. Berkeley's committee to enquire into the charges of forgery and personation in the signatures to this petition, have brought in a report as under. The facts proved are exactly as we stated them at the time, and the Committee are obliged to own as much in their report. But as there happened to be a majority of Anti-Free Trade members on the committee, the last sentence was very kindly added as a rider, as a delicate method of letting down easy to the hon. member, who has made himself so conspicuous on the occasion. Here is the report:

"That it is the opinion of this committee that an irregularity in regard to the petition from Cheltenham, as transmitted thence to Manchester, was of a nature which rendered it not capable of being presented to the House of Commons, according to the known forms of the house, that it was altered by agents of the Anti-Corn-Law League at Manchester, who were cognisant of the rules of the house; and in adapting this petition to those rules they acted irregularly, though with no fraudulent intention. It appears to your committee that the first five signatures appended to the petition sheet, as presented to the house, are not in the handwriting of the persons there named, but are transcribed from genuine signatures which were on another sheet; that this act of transcription, though irregular, is not fraudulent. It further appears that 24 names, purporting to be the signatures of other subscribers to the petition, were written by one and the same person (an elector of Cheltenham), with the sanction, as he states, of the persons named. In closing their report, your committee think this a fit occasion for expressing their regret that methods of promoting and preparing petitions should prevail, which have a tendency to bring into discredit that mode of giving expression to the sentiments of the subjects of the realm." —Cheltenham Examiner.

CORN FOR EUROPE.—Several shipments of Indian corn having been made from this country for various ports in Ireland, the impression prevails that on corn the duty has been or will be taken off. The shipments as already stated, are by order of the British Government, for the aid of the poor Irish who are suffering from the injury of the potato crop. Indian corn, however, will be included in the tariffs of the bread stuffs, if it shall be ascertained that Sir Robert Peel is strong enough in both houses of Parliament to reform the Corn Laws according to the principle he has laid down, but it is certain that recent experience having shown the utility and economy of our Indian corn, and as it cannot be produced by the corn-growing countries of Europe, our west will have the benefit of an extensive sale of this valuable product as every kind of experiment will be made in England to improve the manner of baking it. In other bread-stuffs it is possible that grain from the Baltic could be sold as cheaply as from this country. But if we look at the importations of our bread-stuffs into England during the months of December and January, say in the port of Liverpool alone, we are doing a heavy business even with the Corn Law in force. Of flour there was entered in those months 133,883 bls., 129,652 bushels of wheat, 188,012 bushels of corn, besides barley, peas, beans, &c. It is a doubtful policy for us to tie ourselves up by a commercial arrangement of reciprocal duties in relation to the tariff. We reduce our tariff as a national policy, and England reduces her duties on the Corn Law in conformity with the wishes of the people. The change is mutually beneficial, and operating silently to the benefit of both. There is no necessity for treaty stipulations. Independent of the double crop of corn produced in the prairies of the west, we can grow to the north several millions of bushels more than we did in 1845; and we learn that our farmers at the present season are preparing to plant many additional acres of Indian corn. —New York Sun.

THE BOROUGH OF WIGAN.—The following circular from Mr. James Lindsay, dated London, March 24, was delivered to the electors of Wigan on Friday last:—"Having seen in the Parliamentary proceedings that a petition from two of the electors of Wigan had been presented, on the 17th instant, praying to defend my return, I think it is due to myself and respectful to you to inform you that this course has been taken without my knowledge, and I deeply regret it. Having endeavoured to obtain what information I could, it would appear that it has been prepared by persons wholly unconnected with the town of Wigan. I accordingly sent for the agent employed by the party to defend my seat, and informed him, in the presence of witnesses, that this petition had been prepared, and he had been employed, without any sanction from me, and that neither I nor any one connected with me would be responsible in any way whatever on account of their proceedings; for, having declined to defend my return, I conceived I could not with honour encourage others to defend it for me." It is said that Mr. Gladstone has signified his readiness to become a candidate, if unopposed. —Liverpool Albion.

THE TARIFF.—THE NEW BOON TO ALL NATIONS.—A Dutch paper makes the following statement with respect to the new Peel tariff:—"Groningen, March 16th.—We understand that it is in contemplation to establish a direct communication between this city and London. When the great measure of Sir Robert Peel, the reform of the English tariff, has passed, as in all probability it will, the Upper House, it will have a favourable effect on the price of our productions, and in their exportation, so that a direct communication with England will be of great importance to our provinces. What an influence the general reform of the English tariff will have, is already seen by the considerable increase in the price of cattle, in consequence of the reduction of the duties on importation, and the prospect of their entire abolition in the sequel. When the greater part of our productions find easy admittance into England we shall never have to fear a want of exportation, since all our articles, if the projected reform of the tariff take place, will find a ready market in England; and even many things, which hitherto could not be thought of, may become articles of exportation, when a regular communication by steamboats between this city and London is established."

THE EMPEROR OF CHINA A FREE TRADER.—A very salutary and effective measure has just been adopted, which promises well for the increase of commerce, and to be otherwise beneficial to the Capital. Through want of rain, the grain boats from the provinces have been delayed, and the city as well as the environs have this season been exposed to much suffering. The Emperor has been prevailed upon henceforth to allow the tribute rice of some provinces to be imported by sea to Teentsin, instead of the tardy inland passage. He has also abolished the Corn Laws at Childe, and permits vessels from Fo-kein and other provinces to import rice to any amount free of duty. —Pekin Gazette.

THE COLONIES ARE COMING!

(From the Nonconformist.)

The course of right, like that of true love does not appear to be "running smooth." The protectionists, in one way, or other, have secured delay; the object of which, is to have time to bring up the colonies into their line of battle.

It is therefore time to begin to look after colonies. What is a colony? The colonial question is going to be inoculated upon the cam. The League, for the putting down of Corn Law robbery, is going to be transformed into a League for the putting down of colonial robbery, by the act of the enemy.

A colony is a portion of the inhabitants of a country, sent out of it to live and labour somewhere else. If Robinson Crusoe had sent his man Friday to grow yams at some distant point, or some island in sight, if such there were, Friday would have been a colony. And the rule for determining whether this colony was worth having, would have been simply whether Friday in his transportation made more and better yams than he would have done by staying at home. If on keeping Friday at home and employing him there, more and better yams could be gotten for instance by exchange with the inhabitants of the main land opposite, supposing peace to have been established;—then Friday would be a knave and Robinson a fool, if he carried his point of going forth a colonising. And doubly both, if Friday could be conceived to be of such consummate impudence, as to propose a self-denying ordinance in the shape of a tax on Continental yams, by way of enabling him to keep up the price of his.

If Friday requested to direct attention to the great and important trade which would be carried on with him in his losing colony,—the canoe-loads, for instance, of curiously tanned goats' hides, and implements framed with the help of such tools as his master alone possessed, which might be dropped down to him under charge of a shipwrecked Spaniard, for a return cargo of his yams,—his master would tell him he was an ass if he expected this to be done, when yams as good could be got by a less expenditure on the Continentals who were in the market. But civilised men are not asses, when they think they can cheat their fellows by an Act of Parliament; because the practicability of the thing is every day demonstrated, and not only that, but the consequences of the way in which the community at large have hold of the short end of the lever,—the nature of things is to do wrong, and to do right or to get it is the difficult exception.

The colonies, then, are on their way. Their trumpeters will be here by the next steamboats, to assure you,—one, that it will engage to find you with dear corn, if you will only pay for it,—and another, that you shall never be without dear sugar, unless by your own fault and obstinacy. The secret in all this to be kept, and which heaven and earth will be moved to bury under a load of words and bluster, being that all and everything in the way of encouragement given to trade and industry by the foolish process, would be given to them somewhere else by the wise one; with the advantage to the consumers, who are everybody, of having something for the difference of price instead of nothing. The history of Jobson and Johnson and Jackson, in the article headed "Economical Blunders!" in last week's Nonconformist, is applicable throughout.

This one principle runs through everything. It runs through corn; it runs through colonies; it runs through the apprehended injuries to the working classes from the employment of machinery. In fact, it is the eye-opening principle; and if we can get our eyes open, we shall put down all that can be brought against us.

THE TRIUMPHS OF DAVID HUME AS A POLITICAL ECONOMIST.—"In no long time, a hundred years will have elapsed from the day when Hume told the world, what the legislature of this country is now declaring, that national exclusiveness in trade was as foolish as it was wicked; that no nation could profit by stopping the natural flow of commerce between itself and the rest of the world; that commercial restrictions deprive the nations of the earth of that free communication and exchange, which the author of the world has intended by giving them soils, climates, and geniuses, so different from each other; and that, like the healthy circulation of the blood in living bodies, Free Trade is the vital principle by which the nations of the earth are to become united in one harmonious whole. Those who, with a reverential eye, have marked the wonders of the animal structure, and discovered beauty, utility, and harmonious purpose, where presumptuous ignorance has found uselessness or deformity; or have seen the lower animals, each working in its own blind ignorance, gregariously constructing a fabric more perfect, on philosophic principles, than human science can create, have thence drawn vivid pictures of the wisdom and goodness with which the world is ordered. May we not extend this harmony to the social economy of the globe, and say, that the spirit of activity and enterprise, harmonising with the dispersal of the different bounties of Providence in the distant regions of the globe are part of the same harmonious system; that the love of commerce and the desire of aggrandisement, which in the eye of a narrow philosophy assume the air of selfish and repulsive passions, represent themselves, when they are left to their legitimate course, as motives implanted in us for the great purposes of securing mutual dependence and kind offices, and their fruits, peace, and good-will, throughout the great family of mankind. To be the first to teach that the earth is not doomed to the eternal curse of rivalry and strife, and to open up so wide a prospect of beneficence, may be an atonement for many errors, and in the eye of good taste may justify the brief assumption of conscious superiority, in which the subject of this memoir indulged, when he desired that the inscription on his monument should contain only his name, with the year of his birth and of his death, leaving it to posterity to add the rest." —J. H. Burton's Life and Correspondence of Hume.

A correspondent, whose case, we fear, is not singular, says—"In the process of sowing a field of five acres, I found eight nests of young rabbits, five in each, about eight inches below the surface. This is 'stocking' a poor man's possession with a witness. It is equal to 320 animals on 40 acres." —Montrose Review.

If we are to have Free Trade, let it be free and unconditional. Open the ports, by all means; but open them to everything. Let the quays be as free for traffic as the Queen's highway; let us grow what we like, consume what we please, and tax us in one round sum according to each man's means and substance; and then, at all events, there can be no clashing of interests. This is the true principle of Free Trade, carried to its utmost extent; and we recommend it now to the serious consideration of Ministers. —Blackwood's Magazine.

Just Published,

MR. COBDEN'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Friday, February 27th, 1846.—Revised. Price One Penny, 16 Pages.

MR. BRIGHT'S SPEECH in the House of Commons, on Tuesday Night, Feb. 17. Price One Penny.

MR. GIBSON'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Monday night, Feb. 18. Price One Penny.

LEAGUE Office, 27, Fleet-street, London; J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Where may be had, THE GOATACRE MEETING.

Just published, price One Penny, or 5s. per 100.

A VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATACRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.

Upwards of 100,000 copies have been printed.

Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Mrs. Maner. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.

TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE TRADE. By Earl Ducie, Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, Bright, Gibson, O'Connell, McCullagh, Baines, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, April 8, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

*Burd, John, and Sons, Manchester	40	0	0
*Gill, Wm., Burley Hall, near Otley	20	0	0
*A Friend, do	20	0	0
*Bevan, Reice, Wigan	10	0	0
*Lloyd, Nathaniel, 101, Rumford-street, Manchester	2	0	0
*Court and Wolfenden, Wakefield-st., Oxford-st., do.	1	0	0
J. L. do.	1	0	0
*Booth, Tempest, Tempest-street, Ardwick	1	0	0
*Hilton and Norris, 35, Chorlton-street	1	0	0
*Wood, Robert, Rochdale Road, Bury	1	0	0
*Clutterbuck, James, Russell-street	1	0	0
*Bucknall, Benjamin, printer	1	0	0
*Hawkins, Henry	0	10	0
Thomas, Isaac	0	5	0
Grimes, J. C., Stonehouse, near	0	5	0
*France, Benj., and Sons, Honley, near	4	0	0
*Boothroyd, Joseph	4	0	0
*Whiteley, James, Almondsbury, near	2	0	0
*Thewlis, Titus	2	0	0
*Binns, David, Lindley, near	1	0	0
*Wormald, Henry, grocer	1	0	0
*Whiteley, Samuel	0	4	0
*Sykes, Thomas, Slaithwaite, near	0	4	0
*Sevill, Messrs., and Wolstenhulme, Lower Moor Iron Works	10	0	0
*Wild and Whitehead, Pastures, Saddleworth	10	0	0
*Holden, John, and Brothers, Holden Fold, Royton	10	0	0
*Holden, John, Highlands, Royton	10	0	0
*Smethurst, Wm., Stock Brook, Chaderton	6	0	0
*Whittaker, Brothers, Royton	5	0	0
*Holden, John and Thomas, Shiloh, do.	4	0	0
*Barker, James, Horsedge Mill	4	0	0
*Radcliffe, Henry, Union-street	4	0	0
*Bentley, John, Victoria-place, Mumps	4	0	0
*Cowper, Wm. do	4	0	0
*Whitehead, Jerry, Greenacres Moor	2	0	0
*Mellodew, Thomas, Moorside, do.	2	0	0
*Braddock, Thomas, Bell Mill, do	2	0	0
*Chadwick, Thomas, Royton	2	0	0
*Stott, James, Edge-lane, do	1	0	0
*Fielding, John, New Earth, Greenacres Moor	1	0	0
*Ashton, John, Fonleach, do	1	0	0
*Grainger, Wm., Croft Bank do	1	0	0
*Mellor, John, Side of do	1	0	0
*Holt, Wm., Stampston do	1	0	0
*Rhodes, Thomas, Castle Mill, do	1	0	0
*Fletcher, James, Rhodes Mill, do	1	0	0
*Riley, Joseph, Market-place	1	0	0
*Tipping, Henry, Church-terrace	1	0	0
*Greenwood, George, Victoria-st., Mumps	1	0	0
*Mills, John and Thomas, Barnfold	1	0	0
Mills, Jas, Union Mill	0	8	0
*Chadwick, Edward	1	0	0
Milnes, Jonas	1	0	0
Hurst, George	1	0	0
Sinkinson, Wm.	1	0	0
Richardson, Wm.	1	0	0
Whitehead, John	1	0	0
Taylor, James	1	0	0
Bradley, Wm.	1	0	0
Ormond, James	1	0	0
Garstide, John Bell	1	0	0
Mortimer, John	1	0	0
Bernard, Michael	1	0	0
Riley, Joseph	1	0	0
Simpson, John	1	0	0
Halkyard, John	1	0	0
Dunkley, Edward	1	0	0
Dawson, George	1	0	0
Greaves, John	1	0	0
Brookelhurst, Thomas	1	0	0
Fearnley, James	1	0	0
Oldham, James	1	0	0
Politt, Joseph	1	0	0
Whitlam, Timothy	1	0	0
Ramsey, Robert, merchant	2	0	0
*Wardrop, Robert, do	1	0	0
Williamson, David, do	1	0	0
*Crawford, Hugh, thread manufacturer	1	0	0
*Clark, Archibald, draper	1	0	0
Martin, Rev. James	0	10	0
Meikle, Rev. James	0	5	0
Giffen, Adam, draper	0	5	0
Muir, John, tanner	0	5	0
Richmond, George, glazier	0	5	0
Dunlop, John, baker	0	5	0
Various small sums	0	6	6
Marshall, Wm.	1	0	0
A Friend	0	10	0
A Friend	0	2	6
A Friend	0	2	6

*Wilson, Walter, Orchard House	4	0	0
*Fraser, Robert, Teviot Crescent	4	0	0
*Laird, Alex. and Son, Wilton	4	0	0
*Wilson, John, Ladylaw	4	0	0
*Wilson, George, High-street	4	0	0
*Elliot, Hon. J. E., Wilton Lodge	4	0	0
*Nixon, Wm., Lynawood	4	0	0
*Keddie and Armstrong, High-street	2	0	0
*Turnbull, Wm. and J.	2	0	0
*Hogg, Geo., at Watson's Factory	1	1	0
*Watson, George, and Son, Buccleugh-s	1	0	0
*Wilson, M. and Sons, Teviot Crescent	1	0	0
*Briggs, John, clothier	1	0	0
*Kirk, Charles, Kirkstyle	1	0	0
*Turnbull, John, Dyer Crescent	1	0	0
*Melrose, James, and Son	1	0	0
*Turnbull, James, Galalaw	1	0	0
*Goodfellow, Alex., Hadshaw	1	0	0
*Pringle, Robert, High-street	1	0	0
*Pringle, Thomas, do	1	0	0
*Inglis, Wm. do	1	0	0
*Michie, Robert, O'Connell-street	1	0	0
*Grierson, Adam, High-street	1	0	0
*Laidlaw, Douglas, do	1	0	0
*Armstrong, John, do	1	0	0
*Michie, Andrew, Loan-street	1	0	0
*Haddon, Andrew, Howe Gate	1	0	0
*Kennedy, James D.	1	0	0
*Robson, Ebenezer	1	0	0
*Easton, George, Tower Knowe	1	0	0
*Ewen, Henry, Crescent	1	0	0
Scott, George	0	10	0
Irvine, Wm., High-street	0	8	6
Wilson, James, writer	0	8	0
Park, David S.	0	5	0
Horsburgh, Alex.	0	5	0
Fengrieve, James	0	5	0
Dalglish, James	0	5	0
J. G.	0	5	0
Blackie, Geo., Tower Knowe	0	4	0
Munro, Wm., High-street	0	4	0
Deiner, F. W., Round Close	0	4	0
Scott, Thomas, New Road	0	4	0
White, Wm.	0	2	6
Laing, John	0	2	6
Hiddes, John	0	2	6
Brodie, Walter	0	2	6
Armistead, John	0	2	6
Douglas, John	0	2	6
Barnet, Robert	0	2	6
Turnbull, Wm.	0	2	6
Deans, Francis, High-street	0	2	6

*Paton, J. and D.	10	0	0
*Archibald, J. and R.	5	0	0
*Archibald, Robert, and Sons	4	0	0
*Monteith, Thomas, and Son	3	0	0
*Walker, Andrew, and Co.	2	0	0
*A Friend	1	0	0
*Henderson, James	1	0	0
*Harison, W. and P.	1	0	0
*Thomson, J. and M.	1	0	0
Walker, J. and G.	0	16	0
Dawson, Thomas	0	12	0
Hunter, George	0	12	0
J. F.	0	8	0
Cargill, John	0	8	0
Miller, George	0	6	0
Morrison, John	0	6	0
Pyle, Wm.	0	4	0
Shaw, Alexander	0	4	0
Philip, Robert	0	4	0

*Brettle, George, and Co., 119, Wood-street	100	0	0
*Strutt, Edward, M.P., 42, South-street	70	0	0
*Strutt, John, Derby	70	0	0
*Strutt, Anthony, do	70	0	0
*Courtauld, Taylor, and Co., 2, Carey-lane, Cheapside	60	0	0
*Stone and Kemp, 35, Spital-square	40	0	0
*Vyse, Thomas, and Sons, 3, Cripplegate-buildings	20	0	0
*Devas, W. and T., & Co., 24, Lawrence-lane, Cheapside	20	0	0
*Smith, Geo., and Son, 14, Gough-square, Fleet-street	20	0	0
Mitchell, T. A., M.P.	20	0	0
*Lee, Messrs, J. & Co., Felling Alkali Works, Gateshead	20	0	0
*Crawshaw, George, Gateshead Iron Works, do	20	0	0
*Cash, Wm., 39, Wood-street	10	0	0
Cory, Wm., and Son, New Barge House Wharf, Commercial-road, Lambeth	10	0	0
*The Eastington Association, Eastington, near Stroud, Gloucestershire, per W. Clarke	10	0	0
*Smith, James, 58, South Audley-street	5	0	0
*Pontifex, E. and W. and Co., Shoe-lane	5	0	0
Watson, John, 56, Holborn Hill	5	0	0
*Morgan, Arthur, New Bridge-street	5	0	0
*Balfour, Brothers, 72, Great Winchester-street	4	0	0
*Lowe, Thomas, Bordesley-street, Birmingham	2	0	0
*Rife, Sir John, Newcastle-on-Tyne	2	0	0
*Greenhow, Mrs., Bonwell, Westmoreland	2	0	0
*Clark, Thomas, St. Mary's Gray, Kent	2	0	0
*Phelps, Joseph, 44, Paternoster-row	2	0	0
*Seagram, Thomas, M.D., 109, Pall Mall	2	0	0
*Pole, George, 95, High-street, Borough	2	0	0
*Hubbard, C. J., Stockwell Green, Stockwell	1	1	0
*Carter, Richard, 3, Newgate-street	1	1	0
*Bendall, Richard Smith, Old Kent-road	1	1	0
*Levy, Edward, 37, Upper Gower-street	1	1	0
*Lambert, Samuel, 236, Regent-street	1	1	0
Brooks, Thomas, 13, Frederick-place, Goswell road	1	0	0
Moore, Thomas, 8, Grove-place, Brompton	1	0	0
*Robson, Harry, 3, Hamilton-place, New-road	1	0	0
Hodgson, Wm., Rastrick, Huddersfield	1	0	0
*Thornely, A. W., Wrexham	1	0	0
*Clark, Mrs., Elizabeth, Lymington, Hants	1	0	0
*Dimmore, John, Knaresborough	1	0	0
Gleig, George, shipowner, Arbroath	1	0	0
*Jones, Samuel, iron and brass founder, Littleborough, near Rochdale	1	0	0
*Chaplin, Robert, 20, High-street, Maidstone	1	0	0
*Monro, F., Cheltenham	1	0	0
*Pilkington, T., Promenade, do	1	0	0
Trangmar, Anthony, London-road, Brighton	1	0	0
*Skeggs, John, 1, Albemarle Cottages, Stoke, near Devonport	1	0	0
*Tripe, L. P., St. Aubyn-street, Devonport	0	10	0
*Johnson, Edwin, 25, Blackman-street, Borough	0	10	0
Davis, Henry, 166, Sloane-street, Chelsea	0	10	0
Henry, John, 82, High-street, Paisley	0	5	0
Willmott, Thomas, 20, Little Bell Alley, Moorfields	0	5	0
Kensett, J., 126, High-street, Guildford	0	2	6

FARM LETTING IN SCOTLAND.—Two or three farms in the vicinity of Edinburgh have lately been let, or such money rents offered for them, as would lead to the conviction that farmers consider the protection of the Corn Laws no better than a stalking horse. A small farm within two miles of this city to the south, has been let at 5l. 12s. 6d. per acre (money), and to the west even higher rates have been offered.—Scotsman. [In Perthshire, also, several large farms have been recently let at an advance of from 10 to 30 per cent. on the old rents.]

CORN LAWS, versus RENTS.—Notwithstanding the prognostications of the protectionists, that the proposed measures of the Government would immediately tend to a vast reduction in the rent of land, there was a farm, within a few miles of Hawick, let last week at an advance of 25 per cent. The former rent was £1000.—Border Watch.

A HISTORY FOR HOLIDAY CHILDREN OF ALL GROWTHS.

BY REUBEN.

The robber C—L—

How he got up when Buonaparte fell;
How, with the great lords, he in London did dwell;
How he lies now in a murderer's cell.
Let us all read the life of the robber C—L—.

Which is an authentic history of a great murderer and robber, one C. L., sentenced to death by order of her Sovereign Majesty the Queen. Written for the Newgate Calendar, and printed by permission here.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE FIRST.

CHAPTER I.—Of the place of his birth; of his parents; of his education; of his teachers; of his catechism; of the consolation of its precepts in the condemned cell.

C—L— was born in the ancient city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, Anno Domini, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen. His parents were travelling tinkers, remaining neither long in London nor long in the country, but shifting from one to the other, as they felt a desire to do tinkering work in town or a desire to travel out of town.

At the time of C—L—'s birth, they occupied an old house in a low part of Westminster, close to the river side and near the foot of Westminster-bridge, which has since been burned down. They are now living in a temporary place of shelter, and have been so housed, when they are not travelling in the country, for the last ten or eleven years. Whether this is because nobody will give them a house, their characters being damaged by their loose habits of life, or whether it be that they are looked upon as chargeable with the crimes of their children, or that they, used to a migratory life, as all tinkers are, care not for a settled habitation, we cannot say. All we know is, that since their old house was burned down, eleven and a half years ago, they have not been otherwise sheltered than in a temporary shed or outhouse. And in this metropolis, there is always a strong disposition to question the respectability and honesty of people who lodge themselves in sheds or outhouses, or under waggons in the streets, or on door steps, or in the dry arches of the bridges, or among the baskets of Covent Garden market, or under the scaffolds of new buildings, or in the churchyards among the tombstones, or in St. James's Park under the trees, or who walk the streets without rest, complaining to all who will listen, that they once had a house of their own, but have none now.

Both the statute law and common law of the country pronounces such unhappy people to be vagrants; or, as they are sometimes called, rogues and vagabonds.

Such have been, and, as we are informed, such are, the unhappy parents of the notorious malefactor C—L—, now under sentence of death in her Majesty's gaol of Newgate; some of the events of whose life—the extraordinary trial of whom at the Old Bailey—the unparalleled efforts of whose relations and associates, in attempting to secure his escape, we are now about to relate.

Of the education of C—L—, save the training of him in practices of dishonesty, we know little. It is said he received some early lessons from one Robinson—Mr. Prosperity Robinson, we think, is the name the neighbours gave this teacher when we made our inquiries—and he was also at the school of one Castle-reagh, an Irishman, living in Westminster; of this, we have not ascertained many particulars. It is certain, however, that one Perronet Thompson, seeing the evil courses of the boy when in his very childhood, endeavoured to reclaim him by teaching him the catechism; but the parents, who did not desire to see the child bred up honestly, thwarted this good work, and no result was effected; at least, not then. But it is so far satisfactory to know, that since the criminal has been condemned and left to the solitude of his cell and his own conscience, and after all the petitions to save him from execution have been answered by the Right Honourable Sir James Graham, Secretary of State for the Home Department, that a reprieve cannot be granted—that he must expiate his crimes upon the scaffold; it is, we say, satisfactory to know that in the gloom of the condemned cell, in the hours of his repentance, he confesses to having retained in his memory, throughout his career of crime, some of the early impressions made on him by the excellent teacher of the catechism; and though in the seeming prosperity of his guilty course, those impressions lived within him as thorns that could not be plucked out, he feels them now in the pained conscience as balm upon his wounds.

It is said that some of his more hardened associates in vice, who have been working to effect his escape—those who attempted his rescue when before the magistrates, and again at his trial, who have got up the petitions in his favour, and who, it is supposed, will make a desperate effort, though it must be unavailing, to seek the assistance of the multitude to rescue him on the day of his execution,—it is said that nothing has mortified these persons more than the rumours that he has repented—that he will not, as Lord G. B., one of his old companions, calls it, “die game”—and that in his hours of sorrow and repentance he confesses never to have entirely forgot his catechism, and that he draws consolation from its precepts now, when passing through the valley of the shadow of death. They say if he would put a bold face on it, and keep up his heart, and make no confessions to the governor of the gaol and the chaplain, as it is rumoured he has done, nor read the catechism or any of the books given him, to help his repentance and to ease his mind, but be ready to jump from the scaffold into their arms when he is brought out for execution—as he was expected to leap out of the dock at the Old Bailey when they gave the signal—they would still save him. But they think if he has really made a confession, and has seriously betaken himself to the precepts of the catechism which the gentleman named Thompson taught him in his youth, there will be no hope of his escape from the hands of the executioner. They say that in that case it will be “all up” with him, and perhaps with some of them, for they dread his making a confession, lest in the last dying speech and declaration which will be published, he should peach upon them, and divulge to the world how they have been sharers in his guilt.

We shall now give a few particulars of his career at its different stages.

CHAPTER II.—Of Peter Street, Westminster; of his being called a soldier's bastard; of the boys of that day; of the old man with the breeches pocket; of the shoemaker; of the soldiers; of the cupboards.

One day, when he was still a child, his father and mother were going through Peter-street, Westminster, calling, “Pots and kettles to mend!—old iron or brass to sell!” He was trudging after them, peeping into shop windows, and into houses that had their doors open, and standing behind corners, snatching the bread and butter from the hands of solitary children, when the boys who knew him called out, “There goes the young thief!” And they kept at him, calling to every one to look and see the thief. Says one noisy boy—his name was Gale Jones—“Who sneaks down the areas?” Cries another, whose name was Wooller, “Who robs the cupboard?” And then a tall farmer's boy, in a smockfrock—for even the country-people knew him by this time; his name was Hunt—he happened to be going along Peter-street at the time, answered, “Why, no one, but that there tinker's brat as robs the henroosts down with we in Hampshire,—that be the thief of the cupboards, that tinker's son.” At which a poor man, who kept an apple-stall at the corner of the street—his name was Alexander Baring—said, “I know he is a thief; not that I can say anything about cupboards or henroosts being robbed, but he has been at my breeches pocket, where he saw me put a couple of ha'pence, that I took for a pennorth of apples. I know them tinkers have brought him here to rob my breeches pocket; it is me that he has come to rob; my apple-stall and my breeches-pocket. We must, all of us, help to have him sent out of Westminster. He will not leave a ha'penny in my breeches pocket.”

Hearing which noises, the tinker turned round, and asked what the boys and the old man meant by abusing his son. Says a shoemaker, who put his head out of window, one Thomas Williams, “He is your wife's son, old fellow, and you may be stepfather. I dare say you are; but, blow me if I'd call him son, if my wife had been among the soldiers, as yours has been.” Whereat the tinker's wife was in a most violent passion. She called the shoemaker many bad names, and denied what he said. But he stuck to it stoutly, that he had seen her in Palace-yard with the soldiers, and carrying on an abhorrent dalliance with them in the very streets, and at the doors of the Houses of Parliament. And the shoemaker appealed to his neighbours if this was not true; and they said it was true, and that the old tinker was a cuckold, and did not know it. And the tinker was so enraged that they should call him a cuckold, and say that his son, C—L—, of whom he was fonder than of any other of his children, was begotten of the soldiers, that he threw down the pots and kettles which he had collected to mend, and trampled on them, crushed them, kicked them, tore them in pieces, and threw the pieces at the head of the shoemaker, and cut it open, and swore that he would have the life of some one, if they called his darling son, C—L—, a thief and a soldier's bastard.

And while he was thus breaking the pots and kettles that he had gathered together to mend, and was fighting with the shoemaker and his neighbours, his wife, still denying that she had ever been unduly intimate with the soldiers, returned, after a brief absence, with some tall guardsman at her back; and giving them the word to begin, they began, snatched up the pieces of broken pots and kettles which the tinker got from the people to mend, and gave those same people a terrible thrashing, wounding and disabling them with pieces of their own pots and kettles. Some of the people called to the tinkers to be off altogether; that they were all dishonest alike, themselves as well as their children; that the calling of pots and kettles to mend was only a pretence to get into people's houses to steal; that they mended one hole in a kettle and made another that they might have more jobs to do, and more chances of getting into private houses to steal. The people bade them to go about their business, and they would mend their own pots and kettles when they needed mending. But the tinkers had the soldiers at their backs; and more soldiers came to help those who came at first, and the upshot of it all was, that some of the people were slain, and some wounded, and some sent to prison. But even this was not all their punishment. While the conflict was going on, and all were out of doors, or looking out of doors, the insidious young thief, C—L—, about whom they had all been quarrelling, was sneaking from house to house, plundering every cupboard that had an eatable thing in it; slinking off with loaves of bread; dipping his hands into sugar basons, and eating the sugar; his fingers into pots of butter, and eating the butter; or into basons of lard and dripping, which, if he could not eat, he carried away to those who had trained him to steal—to his dishonest parents, who liked nothing better than a row in the streets, such as this was, covering, as it did, some new attempt of theirs to live at the expense of others. While the people and the soldiers were thus rioting, C—L— and his parents were thus employed. This happened when he was little more than four years of age.

CHAPTER III.—Of his travels in the country; of his parents and the farmers; of the ogres with more heads than one; of his protecting the farmers from the ogres; of his being suspected; of his acquittal.

Soon after this, the tinkers betook themselves to the country, where, meeting with some of their migratory associates, they held a merry time of it in the woods and green lanes; a merry time, however, at the expense of the farmers.

What with sheepfolds, hen-roosts, potato-fields, rick-yards, barns with corn in them, mills with flour in them, styes with hogs in them, and sows with little pigs, hares and rabbits with skins on their backs, the skins being saleable; fields with cows in them, the cows willing to be milked in the dark; dairies with butter and cheese in them, the dairy-maids willing to have their fortunes told;—what with all those advantages for themselves, besides provender for their asses, on whose backs the pot and kettle implements were carried, and keep and scope for their dogs, they did very little tinkering work in the country. There they were chiefly engaged in fortune-telling among the farmers; and were it not that we have the clearest and most ample evidence of the facts of the delusions practised by the tinker fraternity and their imp of all mischief, C—L—, we could not believe that the farmers, farmers' sons, farmers' daughters, and farmers' wives of England could have been so credulous and pliant to imposition.

The tinkers would go to a farmhouse, and say, “You know we mended all your pots, pans, kettles, and everything else of yours that wanted mending last year and this year, and we will do so again, and we never charge anything: we make the farmers, with whom we are always good friends, a present of our tinker work. But we have heard that you have lately had some losses in your flocks, and also in your corn fields; we will, if you choose, by the use of some secrets we possess, discover the thieves for you.”

At this the farmer would be overjoyed, and would begin, and at great length relate all his troubles, past and present, and his fears or hopes for the future. Hearing which, the tinkers would take him by the fingers, look at the palm of his hand, bid him put a piece of money in their hands, and they would tell him his fortune, in addition to telling him who had stolen a sheep, or a sack of corn, or anything else he had lost.

And though almost all the farmers were pleased to think they got their tinkering work done for nothing by their good friends the tinkers, and though they would have been very slow to pay money directly and openly for tinkering, they parted with their money freely to have their fortunes told, or to have the mystery of the key and the book performed for the discovery of thieves. It mattered not that the real thieves were never pointed out; they always believed what the tinkers told them.

This is partly to be explained on natural principles. There was a farmer in Hampshire, who, when they offered to tell his fortune, smiled and shook his head, and said he would not like to entrust them with his fortune, not even to tell what it was to be. And on another occasion, when they offered to discover, either by the book and key, or by some mystical herbs which were to be boiled, (we are not with certainty informed which), who the thieves were who had been at his corn which stood in sacks in the barn, he spake scornfully, and told them there was no need for him to employ them to tell who robbed his barn,—he knew as well as they did; and they knew well enough to be able to tell without either book or key, or mystic herbs, or any of their incantations. And he went on, and at last called them impostors; and when they became angry at that appellation, he called them worse; he said they were the robbers of his barn themselves, and he could prove it.

At which they sneaked away, threatening him for saying these words, and only looking back to shake their clenched hands at him, and grind their clenched teeth. In six months that farmer was sold up, and turned out of his farm.

There was another in Wiltshire, who expressed his disbelief in their incantations and fortune-telling. When he had done so, he made a boast of it to his neighbours, and said he had served the tinkers right. But all his neighbours were grieved to hear what he had said. They shook their heads, and looked sorrowful, and told him that something evil would most certainly happen to him.

And what they said to him was true. In less than a year he had to quit that farm. He was not sold up; he left it with some wealth. But the tinkers, who were always moving from place to place, spread such evil reports of him being a bad farmer, and a bad man, that he could not get another farm anywhere. He and his family were at last beggared, and some of them had to go into the workhouse, whilst he himself became a pauper, breaking stones on the parish roads for parish pay.

And so it was in nearly every case where any farmer doubted the honesty or the efficacy of the incantations of the tinkers. This being seen throughout the country, the people in general, and the farmers in particular, believed that there must be a spirit of prophecy, or a kind of second sight, allied with the trade of mending pots, kettles, and pans, and of dealing in old brass and iron and tin.

Thus they not only submitted to the rules and propositions of the travelling fraternity, but they sought the youthful C—L— and his parents, and eagerly crossed their hands with money to set them to befriend them, to make each of their ewes have three lambs, their corn have double ears, and their eggs two yolks; or to have it told them again and again that the robbers of their barns were not men, but terrible ogres with two heads, and some with three heads, who lived on human flesh, far away by the hills of Derbyshire; and that they came in all kinds of mysterious shapes, and stole the corn from their barns, and the butter and bacon from the pantries, and the lambs from the sheepfolds, and the eggs from the hen's nests, and the little sucking pigs from their mother sows, all to feed little children upon and grown-up people, to make them fat, that they, the ogres with two heads and three heads, dwelling beyond the hills of Derbyshire, might eat them and grow fat themselves.

Now, though the farmers never caught one of those ogres at their barns, they believed they came there; though they had never seen one anywhere, they believed that they existed, for the tinkers told them, and they always believed the tinkers. Accordingly, C—L—, being highly respected for his power of seeing in the dark, and of seeing ogres with two heads and three heads, when nobody else could see them; and of frightening them away, no matter in what variety of shapes they might come to the farm-yard, he was looked upon as the hope and protection of the farmers; and was admitted into the homes of every one of them, and treated to the best which the farm-houses could afford, and more at times than they could afford. Every morning he came out of the dark places where he spent the night, and told of the things with two heads and three heads which he had seen; and how he had driven them away; and how they would have devoured every living thing on the farm, the farm itself, the farmer also, and his wife and children, and even the farm labourers and their wives and children, and would have picked the flesh from the bones of the very leanest of the labourers, and the very fattest of the farmers without reserve, had not he, C—L—, been present in the dark to protect them.

Still the losses of the farmers continued, and increased in amount and in frequency of occurrence, until C—L— was not so popular with them as he had been. Accusations against him began to be made, and he was at last taken before the magistrates and examined. This was when he was only in his seventh year, in 1822. But the charges against him were not listened to. The tinkers said, “If accusations are admitted against him, accusations against us will follow; we must speak and act, for our own sake, in his defence.” And they did so, and persuaded all the farmers who had been robbed to speak well of him, and to lay the blame of their losses on the ogres with two heads and three heads, who lived far away beyond the hills of Derbyshire. So zealous were the tinkers to get the farmers to speak well of him, and with such high praise, that he was not only acquitted, but his supposed good services sought after more eagerly than ever, while his popularity increased so greatly as to gain admittance for him into the highest society. Even earls, and dukes, and countesses, and duchesses, and the very king himself, sought the friendship of the wonderful boy with the second sight, who could see in the dark, and protect them from the two-headed and three-headed ogres, who came from the north, from the hills and dales over the mountains of Derbyshire.

CHAPTER IV. — Of his friendship with the noble and the rich; of his late evenings; of his early mornings; of the hand-loom weavers; of their children and their wives; of the murders he committed.

The fortunes of C— L— were now in the ascendant. From the meanest pilfering he rose to revel in splendid sin in the company of the noblest and richest of the land. He attended young lords to Oxford and Cambridge, not as a fag, nor to be a student himself, but as a companion, without whose society they said they could not exist. He taught them to perform tricks which we might have supposed were below the dignity of young nobles; but so pleased were they with him, that they almost grieved they were not tricksters themselves. It was here he made the acquaintance of some of those who have adhered to him ever since, and have perilled their own existence to save him. They, in turn, introduced him to the doctors and proctors of the universities, and to the dignitaries of the church, who all believed that he must be an excellent fellow when recommended as he was by young nobles.

We have heard of old Squire Elwes, the miser, sitting all the night in the most splendid saloons of the metropolis, supping with the card-playing nobility on the most costly viands, staking thousands of pounds on the chances of the cards, having a new pack at each deal, and tossing the used ones on the floor, until he was up to the knees in cards. Leaving this society, its splendour, and its recklessness, at an early hour in the morning, if it was Smithfield market day, without having gone home to change his dress, he would go out of town a few miles to meet his cattle coming to market that he might help to drive them through the streets, to save a shilling to an assistant drover! and to watch the salesman at the market that nothing less per head might be taken for them than by dint of a sharp bargain he could obtain. But the paradox in the character of this miser was far outdone by the paradox in the character of our thief, C— L—.

We have all heard of highwaymen who, when the profession of "your money or your life" was in its palmy days, used to rob the rich without mercy, and give alms without stint to the poor. Our highwayman, however, used to rob the poor without mercy, and give the proceeds without stint to the rich.

At the dawn of day, or an hour before day dawned, he would leave the gorgeous saloons of the west end, where he had spent the night with Lord G— B—, Lord W— L—, and other associates of that exalted order, with cards, dice, wine, women, and all the luxurious accessories of sumptuous sin; he would come out upon the streets charged by them to replenish their purses by the ensuing evening for more gambling and more surfeiting. They needed money, they said; money they must have; and he was the only one that could get it. What did they exalt him into their society for, asked they, when he seemed unwilling to work for them, but that he might use his tricks learned in the tinker trade to supply their wants, and be repaid therefor by the honour of having them to call him friend?

And it must be written, and written truly, that he esteemed it no small honour to be so called. Instead of going to bed in winey sleep, he would keep awake, and come out in the early morning, when the first of the industrious rise from their beds and go forth to work, and the last of the idle go to bed to sleep till mid-day; and he would peep round corners, and follow the market-men and the basket-women of the markets stealthily; and he would put his hand into the baskets on their heads and take something out, and deposit it out of sight, as the clown in the pantomime does, until he could sell it, or otherwise make money of it. He would watch the carpenter going on the early street to his work, with his basket of tools over his shoulder, his saw beneath one arm, and his bread for breakfast and dinner in a napkin under the other. He would watch where this man went to work, would see him strip off his coat and fold it, and lay his dinner in the fold. When he was plying his tools, C— L— would lift the coat, carry it to the pawnbroker, pawn it, put the money he got on it in his own pocket for his splendid associates, and the carpenter would have to work hard many a day before he got another coat. He would do the same with the bricklayers, and the labourers of the bricklayers, and the paviours of the streets, and the scavengers, and the milkmen of the early morning; and the same with the women who sit with stalls at the corners of the streets, selling coffee and bread and butter, and water cresses, for early breakfasts.

He would go on the bridges while they were yet unloaded with the din and traffic of the day, and look over upon the barges and wherries and the one or two steamboats which had then for the first time come upon the river, as they lay dosing asleep—the barges loaded as if they would sleep for ever, the steamboats exhausted with their efforts of yesterday—with their puffing and blowing before they got used to their work—and he would see that nothing was astir there save the silent river; and he would go down the stairs to the water's edge, like a spirit that had no sound in it, and would go on board stealthily, and would steal from every one of them, and take what he stole to some receptacle for such things, carrying the money to his masters when he had added it to what he got before, and had put to it what he got after.

When London awoke to business, and the suburbs sent in the bankers and the clerks, the stockbrokers and the merchants, who dwelt there, to the city; when the shops had opened their eyes, and put away their shutters, and looked out for customers; when the Temple, and Lincoln's-inn-fields, and Chancery-lane, and Gray's-inn, and all the places where lawyers creep into when they are sleepy, gave out their lawyers refreshed and wide awake, as holes in an old house give out black-beetles; when the river turned himself on his bed, and bade the dosing craft bestir itself, and get to work; when the great thoroughfares, which had slept all night with only an occasional sound of wheels upon them, as if they were speaking in their dreams—when they woke, and began to hurl from one to the other the traffic of giants, and shops were filled with customers, and everybody was a human bee, buzzing about and making honey, then C— L— was a wasp buzzing about, too, present everywhere, stealing honey which was not his own, and stinging those who detected him, and essayed to drive him away.

At Mark Lane on Mondays, he was among the corn factors and the farmers, who were not richer of his presence. He would again meet them in the country, and again have his hands crossed with their money to tell them their fortunes, or to discover some thief who had been in their houses or their barns taking money from the secret drawers, or corn from the sacks. Go where he might, no matter whether the farmers were in prosperity or distress, he found them always ready to listen to him, to tell their fortunes and to pay him for so doing.

He would go into the large towns of Lancashire, and to the small towns also; to the towns of every other county, and to the villages and hamlets, and even to the solitary houses, the very poorest of them, and levy contributions. He would creep beneath a weaver's hand-loom, and when he saw the weaver's toes worn through his old shoes, he would lay hold of the bare toes and pinch them; and he would also make the weaver's limbs ache, and would from beneath the web in the loom pinch the weaver's belly as if a screw were worming its way through him; and while the weaver endured this trouble, but could not tell what was the matter, he would cut away a part of his web, or steal his coat, and sell it, if he had one.

He would go down the narrow streets, where dwelt the weaver population, and go into the poorest of their houses, perhaps because the poorest were most defenceless, and would look if he saw children ill of fever, or if they were left alone with nobody to protect them, their mother being out at work to earn money to buy bread for them; he would look into the cupboards and take what bread he found there; and when the children, seeing their bread disappear, screamed, he would lay them down on their meagre bed and pinch them till the flesh came off their bones, and would leave them dead, and would carry away the merest remnants of clothing and furniture to sell it, when they were dead; and would meet the tired mothers at the door, who would try to stop him; but he would lay hold of their skinny arms and twist them, and throw them down, and would take their wages from them if it was pay day, and would show them their dead children; and when the women grew desperate at the sight of the house stripped bare, and the children dead, and in their desperation tried again to do battle with him, he would throw them on their dead offspring, and would kneel on them and crush the life out of their bodies, and commit those most cruel of murders for which he is now condemned and is doomed to suffer.

And when he had left families dead or dying, and had robbed them, and had made money of the deaths and the robberies, he would come into the public streets and put his hands into the baskets of women who were out at market, and take the little shoes out of the baskets which little children were waiting impatiently for at home, dancing this night for joy that they were to get new shoes when "mother came home from market;" but the mothers would go home without the shoes, and with less bread than enough, because it being so dear they had bought less than enough to get the little dears shoes to their bare feet, or some article of clothing to their cold backs. And the little creatures, because C— L— had robbed their mothers, would have to go barefooted and bare-shouldered in the shivering cold, and were so disappointed that their little hearts were like to break.

And when he returned to the society of the tinkers and the lords of London with the profits of his spoil, he would tell them how very poor the hand-loom weavers were; that their toes were bare; that they had not a coat to their backs; that their limbs ached; that they had pains in their stomachs, like worms screwing through them; that they lived in narrow streets, in mean houses, with fever in them; that the mothers left the children at home, and went to work to get bread for them to eat; that he looked into all the cupboards, and found only a little food in some, and in some none; that where he found any food, he brought part of it away, or if there was very little, he brought it all and turned it into money, and there was the money.

And the lords would almost weep to hear of the misery of the poor weavers, but they would take the money and put it in their pockets, and play with it in the evening, or they would go to horse-races with it, and lay wagers, and lose and win, and return and join their wives and daughters, arrayed in the dresses which part of this money bought for them—the shawls of Cashmere, the satins of Persia, and the orient diamonds, glittering like—like—the tears of weavers' wives.

And in drawing rooms, furnished and adorned with all that is most beautiful and rich found within the compass of the earth's girdle, and shining in brilliancy, as if men had gone beyond the earth for their illumination, peopled with the loveliest beings of creation, to whose grace and beauty all things minister—the female aristocracy of England, (who, we are compelled to believe could not have known that C— L—, upon whom they smiled so sweetly, and listened so intently, was the crime-maker we know him to be); but in those drawing rooms, amid those fair forms, fondled and almost caressed to wantonness, C— L— told the miserable story of the weaver population,—how he had seen ogres with two heads, and those heads living upon their flesh; how he had encountered the ogres and fought with them, and expected some day to be able to kill them. He told this, and the fair beings wept to hear what the ogres had done, and applauded to hear what C— L— intended to do to them.

And when their senses were sated with the excess of luxurious elegance, and they retired to their homes, reposing in their carriages on cushions of satin, tired with ease, C— L— was once more out in the early morning, gathering from every human being, down to the meanest and most wretched, contributions to sustain that excess of grandeur, elegance, and ease.

He would see some wretched needlewoman from whom he had filched before, when she was 18 hours a day at work to complete one of the matchless dresses for which there was no patience to wait, and whom he had reduced from a milliner to a mere shirtmaker, compelling her to make shirts at threepence each, wringing from her the odd halfpenny, turning her out of doors because she could pay no rent. Even this creature of God, broken down in body and soul, he would see sitting in the recesses of the bridge; and he would watch her well, for if she had still one penny left to get bread, he must have a share of that bread or that penny; or if she was, as there was too much reason to fear, at the fatal spot where many earthly miseries have expired, he would watch her, and catch her when wound up to that pitch of endurance where the strings of life must break—he would catch her as she was plunging into the river, that he might get a remnant of dead clothes, even from her; and her last penny if she had one. He would then throw her in, and watch her drowning struggles, to get threepence out of the shilling which the parish pays to those who take dead bodies from the river.

END OF PART THE FIRST.

A GAME LAW HERO.—At the Leicester assizes on Monday, two men, named Rolleston and Hales, were charged with being on land in the parish of Evington, during the night, armed, for the purpose of destroying game; and as the evidence was distinct, they were sentenced to 12 months' hard labour each. Fouldes, gamekeeper to G. A. L. Keck, Esq., of Houghton, during his cross-examination, was asked by Mr. Kenneth Macauley, who defended the prisoners, how many offenders against the Game Laws he had taken? He does not appear to be more than 40 years old, if so much; but his reply was, "Two hundred and twenty!"

AGRICULTURE.

LANDLORDISM'S FAIR SIDE.

HOW FREE TRADE WILL HELP THE FARMER.

We have frequently referred to the various ways in which Free Trade in corn will improve the business of farming; and, amongst others, to the improvement of the relation between landlord and tenant, which will be the speedy result of the abolition of the Corn Laws. The letter of a noble landed proprietor to his tenants, which has recently attracted some share of public attention, affords the means of illustrating this point. The Earl of Mount Edgcombe has written and published a kind of paternal lecture to his tenants, singularly suggestive of the actual state and future prospects of the farming business, so far as it depends upon the owners of the soil.

The purport of his lordship's letter is to show his tenants that the maintenance of "protection" is no longer possible, inasmuch as all public men, of all parties, who have any pretension to statesmanship, have, with more or less willingness, declared for Free Trade; that resistance and impotent rage on the part of farmers and others is altogether useless, and that nothing remains to be done but to make the best of the matter, to leave off invocations to "protection" and reliance on Acts of Parliament, and, by putting their shoulders to the wheel, show that British farmers, with enterprise and capital, can compete as successfully in the world's market as British manufacturers have done. Now this is very sensible advice, which is creditable to his lordship's judgment, as the manner in which he has conveyed that advice does honour to the kindness of his feelings towards his tenantry. Nevertheless, the letter betrays an absence of knowledge of the real wants of farmers, or an indisposition to meet the necessities of the times. Of course the high protectionists fell foul of his lordship. To see clearly that "protection" was doomed, although personally unconvinced that it is detrimental, and still viewing Free Trade with alarm, was a degree of rationality inconceivable to the "protectionist mind." The Morning Post, launched, on three successive days, three leading articles, intended to be savage, against the Earl's backslidings; in which such "dastardly prudence" as that of Lord Mount Edgcombe, was denounced as destructive of the "influence of his order;" and, it was pathetically urged, that if the example should be generally followed, "the ascendancy of the landed interest in the British empire is at an end;" a catastrophe "we (the Post) shall lament as the forerunner of the degradation of the country."

Now it is this "ascendancy of the landed interest," maintained hitherto by means of the "degradation" of the tenant farmers, which has been so prejudicial to agriculture and so mischievous to the community. Why should the "landed interest" have an "ascendancy?" Why ought the semi-feudal relations, which have hitherto subsisted between landlords and tenants for the sole purpose of maintaining that "ascendancy," to be upheld? Now that the subject is being canvassed by the public, the days of that "ascendancy," like those of "protection"—if, in fact, they are not synonymous terms—are numbered. Let us see how the Earl of Mount Edgcombe, apparently one of the best of his class, is prepared to deal with the NEW ERA.

His lordship, after stating that his health will not permit him to meet his tenants, says he cannot refrain from addressing them by letter "at this moment so interesting to the agricultural interest." He then adds:

"It is not to hold out any hopes that protection to agriculture can be longer maintained; it is decided that in a few years the English farmer will have to compete with the world."

"Nor can I so entirely get rid of my former opinions as to be able to declare that we have not great ground for alarm."

"Yet when I see, with very few exceptions, every man who can claim any title to the character of a statesman, openly commit himself to directly contrary opinions, and consider that on a question of this kind that of any man of acknowledged talent, who has laboured to ascertain the facts upon which it is formed, is worth the opinion of any number of ordinary men, particularly when his sincerity is proved by his interests being deeply involved, I cannot under such circumstances myself despair, and hope that you will not; but wait till the result is shown by experience. If, as some say, the change prove beneficial rather than injurious, I shall most sincerely congratulate those who hold leases under me on their good fortune; if the contrary, I then, after obtaining the best information and advice in my power, shall take that course which, according to my judgment and conscience,

I shall deem to be liberally just. One thing is, however, certain—all agree that to ward off these dangers we must exert ourselves. We are started in a race against all comers, and we betide the hindmost. In such a race the manufacturers have been signally victorious; and it is well for farmers to consider by what means they have succeeded."

That his lordship means to be "liberally just" we doubt not, but he must do somewhat more than the things of which he afterwards speaks, if he intends to let his tenants succeed in the "race against all comers." Although we do not know his lordship's estates, we venture to offer him the following advice. Let him discharge his gamekeepers, and give up the game to his tenants. Let him remove all the hedge-row timber with as little delay as possible; let him enlarge all the inclosures which are less than ten acres, by removing some of the fences; and let him offer every tenant, who has capital, a lease of his farm for 21 years, without any unnecessary restrictive covenants. If these things be done, and fair arrangements made about draining, where draining is necessary, we will assure his lordship that his tenants will cheerfully pay him his present rents, and put in practice the precepts of improvement contained in his letter. Of these the following is a specimen:

"That success (of manufacturers) is attributable to, not only a steady attention to their business, but also to an unceasing activity of mind. Each improvement in their respective trades is no sooner made public, than it is immediately adopted, antiquated methods are put aside, and every new discovery of science and ingenuity without delay or hesitation put into practice. Those without the activity, the talents, or the capital necessary to effect such changes, become bankrupts, and their places are supplied by others in the enjoyment of those advantages or rather necessities."

Tenants have been, his lordship says, protected from such penalties by a sort of feudal benevolence on the part of their landlords:

"Against all but tenants has this last penalty been in force, and why has it not been against them? Because other influences besides the love of money-making have been allowed to operate. The landlord feels that the tenant is bound to his estate, and he to his tenants, by ties of the heart, rarely, if ever, known to the manufacturer, or by those with whom he is connected. Far be it from me to wish those feelings should cease to exist or to exercise their kindly influence; I deem them to be the best source of the peace, and the happiness, and the strength of the community; and when I am told that we are fated to become the shopkeepers of the world, I deplore the change from the belief that with it must come the diminution of such feelings."

Oh, most tender twaddle! But let his lordship feel quite easy about these "ties of the heart," under the new state of things. "Such feelings," we can assure his lordship, have no existence, except in the imagination of his lordship's class. Tenant farmers are not very sentimental beings, especially when the change his lordship deplors will certainly bring with it a considerable increase of farming profits. That will be a sure balm for the wounded "ties of the heart," snapped by the adoption of business-like habits. Take his lordship's own statement of the chief reason why protection was no longer tenable:

"The misfortune that has tended the most to cripple the efforts of your friends (which, like most so called misfortunes, arises from a great fault) is, that the agricultural labourers have not, and do not, enjoy the comforts they are rewarded for their services are justly entitled to. Our duty as Christians, to society, and to ourselves, calls upon us, each in our station, to remedy to the utmost of our power that disgraceful evil."

And why are the labourers so badly off? Simply because the land is scarcely half cultivated; and that state of half cultivation is a part of the system of paternal feudalism, that tenure of "ties of the heart," over the possible extinction of which the well meaning peer laments.

Let it not be supposed that we undervalue a good understanding between persons so closely connected as landlord and tenant, and who really can often materially assist each other; but we desire to see that good understanding based upon a manly, rational, and business-like foundation of independence and mutual respect. This can only be under a system of long leases.

After babbling of "healthful sport on the green," and "gambling in dark manufacturing towns," in a fashion purely aristocratic, his lordship further observes:

"The power to check the ordained course of events, however, nowhere exists; the agriculturists are treated as, and now indeed are termed 'manufacturers' of corn, and to exist must, however unpalatable, adopt to a great degree the system, and submit to the same fate as their fellow-manufacturers. It must be remembered that now no capital produces to its owner so small a return as that invested in land; while in no manufacture have science and ingenuity introduced greater improvements than in that of food, and it is not only the interest, but the duty of tenants, following the example of all other manufacturers, to use every exertion, first to learn and then to put into practice these improvements without delay. To tenants who have succeeded to estates from their ancestors have also, frequently descended habits which it is hard to cast off. The attempt, however, now must be made."

The emphasis on the three last words is his lordship's. And in the next sentence, something in the relation of landlord and tenant less tender than "ties of the heart" peeps out. He says:

"Landlords are on their part bound to take every means in their power to make their tenants acquainted with all changes in agriculture, which from time to time experience may have shown to be improvements, and also to give them every assistance in their power by sharing on equitable terms the expense, or by in any other way aiding them to carry them out; but in return, they have a full right to expect the utmost readiness in tenants to take advantage of the assistance and information offered, and to decline a renewal of connection with men who refuse to perform their part in what is no more than their duty at a time of difficulty and danger to all."

Now, to us, this looks very like saying to tenants, who for thirty years have been told to rely on Acts of Parliament and so forth for profit, "the time is now come when you must stir yourselves like other tradesmen, or you must turn out." And that view is confirmed by the next passage:

"As I said before, in other trades, either the want of sufficient activity or of capital is followed as a matter of course by inevitable ruin, and no aid is offered; but a tenant's case as I put it, and as I hope under most landlords it would in fact stand, is far better; for if he will be but willing and active, consideration and assistance will be shown, to shield him from the disastrous consequences that naturally flow from the want of talent and capital. But I repeat, that when advice and assistance is offered and not readily accepted, the fate common to all must be expected, and cannot in justice be complained of."

From generals his lordship thus hints at particulars:

"I will not lose any time in determining on a system by which information proved to be useful, and the assistance you can fairly expect from me, may be afforded; and in the mean time confidently call your attention to the advantages which are certain to be derived from a great increase of the number of cattle fed on your estates, to the better preservation of their manure, and to under-draining."

To promote which, the tenant must first be made independent by a long lease.

His lordship next attempts to pacify his tenants with respect to the conduct of their representatives; and then himself indulges in a long string of seesaws, wherein he greatly blames Sir Robert Peel for leading the "gentry and legislators of England" to do that, which his lordship alternatively shows it was impossible for any sane legislators to avoid doing.

But his lordship's wisdom is hereditary wisdom, differing possibly from mere vulgar wisdom, and we dare say it is "all right," for at the last he comes to this intelligible and accurate estimate of the protectionist position:

"These few lines on politics have I added from the desire to soften any ill feelings that may exist amongst us. It is most desirable that whatever may be the consequences—yield we must, that we should do so with a good grace, that the agricultural body, who still may claim so high a station, should not present the undignified spectacle of struggles now so clearly ineffectual—as to have the appearance of impotent efforts of childish anger—still less of quarrels and criminalities amongst ourselves. Let us rather determine at once to unite all our energies to do our duty to the community and ourselves, by industriously putting into practice those improvements which science and experience have shown will enable us to produce from our land the greatest quantity of food at a fairly remunerating cost."

This is hopeful. When landowners as a body shall act up to the convictions expressed in Lord Mount Edgcombe's letter, they will not find tenant farmers backward. Give them a fair field, and they want no favour.

SIGNS OF LAND GOING OUT OF CULTIVATION!!!

Perhaps the most dishonest pretence urged by the monopolists against the repeal of the Corn Laws was, that land in Great Britain would thereby be driven out of cultivation. Well, Free Trade is inevitable—it is at hand. For all practical business purposes, in dealing with landed property, it must be calculated on as immediate, or almost immediate; and what about land going out of cultivation? See a few of the first evidences which we select at random:

"On Tuesday, the grass parks attached to the mansion-house of Barr, the seat of Colonel M'Dowall, Lochwinnoch, were let by public roup, and the yearly rent obtained for the same amounted to no less than 126*l.*, above the sum for which the same ground was let last year. Similar advances have taken place in various parts of the country."—Edinburgh Witness.

Neither free corn, nor free cattle, have prevented the "grass parks" from fetching a greatly increased rent. Again, in spite of the tariff, stock looks up:

"HIGH PRICES OF FARMING STOCK.—Among the many sales by auction which have recently taken place in this county, we are not aware of any that have realised higher prices than at Shrawardine Castle Farm, near this town. By request from several gentlemen, we have been furnished by Mr. Tisdale, the auctioneer, with the following statement:—"Of the cows and calves, the highest price for a cow and calf was 29l. 10s.; and the average price of all the cows and calves was upwards of 26l. Waggon horses: One waggon-horse sold for 64l., one at 53l., two at 50l. each, one at 47l., three at 44l. each, and the average price of the first twelve waggon-horses was 45l. 5s.; two waggon-colts sold for 71l. Sheep: The highest price for a pen of five ewes and five lambs was 20l.; the average price of the ewes and lambs fetched nearly 3l. 10s. per couple. Rams: One two-year-old ram sold for 13l., and one for 10 guineas."—Shrewsbury Chronicle.

Next we have the following letter addressed to ourselves:

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"Heath, Leighton Buzzard, March 24, 1846.

"SIR,—The enclosed is the answer I received in reply to my inquiry respecting three farms, advertised to be let in Hampshire. Such eager competition for farms, at a time when the 'British farmer' is about to be deprived of his 'protection,' shows how much danger there is of land being thrown out of cultivation. As the letter to me is private, I cannot authorise you to publish the name of the writer, but I think the fact too good to be lost.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"Wm. MORRICE."

This is the enclosure:

"March 21st, 1846.

"SIR,—In reply to your note of the 19th inst., I beg to say, I have now so many applicants for my farms, that at present I scarcely know if they are let or not. I will, however, keep your address, and if I have a vacancy in a few days I will write you again.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

"Mr. Wm. Morrice." "J. F. H."

Now with these and similar passages, which must strike the eye of every reader of newspapers, before him, will the most timid protectionist refuse to be comforted?

PROTECTIONIST OBSTRUCTION.

THE CORN TRADE.

The "farmer's friends" in the House of Commons are making growers, sellers, and buyers of corn, cry out lustily, "save us from our 'friends.'" The following account of the wheat market appears in the Mark Lane Express review of the corn trade:

"The uncertainty felt, even up to the present moment, though the matter has been before the house since the commencement of the session, how the affair may ultimately terminate, has had, and still continues to have, a most injurious influence on commercial operations. It is now certain that the third reading of the Corn Importation Bill will not take place till after the Easter recess; and in the Lords the question can scarcely be expected to come under consideration till the beginning of May; it will therefore probably be June before a definite settlement is arrived at. Meanwhile merchants, millers, and dealers are likely to pursue the same course as that by which they have regulated their operations for months past, viz., avoid buying more than just sufficient to meet their immediate wants; if therefore the supplies from the growers should about keep pace with the consumptive demand, the knowledge that upwards of a million quarters of wheat are ready to be thrown on the markets at any period the proposed alteration in the laws may be sanctioned by the upper house, must undoubtedly act as a powerful check to any advance."

And what will the wheat producers say to the following aspect of trade in general?

"CITY NEWS.—In the opinion of the mercantile classes of the city, the 'protectionists' in the House of Commons have taken the best means in their power to retard the passing of the plans of Sir Robert Peel. But scarcely one of our merchants were prepared to see such a falling off in the receipts of the Customs and Excise as is apparent in the official returns just made public. The diminution in the receipts of the two all-important branches of the revenue is solely and entirely to be attributed to the anxiety of the trading interests, to see the measures of Government passed into law before operations on their part are entered into; till, in fact, they are enabled 'to see their way clear,' as the almost every-day phrase is, when wholesale and retail dealers throughout the country are solicited for orders. It is therefore held to be of the most pressing importance, that the final decision of the legislature, upon the corn and other measures of the Ministry, should be announced at the earliest possible period. In the event of the Corn Bill being rejected by the House of Lords, and an appeal to the country being made by Sir Robert Peel, the delay that will inevitably occur must prove as prejudicial to the revenue returns in the present as it has been in the last three months."—Mark Lane Express.

We suspect the state of the revenue has given a quietus to lordly rejection of the bill, whatever may have been previously intended.

THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

It seems that that aristocratic body, the Council of the Royal Agricultural Society, has been moved to consider the best plan for promoting practical discussions on husbandry, at the county meetings of the society. At the council meeting, on Wednesday week, the subject was thus mooted:

"NEWCASTLE LECTURES AND DISCUSSIONS.—Mr. Thompson then moved, agreeably with the notice he had given at the previous Council, for the appointment of a committee to make arrangements for lectures and discussions on agricultural subjects at the ensuing meeting at Newcastle. He stated that one of the main reasons that had induced him to make this motion was his conviction that, although the society had been very successful in bringing together first rate exhibitions of stock and implements, it had not yet succeeded in producing a free interchange of opinion amongst practical men, or anything approaching to adequate discussion on the disputed questions in agriculture—one of the principal arguments used to justify the laying out of so large a sum annually in premiums at the show having been that such outlay was absolutely necessary to induce practical men to assemble from distant parts of the country, and that when so assembled they would assuredly both impart and receive benefit from intercommunication and discussion with each other."

In the show yard nothing but casual conversations take place, and that chiefly between persons from the same districts:

"Whereas, he conceived the object of the society was to induce persons living at a distance from one another to practise different systems, and to compare their respective opinions, so that those who could satisfactorily show their practice to be the best, might induce others to follow their example, while they, on the other hand, might themselves be led to abandon such parts of their own system as could not rationally be defended against the advocates of other views."

The plan of lectures hitherto adopted had not elicited conflict of opinion and comparison of facts:

"The method followed by the British Association seemed best adapted to attain the object in view; and with some modifications, he thought the advantages of lectures might be combined with those resulting from the reading of papers and discussion. He considered that it would be one main point to have the lectures short, and to have it clearly understood that such lectures should be only the opening of the subject and commencement of the business of the meeting."

A committee was appointed, to work out the detail of which Mr. Pusey is chairman. We suspect such restrictions will be placed upon these discussions as will prevent their taking a turn unpalatable to the land-owners, otherwise some useful collision and communication of practical knowledge might arise from this plan.

LOOKING ONE WAY, AND GOING ANOTHER.

A correspondent of the Farmers' Journal, who writes to uphold "protection," makes the following statements, which for that purpose are certainly oddly used. However, that is the writer's business, not ours; for certainly we cannot complain when such arguments as the following are put forward for monopoly:

"These are, undoubtedly, very weighty reasons why the working classes of this country should have cheap bread, and prices approximate, as near as possible, to those of the old countries of Europe; the Corn Law of 1842 would, on an average of good seasons, keep our prices at 48s. to 50s. The proposed law, with the 10s. duty, will reduce them to 35s.—a reduction of about one fifth in price—and the great question is, how far it will be possible to meet such a reduction of 20 per cent. in the productive cost of corn? I am much inclined to think it can generally be met by farmers of capital and intelligence, without any lessened demand for labour, or throwing out of cultivation any very considerable proportion of arable land; but that it will tend to employ more labour, from the necessary conversion of large tracts of poor grazing land into arable, which land will give a much greater supply of food for the national wants, and an increased demand for labour. The reduction of 20 per cent. in the prices of agricultural produce will require one-fifth less capital, and lessen the general cost of production one-fifth. If the landlord lowers the rent one-fifth, he will gain as much in the lowered price of the main articles of the consumption of his family and establishment; and from the fact that on many farms (where they are partly grazing), full one half of their whole growth of corn is consumed by the farmers themselves; consequently, such low product-cost will be to their advantage as regards such half of their crop."

This is an argument we have constantly used. We hope the clouds which have obscured monopolist brains are being gradually dissipated, and that there will be a residuum of common sense yet.

INDIAN CORN BREAD.

The following extracts from Dr. Bartlett's little book on the use of maize, will teach our readers how the Americans make this grain into divers wholesome and palatable edibles:

"As an article of general domestic use it has no equal, where economy is an object to be kept in view. It is easily converted into puddings, cakes, rolls, and bread; but the cheapest mode of using it—that is to say, the way in which it will go farthest—is in the form of hasty-pudding or mush; and in this manner, when properly cooked, its advantages as a cheap food are surprising. To establish this fact, I made the following experiment:

"I carefully weighed out one pound of the meal, and gave it to a person who understood the mode of cooking it. In the course of boiling, it absorbed about five pints of water, which was added at intervals, until the process was complete. The bulk was again weighed, and gave as a result four pounds and a half. Such are the powers of expansion possessed by this kind of grain. On dividing the mass into portions, it was found to fill four soup-plates of the ordinary size; and, with the addition of a little milk and sugar, gave a plentiful breakfast to four servants and children."

"To MAKE GRIDDLE-CAKES.—Best way to make them is to use milk altogether, instead of water; two eggs, yellow and white, to be allowed for a pint of corn-meal; the milk to be a little warmed, and the whole to be well beat up with a spoon or ladle. There must be milk enough used to make the whole so liquid as that it will pour out of the saucepan on the griddle. One spoonful of wheat flour, and lard (pure butter still better) the size of a walnut."

THE GRIDDLE.—Much nicety is to be observed in the preparation of the griddle, which, as must be well known, is a flat, round, iron concern standing on three legs, and of any size. It must be made not very hot, because then it would burn the cakes; and it must be well cleaned and greased while warm, that it may be perfectly smooth, so that the cakes may be easily turned, that they may be done brown (not burnt) on both sides: to promote their turning easily is the object of adding the wheaten flour. Be it remembered that the dough, or rather the batter, as above directed, must be well beat up and prepared directly before being cooked, though it might set an hour. This is mentioned to prevent its being supposed that it, like some other bread, would bear to be mixed overnight. The cakes are usually poured on until they spread on the griddle to the size of the bottom of a breakfast-plate. You will think this recipe rather prolix, but it is my way in all such cases to be very exact. Better be too particular than to omit any essential item."

"EGG PONE.—Three eggs to a quart of meal; no wheat flour; to be made also with milk—water would make it heavy; a spoonful of butter; all well beat together, and made up of a consistence thicker than the cakes, too thick to pour out, but just thick enough to require to be taken up with a spoon: may be baked like the cakes, immediately after being mixed; must be baked in a tin pan, which must be placed in a Dutch oven, not too hot at first, but the fire under it to be increased. The object is to have it begin to bake at the bottom, when it will rise in the process of baking, become brown on the top, and when put on the table and cut, resemble what we call pound cake. 'Hominy and ash-cakes' George Washington had cooked for his own eating to the day of his death."

"P.S.—Salt, of course, add as usual, in both cases."

FLAX CULTURE.

We recur again to this subject, because we believe that growing flax will be one of the means farmers may usefully adopt in the improved condition of husbandry, which will commence with Free Trade, to advance the fertility of the soil, to vary the rotations, and to afford winter employment to the women and children of the rural classes. With that view we give the following, wherein Mr. Warnes has put forth the principal points in favour of flax in a few pithy propositions:

"TEN FACTS CONNECTED WITH THE FLAX CROP.

"1st. Under the improved system of husbandry, flax is not an exhausting, but a highly restorative crop."

"2nd. If sown primarily for the seed, the value of the crop is equal to the average value of wheat, barley, and oats."

"3rd. Under experienced management in every department, the crop is worth more than wheat."

"4th. Flax will grow upon any soils that produce corn, and upon soils where corn will not grow at all."

"5th. It will flourish after any crop, turnips excepted, and probably carrots, or mangel-wurzel."

"6th. Flax has been grown upon my farm in the following rotations during the past six years:

Clover stubble, flax, wheat, barley.

Wheat, flax, wheat, barley.

Wheat, barley, flax.

Potatoes, flax, wheat, turnips, wheat.

Wheat, potatoes, flax, barley;

the improvement of every field being distinguishable."

"7th. This year I have already sown four acres and a half upon clover stubble. One acre upon barley stubble, instead of turnips. Three-quarters of an acre that never produced a crop of any kind, save briars and thorns; and three acres of which the previous crops were flax, wheat, and barley."

"8th. I have now six fields of growing wheat, but the most luxuriant is that of the flax, and which is also superior to any in the parish."

"9th. When wheat follows flax, much less seed is required."

"10th. One acre sown with flax to every hundred now under tillage, would produce at least 35,000 tons of Linseed more than ever was imported of oil-cake in one year, afford employment for double the present redundant population, and then not supply half the home demand for the fibre."

"From observations, and some experience, I am of opinion that clay land, such as is now allowed to lie fallow, would produce alternate crops of wheat, and flax much larger than any other rotation."

"I could adduce many additional facts in refutation of former prejudices against the flax crop, and in favour of its immediate adoption in every agricultural district throughout the kingdom; but I trust the above will suffice for the present."

"Two fundamental principles are involved in this important question:

"1st. The successful cultivation of the plant depends upon the preservation of the seed, a point hitherto not recognised either by the theory or the practice of past or present times."

"2nd. The national introduction of the crop can only be achieved through the exercise of patriotism. On this ground, then, I hold myself in readiness to co-operate with any parties, regardless of every private consideration."

"April 3rd, 1846."

"P.S. Linseed may be sown with advantage throughout the present month, and I have seen good crops from seed sown in May, but the earlier the better."

That farmers are seeking information on the subject, is evident from the frequency of such inquiries as the following, by a correspondent of the Mark Lane Express:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MARK LANE EXPRESS."

"SIR,—Last year I grew two acres of flax as an experiment; I have now just completed threshing the seed from the fibre, and am at a loss how to proceed further, as I do not know where to obtain a scutching machine to convert the fibre into flax. If you, or any of your correspondents, can favour me with information, stating the names of manufacturers of machines for the purpose I have named, with the price, you will oblige your obedient servant,

"March 23."

"A SUBSCRIBER."

"P.S.—Any additional information regarding the best method of manufacturing the fibre into flax will be appreciated."

FREE IMPORTS.

The following paragraphs show the value of free imports to the farmers:

"The Chamber of Commerce at Cork have received some very choice specimens of seed potatoes from Vera Cruz."

The Cork Reporter says—"Mr. D. Meagher at once had the baskets, which were closely done up in matting, removed to the Chamber and examined; each contained about three hundred-weights, and every potato was wrapped in thin blue paper. They appeared to be of a very choice kind, in excellent sound condition, and putting forth light healthy shoots. We presume they are intended as samples of what may be imported from Vera Cruz. They will remain at the Chamber of Commerce for inspection, and will be distributed for seed in a day or two."

Again:

"SEED POTATOES FROM AMERICA.—We observe by the import list that two vessels arrived last week from South America, having on board about 100 barrels of potatoes, which we understand were expressly ordered by the importers for seed. 'It was from South America the potato was first brought to Europe, and it is reasonable to suppose that seed from the indigenous soil will be highly prized at the present moment. Some years ago a small quantity of potatoes was brought from the same quarter, and used as seed by a farmer in Dumfriesshire. The produce, we are informed, turned out very superior.'"

"POTATOES IN ROSS-SHIRE.—We are glad to be able to state that the potato pits lately opened in this county are in good condition, and that there are none diseased. A great quantity has been shipped for the south, and the prices are high, from 12s. to 16s. Small quantities, however, can be got cheaper. We are within the mark, however, when we say that about 4000 bolls have been, or are in the course of being, exported from Ross-shire this year, a very unusual circumstance."—Ross-shire Advertiser.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Worcester, Massachusetts, Feb. 28, 1846.

ELIHU BURRITT TO JOSEPH STURGE.

HONORED AND DEAR FRIEND,—I thank you with all my heart for your kind letter, and the documents you sent me by the Cambria. O how we felt disposed to shout aloud for joy, at the blessed peace-breathing, that steamer brought to our shores—the abolition of the Corn Laws! Who can predict the consequences of that measure of heroic humanity? How many fetters and iron restrictions it will loose from the necks, and hands, and hearts of millions! How the Providence of God has co-operated with you in effecting this great blessing to the world! The potato—how the base things of this world have been chosen to confound the wise, the honourable, the mighty—to overthrow dynasties! Had it not been for the defection of the potato crop, probably your long-earnest hopes would have been deferred to a distant year. Famine, then, has been a Prime Minister of Providence to give cheap and plenteous food to the future generations of your countrymen. The blessings of all the poor and bondmen of the earth will be for ever on the Anti-Corn-Law League for what they have done for man. They have proved that God always co-works with those who work by moral means, and that moral power is an attribute of his Omnipotence which men may wield to the pulling down of the strongholds of oppression and wrong. O, you have worked out a problem for the whole world, of increasing importance to the race. You have encouraged all the labourers in the field of humanity to believe in God, and throw away all other weapons but those of moral power. Slavery, war, want, sin, and misery through the world have thriven with fatal luxuriance under the reign of brute force; but at the spirit of Christ, the spirit of truly philanthropic hearts, they must bow.

Free Trade! it is verily the harbinger of the millenium. How soon it would fuse the nations into one unanimous brotherhood! Oh! it is delightful to contemplate its social and moral influence on our two countries. How soon, with the affinities of consanguinity and common language, will it make us brethren in every sense of fraternity! Why, as soon as your markets are open to our produce, it will have a transforming effect on our whole western population, in whom the war-spirit is most excitable. They will be brought immediately into the most pacific attitude toward the labouring classes of Great Britain, and they will soon begin to talk more about feeding than "licking the British." How often extremes meet. It is intimated in some of your papers that our western people are all impetuous for war with England; open your ports, and you will find them more impetuous for peace. Give them a chance to open the port-holes of their vast Egyptian granary upon your ill fed millions, and their martial propensities would be satisfied. And why will you not say to your hungry, hard-labouring people, that our rude warm-hearted westerners owe them no grudge, nor wish to do anything more to them than to feed them with cheap bread. Give them a chance to do this, and they will hang up their hunting rifles, and take to the hoe and plough. Nothing could be more happily conceived than your plan of sending to the citizens of our cities addresses from the inhabitants of yours, appealing for peace. This is a beautiful social movement, and will be met with enthusiasm in this country. I wish it were possible to send back responses by the Cambria, but the time has been too short to call town meetings, for the purpose of authorising addresses to our English friends. The next steamer, I trust, will carry back to your shores the proof that our countrymen will not be behind yours in sentiments and expressions of brotherhood. I hope one thing, in connection with this movement, most devoutly: that is, that every town, village, and hamlet in Great Britain, which has a namesake in this country, will send it a friendly address, as your Boston has done to our Boston. There is a something extremely interesting in this; something like a word of maternal affection from a mother to a daughter; something so personal—so calculated to stir up a home feeling. The influence of such an interchange of friendly addresses, would last for the whole generation; and lead to an intimacy—a oneness of sentiment and interest, that would strengthen the bonds of our brotherhood, and beget associations of great efficacy to the cause of peace and humanity. I enclose in this a slip, addressed to the ministers of the gospel in Great Britain and the United States, appealing to them to interchange some friendly communications to show that Christianity is as much for peace as commerce. I have printed 1000 of your addresses on my "Olive Leaves," and sent them to all our members of Congress, and hope to send you some account of them by the next steamer. They have already been published in the leading journals in New York and Boston, and will probably appear in most of the journals of the land.

REVIEW.

The Honey Stew of the Countess Bertha. A Fairy Tale. Translated from the French by Mrs. Cooke Taylor. London: How.

This little work has many claims upon our attention. It comes from the pen of the secretary to the ladies' committee of the Covent Garden Bazaar, and thus revives many pleasing associations connected with that Free Trade jubilee. It is one of the most beautiful specimens of ornamental typography which has ever issued from the press, each page being set in a framework of gold, equally novel and chaste. The chromographic illustrations are highly creditable to British art, both in design and execution. The price is moderate, and the tale itself is one of the most delightful works of fancy which we have seen for many years. But a further recommendation, hardly intended by the author, but which probably induced the translator to bring it before the English public, is, that the story may be regarded as a very clever allegorical illustration of the aphorism, that "property has its duties as well as its rights," and that one of the first duties of landlords is to provide for the feeding of the people. Imagination, as well as reason, has been brought to the aid of the great cause of Free Trade and untaxed provisions. The Countess Bertha may be regarded as a personification of those sound principles equally taught by the laws of economic science and the precepts of our holy religion, while the association of beneficent fairies or Kobolds, formed to fulfil her behests, is a lively representation of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

The agreement between the Countess Bertha and the Kobolds was made when her old castle was about to be pulled down and a new one erected, just as commercial law may be said to have originated in England when the old constitution of the Stuarts was set aside to make room for the Bill of Rights and the Revolution. The proposition of the Kobolds was made in rhyme; and to complete the parallel, it used to be asserted that the Revolution was effected by the ballad of Lillibullero. Here is the interview between the Kobolds to the Countess Bertha and her husband, Count Osmond. The fairy creatures sent a deputation to their bed-room; and we may remark, that it was under similar circumstances William and Mary received those who invited them to England:

"The Ambassador, who was at their head, was richly dressed in the fashion of the times, having on a furred mantle, a vest of velvet, pantaloons to match, and his little shoes extravagantly pointed. By his side was a sword of the finest steel, the handle of which was a single diamond. He held politely in his hand his little hat, ornamented with feathers, and, approaching the bed of the Count and Countess, who looked on with astonishment, he addressed these words to them:

"We have heard a report, noble lady and lord,

That you wish to erect a new dwelling,

As this castle no longer can shelter afford,

When tempests around it are swelling.

"We approve the design—for these ivy-clad walls,

And the weeds that each buttress have studded,

Seem no better than spouts for the rain when it falls,

So that every apartment is flooded.

"Pull the old castle down—let a new one appear—

And the Kobolds will grant you protection,

If the virtue and truth, which made this one so dear,

Shall reign there in equal perfection."

Count Osmond was too much astonished at what happened to reply to these words, otherwise than by a friendly gesture; but the Ambassador seemed quite satisfied with this politeness, and retired, after having ceremoniously saluted the wedded pair."

The Kobolds assisted in building the new castle as the mercantile interests did in urging forward the Revolution; but the former were not appreciated by the masons, nor the latter by politicians:

"One day, a mason found, on the scaffolding, a little wheel-barrow, not as big as his hand, but so beautifully made of the best rose-wood, bound with silver, that it seemed only fit to be a plaything for a king's son. The mason who had discovered the wheel-barrow showed it to his companions, and in the evening took it home to give to his little boy; but the instant that the child was about to take hold of it, the wheel-barrow began to roll away of itself, and ran out of doors with such rapidity, that though the poor mason ran after it as fast as his legs could carry him, it disappeared in a second. At the same time he heard several shrill peals of laughter, loud and prolonged, as if the Kobolds were making game of him."

We come now to the promise of the Countess Bertha, on which the story is founded:

"At the end of the third year, when the swallows quitting their nests in our eaves, bid also farewell to our climates, and when the other birds, doomed to remain in our cold northern regions, become more sad, and more scarce, the new castle, though still far from being completed, began to make something of a figure; Bertha noticing this, as she one day presided over the labours of the workmen, addressed them in these words, with her bland and melodious voice:

"Well, my good masons and labourers, do the works advance as quickly as you can make them? Winter is knocking at the door, and the Count and I are so badly lodged in our little farm-house, that we are very anxious to leave it, to live in the fine castle which you are building. Listen, my children, if you will enable us to enter in a month, I promise you, on the day when you have placed the coping stone on the highest tower, to regale you with a honey-stew; the like of which you have never tasted. And more than that, I swear, that on the anniversary of this great day, your children and grandchildren shall receive the same treat from me, while I live, and afterwards from my children and grandchildren."

"The invitation to partake of a honey-stew—trifling as such a matter seems in modern times—was not to be despised in the middle ages; for it was the form used in asking you to a good and plentiful dinner. People said then, come and take your honey-stew with me to-morrow, as they now say, come and take your soup with me to-morrow; in both cases, the dinner was tacitly understood, with merely this difference, that the honey-stew was eaten at the end of the repast, but soup is eaten at the beginning."

The greedy Dominick, who had come into possession of the castle after a lapse of time, may be considered a representative of Lord North's monopolist administration; he withheld the Honey-stew as Lord North taxed trade. Both suffered severely for their violation of principle; and Dominick's final punishment is a lively symbol of the loss of the American colonies:

"Dominick resolved to take no farther notice of what had passed, and that day invited all his officers to a more than usually splendid banquet; indeed, the terror inspired by Dominick was so great, that at the appointed hour, although the orders had only been given in the morning, the table was served with wonderful splendour. The delicious meats, and excellent wines from the Rhine, France, and Hungary, drew forth repeated exclamations of praise from the guests on the liberality and magnificence of their General; who, however, on taking his place turned pale with rage, calling out, with a frightful oath, 'What wretch has dared to put this ammunition-bread before me?'

"Indeed the bread placed for the General, was the same as that distributed to the common soldiers, and such as Dominick had eaten in his youth.

"Every one looked to his neighbour with astonishment, unable to comprehend how any one could be bold enough to play such a trick on a man known to be so fierce, haughty, and vindictive as the General.

"Come here fellow," said Dominick to the servant, who was behind a chair, 'and take away this bread.'

"The servant obeyed with all the eagerness which fear inspired; but vain were all his exertions to remove the loaf from the table.

"My Lord," said he, after several useless efforts, 'this bread is so glued to the place, that I cannot get it away.'

"Then the General, whose strength was acknowledged to be equal to that of four men, took the bread in both hands, and in his turn, endeavoured to lift it; but he raised the table, not the bread, and after a violent exertion of five or six minutes, he fell back in his chair, exhausted with fatigue and covered with perspiration.

"A drink! a drink! fellow, and of the best," said he, in an irritated voice, holding out his glass; but he assured, I shall not fail to find out who has played this singular trick on me, and he shall be rewarded as he deserves. Dine, gentlemen, dine; I drink to your good appetite."

"He raised the glass to his lips, but immediately rejected what he had taken, exclaiming, 'What wretch has given me this infamous beverage?'

"It was I, my lord," said the trembling servant, still holding the bottle in his hand.

"What is in that bottle?'

"Tokay, my lord."

"Liar! you have poured me out water."

"It must have changed into water since it came into your glass, my lord, for I have poured out from the same bottle for the two gentlemen sitting next, my lord, and they both declare that it is excellent Tokay."

"The General turned to his two neighbours, who confirmed what the servant had said.

"Then Dominick, frowning, began to comprehend that the jugglery was more terrible than he had at first supposed; for he had imagined it to be a trick played on him by the living, while, according to every probability, it came from the dead.

"Wishing, then, to ascertain the truth, he took the bottle from the servant's hand, and poured out a glass of Tokay to each of his neighbours. The wine had its usual colour, and appeared a liquid topaz; then, from the same bottle, he poured some into his own glass; but no sooner did the wine fall there, than it took the colour, transparency, and taste of water.

"Dominick smiled bitterly at this double allusion to the lowliness of his birth, and not wishing to remain near the black bread, which seemed placed there to humiliate him, he requested his aide-de-camp, who was a young nobleman of one of the first families in Germany, to change places with him. The young man obeyed, and the General went to sit at the other side of the table.

"But he was no better off now than he had been before; whilst under the aide-de-camp's hand the bread detached itself from the table, without difficulty, and became like the other bread: every bit that Dominick took immediately changed into ammunition bread, and the wine, contrary to the miracle at the marriage of Cana, turned into water.

"Dominick, out of all patience, wished to eat something, and drew a large dish of roast larks near to him; but no sooner had his hands touched the dish than the larks took wing, flew away, and fell into the mouths of the peasants, who, from a distance, were beholding this magnificent banquet."

We need not quote many more of the historical parallels which this amusing fiction must suggest to every Free Trader; but there is one passage so vividly picturing in allegory a contest between Cobden, typified as the King of the Kobolds, and a boasting monopolist, represented by the craven knight, Hans, that we must give it insertion. We need only premise that Hans agreed to watch in a chamber said to be haunted by the Kobolds, just as some protectionists promised to encounter Leaguers in a county meeting:

"We may mention, for the honour of Sir Hans, that he had begun to sleep, when he suddenly heard a great noise in the chimney; he immediately threw a faggot upon the fire, which was almost burned down, thinking to roast the limbs of the ghosts if they decided on coming by that way. The fire blazed up anew, and the flames rose to the chimney, crackling, and sparkling, when suddenly Sir Hans saw a plank, about a foot wide, issue from the chimney, which pushed itself forward, growing larger and larger, without it being possible to discover what had set it in motion. The plank then descended slowly in a slanting position towards the ground, and when it rested on the floor, it seemed to form a kind of bridge over the flames. At the same instant a multitude of little Kobolds began to slide down this bridge, like holiday folks down the hill at Greenwich, headed by their king himself, who, armed at all points, like the great knight Hans, seemed to lead them to battle. As fast as they descended, Hans kept pushing himself back in his arm chair, so that when the king and his army were ranged in battle before the chimney, Hans had arrived at the other end of the room, prevented by the wall from going farther, though there was still a large unoccupied place between him and his unwelcome visitors.

"Then the King of the Kobolds, having conferred in a low voice with his general officers, advanced alone into the room.

"Sir Hans," said he, in an ironical tone of voice, "I have heard you more than once boast of your great courage, and as a true knight cannot lie, I feel convinced that you spoke the truth. In consequence, I have come to offer you single combat; and having heard that you valiantly offered the Baron Willbold to conjure the spirit who haunts this castle, I have obtained from this spirit, who is one of my intimate friends, leave to take his place this night. If you conquer, the spirit, through me, engages to abandon the castle, and never to re-appear in it. If I conquer, you are frankly to acknowledge your defeat, and to give your place to Sir Torald, whom undoubtedly I shall have little trouble in defeating, as I have never heard him boast of having cut any one in two in a blow. Therefore, as I do not doubt that you will accept my challenge, behold my glove."

"At these words, the King of the Kobolds threw his glove boldly at the feet of the knight.

"Whilst the king spoke in a clear little voice, Hans looked at him attentively, and feeling certain that he was not more than six inches and a half high, felt comforted; for such an adversary did not appear very terrible; he, therefore, took up the glove with confidence, and placed it on the top of his little finger to examine it. It was a little glove, cut out of the skin of a muskrat, upon which little scales of steel had been sewed with great exactness.

"The King of the Kobolds allowed Hans to examine it at his leisure; but after a moment's silence said: 'Well, Sir Knight, I await your reply. Do you accept or refuse my challenge?'

"Sir Hans again took a survey of the champion who challenged him to combat, and seeing that he scarcely reached half-way up to his knee, he took courage from the diminutive size of his adversary.

"And what are we to fight with, my little man?" said the knight.

"We will each fight with our own arms—you with your sword, I with my whip."

"How! with your whip?"

"Yes, it is my usual weapon; as I am little, I must have something to reach to a distance." Hans burst out laughing.

"And you will fight against me with your whip?"

"Undoubtedly. Have you not heard me say it is my usual weapon?"

"And you will take no other?"

"No."

"You promise?"

"On the faith of a knight and king."

"Well then," said Hans, "I accept the challenge."

"And he threw, in his turn, his glove at the king's feet.

"It is well," said the king, who made a few steps backwards, "not to be crushed. Trumpets sound!"

"Immediately, a dozen trumpeters, who were mounted on a little footstool, sounded a warlike flourish, whilst an officer brought the king the weapon with which he was to fight. It was a little whip, the handle of which was formed of a single emerald. To the end of this handle, five chains of silver were fastened, about three feet long, each terminated with a diamond about the size of a pea. Putting the value of the material aside, the king's weapon resembled one of those whips sometimes used for beating clothes and carpets.

"Sir Hans, full of confidence in his size and strength, drew his sword.

"When you will," said the king to the knight.

"At your orders, sire," said Hans.

"The trumpets immediately sounded even a more warlike air than the first, and the combat began.

"But at the first blows he received, the knight perceived that he had been wrong in despising his adversary's weapon. Although covered with armour, he felt the blows of the whip as if he had been naked, especially where the five diamonds struck; they indented themselves into the iron of his armour as if it had been the softest paste.

"Hans, instead of defending himself, began to cry, and ran about the room, to get up on the furniture and bed, followed everywhere by the whip of the implacable king, whilst the warlike air which the trumpets had played, accommodating itself to circumstances, had now assumed the character of a gallopade. It was this same gallop, my dear children, that our great musician, Aubert, found, and without telling any one, placed it in the fifth act of Gustavus.

"After five minutes of this exercise, Sir Hans fell on his knees and asked pardon.

"Then the King of the Kobolds giving the whip to his equerry, and taking his sceptre, 'Sir Hans,' said he to him, 'you are nothing but an old woman, and it is not a sword and poignard that suits you, but a distaff and spindle.'

"At these words, he touched him with his sceptre. Hans felt as if a great change had taken place in his person. The Kobolds screamed with laughter, and all disappeared as in a vision."

We wish it were possible to present our readers with a copy of the clever picture of this engagement; Cobden in armour is capital, and his two squires will be readily recognised. Here we must close this little volume, which has afforded us much gratification and some instruction.

ANTI-CORN LAW LEAGUE, (La Ligue Anglaise. Revue Britannique; Sixième Série, No. 1.) Paris and London: Barthes and Lowell.

We have delayed our notice of the admirable article on the history, character, and objects of the Anti-Corn Law League, published in the Revue Britannique, until the Parliamentary recess afforded us sufficient space to do justice to its merits. It is from the able pen of M. Fonteyreau, a young economist, who has already taken his place in the first ranks of economic science, a place to which he is entitled by the depth of his intelligence, the soundness of his principles, and the accuracy of his observations. We know of no foreigner who has so thoroughly appreciated the truly English character of the great Free Trade movement. He has comprehended not merely its operations, but its internal impulses. He has viewed it not merely in its physical, but in its moral and intellectual influences, and has justly portrayed it as the great revolution of a great nation, winning triumphs not for itself, but for universal civilisation; securing benefits not to its own exclusive interests, but to those of general humanity. M. Fonteyreau justly says:

"The League, whilst working for its proper object—the abolition of the Corn Laws—has not neglected the future. Whilst overthrowing the old edifice, it contemplates that which must be raised in its stead, and conceives it in its largest proportions. The men who conduct it embrace in thought the universal relations and interests of the nations of the earth. They require a system; they require a legislation which shall comprehend them all. Conceive a boundless ocean, over which every flag may float, every fleet glide, and every kind of produce be conveyed; conceive Peace spreading her wings to afford shelter to the entire world, and you will have figured to yourself the vision which these beneficent men desire to realise. To a thousand voices of rival selfishness they wish to oppose the single calm and impartial voice of reason; to a thousand interests jarring and clashing in darkness, they wish to oppose one great and recognized interest, that of the nation. In a word, to the deceptions of the existing fiscal administration, they oppose the majestic simplicity and inexhaustible benefits of Free Trade. If they have directed their principal efforts against the monopoly of the Corn Law, it is because that is the bulwark and support of all the rest."

We need not follow this able writer through his very clever history of the Corn Laws, but shall quote his account of some of the lamentable consequences which the artificial scarcity they created produced in the country:

"During the years of favourable harvests from 1832 to 1837, the number of emigrants did not exceed 70,000. In 1841, a year of dearth and scarcity, emigration rose to 116,000, and in 1842 to the higher number of 128,000; between 1838 and 1843 not less than half a million of individuals voluntarily abandoned their country. The people of Rome in times of oppression retired to Mount Aventine; Englishmen retire beyond the Ocean, and to the Blue Mountains of America; in both cases I perceive an anathema pronounced against social order. In criminal statistics we find the same gradation. In 1836 the number of criminals was 36,000; in 1843 it rose to 51,000. The total number of bankruptcies, which was 800 in 1838, amounted to 1500 in 1842, and paralysed every branch of industry. Factories were emptied to crowd work-houses. Poor rates assumed formidable dimensions. In five years they increased 134 per cent. in Manchester, 159 per cent. in Oldham, and 304 per cent. in Bolton. And whilst the country was thus depopulated by emigration, by death, and by the prison—that tomb of the living—marriages, which should have filled the void, rapidly decreased; parents died, and were not replaced by children. Let it not be supposed that these disastrous effects were confined to the manufacturing districts, for, as we have already indicated, there is a cohesive principle uniting all the members of the social body. At the moment that the Corn Laws, the vaunted palladium of England, raised prices to the very summit of the sliding scale, a Poor Law Commissioner found agricultural labourers, working at 4d. per day, in the midst of the most frightful destitution. Nine hundred and eleven families of labourers showed him the title-deeds of their property. They consisted of more than nine thousand duplicates of articles pledged to the pawnbroker. Thus protection murdered those whom it professed to shelter; its shade was as fatal as that of the Upas tree."

Take now his survey of the effect of the Corn Laws on foreign commerce:

"In one word, these restrictions raise an insurmountable barrier between countries producing provisions, and the manufacturing districts of England. The earth, the great producing power, or, as we may call it, the manufactory of corn, of wine, of cattle, no longer gave motion and activity to steam engines and spinning jennies; a separation was made between man and nature, between man and his fellows. These are not sentimental imaginations or visionary dreams; they are stern realities and simple truths. In all the propositions for reciprocity treaties of commerce made by England to Russia, Germany, and the United States, her diplomatists were silenced when the scornful finger pointed to the Corn Laws as the emblem of prohibition and isolation. They refused her iron, her yarns, her calicoes and her coals, because she refused the corn of Dantzic, of Riga, of Odessa, of Hamburg, and of New York. Reprisals were everywhere invoked to the everlasting disgrace of the political leaders of Great Britain."

The mission of the League, its orators, its lecturers, and its writers, was to teach the people:

"They teach that men are one great family, invited by Providence to the same great feast of his bounty; that the immense variety of their wants is satisfied by the immense variety of the productions of nature, in the division that is made of all social functions—such a country producing iron; such another, cotton; such another, diamonds; such another, the master pieces of engraving or painting; so that it is necessary to float all these varied forms of wealth on the same level that they may diffuse themselves freely over the whole globe. They show Holland prospering without Corn Laws, and overflowing with provisions, though its soil slips from beneath the plough, and collecting against famine a store of provisions which in the time of Raleigh amounted to 700,000 quarters of corn. They show the granaries of the United States groaning under their loads of food, and waiting but the signal to pour the rich abundance into England; they curse those laws which, as O'Connell said, 'moisten the wheels of the rich with the tears of the poor,' which condemn him to inactivity, that vestibule of famine—and to famine, that vestibule of disgrace or death. They oppose all those things; and above all, they set in contrast to them their own deeds, their devotedness of every day and every hour to the sacred cause of truth, of justice, and of charity."

We shall now turn to his character of Mr. Cobden, which is traced with great force and discrimination:

"We have placed Mr. Cobden in the lead of the movement;—in truth the leadership belongs to him in right of his devotedness, of his talent, and of his courage. It was by no sudden effort that this supremacy of moral force was established. The League had long been growing in obscurity; and it was while maturing its growth, and vivifying its agitation, that Cobden gradually revealed himself as the hero of its struggles. The caution necessary to be exercised in the selection of means for conducting an infant agitation, the contact with enlightened minds, the information obtained during his searching enquiries into the misery of the country, prepared him to come efficiently before the public; and when, by a kind of tacit consent, the League conferred on him the leadership, he found himself fully equal to the difficult mission. The scientific ardour of Mr. Cobden then took a new course, and was transformed into an indefatigable activity for commercial freedom. There has been no great evolution of the party which has not been maturely considered by him and his faithful companions, Messrs. Wilson and Bright. There is not a victory which has not been won at the cost of a thousand efforts; there is not a struggle in which he has not shown himself ready to sacrifice his health, his interests, and even his self-love; for it will be hereafter not the least of his glories, to have set in motion so many men, and to have influenced so many minds, without exciting the jealousy, or wounding the pride of those by whom he is surrounded. In this we must see a proof of great moral superiority united to great integrity. This superiority is specially remarkable in Cobden's marvellous aptitude in using all the varied forms of action. Should a new system of tactics seem necessary, he finds unexpected resources in the calm sagacity of his intelligence; if the country is to be addressed through the press, he has at its disposal a practised pen; if Parliament is to be persuaded, his address exhibits the calm reasoning and acute exposure of sophistry, which is sure to win votes: if he is required to force conviction, he finds in his own breast the noblest sentiments of humanity, and adorns them with lively sallies of eloquence and wit. Doubtless there are orators more rich in imagery, more philosophic, more ardent, more poetic—but there is no one who better elucidates fast, and enters deeper into his subject. The traces he leaves in the mind are, perhaps, less brilliant than those left by Fox, or Bright, but they are more profound. His logic penetrates like some finely tempered weapon; it tears no muscle, inflicts no pain, but almost imperceptibly it reaches the heart and compels it to surrender. That which especially characterises the eloquence of Mr. Cobden, is the entire absence of digression; his speech is as true to the point as the needle to the pole, and never deviates for an instant. A great orator, he is above all, the orator of the League; a sound statesman, he is especially the representative of the League in Parliament; in a word, he appears to me its very personification—the actual incarnation of its movement."

Cobden's whole life has been one of labour and meditation. Beginning with humble means, he has realised a fortune; emerging from obscurity, he has won a reputation; respected and feared by the aristocracy, he has undertaken to guide an entire nation to the promised land of Free Trade. He is in the strength and prime of his age, if strength can be applied to one of those delicate organisations which is consumed by the fever of thought. His calm and meditative physiognomy, furrowed over by the deep lines of meditation and reflection, bears witness to his efforts and his struggles. He might be mistaken for a hermit, if the ardour that sparkles in his eyes did not mark him as the leader of a party. It is from the mildness of his manners and his simplicity, worthy of Franklin, that Cobden has obtained the sympathies by which he is surrounded; as it is in the earnestness of his temperament and his exhaustless energies, that the source of his influence over the masses may be found. At a distance he is admired, in intimacy he is beloved. This is not usually the effect of great talents; they usually charm you at a distance, but crush you when you come near. I may add that this admiration and sympathy of the League for its chief is often manifested in a most striking manner; ships and streets have been called after his name, and corporations have been anxious to enrol him amongst their citizens."

We shall now turn to the portrait of Mr. Bright:

"In the charming openness of his countenance, Mr. Bright exhibits the characteristic signs which reveal great talent. The inseparable companion of Mr. Cobden, he has shared with him the applauses of the nation and the fatigues of the strife;—both acting in conjunction without either being eclipsed; the one giving to the question clear and definite outline, the other affording to the picture depth and relief. Ask not Mr. Bright to convince statisticians and algebraists, or to win over a company of nervous ladies and perfumed dandies; he respects the figures of arithmetic, but he rarely uses them; and with respect to the nervous ladies, there is a manly firmness in his tones which would scare them out of their lives. No: what the young quaker wants is a mass of human beings to stimulate, an enemy to crush by sarcasm, a plea of charity to be poured in words of fire into feeling hearts. To-day he will hurl thunderbolts against the iniquities of aristocratic tyranny; to-morrow, his voice, faltering with emotion, will melt an audience into tears, whilst he describes the misery of the working classes. Behind the orator you always see the Christian, as behind the League you can discover the democrat, the apostle of international fraternity and the genuine rights of man. Thus this double source of ideas gives extraordinary amplitude to his language. In his speeches you find, side by side with philosophical inspirations, the views of an economist, the popular sentiments and irony of a Parliamentary debater;—a singular mixture of acuteness and frankness, sallies of feeling direct from the heart, sarcasms of great bitterness and even of invective, as when he dissects the political articles of the Standard. Mr. Bright takes pleasure in braving and defying his enemies. It is in the midst of the groanings and interruptions of the protectionists that he likes to try his strength. He loves the tempest which he knows so well how to subdue. Like Addison's angel,

He, pleased the Almighty's anger to perform,
Rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm.

"There is in Mr. Bright such a warmth of conviction, that he carries the heart into all questions. All furnish him pathetic emotions, and he does not utter them to the multitude until they have passed through his own soul. In

On the 1st and 15th of each Month, every Part containing Four highly-finished Portraits, price One Shilling,

THE PEOPLE'S NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY

Of Illustrious and Eminent Personages of the Nineteenth Century, engraved by first rate Artists, from Paintings by Lawrence Reynolds, West, Shee, Hoppner, Beechey, Phillips, Carrick, &c. &c.

With Memoirs by W. COOKE TAYLOR, LL.D.

Fisher, Son, and Co., the Caxton Press, Angel-street, Newgate-street, London.

On the 15th of each Month, every Part containing Four highly-finished Steel Engravings, price One Shilling, FISHER'S GALLERY OF SCRIPTURE ENGRAVINGS.

INGES, Historical and Landscape. The Landscapes by Fisher, Son, and Co., the Caxton Press, Angel-street, Newgate-street, London.

With Descriptions, historical, geographical, and critical, by JOHN KITTO, D.D., F.S.A., Editor of "The Pictorial Bible," the "Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature," &c. &c.

Fisher, Son, and Co., the Caxton Press, Angel-street, Newgate-street, London.

Price Six Shillings.

COMPENSATION to the People for Aristocratic Food

Laws and Unfair Taxation, or, the Influence of Aristocrats on the Condition of Nations. By J. M. COOKE, LL.D.

London: Fisher, Son, and Co., and all Booksellers.

Now Ready, at every Library in the Kingdom.

In 1 vol., price 1s. 6d.,

HELEN STANLEY; a Tale. By MATILDA M.

LOVE, WAR, AND ADVENTURE. By H. HARRNESS.

In 3 vols., price 41s. 6d.,

GILHA OF THE FOREST. By the Author of Rodenhurst.

E. Churton, Library, 26, Holles-street

No. 2. of THE TOPIC.

Now ready, 4p. 4to, price 3d.,

THE NEW TARIFF, and its Effect on Trade and Society fully analysed and elucidated

This new periodical, "The Topic," consists of an article each week of the same kind, and by the same writers, as in the quarterly reviews.

No. 1.—The Indian War.

C. Mitchell, Red Lion court, Fleet street.

Just Published, price 1s. each, or by Post (pre-paid), 1s. 4d.,

THE OVERSEASERS' GUIDE.

THE HIGHWAY SURVEYOR'S GUIDE.

THE CONSTABLE'S GUIDE. THE CHURCHWARDEN'S GUIDE.

Also price 3s. boards.

THE GENERAL HIGHWAY ACT, and the Statutes and Cases relating thereto, with Notes, Abstracts, &c. By A. A. FARRIS, Esq.

London: Charles Knight and Co., 22, Ludgate-street, Publishers (by Authority) to the Poor Law Commissioners.

Dr. Robert Culverwell's Guide to Health and Long Life.

(300 pages, pocket volume), price 1s. by post, 1s. 6d.,

WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID; with Diet

Tables for all Complaints. By R. J. CULVERWELL, M.D., M.R.C.S.,

L.A.C., &c. Contents.—How to insure perfect digestion, tranquil feelings, a good night's rest, a clear head, and a contented mind. By an observation of the instructions herein contained, the feeble, the nervously delicate, even to the most shattered constitution, may acquire the greatest amount of physical happiness, and reach in health the full period of life allotted to man. To be had of Sherwood, 23, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand, who may be advised with on these matters daily till 3, evenings, 7 till 9.

CORNER'S NEW HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading.

Each History, commencing with the earliest authentic records, is continued to the present time: faithfully portraying, also, the Manners, Customs, and States of Civilisation of the People.

England and Wales; five fine plates, and map, 4s. - - - 3s. 6d.

Ireland; three fine plates, and map, 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.

Scotland; three fine plates, and map, 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.

France; three fine plates, and map, 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.

Spain and Portugal; three plates, and map, 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.

Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; with two fine plates and map, 3s. 6d.

Germany and the German Empire; 3 fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.

To Key and the Oceanic Islands; 3 fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.

Poland and Russia; with three fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.

Italy and Switzerland; three fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.

Holland and Belgium; with two fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.

The object of these works—poetical and historical—is to furnish the reader with a faithful History of each Nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the Religion, Customs, National Characteristics, State of Civilisation, and Domestic Habits of the people, in various periods of their history—to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of detail; and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.

London: Dean and Co., Threadneedle-street; and, by order, of all Booksellers.

Tableau of Public Interest, which has been Eight Months in Preparation.

THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert, and their Four lovely Children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F.

Tussaud, the Costumes by Mrs. F. Tussaud, is new added to the Collection.

—BAZAAR, Baker-street, Portman-square.

—This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis.—Times.

—Admission, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 7 till 10.

RICHARD COBURN, ESQ., M.P.

J. STEPHENSON AND CO., Engravers, Publishers, and Printers, have the honour to announce that the WHOLE-

LENGTH PORTRAIT of RICHARD COBURN, ESQ., M.P., painted by

C. A. Du Val, Esq., is now on view for a short time prior to being placed in the Engraver's hand. This is the latest portrait as well as the most striking likeness ever painted, and will be engraved in line in the highest style of art.

J. S. and Co. have the pleasure to inform the Subscribers to the Portrait

Now ready, Vols. I., II., III., each containing 64 beautiful Engravings on Steel, elegantly bound, price 22s.

THE PEOPLE'S GALLERY OF ENGRAVINGS,

after original pictures and drawings by Lawrence, Turner, Stanfield,

Prout, Roberts, Allon, Chalmers, Hayter, Paris, Maclise, Stephano, Cattermole, Bartlett, Leitch, &c. &c.

Edited by the Rev. G. N. WHIGHT, M.A.

Published also in Paris, each Part containing four beautiful Engravings on Steel, for One Shilling

Fisher, Son, and Co., the Caxton Press, Angel-street, Newgate-street, London.

FREE TRADE CLUB, 27, Regent-street, St. James's.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the MEMBERS of this CLUB was held on Monday, the 11th of April, 1846, at the Club House, in Regent-street.

Major-General BRIGGS, F.R.S., F.G.S., in the Chair.

A most satisfactory report of the financial and general prospects of the club having been read and adopted, it was Resolved—1. That a copy of the report be printed and sent to each member.

2. That the committee be requested to draw up a circular, to accompany the report, calling on each member to exert himself zealously to obtain the price of the stamp, and when paid, no charge is made for admission.

contemplated in the establishment of the club.

3. That the following noblemen and gentlemen be elected members of the committee for the succeeding year, namely:—

Briggs, Major-Gen. F.R.S., F.G.S.,

Bright, John, Esq., F.R.S.,

Clark, William, Esq.,

Cobden, Richard, Esq., M.P.

Cogan, Captain

David, Edward, Esq.

De la Beche, Esq.,

Hizroy, Lord Charles, M.P.

Gibson, Thomas Milner, Esq., M.P.

Ivimey, Joseph, Esq.

Thanks having been voted to the chairman, the meeting dissolved.

By order of the Meeting,

JAMES ADOLPHUS MOORE, Secretary.

CIRCULAR NOTES AND LETTERS OF CREDIT.—

THE LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK issues Circular Notes for the use of Travellers and Residents on the Continent. These Notes are payable at every important place in Europe, and thus enable a traveller to vary his route without inconvenience, no expense is incurred except the price of the stamp, and when paid, no charge is made for admission.

These Notes may be obtained either at the Head Office of the London and Westminster Bank, in Lombury, or at the Branches of the Bank, viz.—

1, St. James's-square; 213, High Holborn; 4, Stratford place, Oxford street; 3, Wellington-street, Borough; and 67, High-street, Whitechapel.

By Order of the Bank,

JAMES WILLIAM GILBERT, General Manager.

DENTISTRY.

225, Piccadilly, between Regent Circus and Haymarket, London

E. GIDNEY, formerly of New York, but for the last

16 years extensively known in Manchester and its populous neighbouring towns, as the American Dentist, in consequence of his health not being equal to a more arduous and delicate, has selected the above premises, as very central, and convenient for his professional business, where he tenders his best services to all who may desire the faithful and solid advantages of his art. His practice will embrace every necessary operation for the improvement and preservation of the human teeth. He regulates deranged teeth, and removes all causes incidental to their destruction, or that may deform the beauty of the important organs.

Mr. G. never uses any of the various cements, pastes, or succedaneums, which are all mere fancy names for the same article, being base amalgams of quicksilver (mercury) with other equally noxious materials, their use being wholly prohibited for filling teeth, and justly considered mal-practice by the American College and Society of Dental Surgeons; but he fills decayed teeth with the very best gold, so as to preserve them free from pain for life. Nor does he excise or cut off the crowns of painful teeth when they should be extracted, but he preserves them, and with ease destroys the nerve when exposed and painful. His experience and advantages in artificial substitutes are equal to any in the profession.

Mr. G. considers it strictly professional, and will, under a conviction of its utility, adopt the practice when called on of visiting public companies and private families, for inspection and consultation only, either before or after the hours of business.

His circular containing regulated charges, and brief information, respecting the advantages and utility of his profession, may be had through post when required. Hours of business from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

FENDERS, STOVES, and FIRE-IRONS.—The largest assortment of Stoves and Fenders, as well as General Ironmongery, in the world, is now on Sale at WILLIAM S. BURTON'S (late RIPPON and BURTON'S), extensive warehouses. Bright steel fenders, of 4 feet, from 30s each; ditto, ditto, with ornamental ornaments, from 60s;

rich, bronzed scroll do., with steel bar, 10s each; iron stands, 3 feet,

3s 6d; 4 feet, 6s; ditto, bronzed, and fitted with ornaments 3 feet, 9s; 4 feet, 11s; wrought iron kitchen fenders, 3 feet, 4s 6d; 4 feet, 6s; bright register stoves, with bronzed ornaments, and two sets of bars, from 9s; ditto, with ornamental ornaments, from 12s; black dining-room register stoves, 2 feet, 18s; 3 feet, 27s; bed-room register stoves, 2 feet, 16s; 3 feet,

24s. The new economical thermo stove, with feeder and radiating heartplate, from 28s; fire-irons for chambers is 9d per set; handsome do., with cut heads, 6s 6d; newest pattern, with elegant bronzed heads, 11s.

A variety of fire-irons, with ornamental and richly cut heads, at proportionate prices. Any order for furnishing a room, or for the purchase of any other household article, will be promptly attended to, and the goods delivered at any other house. The money returned for every article not approved of.

Detailed catalogues, with engravings, sent (per post) free.

WILLIAM S. BURTON'S (late RIPPON and BURTON'S) stock of general furnishing ironmongery is now the largest in the world, and as no language can describe the variety and beauty of its variety and decent, purchasers are invited to call and inspect it.—39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Wells-street, 1820.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN LANDLORD

SECOND BRITISH BUILDING AND INVEST-

MENT COMPANY. Enrolled.

Established on Macarthur's Simplified and Improved Plan.

Monthly Subscription, 10s. per Share.

No Redemption Fee.

Office, 3, Ivy-Lane, St. Paul's, London.

Hours, 10 till 4.

Commenced in March, 1846.

William Anderson, M.R.C.S., 12, Chadwell-street, Myddleton-square.

William Farmer, 29, Charlotte-terrace, Barnsbury-road, Islington.

James Staley, Tiberton-square, Islington.

Thomas Sheppard, 5, Gainsford-place, Barnsbury-road.

All letters should be directed to the Second British Building and Investment Company, 3, Ivy-Lane, St. Paul's, London.

The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2900

Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of land, which success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies.

At a Public Meeting, at which upwards of 1100 persons were present, held at the London Mechanics' Institution, on Tuesday, 17th Feb., 1846, Mr. W.

Farmer, in the chair, the following Resolutions were carried unanimously:

Moved by Mr. Beal, seconded by Mr. Lovejoy.—That this meeting highly approves of the plan on which the Second British Building and Investment

Company is established; and cordially recommends it to the public as being based on equal justice to all, and providing for the members, desirous of purchasing property, the greatest advantages consistent with security to the whole body of members.

Moved by Mr. Alexander, seconded by Mr. Thomas.—That this meeting considers the conduct of the Directors, in waiving their right to receive or claim any advance from the Company during the first 12 months, as highly honourable, and deserving of the sincere thanks of the meeting.

Moved by Mr. Thomas, seconded by Mr. Lovejoy.—That the meeting approves of the plan on which the Second British Building Societies to be a decided improvement.—Weekly Dispatch.

"He has really simplified and improved the plan on which Building Societies are conducted."—Temperance Intelligencer.

The Prospects may be obtained, gratis, of any of the Directors, and at the National Office, 18, St. Mark Lane, City.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 134.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

WHIG AND TORY BRANCHES OF THE RIGBY FAMILY.

"THE 'QUARTERLY'—LORD JOHN.—If Lord John Russell's letter had not so rashly, and we now say so unfortunately, pledged himself and his party to a measure which, even with Sir Robert Peel's support, he found he could not carry—had Lord John stood on his own original ground, his own early opinions—the opinions, we believe, of Lord Grey, of Lord Melbourne, of Lord Lansdowne, of Lord Brougham—of the necessity of an effective protection (either fixed or sliding) to agriculture, there would have been no reason why there might not have been a cordial union of all classes of protectionists on the only great question that now divides the political world; and Lord John Russell might have been at the head of a government strong enough to be independent of Mr. O'Connell and the League, and to have gathered round it all the friends of the existing institutions and policy of the country. This great position Lord John giddily threw away, and has created difficulties in forming an administration capable of governing the country, of which we humbly confess that we do not see the solution."—Quarterly Review.—(Extracted into Globe.)

We should scarcely have deemed it worth while to make the above piece of mingled drivelling and roguery the text of an article in THE LEAGUE, but that we find it set forth in a prominent place in the columns of a journal which is generally understood to speak the sentiments of a section of politicians of considerable "Liberal" pretensions. If we wrong the Globe and its patrons, in supposing that its quotation of this choice bit of Rigbyism is to be taken as indicating, in a sly way, a disposition to regard favourably the suggestion of a Whig and Tory coalition on the "principle" of plundering the receivers of wages and the eaters of bread, it will give us sincere pleasure to be called upon to retract an error which has, at least, prima facie evidence to excuse it. As the thing stands, however, we fear we can hardly be mistaken in the conjecture, that a number of what are called "influential" and "leading" persons, of "Whig principles," would like dearly, if they could, to close with the monopolists on the Rigby terms, and patch up a bread-taxing alliance of pseudo-Liberals and Tory landlords.

The above extract from the Quarterly Review is, in fact, but a plain avowal of opinions and predictions which, we are well aware, have been long entertained by a class of over-clever, but desperately purblind politicians "about town," whose whole souls are wrapped up in the vulgarest and coarsest interests of party—men who, in the grandest of national struggles for the assertion of a great principle, can see nothing but the chances of finding, or making, political capital to be invested in the names of certain Pall-mall cliques. These men never dream of asking, whether such or such a line of policy be right and just in itself, and conducive to national well-being—and rarely trouble themselves about the accordance of their notions with a public opinion whose signs they are utterly unable to discern and interpret. Their thoughts run mainly on what Rigby calls "combinations" for tripping up the heels of Parliamentary and official rivals; and the only mode in which they ever recognise the people as an element of their political calculations, is in the periodical invention of a "good cry," to practice upon popular gullibility. As a knave is, after all, "a fool with a circumbendibus," it is not surprising that these gentry are extremely apt to be taken in—are, in truth, about the most gullible of mortals.

The Quarterly Reviewer, well knowing his men, baits his trap to their taste. He tells them, that if Lord John Russell could only have kept himself to himself, in the month of November last, and given the go-by to his own principles and convictions, he might have enjoyed the extraordinary honour and glory of getting up a new protectionist party, on the basis of a fixed duty. Up to the hour when Lord John Russell did the boldest, honestest, and wisest act of his whole political life, he had good cards in his hands—but he "rashly" and "unfortunately" forgot which were trumps. He had a "great position," quoth the Quarterly—so long as nobody knew whether he had any, and what, clear opinion of his own on the first question of the age, and was unshackled by "pledges" to do the right thing rather than the wrong one;—when he came out with that ever-memorable declaration which made him, in three days' time, the most popular of English statesmen, he "giddily threw away" the said "great position." This is the story that the Tory Rigby has his private reasons for wishing the Whig Rigbys to swallow;—and they do swallow it—the cunning little Isaacs—every word;—and they fancy that some of them may be the happy instruments of repairing Lord John Russell's rash, unfortunate, and giddy act, and consummating a mutually useful and convenient alliance between the fag-ends of a pair of factions.

All a mistake, gentlemen, as the Quarterly perfectly well knows—as every man knows, who has an honest eye-sight, and a tolerable memory. Lord John Russell's "great position," as a statesman of whom people were not quite sure that he exactly knew his own mind, was simply the position of not having a leg to stand upon; and the "cordial union" between "all classes of protectionists" and the advocates of a fixed duty was a flat impossibility. Lord John Russell had certainly given the experiment a very fair trial. In 1841, he tried the temper of "all classes of protectionists," with eight shillings—with what success, vide the Quarterly Review, of that year, and its lucubrations on the "revolutionary Whigs." Last summer, he tried them again with "four, five, or six shillings," qualified with a "perhaps." It was all of no use. Strike high, or strike low, there was no such thing as pleasing them. The "friends of the existing institutions and policy of the country" had nothing to say to his lordship, or his lordship's fixed duty—not a man of them had a vote either for him or it. The "cordial union" is absolutely farcical. The bait is the veriest delusion that ever was hung out; and none but extremely hungry small fry would ever have had the silliness to bite. Of the morality of the scheme thus shadowed forth by the Quarterly Review, there is no need to speak. What a spectacle that would have been, over the departed possibility of which the Rigby imagination so fondly and tearfully lingers! The Liberal leader helping and heading the old enemies of his party, to tax the people's bread! Coalitions, at the best, are suspicious in honest and plain men's eyes—but this would have had INFAMY as its very basis and bond of union.

We ought, perhaps, to apologise to Lord John Russell for using his name, even hypothetically, in connection with a nefarious project which it is utterly inconceivable that he could ever have stooped to countenance under any combination of circumstances. But it is well to speak plainly, and to tell the whole Rigby kith and kin, Whig and Tory, that so thoroughly roguish a conspiracy never could have had so much as a momentary success. The League and the people would have trampled down the unholy alliance out of sight, and out of existence, in the very hour of its consummation. Long ere this the irresistible course of events would have palsied with terror the hearts of the men who should have dared to commit themselves to this felonious scheme. Why, cannot the dreamers over a dead, buried, and forgotten fixed duty see, that even if their favourite "adjustment," as the cant phrase goes, had happened to be already in actual possession of the statute-book, it never could have kept possession? This year 1846 would have most effectually "adjusted" it. Had the League itself played traitor, nothing could have saved the eight shillings. Irish famine would, by this time, have taken the question out of the hands of all of us. No Minister—Whig, Tory, or nondescript—would ever have dared to ask the English people to pay large sums of money for the purpose of feeding those millions of Irishmen who, between now and next harvest, will have to be fed at the English people's cost—while an eight shilling landlords' tax was charged on every quarter of wheat. The public charity and the private tax never could have stood together. The fixed duty must have come off—and "once off," as Sir Robert Peel long ago said, "by whom is it to be laid on again?"

The truth is, as all the world well understands—excepting only the men who have neither hearts nor heads to know a piece of statesmanship when they see it—Lord John Russell's "rash," "unfortunate," and "giddy" abandonment of the "great position" which, in the lively Rigby imagination, he held up to the 22d of last November, was the very wisest thing he ever did, for himself and for his party. The letter to the London electors saved the Whigs from political extinction. Had Sir Robert Peel's determination to abolish the Corn Law been publicly known before his illustrious rival "pronounced" in favour of Free Trade, the whole grace and force of Lord John Russell's adhesion would have been lost. The Whigs would have ceased to be the popular and Liberal party, in any sense of the words that the popular intellect and sympathies can comprehend. Nothing would have remained to the "Liberal" bread-taxers but a caput mortuum of withered and defunct traditions. Lord J. Russell has shown himself to have far more of length, breadth, and depth of political view than many of those who call themselves his followers. His plain-spoken honesty has proved an immeasurably better policy than any that all the quidnunc cunning of Pall-mall could have devised. By his frank, timely, and effective espousal of the principles and objects nearest to the hearts of the English people, he has won for himself a really "great position" in public esteem and honour—whichever he will, we are confident, continue to occupy, long after both sliding scale and fixed duty shall have become matter of history.

THE POST TAKING MORAL GROUND.

"No case—abuse Plaintiff's attorney."—(From THE ROGUE, a Drama in many acts.)

The Post of Thursday morning takes a very short way with the Ministers and their Free Trade policy. Sir Robert Peel, and Sir Robert Peel's colleagues, and "the crowd by which the present ministerial policy is most vehemently and noisily approved," are rascals—and of course there's no more to be said. The Free Traders, like the little tailor's sons in the old song, are "all rogues together"—and therefore Free Trade is, most probably, a bad thing. Let a man travel all over England "to recruit his town-worn spirits"—and, go where he will, he will find all the bad people staunch Free Traders, and nearly all the good people protectionists. Wherever he "falls in with men of gentlemanly manners, whose conversation indicates education and experience," or with "plain, homely men, who possess respect for religion and law," he "will find a large majority of such men, either directly opposed to the ministerial policy, or very much afraid that it is a great error." On the other hand, all the "riffraff" people, who "smoke cigars and drink brandy-and-water"—all the "ruffians" who wear whiskers and talk slang—all the "scoffers," who "treat all religion as mere superstition"—and all the "loose, disreputable fellows," of "dangerous opinions" and notoriously "profligate morals," are uncompromising Free Traders. On the whole, the general feeling among respectable, moral, and pious people decidedly is, that "there is something BLACKGUARD in the present policy of the Government"—that "there is some GROSS RASCALITY in the business."

Really, this is a wonderfully easy style of political writing, for those persons to whom good taste and a sense of propriety does not render it impossible. It saves a world of trouble. Calling one's political opponents "blackguards" is so much simpler than refuting their arguments. Dubbing the Free Traders "ruffians" and "rascals" is a thing so much sooner done than patching up a decent-looking case for monopoly.

We have no desire to imitate a writer whose passions thus overleap the restraints imposed by the ordinary proprieties of language, and we abstain altogether from those retorts which the well-known tastes, habits, and pursuits of some prominent persons of the monopolist party almost irresistibly suggest. But throwing dirt is not our forte. A writer who can do nothing better with his pen than "blackguard" a party, which has all the first-class statesmen of the country for its chiefs, and the whole mass of the sober, quiet, moral, steady-going industrious classes, for its rank and file, places himself at once outside the pale of political controversy.

We have thought it worth while to notice this coarse and silly trash, partly as it shows how very hard monopoly must feel itself driven for something to say—but chiefly because of the radically false notion of the duties and responsibilities of statesmen, implied in this and similar assaults on the chiefs of the Free Trade Cabinet. In the modern protectionist philosophy of political morals, men who hold and avow different opinions now from what they held and avowed some years ago, are ipso facto convicted of dishonesty—unless they whitewash themselves by refusing to give practical effect to their new opinions as to what national well-being demands. Second thoughts are sinful in a statesman—unless he abstain from acting on them. For a public man to find out that he has been wrong, and to say so, may, perhaps, be venial—though we are not positively sure that this is to be found in the litera scripta of the protectionist code of ethics;—but for a public man who finds he has been wrong, to proceed forthwith, and do what his conscience and judgment tell him is right, is "gross rascality"—there is "something blackguard" about it. Openness to conviction, when embodied in act and fact, is dishonesty; and all who approve of a statesman's learning by experience, and adopting the results of experience into his policy, are "riffraff" and "ruffians."

The aim of all this is perfectly intelligible—but we beg to tell the Post and its patrons that it won't do.

They are quite out in their calculations when they reckon on damaging and discrediting Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham by this sort of tirade. No doubt there is much in the public lives of these Ministers, as of others of our prominent Parliamentary politicians, which invites moral criticism and reprehension;—but this is a work demanding widely different qualifications from those which appear to be at the command of our contemporary—not to add, that after all, the characters of individual Ministers are not, at this moment, the question before the country. Public opinion and public taste will not approve the combination of the airs of a moral censor with the dialect of a fish-woman. The Post may stand assured that the only possible effect of its brainless and unmannerly vituperation is to strengthen and deepen—in the minds of such of the industrious classes as are cognisant of the Post's existence—the sense of the gratitude due to Ministers for the intelligence, earnestness, and vigour of their recent advocacy of the rights of industry.

THE EXPIRING STRUGGLES OF MONOPOLY IN AMERICA.

Monopoly has run its race in America. The monopolists of that country, aided by the English tariff, and by the eloquent declamation of Clay and Webster, succeeded for a time in mystifying and frightening Brother Jonathan into the belief that Free Trade was fraught with dangers. His natural shrewdness, however, has at length led him to discover that it is not his interest to be obliged by law to pay from 20 to 50 per cent. more for every thing he needs except food, and at the same time to sell his corn and provisions in the cheapest markets into the bargain. An American correspondent writes us—"The gallant struggles of the League in England have long created great sympathy here, and have given new interest to the exertions of Calhoun and McDuffie in Congress, which there is now every prospect of being crowned with success. The discussions in England have prepared the public mind here to appreciate Mr. Walker's able report, and the Free Trade measures of Sir Robert Peel have given the finishing stroke to monopoly. There is little doubt that Mr. Walker's views will be in part, if not wholly, carried out this session; but if the monopolists in Congress succeed in clipping them now, it will only lead to more extensive reductions in our tariff next session."

Mr. Walker's admirable report, showing by the most incontrovertible facts that the manufacturing monopoly costs America an annual sum equal to double the amount of the revenue of the country, has startled Brother Jonathan as much as the people here were startled by the evidence of Deacon Hume and MacGregor before the Import Duties Committee, to the effect that our corn and provision monopolies were a burthen equal to the whole expenditure of the country, including the interest on the national debt. It needs no seer to foretell that the publication of such facts in free countries like England and America, must soon be followed by the downfall of a system so prejudicial to the national interests of both. The manufacturing monopolists of America, and the corn monopolists of England, are therefore equally alarmed at the propositions of the ministers of both countries, simultaneously to abolish protective duties.

Boston, in the United States, is the stronghold of the American monopolists; and the Hon. Abbott Lawrence, the largest manufacturer in that country, holds a similar position, as their monopolist champion, with our Duke of Richmond, the champion of the corn monopoly. A pamphlet has been sent to us, containing letters addressed by Mr. Lawrence to the Hon. W. C. Rives, of Virginia, in favour of "protection to native industry," to which S. D. Bradford, Esq., a Free Trader, has had the temerity to reply; and so strong is the monopolist interest in that city, that only one of the newspapers could be prevailed upon to insert Mr. Bradford's letter. Mr. Lawrence's letters are couched in similar language to the monopolists' writings here—bold assertion and rhodomontade—which Mr. Bradford meets with facts and figures very perplexing to controvert:

"From the intimation given near the close of your first communication (says Mr. Bradford, in his first letter to Mr. Lawrence), I had made up my mind that your second would be devoted to break down, demolish, and overthrow the report of Mr. Walker, secretary of the Treasury; nor could I wonder that you should desire to do so. This public document had attracted universal attention, not only in America, but in Europe also, especially in England, where it had been hailed as the olive branch of peace, and had rendered almost acceptable to that proud nation the high and lofty pretensions of the President's message. It had been mentioned as a most extraordinary state paper by the governor of Massachusetts in his annual message. It had charged upon the protective system, as sustained by the tariff of 1842, the greatest injustice and inequality. It had attempted to show how it enriched the few at the expense of the many; how the highest rates of duty were paid upon the articles consumed principally by the poorer classes; how oppressive it was to our commerce and navigating interest; and unjust also towards the agriculturists and planters, in limiting their markets. Mr. Walker had estimated the sum of extra taxation imposed in this manner upon the country for the particular benefit of the manufacturers, as amounting to 54 millions of dollars per annum; being equal to double the amount of the revenue of the whole United States. These are high charges, and ought to be disproved, if they can be. I hope, however, that you will pardon my freedom of speech, and impute it only to my regard for the truth, when I assure you that I have been unable to find in your letter the refutation of any one of the charges above enumerated."

Mr. Lawrence doubtless found it much more difficult to "demolish and overthrow the report of Mr. Walker" than to indulge in confident assertions, that even if Great Britain abolished her corn and provision laws, exports from America of these articles would not increase—just as our monopolists tell us that if we abolish our Corn Laws, our exports of manufactures will not increase.

Mr. Lawrence was at one time one of the largest importers of foreign manufactures in Boston. He was then a Free Trader, and a leading member of the committee appointed at the celebrated Faunceuil Hall meeting, in 1820, "to consider what measures are proper to be pursued in order to avert the calamity which must eventually flow from the passage of the tariff bill, referred to the ensuing session of Congress." He then considered, in the language of the resolutions prepared by this committee, that "the proposed high tariff and the principles on which it is avowedly founded, would have a tendency to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people." He further considered, in another resolution, "that the obvious consequence of the adoption of the tariffs would be, that the farmer must give more than he now does for all he buys, and receive less for all he sells." But Mr. Lawrence has since tasted the sweets of monopoly; he has accumulated enormous wealth by the law which obliges his countrymen to pay him a higher price for his manufactures than they could buy them at if the monopoly were abolished; and now he has the effrontery to tell them, in effect, that if the farmer were by the abolition of high bounties on domestic manufactures to give less than he now does for all he buys, and receive more for all he sells, the country would be involved in a flood of ruin fearful to contemplate. But Mr. Lawrence shall speak for himself. Referring to Mr. Walker's proposed new tariff, he says:

"The question then arises, what will be our condition after the proposed plan of low duties goes into operation? In 20 days after the bill becomes a law, it will have reached every country in Europe with which we have trade; the manufacturing market; the merchandise is shipped on account of foreigners, in many cases with double invoices, one set for the custom house, and another for the sales, so that, instead of the duty amounting to 20 per cent., it will not probably exceed 15 per cent. This has been the experience of the American importers in New York, who, previous to the passing of the tariff of 1842, had (most of them) abandoned the business, not being able to compete successfully with fraudulent foreigners. I will not say that all foreigners commit frauds on the revenue,—far from it; but I do say that enormous frauds have been perpetrated by foreigners, on the revenue, under ad valorem duties, and will be again—prostrating the business of honest foreign and American importers. In less than twelve months after the new plan shall have been in operation, this whole country will be literally surfeited with foreign merchandise (if it be not so, the revenue will fall short of the wants of the Government); we shall then owe a debt abroad of millions of dollars, which must be paid in coin. The exchanges go up to a point that makes it profitable to ship specie; money becomes scarce in the Atlantic cities, yet bills on England and France do not fall; the loans made to the south and west are called in; demands for debts due from those sections of country are made; exchange cannot be obtained; produce is purchased and shipped; and when it arrives at the north, it will not command the cost in the west; a paralysis will have struck the business of the country; produce will no longer answer to pay debts due at the north, and the next resort is to coin, which is to be collected and sent down the Mississippi, or over the mountains to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Western and southern credits are cut off, as the people of those sections can no longer promptly meet their engagements. The new states, and the outer circle of the republic, are the weak points; and the first giving way of the banks is heard from those points where there is the least amount of capital. We see the storm approaching like a thunder shower in a summer's day; we watch its progress, but cannot escape its fall. It at last reaches the great marts of trade and the exchanges, having swept everything in its course; and the banks of the Atlantic cities, after a violent effort to maintain their credit and honour, are forced to yield to this Utopian experiment on the currency. I have no hesitation in stating that all this will take place within the space of eighteen months from the time this experimental bill goes into operation; and not a specie paying bank doing business, will be found in the United States. Where will be the revenue which was to produce such a mighty sum under low duties? Where is the treasury and the secretary? and the President and his Cabinet? The treasury is empty; the secretary is making his estimates of income for 1849, and preparing to ask Congress for a large batch of treasury notes; or, perhaps, the deficit is so large that a loan may be required."

Such is the catalogue of evils which Mr. Lawrence predicts will befall his country, if he and other manufacturers are deprived of the privilege of plundering it to the tune (according to Mr. Walker's estimate) of fifty-four millions of dollars per annum. But we are much mistaken if Brother Jonathan will be scared from doing himself justice by empty alarms of the consequences, especially when he looks to this side the Atlantic, and finds that every proposed relaxation of our monopoly system from the alteration of our navigation laws to the abolition of the wool-tax last year, has been attended with monopolist prognostications of ruin to the country. And although it is proved beyond controversy that every relaxation of our protective system hitherto adopted has been attended with benefits far exceeding the most sanguine expectations, the monopolist cry of disaster and calamity from any further approximation to Free Trade is as vehemently repeated as ever. The fearful consequences predicted from the repeal of our Corn Laws and the abolition of all other monopolies are, that we shall lose our colonies; that the land will cease to be cultivated; that wages will fall; that the country will be drained of all its specie, because foreigners will not sell corn, except for gold; that the revenue will fall off, and the interest on the national debt will no longer be paid; that our venerable constitution will be endangered, the church destroyed, and eventually the monarchy overthrown. Free Traders are not frightened; they only laugh at such raw-head-and-bloody-bone attempts to terrify the simple. Their short and simple answer to such monopolist alarmists is, "Keep your hands out of our pockets, and we will take the risk of being ruined by it."

There is no charge the injustice of which the monopolists here complain more than that of selfishness. They protest that they desire to see protection extended to all. Mr. Lawrence is equally generous:

"I have never (says he) advocated a protective tariff for my own or the New England States exclusively, nor have those gentlemen with whom I have been associated in this cause, at any time, entertained a narrow or sectional view of the question. We have believed it to be for the interest of the whole country, that its labour should be protected, and so far as I have had to do with the adjustment of those difficult combinations embraced in a tariff bill, I have endeavoured to take care that the interests of all the states were protected, whether they were large or small. I say now to you, and it should be said in congress, and to the country, that Massachusetts asks no exclusive legislation. If Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio, the three great states, with Kentucky, Georgia, Missouri, Alabama, and Louisiana, wish to try an experiment on iron, coal, hemp, cotton bagging, sugar, &c. &c., I am ready as one citizen of Massachusetts to meet it, and await in patient submission the result, which I doubt not will be found, within 18 months, in the realisation of all I have predicted. I say again, I would not, if I could, have a tariff made for Massachusetts alone."

Generous Mr. Lawrence! You kindly offer your aid to such individuals, in other states than your own, as are desirous of plundering the community after the fashion of the cotton and woollen manufacturers, by obtaining for them like monopolies in iron, coal, hemp, cotton bagging, sugar &c. Is this what you call protection to all? What protection do you propose to give the growers of cotton, tobacco, rice, corn, beef, pork, and timber, the staple articles of your country? You know you can give them no protection. Your own generosity then, after all, is a mere pretence; all you want is protection to a few manufacturers, a mere fraction of the people. The offer of protection to all is a delusive cheat, and will by-and-by be as well understood in America (where the tariff has been already altered thirty times since 1789) as in England.

Our limits will not allow us to give further extracts from the letters of Mr. Lawrence, or those of Mr. Bradford. In fact, they are chiefly interesting to the community to whom they were addressed. There is so much similarity in the style and in the arguments adduced in support of protection, that if the words, corn, butter, beef, and bacon, were substituted for cottons, woollens, and hardwares, and vice versa, they would suit either side of the Atlantic. We have, however, been gratified to see the specious and reckless assertions of the American manufacturing monopolists so ably and satisfactorily met by the facts and figures put forth by Mr. Bradford, and which cannot fail to impress the minds of dispassionate readers. Whilst Mr. Lawrence was hugging himself with the assurance that his monopoly was secure, because there was no prospect of England repealing her Corn Laws, Mr. Bradford was predicting that the triumph of the League was at hand. Says he:

"Free Trade has already obtained the total repeal of the duty on raw cotton. The next steamer may bring us the news of the total repeal of the duty on bread stuffs; and who can doubt that ere long there will be a total repeal of the provision laws?"

By a singular accident, the steamer arrived with Sir R. Peel's speech the very day the letter was published, by which the prediction was fulfilled, to the no small dismay of the monopolists.

We cannot withhold the concluding paragraph of Mr. Bradford's letter, in which all Free Traders will sympathise:

"Do what you will, you cannot destroy Free Trade, nor retard its progress much longer. Its course is 'upward and onward.' It is being adopted by the nation which General Cass informs us 'possesses already one-seventh of the whole earth, and whose Government rules over one-eighth of all the inhabitants of the globe.' It has recently overthrown the strongest, and in my opinion the best Ministry, which has existed in England for a long time, because they hesitated to repeal the Corn Laws. It will overthrow the next probably, unless they will agree to remove the restrictions on provisions, and also on tea, coffee, and sugar. It is destined to change the fiscal regulations of the whole world. The opinion is becoming almost universal that when Great Britain shall adopt a scale of duties founded on a true revenue principle, the tariffs of all other nations will soon fall before it. It does not ask whether the industrious but suffering operative dwells in the mountains of Switzerland or upon the steppes of Russia. Its philanthropy is expansive. It embraces the whole world. It assists the deserving, and relieves the wants of the suffering, wherever they may be found. It is the herald of peace and civilisation. Free Trade may be compared to an Alpine plant. It is healthy and hardy, and survives the convulsions of the severest tempests, for it depends on itself alone for support. Protection is a hot-house plant, always kept alive at a great expense, often sickly, and requiring constant attention. What wise legislator would hesitate to which he should give the preference?"

CANADA.

The following address has been forwarded to us by the Free Trade Association in Canada; and we insert it with much pleasure as manifesting the existence of a movement in that quarter which cannot fail, if perseveringly pushed forward, to issue in conferring on our colonial brethren the inestimable advantages of unrestricted commerce:

ADDRESS OF THE FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION, TO THE INHABITANTS OF CANADA.

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN,

A crisis has arrived in the commercial affairs of this colony which demands the best energies, the devoted attention of all concerned in the welfare of its various rising interests.

That crisis has arisen from the new commercial policy of the mother country—a policy which strikes at the root of protection in every shape, exposing at once this colony and the mother country to the severest effects of unrestricted competition. To raise objections to this policy would not only be idle, but inconsistent with the objects of this Association.

Believing, as we do, that the principle of Free Trade, applied generally to the commerce of a country, is sound, and the wisest, under all circumstances, for a nation to adopt in order to secure the prosperity of all classes; believing also, (since the mother country is depriving us of the favour we have hitherto enjoyed in her markets,) that the prosperity of Canada can only be maintained by its trade being rendered free, allowing industry and capital to seek out their natural distribution and employment; but apprehensive at the same time that our legislature is not yet prepared to give effect by law to these liberal views, we have deemed it prudent and expedient to form ourselves into an Association for the purpose of collecting in one body all who agree in opinion with us. By this means we shall extend our influence, consolidate our views and interests, attain unity of purpose and action, and thereby place ourselves in a position to secure the ascendancy of our principles in the commercial laws of the province.

United on the basis of Free Trade, we shall respectfully but firmly demand, in the first place, the removal of all imperial acts imposing discriminating or regulating duties; in the second place, the repeal of all duties, imperial and local, levied on American wheat, provisions, or corn of any kind whatsoever; and lastly, we pledge ourselves to resist by every lawful means, the future enactment of any protective, prohibitive, or merely regulating duties—believing such to be detrimental to the general interests of society, and at variance with sound policy.

We further avow that we entertain the opinion that duties should be levied solely for the purpose of creating revenue to provide for the necessities of Government, and the extension of internal improvements; and that, for these objects, such articles only should be selected for duty as will afford it without restricting or fettering the general commerce—the carrying trade—or the agricultural industry of the country.

Declaring these to be our guiding principles and opinions, we now earnestly invite men of all classes throughout the province, to combine and co-operate with us to give them practical effect, by carrying them through the legislature. We call upon our fellow-citizens to enrol their names upon our books, and our fellow-subjects at a distance to form branches, in connection with this central Association.

The commerce and industry of this colony, as yet in their infancy, and hitherto nourished under an unsound system of protective stimulants, will soon be left to seek out their natural channels; and fortunate will it be for our common welfare, if, by our united efforts, we now succeed in planting the principle of Free Trade in our commercial system. Then,—but not till then,—may we hope to make the Saint Lawrence the highway for the rich products of the teeming west—to develop the vast resources of this rising colony—and to secure for her people the highest possible share of prosperity and happiness.

We shall now address a few words to the Canadian agriculturist, to satisfy him that he has nothing to fear from Free Trade; but that, on the contrary, he will derive advantage from it in common with every other member of the community. We are aware the opinion prevails that protective duties enhance prices, and we shall consequently take some pains to remove this fallacy.

All writers of eminence on the subject of political economy; all close and earnest observers of the course of trade, agree in opinion that where a country is in the habit of exporting any surplus produce, the price in the market she mainly depends on, as her customer, regulates the value of the whole to the producer. Canada is in that position. She has for many years past been an exporter of agricultural produce, partly her own growth, and partly naturalised American; and the course of prices has ever been regulated by the value in the markets to which such surplus was sent. To prove this to the satisfaction of all reasonable men, it will only be necessary, we think, to review prices here for the last six years. We adopt this term as most likely to carry conviction to the minds of agriculturists, because it enables us to compare prices during two periods of directly opposite character. During the first period, American wheat was admitted duty free; during the latter it was subject to a duty of 3s. sterling per quarter. Let us now compare the average price of flour in the said years in the Montreal market; taking flour as our criterion, not as being better adapted to our purpose, but because the market prices are better fixed and more readily got at. We shall place these prices in parallel columns, that the principle we are contending for may be obvious at a glance, viz; that, to the Canadian agriculturist, prices are not enhanced by protective duties, but depend on the market to which his produce is sent:

Thus, when American wheat was admitted into Canada free, prices were as follows, i. e. the average of the year:		American Wheat subject to a duty of 3s. sterling per quarter:
Average of the year:		Average prices of the year:
1840	26s 10d	1843	25s 7d
1841	23s 5d	1844	25s 3d
1842	30s 0d	1845	27s 2d
Average of 3 years, 28s 5d		Average of 3 years, 26s

Who now will contend, with these facts before him, that prices are enhanced by protective duties, or that such duties favour in the slightest degree the prosperity of the Canadian farmer? We call upon him, therefore, to unite with us to rid the country of such fettering duties, which plainly have no effect but that of crippling its industry, and restricting its commerce. Let him also bear in mind, that our plan, if fully carried out, will cheapen every commodity which he requires for his daily use; for, by removing all discriminating and regulating duties, we shall enable him and every other consumer, to obtain his sugar and his tea, his wearing apparel and his luxuries, wherever he can procure them cheapest.

We now proceed, in the development of our plan, to show the incalculable advantages that will result to Canadian commerce and the carrying trade, by removing all duties and restrictions from American produce.

First, we shall show the amount of produce collected annually on the shores of our great inland waters, and brought to this city for distribution to the various markets of consumption; next, the vast quantity that passes through the Erie Canal, seeking a market at New York, and other American ports; and lastly, we shall show that it is in the power of Canada to divert a large share of this latter trade through her own waters, if her people and legislature will promptly give effect to the liberal and enlarged policy which it is the object of this Association to advocate and urge:

No. 1.—Table showing the quantity of Produce brought by the St. Lawrence to the City of Montreal in the year 1845.

Pork.	Beef.	Lard.	Flour.	Wheat.	Other Grain.	Ashes.	Butter.
Brls.	Brls.	Kegs.	Brls.	Bush.	Bush.	Brls.	Kegs.
6109	723	461	590,305	450,209	40781	33,000	8112

No. 2.—Table showing the quantity of Produce carried through the Erie Canal in the year 1845.

Pork.	Beef.	Lard.	Flour.	Wheat.	Corn.	Flax-seed.	Ashes.
Brls.	Brls.	Lbs.	Brls.	Bush.	Bush.	Lbs.	Brls.
63646	7699	3064800	2517250	1620033	35803	8303960	80646

From the foregoing tables, it will be seen that the quantity carried through the latter channel is enormous, as compared with the former. It becomes then a question of vital importance, whether a portion of this trade can be attracted through the St. Lawrence. We believe that it can, because the cheapest conveyance to the sea-board and to the manufacturing districts of New England must win the prize; and who will deny that the securing of this prize is not worth our best and united exertions?

The cheapening of the means of transit is the great object to be attained; and our best practical authorities are firmly of opinion that the Saint Lawrence will be made the cheapest route as soon as our chain of inland improvements is rendered complete. They affirm that the cost of transporting a barrel of flour, from Detroit to Montreal, will not exceed 1s. 6d. to 1s. 9d. The difficulty will then be to secure a port of constant access to the sea; and that difficulty will be overcome by the early completion of the projected Portland railway; a road that will place us within a day's journey of that city, the harbour of which may be made the safest and cheapest on the Continent of America. By that route, we shall avoid the occasional dangers and inconveniences of the St. Lawrence from Montreal outwards, practically secure a longer season for trade in the fall of the year, and safely reckon on freights to Liverpool as low as those from New York. But what is equally important to the transit trade to England, is this: that by rendering our charges cheaper than those through the Erie Canal to Boston, we shall secure the transit trade to that great city, and all other Eastern markets, as well as the supplying of our sister colonies, commonly known as the lower ports. This picture may appear too colonies offer the only safe asylum for our increasing surplus population.

It may be in vain that we prove that not only is our colonial trade comparatively small of itself, but that it does not progress in the same proportion as that to foreign countries. Where we are without the benefit of protection, it may be in vain that we show, from the best authority, that even our shipowners are far more indebted to the foreign than to the colonial trade for the employment of their craft;—it may be in vain that we prove that for every mechanic who finds employment in supplying the colonies with the manufactures of this country, at least four earn their bread by working for independent foreign markets;—and it may be of little use that we should produce evidence, which cannot be doubted, that even a majority of the emigrants who have left their native country in search of another home, have found it not in the colonies, but in foreign states. All this, we know, may be useless and in vain, as far as these inveterate monopolists themselves are concerned, whose main object is to secure the continuance of a system of restriction, on which they ignorantly believe their own immediate interests to be dependent. Fortunately, however, there is a large and enlightened public, who are now, above all things, anxious to form a correct opinion on these subjects, based upon unquestionable facts.

As might be expected, the parties who are now taking these active measures to raise in the public mind a prejudice against any further reduction of the timber duties, dwell entirely, or mainly, on the importance of the Canada market. We would not, for a moment, wish to depreciate either the importance or the value of our North American colonies. We seek for the real colonists—that is, the people who actually live in the colonies, dependent on their own industry—every privilege which we seek for ourselves at home. We altogether deny our right, or the policy, of taxing them indirectly, by imposing protecting duties upon our manufactures entering their territory for consumption. If they can obtain their clothing or their luxuries cheaper or better from another market, we contend they are entitled to do so. But what say these soi-disant friends to the colonies here? The overture they make amounts to a kind of compromise of the real interests of the consumers at home and in the colonies, in order that thus a small class shall be benefited. They virtually propose that the great mass of the community in Canada shall be taxed in the form of dear clothing, and that the large mass of consumers at home shall be taxed in the form of dear timber and dear food, in order that the comparatively small class engaged in the timber trade from Canada, and in the export trade to Canada, shall advance their own interests. These men, mostly residing at home, who call themselves the colonial interest, have objects and motives as wide apart from the real advantage of the large mass of the people in the colonies, as it is now generally admitted the labouring population at home have in the objects for which landlords have struggled to maintain dear bread. Too great a distinction cannot be made between individuals interested in colonial monopolies, of whom a large majority have never so much as set foot in any of our colonial territory, and the great mass of the population of the colonies.

As we have said, the main argument on which the defenders of the timber monopoly rely is, that at present our chief dependence for the export of our manufactures is on the colonies generally, and on Canada in particular; that "when Canada is lost to England, we shall have to pay for our timber in gold, instead of in manufactures, as at present." It is needless for us to stop to inquire how gold would be procured for such a purpose, were the emergency to arise; it is needless to dwell upon the obvious fact that if we possess gold, it can only be obtained from other countries in exchange for the articles actually produced by British labour; it will be sufficient that we should now inquire what ground there is for such an allegation. If it appeared that our main exports really found a market in the colonies, and if those foreign countries, whose produce we have either excluded or materially restricted by high duties, took few or none of our goods, it would not be a matter of surprise. But what are the facts? What, upon investigation, do we find to be the truth? Let us take the case of the timber trade by itself, and the trade with those countries from which we import that important article. The countries from which we derive our foreign timber are Germany, Russia, Sweden, and Norway. From these countries in 1844 we imported, of all kinds of timber, 536,737 loads, while from Canada we imported 928,650 loads; being, both of foreign and colonial timber, the largest quantity which, up to that period, had ever been imported in any single year. For several years the importation and consumption of timber have considerably increased, but more especially since the reduction of the duties in 1842. According to the theory propounded by the timber monopolists, the public would be led to believe that every load of timber imported from the Continent has been paid for in gold, while Canada mainly sustains the industry of Manchester, Birmingham, and Sheffield. But what do we find to be the facts when we turn to the Parliamentary accounts? In 1843, the last year for which such subdivision of the exports is published, it appears that out of 52,279,709*l.*, the entire amount of our exports, the British North American colonies represent a sum of 1,751,211*l.*, or little more than three per cent. of the whole. Turning to these Continental countries from which we import foreign timber, we find that in the same year our exports amounted to each as follows:

Russia	£1,895,519
Sweden	131,302
Norway	151,377
Germany, including Prussia ..	6,651,042
Total	£8,829,240

So that the colonies on which our manufacturers and artisans must chiefly rely for a market for their products, and for the benefit of which we are called upon to maintain one of the most injurious monopolies, took, in 1843, goods to the amount of 1,751,211*l.*, while those countries of which it is said they will only take "gold" for their timber, were customers for manufactures to no less an amount than 8,829,240*l.* But if we inquire into the progress which these respective markets have made in consuming our manufactures, in proportion as the importation of timber has increased, the rash assertions made by the advocates of dear timber are shown to be even more groundless. If we compare our exports to the protected timber colony, and to the restricted timber countries on the Continent, in 1833, with the same in 1843, we shall see to which we have been most indebted for that increase of trade on which our growing population have relied for employment. Referring to Parliamentary accounts, we find that in 1833 our exports to the British North American colonies amounted to 4,092,550*l.*, and to the foreign timber countries as follows:

Russia	£1,531,002
Sweden	39,449
Norway	55,038
Germany, including Prussia ..	4,499,727
Total	6,145,316

The two periods will therefore present the following comparison:

	1833.	1843.
Exports to the protected timber colonies	£2,092,550	1,751,211
Exports to the restricted foreign timber countries	6,145,316	8,829,240

We thus arrive at two most important facts in the question. The protected timber colonies now consume less than one-fifth of the quantity of British manufactures which find a market in those countries whose better timber it is sought to exclude by high protective duties; and, moreover, while the colonial market has, notwithstanding the protection it has enjoyed, actually fallen off in the last ten years by 341,339*l.*, the Continental timber countries have increased the consumption of our goods by 2,083,924*l.*

This is a fair sample of the truth of the assertions made in support of the vicious system contended for by the class of men who are now inundating the country with their "printed papers and circulars," in the vain hope of stemming the course of a wise and just policy, which consults not the private and selfish interests of a class, but which has for its object the true and lasting benefit of the whole community. We shall have abundance of opportunities, as this discussion proceeds, to show that not less groundless and fallacious are the other arguments upon which these monopolists rely.

THE "LORDS" AGAIN.

(From the Universe.)

An impression to some extent prevails that the measure of commercial reform which has been so triumphantly advocated in the House of Commons will be just as triumphantly thrown out in the House of Peers; that while the people and the representatives of the people acknowledge its commanding character, or bow to its imperious necessity, our hereditary legislators, on whom the spirit of divination descended at their birth, will eject it with little ceremony and less argument.

We cannot, however, yield to an opinion so injurious to men whose functions and whose faculties we estimate so highly. We cannot suppose them wanting in all knowledge of the history of the past, or all foresight for the future. We cannot imagine that the only lever which can move them is that very common, every-day uncanonical quality called selfishness. Heaven, in making them the lords of its creation, doubtless intended them to be the representatives of its benevolence. The prudence that has descended to them from an ennobled ancestry through many generations must still vindicate its prerogative of acting and judging rightly. Of course they feel the need of the country with considerable acuteness. With their far-spread and far-peopled possessions, living amidst the many-coloured miseries of an impoverished tenantry, and the difficulties of a raised rental, how can it be otherwise? They will not therefore deprive themselves of the privilege and the pleasure of co-operating in the promotion of a plan, large and liberal, like their own minds, and which is designed to secure to the public that permanent relief which they are professedly so solicitous to confer.

Besides, they must feel that the interest of their order is staked, in some degree, upon their fair and frank dealing, and for that order they have a very religious veneration. Should they fall in this trial of principle, their sin terminates not with themselves—it is imputed to their caste. It extends to their progeny, to the third and fourth generation of lordlings. They know and they weep over the solemn truth, that a new and mighty power has sprung up in the country, a power whose supremacy needs only be named to be dreaded by peer and by plebeian. The aristocracy of wealth seems likely to outbid, if not outweigh, the aristocracy of rank. Its rise, its progress, its history,—its wide-spread ramifications, its tremendous strength, may well alarm the most blinded votary of hoary old. The monied men of the kingdom—from their immense and ever available resources—have acquired an influence, which, in this business-like and bad world, the descendants of kings envy. They possess the idol before which the pride of station bends, and breathes not. They are the priests of that divinity in whom mortgaged landowners believe and tremble,—while their intimate acquaintance with the realities of this sober life—with the honesties or the trickeries of trade—has given them all the advantage they can need over those whom inclination or habit has too long and too perilously estranged from the mass of the people. These knights of the long purse have been wise in time. They have thrown themselves into the conflict of commercial freedom; not as borne along by the tide of circumstances; not as compelled by the terrors of a crisis; but actually as leaders and champions,—now, martyrs in this cause,—now, victors in the fight of humanity. They have thus—to use the old expression—covered themselves with a glory which, whether it belongs to them or not, serves their purpose well. Protection and honour are beneath it. While the very necessities of argument place their opponents in a position, as invidious in its distinctions as dangerous in its results: making them, in appearance at least, the enemies of those whom their very privileges bind them to succour: obstructors to human freedom—monopolists of the people's food. This is a character in which we imagine few would be ambitious to shine. And we hope their lordships will take timely care that none can ascribe to a sordid source either their movements or their motives. They cannot, it is true, be the originators of a scheme which has already found so many advocates, and whose leading principles have so long and so largely impregnated the mind of the country. But why should they not stand forth—if only in self-defence—as immediate abolitionists of a law that has been already doomed? They might thus secure a fund of gratitude in the breast of the people, on which—without the fear of their bills being dishonoured—they might safely draw in the great conflict—which many of them foresee—at least in those vicissitudes from which none of them is exempt.

REV. THOS. SPENCER IN AMERICA.

(From the New York Mercury.)

THE PEOPLE'S RIGHTS.

The Rev. Mr. Spencer, a clergyman of the Established Church in England, delivered a lecture here some months ago on the Corn Laws, and another on temperance. He has laboured arduously in his own country to remove the burdens which are imposed on the people, and has done much to diffuse correct opinions. He has written a large number of tracts, which have been widely circulated. Among the rest, is one entitled "The People's Rights, and how to get them." The directions under the last part are of the most loyal and Christian character. They are, "by deserving them;" they must use none but moral means; they must not be ambitious of law-making; they must display a deep sense of public justice, &c.

The extracts which we print below, stand under the first head, viz. "the people's rights." They are the reasonings of a strong and independent mind, which loves truth better than every thing else, and falters not though that love carries him to the bottom of a well. The thoughts require thinking to understand them, though very clearly expressed. We hope the multitudes who by endowments and combinations and legislative interference seek to do good, will see how their measures tend only to an early decrepitude in our country, and to embarrass the next generation with the great labour of undoing the bad deeds of their fathers. It is an idea worth thinking of, that the world belongs to the living generation, unembarrassed, as far as possible, by the actions of the dead.

1. The right to earn a living with the fewest possible impediments. The rights of industry are the most important of all rights, and an honest man will claim no other assistance than that which he can acquire by his own labour. Cobbett, in his "Advice to Young Men," says—"Start, I beseech, with this conviction firmly fixed in your mind, that being of hale body and sound mind, you have no right to any earthly existence without doing work of some sort or other; unless you have ample fortune whereon to live clear of debt; and that even then you have no right to breed children, to be kept by others, or to be exposed to the chance of being so kept. To wish to live on the labour of others is, besides the folly of it, to contemplate a fraud, at the least; and under certain circumstances, to meditate oppression and robbery. Write it on your own heart, that you will depend solely on your own merit and your own exertions." And of himself he says—"A father like ours, it will be readily supposed, did not suffer us to eat the bread of idleness. I do not remember the time when I did not earn my own living." And when he became a Member of Parliament he ascribed all his success in life to his early habits of industry. Labour and toil are, however, by no means pleasant to men in general. There are always indolent men amongst the rich who will desire to live on State pensions; and idle men amongst the poor who will try to obtain parish pay; but the Divine command applies to all without exception—"Six days shalt thou labour, and do all that thou hast to do." Before a man complains, therefore, of the infringements of the rights which society owes to him, let him take care to respect this right which he owes to them, that he will not be burdensome to them, but will support himself and family by his industry. He is an enemy to mankind who would claim for one part of the community a right to subsist upon the labour or property of another part: this will, in the long run, inevitably impoverish those who are compelled to pay, and degrade those who receive. All experience shows the truth of the assertion made by Lord Brougham in the House of Lords, that "Every permanent fund set apart for the support of the poor, from whomsoever proceeding, and by whomsoever administered, must needs multiply the evils it is intended to remedy."

On the other hand, he who labours has a right to demand from society that there shall be the fewest possible impediments in the way of obtaining his own living. There are natural impediments which are unavoidable, and which exercise a salutary discipline over the human race, calling forth contrivance and forethought, and promoting the vigour of body and mind. The field must be cultivated before the bread can be eaten; water must be got out of wells, metals out of mines. Long continued rain perplexes the farmer; the tempest scatters the ships of the merchant; and every man must exercise his faculties to foresee and provide against the calamities that may befall him. But whoever adds to these difficulties adds to the primal curse; and if he make those difficulties so great as to render it scarcely possible for a man to live by his labour, he takes from that curse the merciful promise that was included in it—"In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread." Legislators have ever been interfering with the rights of industry. Whatever ties a man to a particular place, or limits the number of men engaged in any trade or employment; whatever confers any monopoly or peculiar privilege on some at the expense of the rest;—whatever checks invention, meddles with machinery, or dictates the rate of wages;—whatever prevents a man from taking his labour or goods to the best market, or prevents his getting the largest amount of the necessities of life in return for his labour or goods, from any quarter of the globe;—whatever makes commerce less free than the winds which blow over all lands, or than the ocean which washes every shore, places unnecessary obstacles in the way of getting a living.

TORRINGTON.—CHARITY OF THE LEAGUE.—We are happy to record the munificence of the Anti-Corn-Law League to the agricultural labourers of this place and the neighbouring parishes. On Monday last, Mr. G. Toms, of this town, "the poor man's friend," received a great quantity of beds and bedding from the League, for his disposal to the bedless of the town and neighbourhood, of which unfortunate sufferers there are too many. The beds and bedding are of excellent quality, and such as would be no disgrace in a respectable tradesman's bedroom. Nothing could be more acceptable at a crisis like the present, when the temper charities are at stake, and are likely to become a non-entity. Many poor families, who have had only a pallet of straw to rest on, will now, by the League's compassion, have the pleasure of resting their bodies on a comfortable bed; and, no doubt, will every night repeat their thanks to the League for the comforts they are put in possession of. This noble present has been obtained from the League for the poor through the agency and compassionate inquiries of Mr. Geo. Toms, who has searched into and represented the distressed state of the agricultural labourers of the neighbourhood, and to whom there is much praise and merit due. Would it not be equally meritorious of the gentry of the neighbourhood now to raise a fund, and make a similar present to those who still remain bedless? Deronsire Chronicle.

THE REVENUE.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

The usual returns of the revenue for the year and quarter ending the 5th inst., have been laid before the public. The returns for the year exhibit, on the whole, a favourable result; but those for the quarter are marked by the results of the stagnation of business that has prevailed during a considerable portion of the last three months, especially in those branches of trade likely to be affected by the proposed changes in the tariff. The general result may be summed up in a statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to some questions put by Colonel Sibthorp, in the House of Commons on Monday evening:

"That last year, when he made known the financial arrangements for the year, he stated that he anticipated a surplus of 50,000,000, on the account of the year, exclusive of the sum to be derived from China, and now he found that when he should make his financial exposition of the actual surplus revenue, he should have to state that instead of 50,000,000, it amounted to one million and three-quarters, exclusive of the money from China."

Such being the facts, we saw with no little surprise in the Standard of Monday, an article on this subject, containing the most absurd and extravagant misstatements that have ever come under our notice, even upon this most fertile source of blundering and misrepresentation. The Standard, after giving the figures of the return, says:

"It may be well to compare the results of Sir Robert Peel's Free Trade policy, in a year, mark, said to be of extraordinary prosperity, with the right hon. baronet's anticipations as explained by him on the 14th of February, 1845:—I am now going to address myself to the prospects of the coming year—that year which will terminate on the 5th of April, 1846. The receipts from the Customs in this year (1845), on the 5th of April, rate at 22,500,000. * * * We are not inclined to take the estimate of Customs for the coming year at more than 22,000,000. * * * The Excise we feel ourselves warranted in estimating at 13,500,000. The stamp duties we propose to take at their present actual produce, 7,100,000. * * * On the 5th of April, 1846, therefore, we shall be entitled to make the total revenue, even if the income tax be discontinued, 51,000,000." Let us compare these anticipations with the actual results:

	Anticipated.	Realised.
Customs	22,500,000	17,664,618
Excise	13,500,000	11,886,085
Stamps	7,100,000	7,095,521
Total (minus income tax)	51,000,000	44,395,743

It would, therefore, appear, from this most sage and veracious chronicler of events, that the revenue from Customs and Excise has this year fallen short of Sir Robert Peel's anticipations by about six millions sterling.

One would have thought that the utter extravagance and absurdity of this result would have opened the eyes of the blindest dunce that ever bewildered his brains with financial statements. Unfortunately, however, the editor of the Standard is not only grossly ignorant on the subject of finance, but grossly dishonest on that as on all other subjects. He did not desire to ascertain the truth, or he would very soon have discovered the gross, and, in the conductor of a public newspaper, almost incredible, blunder into which he had fallen.

It is quite true that Sir Robert Peel, on the occasion to which the Standard refers, did estimate the produce of the Customs at 22,000,000, and the Excise at 13,500,000, provided the then existing duties were all maintained; but he proceeded to announce abolitions and reductions of taxes amounting to no less than 3,310,000, all of which have since been carried into effect; and Sir Robert diminished his anticipations of the probable produce of the revenue by the amount of the taxes which he proposed to repeal.

This, however, constitutes only a portion of the blunder into which the Standard has fallen. Of course, Sir R. Peel, in making his annual financial statements spoke of the Customs and Excise revenues of the United Kingdom, which the Standard has very ingeniously compared with the produce of the revenue for Great Britain! Every body who has even the slightest acquaintance with this subject knows that the usual quarterly returns do not include the produce of the revenue of Ireland; and, in the very paper with the article on which we are now commenting, those returns are given under their proper head of "An Abstract of the Net Produce of the Revenue of Great Britain," &c., &c.; so that the ignorance, or the dishonesty, or the mixture of both, which dictated this most extraordinary mass of blundering misrepresentation, is perfectly inexcusable.

But, notwithstanding the flagrant nature of the Standard's misstatements,—although all London must have been ringing with laughter on Monday afternoon at the expense of the conductors of that journal,—we find the kindred Morning Herald falling into errors of the same kind yesterday morning. It gives a pretended statement of the produce of the Excise, from the year 1822 to 1846, in which the three last years stand thus—

	£
1844	14,469,336
1845	12,160,111
1846!!!	12,177,112

On these figures, the Herald makes the following remarks:

"Now, be it remembered, that in 1845, the Premier's reduction of duty levied upon excisable articles was estimated by himself, and he certainly could have had no object in underrating the amount, at something under a million sterling. Calling this reduction, then, 1,000,000, we find that since 1844 there has been a decrease in the consumption of those articles which contribute to the comfort of the people of about 2,300,000."

Where the Herald got the produce of the Excise for the year 1846, we are not informed; but it must have been from somebody who can see some months into futurity. Not laying any claim to the exercise of prophetic powers, we shall not enter upon any controversy on that point. With respect to the comparison of the years 1844 and 1845, however, we have a few words to say. In making this comparison, the Herald has fallen into the same blunder as the Standard, namely, that of comparing the produce of the entire revenue of the United Kingdom in the one year with that of Great Britain in the other. But this is not the only error. The Herald, like the Standard, cannot make the simplest statement without committing a brace of blunders. The net revenue of Excise, in 1844, was not 14,469,336, but 13,308,050, whilst the net revenue, in 1845, was 13,585,582, showing an increase of about 280,000, instead of a decrease of 2,000,000.

We should hardly have thought these egregious mistakes worthy of a serious notice, had we not seen the persevering efforts made to use them for the purpose of throwing discredit upon the Free Trade measures of Sir Robert Peel. As many such attempts will, no doubt, be made by the Herald and Standard, we have thought it right to show our readers how little reliance is to be placed upon any statements of fact which may be made by those journals.

DUNDEE—CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

(From the Dundee Advertiser.)

A meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was held on Tuesday, the 7th inst., for the purpose of considering the propriety of petitioning both Houses of Parliament regarding the necessity of immediately passing the ministerial Free Trade measures. The meeting was more numerous attended than usual, even though it was a market day; and there were present the most influential merchants, manufacturers, ship-owners, and flax-spinners in Dundee. Provost Brown, chairman of the Chamber, occupied the chair.

The CHAIRMAN said, he expected that before this time they would have been in possession of Free Trade; but here they were met again to complain of delay. Things were in a state of uncertainty, and not altogether to their wishes. It was to be apprehended that the prize within their grasp might for some time longer be withheld. He was not altogether without hope of getting it in a short time, provided the country did its duty. He believed Sir Robert Peel's intentions were honest, but he was powerfully opposed by the monopolist party; and on that account he required the ardent support of the country to enable him to carry his measures. The Dundee Chamber of Commerce had frequently declared itself in favour of Free Trade, and he hoped that they would agree to do everything in their power to carry it into effect.

Mr. EDWARD BAXTER regretted the delay which had taken place in passing the Corn and Customs' Bills through the House of Commons, which was operating injuriously to the agricultural and commercial interests. Since these bills had been proposed it appeared that the rents of land on leases in England and Scotland had risen very considerably, and the land also had increased in value. This fact showed that these bills would be beneficial to the landed interest; for they tended to stimulate improvements in the cultivation of the soil, to induce competition, and would increase the amount of farming products. It showed also that the interests of the agriculturist and manufacturer were the same, and intimately blended. The delay in the progress of these bills had already had a very injurious effect on commerce. On many articles in the Tariff, as butter, cheese, wool, and timber, the duties were greatly reduced, while on others—as maize, rice, cattle, &c.—the duties were to be entirely removed. No one would venture to import these important articles of commerce, until a greater certainty was obtained as to the final passing of these bills; and trade in them was at a stand. Mr. Baxter said he had received a private letter from London, expressing doubts if these bills would pass the House of Lords, and that a protectionist Government might even be attempted. He thought such would be very short-lived; but there was a great uncertainty as to the future progress of these measures, as indicated by the great difference in the price of free and bonded wheat, amounting to 5s. per quarter on Dantzic, and 6s. per quarter on Rostock. He then adverted to the loss which would fall on the importer of Indian corn, if he were required to pay the present heavy duties which he had given bond to do in case these bills should not become law; and, after stating the pleasant and nutritious qualities of this new article of food, which he had used in his family, concluded by moving the following resolution:

"That it appears, from the accounts received from various parts of the country, and which are confirmed by the experience of the members of this Chamber, that the protracted discussions on the Corn and Customs' Bills have produced a stagnation in the commerce of the country, and a suspension of the previous activity in manufactures, which, if it be not arrested, will be attended with the most injurious consequences to all classes of the community."

Mr. T. W. MILNE could not conceive it possible that the Premier's measures should not ultimately become the law of the land. They were founded on the broad principles of justice and equity. In fact, the trade of the country was suffering most severely from the delay which had already taken place. That was one reason why they should urge upon Parliament the necessity of immediately passing those measures in order to prevent the evils which would ensue from delay. He would, therefore, second the resolution. The resolution was put to the meeting, and carried by acclamation.

Mr. ALEXANDER LOW begged to propose the second resolution,—

"That this Chamber, while it expresses entire confidence in the ultimate triumph of the principles of Free Trade, is of opinion, from the present state of the country, that every legitimate means ought to be employed for the purpose of getting the Corn and Customs' Bills passed into law with the least possible delay; and, in accordance therewith, resolves that petitions to both Houses of Parliament be prepared; that the merchants of Dundee be recommended to sign them; and that they be forwarded for presentation—the one to the House of Commons, to the Right Honourable Sir R. Peel, and the other to the House of Lords, to the right hon. Lord Kinnaird."

The resolution which they had heard would recommend itself, and therefore it would not be thought necessary that he should say much in its support. The Chamber had often spoken its mind in favour of the principles of Free Trade. He agreed with them in what they had done on that, and nothing had occurred to make him change his opinion. They had witnessed the beneficial effects on the industry of the country by the partial removal of the restrictions which had been effected by Sir Robert Peel. This was a powerful argument in favour of Free Trade, and clearly showed the difference between truth and error. They should take every step in their power to give effect to principles which would be so beneficial in their results. The repeal of the Corn Laws would improve the condition of millions of their population. He did not think any party opposed to the principles of Free Trade would venture to carry on the Government of this country. If they did, the attempt would be a failure. The working classes had already felt, and were again beginning to feel, the effects of the want of Free Trade. Several branches of business were in a state of stagnation. Provisions were rapidly rising. The price of potatoes was double of what it was last year. There were many reasons to induce them to petition Parliament to pass these Free Trade measures. The population was increasing rapidly. Without Free Trade it would be impossible to supply the people with the necessities of life. There was no way of doing that but allowing them to exchange their labour for the bread of other countries. He had full confidence in the ultimate triumph of Free Trade principles. Should the House of Lords be so far left to themselves as to refuse their assent to them, they would find, at no very distant day, that they would have to agree to a larger measure than the people were now demanding. Should the British lion be roused, the nobles of the land would find that his ire would not be directed to a defence of a continuance of their monopoly. Holding these views, and considering the position which the Chamber held, he thought it their duty to do everything in their power to strengthen the hands of Sir Robert Peel, in order to enable him to carry his measures. He would, therefore, propose that the Chamber should give their assent to the resolutions.

Mr. THOMAS NEISH seconded the resolution proposed by Mr. Low. In doing so he felt confident it was unnecessary to say a word to ensure its unanimous approval. He had so often on former occasions addressed the Chamber on the subject of Free Trade, that he would not take up the valuable time of the meeting on the present occasion by pointing out to them how necessary it yet was to give every support to their power to Sir R. Peel for the immediate passing of his Corn and Customs Bill. Other towns were already up and doing; and Dundee should not be behind in so good a cause. Instead of attempting, however, to make a speech, he would, with the leave of the chairman, read a letter from London, dated Thursday last (hear, hear), which stated much better how matters stood than anything he could say, and would also show the meeting that, although there might be a screw loose, it was not the one many of them suspected. The letter stated that there were last week many suspicious as to the sincerity of the Premier with regard to the Corn Bill, and all kinds of whispers in circulation. He (the writer) had endeavoured to ascertain the truth; and although no admirer of Sir Robert Peel, he had every confidence that he would prove determined and upright. The Irish Coercion Bill was an ill timed interruption; but the Duke was to blame; "he had done it all," and having agreed reluctantly to the Free Trade measures, he was determined to have his own way in this matter, and have another trial of the rule of Toryism. It was very generally believed that mischief was brewing in the Upper House; and therefore every town and village in the empire should lose no time in showing every possible demonstration for the purpose of supporting Sir Robert Peel and his tariff. In again seconding the motion, he begged to observe that, as it was proposed to forward the petition for the House of Commons to Sir Robert Peel, it had just been suggested to him (Mr. Neish) that it would be better to send it direct to their own member, Mr. Duncan, with a request that he would communicate with the Premier on the subject. He thought that it might be as well to do so; and hoped that Mr. Low would agree to this alteration in the resolution.

Mr. Low had no objections to the alteration proposed by Mr. Neish. He thought that the petition should be signed by the members of the Chamber instead of being signed by the chairman only; and that the directors of the Chamber should send along with it, as had been done in Manchester and Liverpool, a list of the number of persons employed by those who adhibited their names to the petition, to the member whom they should select to present it.

Mr. EDWARD BAXTER agreed to Mr. Low's suggestion, regarding the petition being signed by the members instead of by the chairman. In the House of Lords the petition of any public body or corporation, however numerous or influential, signed by the president, was regarded as being merely the petition of a single individual.

The CHAIRMAN concurred in all that had been proposed in the resolutions, and agreed to what had been suggested by Mr. Neish regarding the petition being sent to Mr. Duncan. That gentleman had on all occasions done the town's business most cheerfully, and it would only be complimentary to intrust the petition to him at first, and to furnish him with the information alluded to; and, if he thought it proper, he could communicate with Sir Robert Peel regarding its presentation; and there was no doubt if it was transmitted to him in the manner suggested, that he and Sir Robert would arrange matters so as to bring it before the house with the best effect.

After some observations from Mr. Johnston, Mr. Neish, and others, it was agreed that the petition should be signed by the members of the Chamber and transmitted to Mr. Duncan, and that that gentleman should be requested to confer with Sir R. Peel as to its presentation.

Mr. NEISH said, there was another matter deeply affecting the interests of the Chamber, which he wished to direct their attention to, although it was not connected with the business on which they had been called. He hoped the Chairman would allow him to notice it. They were aware that Mr. Bell had been summoned out of the premises in which the present Post Office was kept. It had been proposed that the Office should be removed to a small shop in Reform-street having only one front. The present premises, although by no means equal to what the town was entitled to, or its trade required, had the convenience of two fronts. The premises to which the Post Office was to be removed, might be well enough adapted to a country village, but it was by no means what Dundee, having seventy thousand inhabitants, and the second commercial port in Scotland, required. He therefore thought that the Chamber should memorialise the Government upon the subject, without delay, and endeavour to get more suitable accommodation.

Mr. BALFOUR said that Sir R. Peel would give for answer, "Subscribe money among yourselves, and you shall have a commodious Post Office."

Mr. NEISH.—Three years ago Sir R. Peel would have refused to give anything like a repeal of the Corn Laws, but look what he is doing now (laughter). But whether successful or not, now was the time to try (cheers).

The CHAIRMAN said, he did not think it regular that the Chamber should enter into the discussion of other questions when the meeting had been called for a special purpose; but as the one brought before them was of great importance, he should submit it to the Directors, and call a meeting to consider it on an early day next week.

After giving a vote of thanks to the Chairman for his conduct in the chair, the meeting separated.

DISTRESS OF THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND.—Meetings on the subject of relief and employment continue in the northern and western counties. Some of the grand juries decline to act under the Public Works Act of the present session. The Clare grand jury, on Friday, agreed to a resolution to the effect that it would be inexpedient to take any expensive measures under that Act, as the regular presentment sessions are so near at hand, and as steps have already been taken to provide employment extensively in this district. Sir Lucius O'Brien, the lieutenant of the county, declared that "at this moment the people are starving, particularly in villages."

Nearly one hundred horses, and other property, belonging to various coachmakers running east of the metropolis, have, within the last few days, been taken in execution for arrears of duty to the Crown. At one sale the stock horses, previously valued at 7*l.* or 8*l.* each, realised between 11*l.* and 12*l.*, which is solely attributable to the scarcity of horses of that description required for working omnibuses.—Essex Standard.

IRISH DISTRESS.

DUBLIN, APRIL 11.—Such is the extent of misery and suffering already produced by the failure of the potato crop, that the Tory journals here have ceased their denials; but not until Conservative landlords, such as Sir Lucius O'Brien, Lieutenant of Clare, have cried shame at the heartlessness and baseness of the conduct pursued by those journals in denying the existence of scarcity or high prices, when, as Sir Lucius remarked, at the meeting of the Ennis Poor Law Union, the people are actually starving, and endeavouring to support existence on black and fetid potatoes! I request attention to the observation of the honourable baronet, who is an excellent resident landlord, and totally incapable of sacrificing truth and the safety of the people to factious objects or personal or selfish interests. It is to be feared that there are many Irish landlords not wholly exempt from such an accusation. I have collected the latest accounts from the country, and certainly they present an appalling picture of distress and suffering. A considerable number of the resident gentry are co-operating with zeal in the benevolent work of providing against famine and pestilence; but there are many others who appear utterly indifferent to the calls made upon them at this period of calamity.

The following details are abridged from the provincial journals received this day:

FAMINE IN BALLYLONGFORD AND THE PARISH GENERALLY.—At about nine o'clock on the morning of the 6th instant some hundreds of persons assembled and repaired to the residence of the parish priest, the Rev. D. McCarthy, from whom they demanded immediate relief, which, they said, could not be postponed many days, or if so, that necessity would oblige them to resort, first to him, by slaughtering his cattle. The reverend gentleman remonstrated with them on the impropriety of their proceedings, but promised to represent their awful situation to the proper authorities. They subsequently paid similar visits to Mr. Stephen C. Sandes, of Carrigafoyle House, and also to Mr. William Hickie, of Kileton house, J. P., who, I am informed, was not a little annoyed at seeing the "posse comitatus" approach, as he immediately commenced a preparation for a siege, abiding his well-known motto, "No surrender;" but on being informed of their purpose, he promised to come forward as liberally as any other gentleman in the neighbourhood, and to represent their wants to the Government, upon which they returned to their homes peaceably. I have only to add, that if something be not done, in the way of providing employment, and that immediately, for the numerous starving population of this place, Providence alone can tell what consequences will follow.—Ballylongford Correspondent of the Tralee Chronicle.

BRAY, APRIL 7.—This day, while the board of guardians were sitting at Loughlinstown, county of Dublin, about 40 able-bodied men came together from the town of Bray, and sat down opposite the gate of the poor house. Some of the guardians went to know what they wanted, when they replied they wanted either work or relief. The guardians agreed to admit one or two of them to the board-room, when it was explained to them that the guardians could not relieve them out of the house; but were ready to admit such of them as were destitute, and their families likewise. The guardians desired those two men to go to the rest of their party and tell them this, which they did; upon which they all went quietly away. It was stated to them that a meeting would take place in Bray on Thursday next, to apply to Government to relieve the poor of that district.

COUNTY OF CLARE.—ENNIS, APRIL 9.—Potatoes are now in our market sixpence a stone for the best quality, and, as there are not any offered that are not diseased, we may add to this price an additional penny for waste. Oaten meal is two shillings and threepence a stone—that is, at the rate of eighteen pounds a ton. Very great distress, indeed, prevails.

HEADFORD, APRIL 13.—The Galway Mercury of Saturday, says:—"In this district, as well as others, the progress of the potato blight is exceedingly rapid, especially within the last few months. At the last market the prices reached from 4d. to 5d. per stone, and this was paid for loads not entirely free from disease. Several families have been, for weeks back, endeavouring to sustain life on bad potatoes, and many more, not having even that, are indebted to their neighbours for the means of subsistence."

CORK.—The Cork Reporter of Saturday, says:—"The relief committee have, we rejoice to say, thrown off the Castle incubus, that weighed like a night-mare on their energies. To day there are six depots selling out Indian meal, which arrived by the Nimrod, on Thursday, at 8d. per 7lbs., 10s. 8d. per cwt., just 2d. per cwt. over the rate the Commissary charged for the six tons he gave the committee, for he fixed the price, not at 9s. 4d. per cwt. (a penny per lb.) as expected, but at 10s. 6d. per cwt. We pray the public to remark that that price, 10s. 8d., will cover, we understand, the cost of the Indian meal, bought this very week in Liverpool, after a considerable rise had taken place in its price, and after paying the freight and charges of bringing it per steamer, while the Government, for meal ground from corn bought months since at first market price, directly imported here, charge within a mere fraction of that 10s. 8d. Was there ever anything so monstrous? Yes, there is something more monstrous still—they refused to give it to a starving people, even at that exorbitant price. The committee, besides the Indian meal, are retailing whole meal to the people at 1½d. per lb., which will meet the fears of those who think that the Indian meal alone, however cooked, may not agree with the constitutions of our people. The following letter contains the Government ultimatum in respect to supplying, or rather denying, to the starving poor of our city any portion of the Indian meal stored by the authorities:

"Castle, Dublin, April 9, 1846.

"SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 5th inst., inquiring for the information of the relief committee of the city of Cork, whether it is the intention of Government to permit them the use of Indian meal from their depot at Cork, and am directed to state in reply, that depots for the issue of Indian corn meal are now forming in the country; but it is intended to reserve issues from these depots for the more heavy pressure during the summer months, when farm labour shall have ceased, until which time it is expected that landlords and relief committees will exert themselves to meet the existing distress. These are the views of Government. The country is sure of the provision which is now collecting for them; but all parties must co-operate to reserve it for the most trying period, when it can be simultaneously applied for the relief of the whole country. Premature issues would be wasting these resources.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"J. P. KENNEDY, Sec.

"Rev. Wm. O'Sullivan, R.C.C., Cork."

CARLISLE.—The Tipperary Free Press, in announcing that Lord Stanley has given 100l. towards the poor relief fund at Cashel says: "His lordship is in receipt, we believe, of about 20,000l. a year from his Irish property; and for the last ten years there has not been anything worth naming spent in Ireland."

TUAM.—Our accounts from various parts of the country are most discouraging. In some localities they have not even the seed, and in these districts best off not more than a fortnight's or three weeks' potatoes will remain after the seed. The price of potatoes in Headford market last Tuesday was, for lumpers 4½d., and good seed so high as 6d. This part of the country, which usually abounded in plenty of the best description of potatoes, has scarcely sufficient for seed. At Tuam market this day, they are selling at 5d. per stone.—Tuam Herald.

GALWAY.—The relief deputation appointed by the local relief committee waited on the Lord Lieutenant on Thursday, at the Castle, and acquainted his Excellency with the sad condition of the people, and the necessity of providing them immediately with food and employment. His Excellency promised immediate attention to the memorial, and caused all the officials of the Relief Commission, of the Commissariat, and of the Board of Works, to assist the deputation in their object. His Excellency urged the necessity of local subscriptions, and directed the deputation to sign the memorial, to have them responsible for the statements it contained, as it would be made public use of with all despatch. The deputation then waited upon the relief commissioners, and Captain Kennedy having accompanied Mr. Stephens to Sir Randolph Routh, the commissary-general, that gentleman promised to give orders for the Rhadamanthus steamer to load with Indian corn in Cork, to be stored in Galway, and that an officer of the commissariat department would be here on Tuesday next. Valuable assistance was rendered by the Very Rev. Dr. Kiwan in the interviews with the officials of the several departments to which the deputation were referred; he also put down his name for 20l. as his subscription to the Local Relief Fund; the Rev. Mr. Eyre and Francis Comyn, Esq., have promised a subscription of 10l. each.—Galway Vindicator.

PLUNDER OF A PROVISION BOAT.—On Wednesday morning, as the smack Maria, the property of Mr. John N. Russell, of this city, was proceeding from Limerick to Clare, laden with flour and Indian meal, she was boarded near Smith's Island, in the Clare river, by about fourteen armed men from a lighter, who ordered the crew (three men and a boy) into the cabin. They held possession of the vessel over six hours, during which time they took away about one hundred sacks of prime flour and twenty of Indian meal, valued at 250l. They then departed, first ordering the crew to remain at anchor at their peril, until they returned for the remainder of the cargo. This order the crew did not obey, but started instantly for Clare, and were pursued by a boat filled with armed men. Mr. Russell's agent (Mr. Reardon) at once reported the occurrence to the magistrates and police. Warrants are issued, and about 30 sacks of the flour have been recovered. Several boats that were passing at the time of this outrage were ordered to anchor, and had to remain so during the day, with the exception of the Dublin Company's boat, the Royal George, which was allowed to proceed unmolested. Mr. Richard Russell left yesterday morning for Ennis, to aid in recovering the property, and discovering the perpetrators of this audacious outrage. He returned last night, having discovered 51 bags of flour belonging to his father, hid under the ground near Harler's Cross, on the road from this city to Ennis.—Limerick Examiner of Saturday.

APRIL 14.—DISTRESS OF THE PEOPLE.—RIOTS IN CLONMEL.—CALLING OUT OF THE MILITARY.—The patient endurance of the Irish peasantry, with famine staring them in the face, whilst abundance of food is exported from every harbour, is, perhaps, unprecedented. I sent you a day or two since an account of an open air meeting of the famishing peasantry at Tory-hill, county of Limerick. They had determined at length to take their own case in hand, in the hope of devising some means of providing labour or food. Yet, when the Catholic priest of the parish, with one or two other inhabitants, known to be well-wishers of the poor unemployed labourers, spoke some words of admonition and hope, the thousands of starving men, women, and children, departed peaceably to their cold and comfortless cabins. Amongst the town population of Clonmel, famous for its numerous and extensive corn mills, there has been less of patient endurance. Accounts of food riots reached town this day, and are thus noticed in the Dublin Evening Post:

"A correspondent in Clonmel, whose letter is dated yesterday afternoon, writes to say that the greatest excitement prevails in that town, owing to an attack made by the peasantry on some carts laden with provisions, and under an escort of military. Two troops of dragoons and a party of artillery, that arrived from Cahir yesterday morning, were despatched to Marlfield Mills and Distillery, upon which an attempt at plunder had been made. Happily no lives have been lost, as the military succeeded in driving back the people without firing on them."

Another letter states that the populace had attacked some flour-mills on the River Suir, adjacent to the town, whence large quantities of flour were about to be exported for the English market.

The other accounts received to-day describe the distress as daily becoming more alarming. Read, for instance, the account given by a Conservative paper, the Clare Journal, of the allocation of the money subscribed by the 66th regiment. Sixty famishing beings are to be provided with employment, and the selection is made with as stringent a regulation as if some rich office or fat benefice were to be conferred by a minister of state. The people known to have one meal per day—one insufficient meal of coarse food in the 24 hours—are excluded from the fortunate number who are to obtain 1s. per day out of the labour-fund subscribed by the officers and the privates of the 66th regiment. Yet in this very county of Clare the Marquis of Thomond has a vast estate, although nothing at all like the amount of ready money possessed by Mr. and Mrs. Gerrard, of Gibbstown.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE POOR REMEMBERED.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—The following excellent letter was addressed to me a few days ago, by a few thoughtful, feeling, and benevolent persons, in Sheffield, Yorkshire. It speaks for itself, and its contents have already spoken to the poor through my humble medium. Have the goodness to insert it in your "great fact" paper, and you will oblige,

Yours faithfully,

Bicester, Oxon.

W. FERGUSON.

Hall Carr Terrace, Sheffield, April 1, 1846.

DEAR SIR.—It is with deep regret we see the wretched condition to which the farm labourers in your district are reduced; but we rejoice that they have found such an able advocate of their cause, and benefactor (so far as you have it in your power) to relieve their distresses yourself.

We, a few friends to suffering humanity, who meet at Mr. Joseph Outram's Black Swan Inn, have subscribed 5l. 15s. 6d. towards their relief, and regret the amount is not larger.

Please acknowledge the receipt; and if it is not asking too much of you, be kind enough to give us a statement of a few such cases as you experimentally have found, and the manner in which you dispose of the trifles sent.

Yours respectfully, in behalf of the Subscribers,

N. PEACE.

P. S.—We have sent 6l. 9s. to Mr. Burrowes, editor of the Independent newspaper of Devizes, for the same purposes.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"What thou doest, do quickly."

SIR,—Permit me, through the medium of your "great fact" paper, to inform my Free Trade friends that I have just purchased and given away among some of the most needy and deserving of the peasantry of our neighbourhood, about sixty bushels of potato seed. I have not yet finished this part of my daily work. In a few cases, I have rented a chain of potato land for the use of honest and sober men—yes, men who are willing to work; but, as no man will hire them, they have it not in their power to pay for a chain of land. One of these men, John Waldoek, of the town and parish of Bicester, in the county of Oxford, has a wife and five children to support out of nothing. Waldoek has been married 13 years, and has had but one whole winter's work during the whole of these years; neither has he had constant employment during the summer part of these years. It is not to the protectionists of our high church county, but to some of the Free Traders of Manchester, Liverpool, Sheffield, London, Dudley, &c. &c., that John Waldoek and others are so deeply indebted for the beds on which they sleep, for the bread upon which they have lived during (some of them for weeks, and others for several months) this winter; and also for their potato land, and the seed which they are now planting. Waldoek's touching and heartrending case is a fair specimen of others which I could furnish, to demonstrate that the peasantry in districts purely agricultural are what I have for seven years said and published concerning them, and that is "a ruined wreck."

I assure those friends who have put it into my power to assist those who have been made slaves by protection to an extent to which they have never been before assisted by any man, or by any number of men, in either the county of Oxon or Bucks, that I have done my best to clothe the naked and to feed the hungry. I now begin to feel the effects of walking from village to hamlet day after day, up to the ankles in water and mud, and wet to the skin, to deliver others from the jaws of hunger, and from the grasp of the winter's cold blast. I have shaken one of the strongest of constitutions to its very centre, and with the exception of my own partner, I have had no one either to encourage or to help me. The general remark made by my easy and old-fashioned neighbours has been—"I wonder who sends Mr. Fergusson money to do all this for the poor people? What business has Fergusson with the state of the people? Why don't 'em go to be soldiers? There is no work here for 'em."

The following receipt, which I received the other day for the money which I paid for Waldoek's potato land, will show what kind of education the mechanics of our district have received at the liberal hand of protectionists:

"He have reseve the som of 6 shilens of Mr. Ferkeson for chren of perturer land. "Paid.

"1846 Apriel 9."

There are as many overgrown and stagnant ditches and wild hedges in our neighbourhood as would keep scores of idle hands employed cleaning and dressing them for many months to come. But no; the health, comfort, and honesty of thousands must be jeopardised rather than that the things which are wanting should be set in order.

The most intelligent and extensive farmers with whom I have conversed in our district are most anxious that Sir Robert Peel's measure should become law without any more delay; and as to the tradespeople, they are out of all patience with the unmeaning rant and absurd cant of protectionist members of Parliament.

Permit me to thank you, sir, for the leading article in the League of Saturday, April 11th, 1846. That article should be published in a small tract, and circulated in tens of thousands. My own Free Trade creed embraces both of the views to which you have given a real form and living character in that article.

I seek the total abolition of the unrighteous Corn Laws, because I feel the deepest interest in whatever promotes the happiness, comfort, and elevation of man.

I am happy to add, that I am just about to send four able-bodied single young men into Cheshire, where they are to be employed at good wages as farm servants. Your's respectfully,

WILLIAM FERGUSON.

King's End, Bicester, April 14th, 1846.

FARMERS! KEEP YOUR MANURE DRY.—Suppose that any of the married men in this company was to get hold of his wife's tea-pot, after she had done with it, and was to dry up the leaves carefully, and bring them to her for her tea the next morning, I would just ask you, whether she would be likely to find out the trick or not? I imagine she would not be long in discovering the cheat; and I might venture to guess he would find out to his cost, that, if that was the way he was to keep her in tea, she would soon find out the way to keep him in hot water. Now, if the wife would feel so indignant at being supplied with tea that had been wet two or three times, how ought the farmer to feel who was supplied with manure that had been wet two or three hundred times? It is true the farm cannot fight its own battle so well as the mistress, but there is such a thing as passive resistance; and you may depend on it, that in the harvest, the farmer will be made to feel, that in cheating his land, by giving it manure which has lost all its strength, he has been, in fact, cheating himself, and that this may have a worse result even than cheating his wife.—Mr. Blacker, at the late Market-hill Meeting.

Thanks to Father Mathew, there was only one case of drunkenness amongst the Irish population of Manchester brought before the magistrates on the day following the national feast of St. Patrick.

An opium sale which lately took place at Calcutta produced the enormous sum of 800,000l. sterling.

MR. COBDEN'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Friday, February 27th, 1846—Revised. Price One Penny, 16 Pages.

MR. BRIGHT'S SPEECH in the House of Commons, on Tuesday Night, Feb. 17. Price One Penny.

MR. GIBSON'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Monday night, Feb. 18. Price One Penny. Leaving Office, 67, Fleet-street, London; J. Gadsby, Newall's buildings, and 4, Old Millgate, Manchester.

THE GOATACRE MEETING. Just published, price One Penny, or 3s. per 100. A VERBAL REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATACRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages. Upwards of 100,000 copies have been printed. Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of the League, 1s. in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Mrs. MURPHY. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d. TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE TRADE. By Earl Darnley, Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, Bright, Gibson, O'Connell, McCulloch, Baines, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, April 15, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
*Ashworth, Henry and Edmund, Torton, near Bolton	200	0	0
*Platt, Robert, Staleybridge	200	0	0
*Armistead, Elkanah, and Sons, Manchester	100	0	0
Crawford, Robert, Fleet-street, do	50	0	0
*Clark, J. and J., and Co., Paisley	10	0	0
Wiscman, R. and J., Cupar, N.B.	5	0	0
*A Friend, Newcastle-on-Tyne	2	10	0
*Hartley, Wm. and Richard, Maiton	2	0	0
*Hopkins, John, do	2	0	0
*Grimshaw, Christopher, Surrey-street, Manchester	2	0	0
*Mawson, Moses, Church-street, do	2	0	0
*Thackeray, F. R., The Cedars, Windlesham, Bagshot	2	0	0
*Graham, James, 2, Edwin-place, Glasgow	1	1	0
*Sheldon, J., Kettleholme, Whaley Bridge, nr Stockport	1	0	0
*Gaulen, Mr. Tiverton	1	0	0
*Massey, Thomas, Moreland-road, Burslem	1	0	0
*Simpson, Richard, York-street, Rochdale	1	0	0
*Hunter, George, Side, Newcastle-on-Tyne	1	0	0
*Barrow, Roger, Claremont-place, do	1	0	0
Hills, E. S., Granger-street, do	1	0	0
Harris, W. D., Buckingham	0	10	0
Nemo, do	0	5	0
Thomas, E. and W., Zara-street, Manchester	0	5	0
Hudson, Robert, Parsonage, do	0	5	0
Kirby, Joseph, Buckingham	0	2	6

*Clegg, Wm., Lane End	20	0	0
Workpeople of Wm. Clegg, Lane End Mill	1	8	6
*Smith, Mark, and Sons	1	0	0
*Briggs, John, Rochdale-lane	1	0	0
*Heywood, Wm.	1	0	0
*Hill, Thomas, boiler-maker	1	0	0
Knight, Thomas, Bridge-street	1	0	0
*Whyte, Alex., Rochdale-lane	1	0	0
*Sagar, S. C., Market-place	1	0	0
Bennett, Eli, Church-street	1	0	0
*Mills, Charles, York-street	1	0	0
*Porter, Robert, Hooley Bridge	1	0	0
*Rawson, John, Market-street	0	10	0
A Friend, Market-street	0	5	0
Mills, Robert, jun., millwright	0	5	0
Dawson, A., bobbin turner	0	4	0

*Chambers, George, High Green House	2	0	0
*Wynne, A. and L., Bernard-street	1	0	0
*Simpson, Thomas, Duke-street, Park	1	0	0
Wood, Brothers, High-street, Park	0	8	0
Major, Mrs., Broad-street, Park	0	2	6
*Sissonite, Josh., Park	0	2	0

*Worsley, Thomas	1	0	0
*Ashcroft, Wm., Habsall near	1	0	0
Edge, Mr., solicitor	0	10	0
Dennett, Rev. James	0	10	0
Garside, Wm. H.	0	10	0
Abraham, Rev. A., Netherton, nr Liverpool	0	10	0
Kaye, Ralph, Aughton	0	5	0
Dobson, Henry, Maghull	0	5	0
Charnock, John, Burscough	0	5	0
Thomas, John	0	5	0

*"The Laird," per S. Neish	4	0	0
*Ferguson, Wm., and Son	4	0	0
*Duncan, Peter	4	0	0
*Ewan, John	4	0	0
*Bell, Thomas	4	0	0
Dundee.	2	0	0
*Jaffie, Brothers	2	0	0
*Westland, James	2	0	0
*Guthrie, James, St. Andrew-street	2	0	0
*Duncan, John, do	2	0	0
*Henderson, Wm. and Son	1	0	0
*Lawson, Alex.	1	0	0
*Petrie, David	1	0	0

*Latham, John, town clerk	2	0	0
*Johnson, Charles	2	0	0
*Broadhurst, James	2	0	0
*Johnson, Thomas, Bank House	1	0	0
Snelson, Edward	0	2	6
Mackery, Samuel	0	2	6
Bayley, Samuel	0	2	6
Thompson, Samuel	0	2	6
Whalley, Aaron	0	2	6
Snelson, George	0	2	6
Parr, Edward, draper	0	2	6
Bayley, Joseph, tailor	0	2	6
Hurrop, Frances	0	2	6
Frost, James	0	2	6
Joyce, Edward	0	2	6
Foden, Charles	0	2	6
Farrington, G.	0	2	6
Herdman, G., grocer	0	2	6
Robinson, Thomas	0	2	6
Goldkay, Joseph	0	2	6
Fillingham, Rev. Wm.	0	2	6
Barton, Nathaniel	0	2	6
Loach, Joseph	0	2	0
Loach, Peter	0	2	0
Small Sons	0	7	0

*Tothill, Wm., Stoke	40	0	0
*Charlton, James, Ashley Hill	20	0	0
*Tackett, Philip D., Frenchay	5	0	0
*Charlton, R., St. George's, Gloucesters.	5	0	0
*Davies, Thomas, St. James's-place	2	0	0
Gibson, Robert, 4, York-street	0	5	0

*Ridgway, Thomas, 4, King William-street, City	50	0	0
*Dillon, John, Fore-street, Cripplegate	40	0	0
*Brown, George, 3, Finsbury Circus	40	0	0
*Travers, Joseph, & Sons, St. Swithin's-lane	40	0	0
*Prescott, H. J., 55, Old Broad-street	20	0	0
*Prescott, W. G., 62, Threadneedle-street	20	0	0
*Moffatt, George, M.P., 85, Eaton-square	20	0	0
*Tennant, C., Sons, and Co., 101, Upper Thames-street	20	0	0
*Crompton, Henry, White House, Putney, Surrey	10	10	0
*Hodgson, Thomas, Lambeth-street, Goodman's Fields	10	0	0

*Dewar, David, Son, and Co., King's Arm Buildings, Wood-street	10	0	0
*Morley, John, 18, Wood-street	10	0	0
*Morley, John, jun. do	10	0	0
*Morley, Samuel do	10	0	0
*Burnley, John, and Sons, Batley	6	0	0
*Plater, John, Castle-street, Carlisle	5	0	0
*Silver, Thomas Temple, Woodbridge, Suffolk	5	0	0
*Edmonds, Thomas, High-street, High Wycombe	5	0	0
*McAlpine and Nephew, 63, Broad-street	5	0	0
*Venning, S. M., 12, Pancras-lane	5	0	0
*Porrett, Robert, Ordnance Office Tower	5	0	0

*The Workmen in the Employ of Messrs. Maudslays, Sons, and Field, Lambeth, per Geo. Day	4	0	0
*Hill, John, East Gate, Chichester	3	3	0
*Cook, T. A., Walker Alkali Works, Newcastle-on-Tyne	2	0	0
*The Workpeople of Messrs. S. and J. Holland, Head House, Bighouse, near Huddersfield	1	5	6
*Wilson and Ware, 11, Aldermanbury	1	1	0
*Smith, John, Elm Tree House, Haverstock Hill, Hampstead	1	1	0

*Doyd, James, jun., 59, Mark-lane	1	1	0
Curtis, Stephen, 40, Finsbury-street	1	0	0
Garney, Alfred, 19, Hedge-row, Islington	1	0	0
*Wallis, Thomas, 48, Fenchurch-street	1	0	0
*Keeley, John, 4, Sugar-loaf-court, Leadenhall-street	1	0	0
*Johnson, John, 48, St. Martin's-lane	1	0	0
*Hennell, C. H., 7, Brickhill-lane, Upper Thames-st.	1	0	0
*English, Wm., 8, Tredegar-place, Mile End Road	1	0	0
Hilton, Wm., North-street, Hailey, Staffordshire	1	0	0
*Fennell, Mr., Bury St. Edmunds	1	0	0
*Cudston, W., Bungay	1	0	0
*Hickson, Samuel, 162, High-street, Chatham	1	0	0
*Machin, R., tea-dealer, Nottingham	1	0	0
Raymond, C., 3, Finsbury-place	0	5	0
Munn, Alex., 23, Charlton-street, Somers-town	0	2	6

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

A HISTORY FOR HOLIDAY CHILDREN OF ALL GROWTHS.

By REUBEN.

Being an account of the notorious robber, C— L—, now under sentence of death. Originally written for the Newgate Calendar.

PART THE SECOND.

CHAPTER I.—Of the fortunes of the farmers not being as foretold; of his new instructions by the tinkers; of his journey in Hampshire, when he met Captain Swing, of Swing; of what happened to Hampshire.

Time to write, space to print, patience of readers to read, will not permit us to follow the career of C— L—, in all its events, incidents, turnings, fallings, risings, devices, and frauds; swindling under the guise of friendship, thieving under cover of secrecy, robbing by the strong arm of might, murdering when victims were too weak and too poor to withstand him. It would take as many volumes of large size, as we have chapters here, to contain the record of those things.

In the years of his age, 11, 12, and 13, the country people, and the farmers particularly, complained somewhat bitterly to the tinkers that their fortunes had not been truly told; that C— L— had deceived them; that in watching over them in the dark to keep away the ogres who had two heads and three heads, and who lived in the north among coal pits, black chimneys, fly wheels, spindles, shuttles, and clanking hammers, things went a missing, although he said he had allowed no ogres to come there to steal. Moreover, he said in 1825, that he had killed half the ogres of England, and so wounded the other half that they could not move from home; that they could not even move one of their wheels, nor spindles, nor shuttles, nor make their chimneys smoke, nor clank their hammers, nor go down into the coal pits, nor stir one of their ships out of the docks; he said that all the ships, like all the machinery, belonged not to men, but to ogres with two heads, and three heads, and he had so levelled them with the earth, and the worms of the earth, that they would never get up their heads again, and that the farmers would therefore live in peace and plenty; the ogres would no longer live on human flesh; they would not be able to run after human creatures to catch them, nor could they come again to the farmers' barns for corn, on which to feed the human creatures which they caught, to make them fat enough to eat; and he promised to show the farmers some of those dead ogres some day, or their heads—as a rat catcher shows the tails of the rats he kills, to get his payment.

However, he drew his payment first; and soon after, the farmers heard that the ogres were coming alive again, that ships were going out of the docks, engines were moving, wheels revolving, spindles whizzing, shuttles flying, chimneys smoking, hammers clanking, and the ogres once more putting up people to get fat for themselves to feed on, cramming them with farmers' corn, as farmers cram turkeys before drawing their necks; and hearing this, they were in great distress, and they applied to the tinkers, who in their turn applied to their little imp-of-all-work, C— L—. He pended that he did not tell the farmers their fortunes—that it was the tinkers themselves who did so; and if their fortunes had not come true as told, he could do no more than he had done.

Upon which the tinkers once more, when they came up to Westminster to cry in the streets, "Pots and Kettles to mend," held counsel together; and they agreed that the owners of the farmyards in the country, from which they pillaged, were becoming too knowing for them, and too much dissatisfied.

They agreed that they must set C— L— to work in another manner, and they must take another method of telling the farmers their fortunes; and they must not tell the same fortunes to the same men; they must promise something to all, which probably might be fulfilled. At all events, they must make a new movement, for the country people were beginning to watch their hen-roosts, pigsties, barns, stables, corn-ricks, potato-stores, and dwelling-houses, and that if they, the tinkers, did not delude them afresh, they would be themselves outwitted.

So they put C— L— under a new course of instruction in the 12th and 13th years of his age (1827-1828); and he went down into the country with some new tricks in the 14th and 15th years of his age.

In the latter of those years (1830) he was travelling in Hampshire one day, and on the road between Whitechurch and Winchester, at a village called Sutton Scotney, he made a pause, intending to renew some of his operations there. He had been in the village before, and knew every house in it, and was sure he knew every member of every family. But he now saw a person standing in the midst of a group of idle hungry men—men whom he himself had made idle and hungry. He did not know this person; but their eyes met, and they scanned each other closely—rigidly.

C— L— looked upon the stranger's face, until he looked through him. He looked until he saw that the places where eyes should have been had no eyes; that they were only holes with light in them, resembling red tinder burning in the dark. And underneath a black cloak, which covered the stranger, C— L— saw his entire body, which was nothing more than a skeleton. The skeleton put its bare, bony fingers forth, as if to shake C— L— by the hand, and the latter put forth his hand; but when he touched the skeleton's fingers, he felt that, horrid as they looked, they were not even bare bones,—they were thin matches of dry touchwood, tipped on the ends with sulphur. They spoke:

SKELTON: "Those hands are at thy service, and this (taking his head off, and opening his skull, like a tinder-box, and lighting his finger-ends thereat), these are at thy service. Thou hast come on a mission of destruction, as thou hast come before; make it short, quick, decisive, and do not let the lingering bodies of hungered life bring forth more monsters of thy engenderment as they have brought forth me. For terrible is life like mine."

C— L—: "Who are you?—and what—what is thy name?"

SKELTON: "My name is Swing. I am the embodiment of all the hunger that has been by you created. In me the essences of all the pangs of Sutton Scotney and Barton Stacey are concentrated. I am the representative of bodies worn to leanness, and in me has been deposited the dark secreties and the smouldering passions that bury and grow in hungry men's brains. Welcome enemy of human happiness and peace! Foe of life itself, welcome to Sutton Scotney! We need thee to complete the work begun."

C— L—: "What wouldst thou with me? thou wouldst not have me to commit a crime?"

SWING: "Crime! Hast thou not already laid waste the fields, and wrung the farmers' heads awry, to look at all things or at nothing, or at anything, so that they did not look at their own farmyards, to detect you and those who sent you? Hast thou not torn the very last mouthful of bread and bacon from the workers in the fields, giving them, when they dropped from hunger and the toil of labour, a cold potato for their out-field dinner? Hast thou not worn their hands to the bare bone, and their hearts to something lower and harder than a bone, by laying them lower than the beasts which are fed, or the very worms, or snails, or meanest grubs, which can feed themselves? Crime! You ask if I would allure you to commit a crime? You, who have robbed by violence, and murdered when all was yielded to you! You, who have scuttled ships and laid waste the commerce of a nation until the very grass has been rank on the wharfs and streets, and green weeds have grown in warehouses, only equalled in number and greenness by other grass and other weeds on the graves of the thousands whom you have crushed and torn the life out of. Talk of a crime, indeed! I only ask you, in mercy to the sufferers, to do your work quickly. I am here to help you."

C— L—: "You are an excellent fellow, Swing, but you mistake me. I have not the least objection to your using that tinder-box brain of yours and those touchwood fingers. I can even tell you where to go, and you shall earn my gratitude and that of my nearest relatives and best of noble friends. Go to the north, to the country of the ogres, with two heads and three heads—they are not men; you may roast them alive in blazing cotton, flax, wool, and the oil of their abominable factories, and no respectable person will say it is evil you have done. You may even take the ploughs and harrows of Hampshire with you; pull down the ruins of those ogres' dens—the factory towns—plough over the ground on which they stand, harrow it, and cast all their rubbish of engines, wheels, spindles, shuttles, hammers, forges, and everything of theirs, which you have not in the first instance burned, into the sea, and England will be as great a country as she is now, and as happy; Hampshire more happy and better fed."

But to open that tinder-box head of yours in Hampshire, where my friends, the tinkers, so often resort for a sucking-pig, a goose or two, a few fowls, and for provender to their asses; where I have so often and so successfully come to replenish the banks of the dicing tables of my noble friends and patrons in London, by using a little legerdemain among the farmers, and some boldness and force of arms among such people as those of Sutton Scotney; where also we have foretold such good fortunes to the farmers, so very often, to get them to comply with our demands, or to get them to shut their eyes and open their mouths, and catch what we would send them; to operate with your touchwood fingers and tinder-head here, Mr. Swing, would not be to me convenient. Not that I am tender in the conscience as to the sin of the thing, for I must confess I have often done as bad things myself, though not quite in the same way. What I object to is the inconvenience of setting fire to one's own house, as we may say."

SWING: "I believe you, C— L—, when you say it is not a matter of conscience with you, but convenience, not to light the torch which I offer to put into your hands; but you will be nevertheless the incendiary, and shall be known as such. This day you have come to Stacey and Sutton to steal bread, to bring away a portion of the food of the poor, who are already reduced to the most meagre diet, that the luxuriously fed, who employ you, may be still more luxuriously fed and gorgeously housed, and still more recklessly supplied with recklessly spent treasure. Now, listen to me; take one more loaf from the daily bread, leave one less potato this night, screw the worm of hunger one inch further into the bodies of the working poor, and more stackyards in Barton Stacey than one stall—

A contemporary laugh from C— L— interrupted the sentence. He turned away, and proceeded in his usual manner to visit the flour-mills, bakers' shops, cottage cupboard, and every place else where he could fetch a morsel of food that would help to raise money for his splendid associates and noble patrons in London.

Swing also turned away, his skeleton joints aching, and the concentrated pains of all the hungry stomachs of the two villages, Stacey and Sutton, wringing in his empty framework of bones. Where he went to then was not known.

But that night, at the dead hour of the night, at the side of a wheat rick upon a farm of 1000 acres or more in Barton Stacey parish, where the farmer paid a high rent to a lordly landowner, kept three hunting horses for his own use, rode after the hounds often, and looked after his farm seldom; paid his ploughmen less than what purchased enough of bread (after C— L— had his share), and compelled them to go to the fields to plough with cold boiled potatoes in their pockets—on that farm that night, at the dead hour of night, Swing for the first time opened his skeleton head in earnest, and drew forth the burning tinder, put his sulphur-tipped fingers to it, lighted them to a flame, and put the flame to one wheat-rick, and then to another; and from that farm he ran to another; and again he did the same next night elsewhere; and again and again.

Still, day after day, he continued to meet C— L—, and to implore of him to have mercy on the Hampshire peasantry, not to reduce them to skin and bone, and a potato diet entirely, but to leave them their bread, if not the bacon and the beer, which they were once accustomed to; and he wrote letters by every post to the tinkers related to C— L—, and to his noble and exalted associates, imploring them, and sometimes threatening them, if they would not listen, but always signing his name "Swing," to have mercy on the working men of Hampshire, and not starve them by means of C— L—'s visits, and the distraction and deception which C— L— introduced among the farmers; but the noble and exalted would not listen. The poor were made hungry to make the nobles more rich. New fortunes were foretold to the farmer, and they listened not to the cries of the hungry—they were taught to have no dependence on them; but to depend wholly for the safety of their barns and rickyards on C— L—.

And the barns and rickyards were not safe. In the day time throngs of men assembled in the roadways to look upon the ashes and the wreck of the preceding night. At night, the invisible Swing made more ashes and more wreck for them to look upon next day. They had often been told by C— L—, and the tinkers his relatives, what a terrible thing it was for the ogres with two and three heads to have wheels, and spindles, and shuttles, moved by steam engines, and how marvellous it was in any human being to speak against, and sometimes to kick against, the machinery of the ogres. So they thought it must be no better for the farmers to have threshing machinery; and in their wrath against the farmers and C— L—, and against machinery, they did not discriminate between the machines of farmyards and the machines of factories. They would have destroyed all if they could; they could not, so they destroyed what was nearest them.

And the farmers who had been foretold fortunes of peace and plenty by the tinkers, were now mounted on horseback, with swords girded round them, galloping in troops with the swords drawn from the scabbards, cutting and leaving down the mobs of men from whom C— L— had stolen the means of subsistence; and these men with plough staffs in their hands, and sledge hammers, were breaking the heads of the well fed, and the doors of the affrighted. And columns of infantry, troops of dragoons, companies of artillery, with cannon and bullets and gunpowder; and judges with powder in their rigs; and lawyers in long gowns, almost as numerous as the soldiers in scarlet coats; and hangmen with ropes, and nooses, to their ropes, went down to Hampshire among the lean labourers who had been robbed of their bread by C— L—, and drove them into corners, and caught them in the ropes, and hung them up by the necks until they were dead.

About which time the nobles who danced at Almack's, and dined at Crookford's, required of C— L—, when he came up to town with the penicillitis and ha'porths of bread, and bits of bacon, and Lord, and dripping, which he had stolen for them, that they, the dancers and the dicers, might be supplied with money—the produce of these mean thefts being the perquisites of those mean nobles. About this time they hated in the quadrilles, and lifted their eyes for a moment from the dice tables, and asked what noise and disturbance that was down in Hampshire?

CHAPTER II.—Of the years of his 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, when nobody looked to what he was doing; of the gear when he was 21, and the constable of Wolverhampton, who took him into custody; of the birth of a young giant in the land of the ogres; of C— L—'s new expedition to slay the ogres; of his meeting with the young giant; of the terrible battle they had.

(This chapter, being very long, and narratory only of recent and well-known facts, must be omitted.)

CHAPTER III.—Of C— L—'s arraignment before the magistrates by the young giant; of the evidence produced against him; of his commitment to Newgate; of his trial and condemnation; of the attempt of the more desperate of his late associates to effect his rescue; of their failure; of the uncertainty of the time of his execution.

(This chapter must also be omitted.)

CHAPTER IV.—Of the increasing uncertainty about his fate; of the erection of the gallows; of the morning of the execution; of his old friends, who went to see him knocked off; of what happened.

The uncertainty rose higher, sunk deeper, extended wider every day, and every hour of the day. A few hoped the convict would escape, millions feared he would escape, and part of both laid wagers. As the accomplished layer of wagers on the turf backs his own horse, and would not back a competitor with his own were he strong in hope that his own would win the race, but bets in favour of others because he is not sure that his own will win the race, and sometimes bets heavily against his own through secret agents, because he knows his own will not win—cannot win; so did some of the sporting lords and gentlemen—"old pals" of C— L—, bet heavily, through secret agents, that he would be hanged, though they were sincerely desirous that he should escape. Such thorough sporting men were they, so used to betting, so imbued with the spirit of gambling, that they could not refrain from the game of chances even on the fate of a friend. And so accustomed were some of them to "hedge," to be always winners of something, to take in the green ones, and to secure a large part of a lonely income by "hedging" their bets—that is, laying privately against what they betted publicly, that they could not help "hedging" on the fate of their own friend; though backing him resolutely, they yet knew that the chances were largely and heavily against him; and they, wagering always, wagered now that he would be executed.

Thus did the confused uncertainty become more confusive. The condemnation of C— L— fell upon society like a stone plunged into still water; and each of the fresh rumours of his fate was like another stone plunged into the same water at another place, the commotion of each confusing all, and being confused by all.

At last, one evening, at the hour of twilight, men with pickaxes, with one or two spades, a waggon with two score of strong wooden posts, and as many or more strong railings of squared timber, with sharp edges—these sharp edges to be laid in such a way, when fixed on top of the posts, that those who might climb upon them to obtain a prominent seat would have at best a seat so uneasy, that they would not sit on it long. There were also iron rods of great strength, to stay those wooden barriers, by one end being bolted to the posts, and the other end sunk into the street; so that if the crowd was dense, and the temper of it warm, and its motions dangerously unsteady, it might (there being also double lines of policemen within those railings) be prevented from breaking into the open space round the gallows.

How the coincidence of legislators choosing to make the laws in the night-time, and the workmen who put up the gallows to hang those who break the laws choosing to do their work also in the night-time,—how this coincidence is to be accounted for, I cannot tell. But, as the clock of St. Sepulchre's struck half-past seven, and the darkness had closed in thickly enough to make the top of St. Sepulchre's steeple just barely visible, at that hour the men with the pickaxes began to loosen the stones in the street where it is wide, and where the wooden pavement does not reach, to put in the posts of the outer barriers; and then they laid the strong rails on the posts with the sharp edges uppermost, to make the seat uneasy for those who attempted to sit thereon.

And little ragged boys from Field-lane and Saffron-hill, and out of Turnagain-lane, and all the regions of Smithfield and the Old Bailey, came round the corners, first peeping slowly, then walking more boldly, to look at the men with the pickaxes and the hammers, and the nails and the iron rods. And those who came last asked those who came first what was going to be done. And when they were told that a man was going to be hanged, they said, "Crikey! let us get on the front rails to see him." And when they were told it would be ten hours yet before he was brought out upon the scaffold, and that the erection of the scaffold and the "fatal beam" had not yet begun, they said, "What of that; won't it be a lark to sit all night, to be in the front in the morning?"

And when midnight came, and the black scaffold was erected, and the beam above the scaffold, and the rope was fixed to the beam, and the noose was made to the rope, and Mr. Jackson had tried how it would run, and found it would run very well, other people came and took their places as near the front as they could get, and the Old Bailey began to fill.

Now, if the reader will call to mind what the shape of a funnel is, by which liquids are introduced into a bottle, and imagine what like this funnel may be, if a child gets it to play with and hammers in one side of it at the widest end, and bends the other side out near the widest end; and if the reader will suppose this funnel to be three hundred yards long, instead of five or six inches, he, standing at the mouth of it, will see something like the Old Bailey. And if he will further imagine that, where the funnel's narrow pipe joins the widening part, the gallows has got into it, and is sticking there, and will not let another drop pass into the bottle, or down into Ludgate-street, as the case may be, he will imagine a simile which is real. If, further, he will suppose that the frothy liquid poured into the funnel, which will not let it through, resembles the excited multitude, which is stuck fast and cannot get out, save by running over where more is pouring in; and again, if he will fancy a hand shaking the funnel to make it hold more, and every atom of matter endowed with the power of speech, or so much speech as shall hail its neighbour with an oath, or some known face, seen wedged amongst shoulders at the opposite side, with "Don't go too near; you'll be there soon enough," pointing to the gallows; or if he will fancy cries of "He's coming; he's coming! hats off! hats off!" when nobody is coming; and fancy what like a street would look if paved with ten thousand human faces all turned up, young and old, male and female; some of the faces red and excited, some pale and fainting, most of them dirty, and all contorted with pain suffered by twenty thousand elbows punched into as many sets of human ribs; and if the reader will imagine farther that the police have made a gangway above the first row of railings, and that among those ragged boys, who sit "below the gangway," and who have sat there all night in hopes of a good place, painful though the sharp edges be upon which they sit, that among them are the Young Englanders from the purlieus of Westminster and Piccadilly, old companions of C— L—; and among them the somewhat ancient phizzes of Ben of Shrewsbury, and Peter of Evesham, with Lord G. B., Lord W. L., and other notorious swells from the "flash kens" of the West End—all come to see an "old pal knocked off," if the reader can put all those things before his mind's eye, he may form some idea of what the Old Bailey was like on that memorable morning when the gallows was erected to end the days of C— L—.

The reader might further imagine that he saw the windows of the adjoining houses, and the roofs also, occupied by the nobles of the land (which is no unusual thing at executions), and other strangers who had gained admittance there, and were looking down on the crowd below and the gallows which was to hang C— L—, as if they were in the gallery of the House of Commons during a Corn Law debate; but we shall not press this resemblance.

We shall now leave the crowd, and the gallows outside, and proceed into the interior of Newgate, to the condemned cell.

The unhappy criminal sat up an hour later than usual on the previous evening, writing letters to his nearest relations, which he put into the hands of the turnkey, by whom they were handed to the governor. He then went to bed, and slept soundly. And having directed the turnkey to call him at six o'clock, he rose and dressed himself, and partook of a plentiful breakfast of coffee and buttered rolls. The clasplain then, in the hearing of the sheriffs, asked him once more if he had anything to say before he quitted this life; and he said in an audible voice, which all could hear, "I did it." Upon which the sheriffs said, "Did what?" And he replied, "Took the coffee and bread and butter from them." And the culprit shed a flood of tears, which, when dried, he said had made him happy, and he would now die easy, and would tell all. And he then gave an account of the robberies and appalling murders which he had committed.

His arms were then pinioned, during which operation he only remarked that they need not make the ropes so tight; he had no wish to escape. And then he said, in a mournful voice, "I have been brought to this by not minding what my catechism taught me; it was bad companions brought me to this. Neighbours all, farewell!"

But as he spoke those words, an unusual sound was heard in the passage leading to the cell; feet were tramping and voices speaking. The sheriffs went out and came in again, and then they communicated to the convict that he was respited until sometime after Easter. Hearing which he fell backward; and when we left the cell, he was lying on the table.

The commotion outside, on the news being carried thither of the respite, was indescribable. The young L—xes and their father, a well-known old tinker, all associates of the criminal, were seen throwing their caps in the air; as was also Lord G. B. and the other ragged boys, who sat all the night on the sharp railings below the gangway. The greater part of the multitude, however, gave utterance to their disappointment at not seeing C— L— executed and done with. No business, or almost none, was done on that day by those interested in his fate, and very little, it is said, since.

The holidays being ended, so is this history, and C— L— still lives.

AGRICULTURE.

A PENITENT MONOPOLIST.

It is now little more than two years ago that the monopolist lords and squires, landowners of Hertfordshire, assembled their tenants together at St. Albans, to form a county "protection society."

Nowhere have fictitious statistics, erroneous reasoning, and virulent invective, been more called in aid of the "protectionist cause" than they were at the St. Albans meeting in February, 1844. And amongst the speakers on that occasion there was no one who launched forth more reckless assertions, or coarser abuse than the Earl of Essex. Yet the Earl of Essex has, at length, seen the error of his views, and with courage and manliness has come forward openly to avow the change. This occurred at the Watford Farmers' Club, of which his lordship is president; and his speech is important on two grounds: first, it marks the complete change of opinion going on amongst the aristocratic landlords and the peers; secondly, it proves the profound degree of ignorance which has hitherto existed amongst the dominant class, in this country, the landowners. The Watford Club met to hear a lecture from Mr. Clutterbuck, on "tenant rights," in which the subject appears to have been treated with much good sense; for the lecturer, after enlarging upon the benefits of improved farming, said that "in every instance where a tenant is prepared with sufficient capital, there is nothing like a good, a long, and a liberal lease."

That is a proposition we have often enforced; and we say again, that all attempts to frame any system of tenant right, without a lease, is a mere make-shift; and, in truth, is little more than adapting what is called "the custom of the country" to modern and improved husbandry. "Tenant right alone cannot attract capital to the cultivation of land. It may, to some extent, save yearly tenants from such barefaced pillage as they are now occasionally subjected to, but it never can give independence to the farmer, or certainty to his business; and such seems to be Mr. Clutterbuck's view, for he said, "the difficulty of the question lies in this point only, how existing tenants, who hold from year to year, can receive a guarantee for that outlay of capital, which, at the time of their quitting, may be fairly said to be unexhausted in the land, and which would fairly entitle them to compensation."

And a resolution in favour of the "consideration of tenant right" was unanimously agreed to by the club. The members then dined together, and after dinner the Earl of Essex made his recantation of monopolist errors in a speech, from which we extract the most important passages. His lordship said:

"At no period of our lives—at no period in the history of our country has it ever been, I think, so absolutely necessary for all who are connected with agriculture to exert themselves to the utmost, not only to advance themselves in the profession they have chosen, but even to keep their heads above water (hear, hear). That prop on which you have been accustomed to lean for years past, and which you have been accustomed to consider as conducive to your success—that prop, I believe, is about to be removed. That broken reed—protection, which you have long been accustomed to depend upon, is about to be taken from you, and therefore I think you will agree with me that if ever it was essential, it is now more than ever essential that you should exert yourselves."

Doubtless this is sound and sensible; and after the earnest part taken by Lord Essex in teaching the contrary, he deserves some credit for the acknowledgement of the now undeniable truism. But before we proceed to the noble president's analysis of the state of the farming mind, we must note the fact that the tenant farmers had pretty nearly arrived at the same wholesome conclusions two years ago, when his lordship and his fellow "protectionists" acted upon their fears, their credulity, and their want of information, by telling them "that Free Trade in corn would destroy, to a ruinous extent, all capital now vested in agricultural operations, bring desolation and misery on the agricultural labourer, and prove destructive to the landed interest;" for such was Lord Essex's language at St. Albans. His comments upon farmers must therefore be received, subject to the remark that he is a new convert. It is right here to mention, that in thanking Mr. Clutterbuck for his lecture, Lord Essex had said in the morning:

"He was ready and willing to give his word and his bond to remunerate his tenants for all permanent and unexhausted improvements, or to afford any other security to his tenants to induce them to farm in a liberal manner."

And he referred to the custom of the late Lord Leicester to require his tenants to possess capital to the extent of 10*l.* per acre. At the dinner, after the passage before quoted, Lord Essex remarked, that in all great measures, however generally beneficial, some persons usually suffer, and added:

"On this occasion there are two classes of farmers who are more liable to be injured than any others. The first class comprehends all those who have hitherto been farming without capital—men who, I should say, and I say it with greater freedom, because I believe there are none here who are in that situation—men who never should have been farmers at all; because it is clear that if there is an occupation in which, owing to the vicissitudes of the seasons, capital is absolutely necessary, it is the occupation of farming. I, therefore, frankly and freely say, that if those who are farming from hand to mouth, as it is termed—men who ought not to be farmers, should suffer from this change, however much we may be sorry for the individuals, yet we shall not be surprised (hear, hear). The next class of men is those who, having capital, possess not sufficient confidence in their own energies, or in the productive powers of the soil, to employ that capital to the best advantage."

For the last class, retirement from husbandry would be the best course, but "There is another class who have capital, and who, I believe, cannot better employ it than by putting it on the land; for of this I am convinced, that if you behave liberally and handsomely to the land, she will return a liberal and handsome interest. Those men who have the courage to avow and to throw over their ancient prejudices, and who possess minds sufficiently enlightened to induce them to adopt all known improvements—those men, I believe, will live to see the day when those measures will confer the greatest benefit upon themselves and the country, and they will arrive at a pitch of prosperity hitherto unknown. They will find that which they have hitherto been disposed to depend upon is most fallacious; they will find that it robbed them of one-half the energy which, as Englishmen of intelligence, they ought to possess; they will find that they have hitherto been ignorant of what they themselves are capable of doing, and of what the soil of England is capable of producing; they will find themselves as ignorant in those respects as a man who, having been accustomed to go upon crutches all his life, is of what he could do if the use of his limbs were restored to him (hear); they will find that what is commonly called "high farming" as the course which they must in future pursue; that they must not fear liberally to use the great advantages of farming with sheep and artificial manures, which last I look upon as a positive gift of Providence; above all, they will find it necessary to increase their quantity of live stock; they will find it necessary to have such crops of turnips that they may still continue to keep as large an amount of sheep as they now do, and still be able to carry a third, or a fourth, of the crop to the yard to fatten bullocks, and thereby make such an increase in the quantity and quality of the dung as shall repay them (hear, hear). I believe it is more for the advantage of all of us to grow four quarters an acre at forty shillings, than three at fifty shillings. So, with regard to meat; I should wish to see so great a quantity of meat raised in this country that the farmers could afford to sell it at two thirds of the prices it is now fetching. What would be the consequence of that? Why, that those who now eat meat once or twice a week at the utmost, would eat it two or three times a week, and thus, as regards the producer, the increased consumption would more than equal the diminution in price."

Now this is just what we have so long been saying, and for which we have been so roundly abused by his lordship and his fellow monopolists. He then referred to the practice of manufacturers, saying:

"Now, with respect to the manufacturers, I believe that this measure will prove most beneficial to them, and I am firmly convinced, from the sympathy which exists between the manufacturing and the agricultural interest, that whatever is advantageous to, and conducive to the prosperity of, the manufacturer, must conduce to the interest of the agriculturist. One great cause of the prosperity of the manufacturer was this—notwithstanding he has had taxes of all sorts to contend with, and also a high tax on the raw materials which he manufactured, he has proved himself superior to all the other manufacturers of the world, and has competed with and beaten all the world; he has employed his capital liberally and skilfully. On all occasions he has adopted the new improvements in mechanics, and invariably profited by the advantages which science, in its various branches, could confer upon him. And I would venture to hold out the same inducement to you, and say, the judicious and liberal employment of capital will enable you, as it has enabled the manufacturer of this country, to compete—and that successfully—with the wide world."

True, most true, Lord Essex.

We cannot, however, avoid the suspicion that his lordship is a recent convert to "high farming" no less than to Free Trade—that he belongs to that numerous and increasing class of landowners who deem the light of agricultural knowledge to have first broken upon the rural world since the formation of the Royal Agricultural Society—look upon guano as a specific, and imagine modern machinery will do as much for the farmer as it has done for the manufacturer. Now we do not undervalue any of these things, so far as they go; but we should be false to that interest we have at heart—that of the industrious agriculturists, the tenant farmers, and farm labourers—did we not protest against the notion that there is any royal road to husbandry. Success in farming, as a business, must be the result of much steady, cautious, and persevering industry. Neither do we think that tenants whose capital does not come up to the approved standard of 10*l.* per acre ought to be regarded as men who should "never have been farmers at all." A very considerable proportion of the tenantry of England are farming with less than half that portion of capital, and it can never be supposed that they can be suddenly replaced by men of full capital, or that landlords will immediately abandon their prejudices and their systems which repel capital from the cultivation of their estates. But the capital the farmer has may be made available for increased production by adopting longer rotations of crops, keeping a smaller portion of his land in grass, and cultivating that portion more completely than he has hitherto done. By such means he may increase his stock, and gradually acquire the means of a higher system of farming. For such a style of farming, a lease is no less indispensable than for one by which the whole farm is at once highly cultivated. In many cases the landlord might take away some of a farmer's land, and thereby increase his profits, though so general is the custom of taking too much, that it would be difficult to make the ordinary farmer accede to that proposition. But to return to Lord Essex's speech. He then thus manfully referred to his former errors:

"Many of you, no doubt, have been surprised, after hearing me address you not long ago at the meeting at St. Albans on the subject of the Corn Laws—you must have been surprised, I say, to hear me express the sentiments I have just uttered (hear, hear). Gentlemen, I own—and I do so with a feeling somewhat akin to shame—that the sentiments I then expressed were adopted by me at the time when Providence first cast me among you, previous to which period I took but little interest in this subject. I found myself cast among those whose lot was fixed to the soil, and whose whole interest and prosperity were dependent on the soil, and at a moment when the subject of the Corn Laws first became most interesting. With that facility which most people are too apt to show in adopting opinions that apparently favour their own interests, I adopted the opinions of those among whom I was classed, and I take shame to myself, when I say that I did so without duly inquiring and fairly considering the subject. I continued to maintain those opinions until I saw that the question was coming to a crisis; and then I found, after deep consideration and strict inquiry, that those opinions were erroneous. I saw that the crisis would shortly arrive, when, in the House of Lords, I should be called upon to give a vote upon this question, and I then felt that my preconceived opinions, however honest they might have been, were not sufficient grounds on which to give a vote on this deeply-important subject. I felt that as a member of the House of Lords, I was bound to reconsider the question—as an honest man to give an unbiassed vote; and therefore to devote the same attention and give the same good consideration to every argument and statement made on one side of the question, as I am ashamed to say, I had hitherto given only to those on the other. The result was, that I came to the conclusion that the fears which are entertained on this subject will prove erroneous. I have already stated that I believe the new measure will be productive of great good. When I consider the progressive state of the population of this country—a population increasing a thousand souls a day—I cannot believe that the farming of this country, however much it has improved, can possibly keep pace with that increase of the population. When you consider that the first want of all people is a sufficiency of food, I think you will allow that the measure is justified by the circumstances of the times; and I would have you take my word for it, that the employment of capital, and the exercise of skill, will not be injurious, but will produce this effect—that both the employed and employer will be ultimately more happy and prosperous."

To such a frank confession every Free Trader must respond, and as frankly adopt his lordship into the brotherhood of those who seek to untrammel British, aye human, industry. There is one point, however, on which we wish Lord Essex had spoken as explicitly—namely, game. Our readers will remember his controversy with Mr. Horncastle his tenant, on the subject of game preserving, in which the earl having been worsted, turned the tenant out of his farm. We hope that his lordship implied his own abandonment of game preserving when he said he was ready "to afford any other security to his tenants to induce them to farm on a liberal scale." Assuredly the tenant can have no "security" unless he has complete power over the game.

GAME LAW JUSTICE.

WHO SHALL WATCH THE WATCHERS?

We have of late rather abstained from adverting to the Game Law nuisance, because we have reason to believe, from the character of the witnesses examined before the Game Law Committee and their opportunities of knowing the evils of game preserving, that a case so conclusively condemnatory of the Game Laws will be made out as to render their speedy abolition imperative. There is, however, a case reported in the Bury Post of last week, which is so characteristic that it ought not to be withheld.

It appears that Mr. Cooper, of Ingram—who was examined before the Game Law Committee last year—had reason to suspect that he was robbed by his farm servants, in connection with some other person; and, after watching for a long time, he discovered that two of his barnsmen, in concert with a man named Dodman, a gamekeeper of the Rev. Mr. Benyon's, Mr. Cooper's landlord, were the thieves. They were apprehended; and though committed for trial for the felony, Dodman was forthwith bailed by the head keeper, under their master's direction, and the man is now again prowling about Mr. Cooper's farm.

The Rev. Mr. Benyon, we understand, is much addicted to the evil habit of game preserving. The following passage, from the evidence given before the magistrate need no comment. It was stated:

"When Mr. Cooper received the information in December, he was likewise told that a cave was actually dug in a plantation near his house, which contained about 30 acres, and was held so sacred for game that Mr. Cooper was not even allowed to go into it; and if his hens laid eggs there, it was almost a trespass if the boy went in after them; and his house and other dogs, if they ventured in, were trapped. Till he made the discovery about the cave, Mr. Cooper had never once entered the plantation, knowing how sacred it was held; but in December he went in, and there he found the cave, and corn in it; he afterwards went, day after day, to the cave, and found that the corn gradually diminished, then it became replenished; still by no possibility could he find how it was got there."

Mr. Cooper, when examined, stated:

"On the 25th of March, Richard Devereux, my yardman and foreman, by my orders placed himself in a blacksmith's shop which commanded a view of the road between my barn and the plantation, and of a path in the plantation leading in a zigzag direction to a spot where a cave was dug. That cave, I should imagine, is not an old cave—it is dug about 6 feet long, 4½ feet wide, and about 4 feet deep. It is covered with spars across it, and clods and moulds are thrown over it, so that it is nearly level with the earth. It would hold perhaps about 12 or 14 combs of corn. I went to Bury market last Wednesday week about ten A.M., and from information I received I returned home a little after one. I then changed my dress, and went to my yardman, who was near the blacksmith's shop. He told me what he had seen, and went with me into the plantation, and we found there two sacks with spruce fir boughs covered over them. One of those sacks is mine, my name being on it; the name on the other is obliterated, but I have no doubt that it is also mine. They were filled with the 'spoutings' from the machine when barley is dressed. I should say the two sacks contain at the least two, if not three, bushels of the best barley. I then secreted myself in the plantation by covering myself with the sere boughs and leaves. I remained there till a little after 5 o'clock, when I saw Dodman come into the plantation and go to the spot where the sacks were concealed by boughs, and look at them, and walk round them. He then walked away. A few minutes before six I heard a gun fired in the plantation, I do not know by whom. The plantation contains between 20 and 30 acres. A few minutes afterwards James Petch came into the plantation and went towards the direction from where the gun was fired. I then could see the legs of two persons underneath the trees. In about three quarters of an hour after the firing of the gun, Dodman came up (he had then a cap on, but on his first coming into the plantation he had a hat on) with James Petch from the thicker part of the plantation to the spots where the sacks were concealed. Dodman took one of the sacks on his shoulder, being assisted by Petch to get it up, and James Petch tried to take away the other. Dodman proceeded into the thick of the plantation in the direction of the cave. Petch being a small man could not get his sack, which weighed about 13 stone, away, though he tried to do so. The direction to the cave is away from my barn. I immediately got up and went to Dodman, and laid my hands on his shoulders, saying 'There can be no mistake about this question now: I have been watching you these three months, and now, my man, I have caught you plainly enough in the very act!' I had seriously suspected Dodman, knowing that as the plantation was so sacred for game, that any thing going on there must be with the keeper's cognisance. Dodman's reply to me was, 'It is only seeds, and I have paid the man (or men) for them—I gave them sixpence a sack for them.' Sixpence would not be the value of the contents of the sacks. There was in each sack at least a bushel of barley worth three and sixpence a bushel, and the other parts, consisting of refuse seeds, &c. was worth about a shilling. Dodman then began to abuse me, and scuffle with me. I gave a signal, which I had agreed upon to my man Devereux, who then came up. When he appeared Dodman said to him, 'Holloa, Devereux, here is some of your old seeds.' Petch had no authority from me to sell seeds, nor has any one else in my employ, from my barn. I consume them myself, boiling them with linseed for the sake of the oil, after the plan recommended by Mr. Warnes, of Norfolk. Last winter I kept a quantity of bullocks on the oil from these seeds mixed with linseed and corn. The seeds were 'fat-hen,' and poppy seeds, and seeds of all descriptions. When these seeds have been very dry and very bad I have laid them where they might exhaust themselves by growth, so that they were not carried on the land. I do not allow them to be given away or sold to the keeper for the game, because seeds do not decompose in the bodies of fowls, and when they drop their dung the seeds lie and germinate; my land is too full already of the plants, and I want to prevent the evil being extended further. On the 16th of December, when I first went to the cave, I found in it about 50 combs of colder and ordinary barley (without seeds), of which I took away a sample, now produced. These appeared as if taken from the barn floor when threshing was going on."

Mr. Cooper then identified the sacks as his, and stated that the corn stolen was worth 8s. a sack. And added:

"On one occasion, about a month since, on going to the cave I found an obstruction to my drawing the faggot from the mouth of the cave, and, on stooping down to force the faggot away, I pulled the trigger of a spring gun. The noise and smoke quite unnerved and alarmed me, but I received no shot; I was too frightened to think of looking whether shot had hit any of the trees round about. The gun was attached to one of the rafters of the cave. Dodman has the care of the plantation, and is keeper. The property belongs to the Rev. E. R. Benyon. My barn door is about 10 yards from the entrance to the plantation."

The following is from the evidence of Devereux, Mr. Cooper's foreman, who had been set to watch when the discovery was made:

"He was, by his master, stationed as a watch in a blacksmith's shop, which had a wicker window at the side, from whence he could have a full view of the path from the barn up the plantation. He went into the shop about 10 o'clock in the morning, and at about 11 he saw James Petch go into the little plantation, or, neck of the bigger one, in a direction from Mr. Cooper's barn, with a full sack on his back. Witness could not see up to the cave, nor within 40 yards of it. He lost sight of Petch, but in about five minutes he came back again towards the barn without anything on his back. In about another five or ten minutes after that he saw him come again in a direction from the barn with another full sack on his back, and go in the same direction as before. He soon returned without any sack, and went towards the barn, and witness saw nothing further going on. James Petch could not have got the sacks on his shoulders without assistance. In about 20 minutes after witness left the blacksmith's shop, and went into the plantation in the direction he had seen Petch go with the sacks, and he found them under a spruce tree covered up with spruce boughs. They were full of undressed barley. He did not examine sufficiently to see if there were any marks on the sacks. He then left the plantation, and sent off to Bury for his master. He had been in the barn about an hour before he saw James Petch go into the plantation with the sacks. James and Benjamin Petch were the two only men at work in the barn. He saw there two heaps, one of spoutings and the other of screenings. One was a small heap—the other a large one. About half an hour after seeing the sacks carried into the plantation he went into the barn, where only the two Petches were. He found the small heap of screenings gone, and the large heap of spoutings much diminished. The Petches were uncle and nephew. In the spoutings there is a portion of good barley, in the screenings very little—the spoutings would be dressed again, but the screenings would not. He should say in the spoutings there would be pretty nearly half of best barley; in a sack of them he was sure there would be a bushel of the best barley. It was considered that spoutings always threw off the largest and best barley. Witness by his master's direction was on the look out in the afternoon. About 6 o'clock he heard a gun fired in the plantation, and soon after saw James Petch go into it by the same path as before. About half an hour after Mr. Cooper gave him a call, and he went to him; he found him with Dodman near, and one of the sacks by his side. Dodman said to witness, 'Devereux, I have got some of your seeds here.' He believed this was all that passed then. Dodman said nothing about buying them. On Saturday last witness met Dodman in his walks, and Dodman said, 'Well, Devereux, we have got into smoke,' or something of that sort. Witness replied, 'I don't know much about how that is.' Dodman said, 'I don't care anything about it, because I had never any thing off the premises, except what was brought into the plantation, and that I bought (or was allowed); I saw the two sacks lying in the plantation an hour before ever I touched them; I thought perhaps it might be a trap laid for me, and for that reason I would not meddle with them till the man came. I will defy the men in the yard, or about the premises, ever to say they saw me interfere with anything upon the premises, till the men brought in this, and they told me they had leave to sell it.' He also said he gave sixpence a sack for it, which he was always allowed to give for refuse seeds. Witness did not know of there being a cave in the plantation till Mr. Cooper told him of it. He had never been allowed, nor had others, to go into the plantation."

"The magistrate, the Rev. Mr. Bidwell, said it would be his duty to send both of the parties for trial; but he was willing to take bail, themselves for 50*l.*, and two sureties for 2*l.* each, or one good surety for 50*l.*, that they would appear to answer the charge at the next Quarter Sessions."

"Ayres, the head gamekeeper to Mr. Benyon, who at his master's desire had been present at the hearing of the case, instantly gave bail for Dodman, for 50*l.*"

"Several parties came forward to offer bail for Petch; but on being questioned by Mr. Bidwell, were not considered sufficiently responsible. Amongst them, was a man who had been convicted by Mr. Cooper, for felony; of course his offer of bail was immediately refused."

Of course the taking bail was only intended for the gamekeeper's benefit. We believe Mr. Grantley Berkeley, and other game-preservers of the "punch-in-the-head" school, assert that the gamekeepers and game-watchers are, at all events, effective protectors of the farmers' property, or so much of it as is not wanted to feed his landlord's game. What will the vermin-protectors say to this case?

MORE MONOPOLIST EVIDENCE FOR FREE TRADE.

It seems that Lord Abingdon, like the Marquis of Salisbury, is practically giving the lie to the loudly-made "protectionist" assertion, that Free Trade will drive poor land out of cultivation. The very reverse is the truth. Here is the practical testimony of a monopolist witness:

"CULTIVATION OF WASTE LANDS.—The Earl of Abingdon has for some time past caused employment to be given to a great number of labourers, under the superintendence of Mr. Druce, an eminent agriculturist, of Ensham, Oxon, in clearing a large tract of land, thickly studded with furze and gorse, at Cumnor, Berks, situate about three miles west of the city of Oxford, known as Cumnor-heath and Cumnor-hurst, a noted warren for rabbits, and also a harbour for other game, very much to the destruction of the adjoining crops, and which from time immemorial has been lying waste. Last year his lordship caused a portion of it to be cleared for agricultural purposes, and the results of the crops then produced were highly satisfactory, so much so, that during the past winter another portion has been cleared and planted, and during the present spring it is expected that the whole of it will be brought into good cultivation. Whatever the Earl of Abingdon's opinions may be respecting the measures of Sir R. Peel, it is scarcely necessary to inquire if he entertains the notion that Free Trade will either depreciate the value of land in this country, or cause it to go out of cultivation altogether; indeed, if we may judge from the great outlay in bringing this large tract of land into cultivation, and also that it is being carried out on the very eve of the downfall of protection, it may be fairly inferred that the contrary is his lordship's opinion. This is the commencement of a system which might be most advantageously carried out in the neighbourhood of Oxford, for within a few miles of that city there are upwards of 1000 acres of land which are comparatively of little value, but might easily be made available for agricultural purposes. We allude to Port Meadow, the property of the freemen of the city of Oxford and inhabitants of Wolvercot, containing between 500 and 600 acres of as rich and fertile land as any in the county of Oxford—the meadow is fed without stint all the year round (except when under water), and is only serviceable peculiarly to those parties who can afford to stock it—the poor freemen not having even the privilege of letting their commons.—Times."

EMIGRATION.—For the last fortnight our quays have been daily thronged with the fine and stalwart peasantry of this and the adjoining counties, preparing to emigrate to various parts of the transatlantic world. Perhaps upon no former occasion, even before the hope of railway employment was held out to the people, and when "Government grants" for their relief were never heard of, did the number of emigrants from this quarter exceed the proportion of the present year. Besides the various large and full freighted vessels which have left the quays of Cork direct for America, several ships were despatched to the west of the county, and had no difficulty in obtaining their full complement of passengers. The Triumph and the Leviathan, two large ships chartered by Mr. Marmion, of Skibbereen, went round to Berehaven a few days ago, and have since left the shores of that bleak district with over 200 passengers. The St. Laurence, the Ponzola, the Albion, the Brothers, and some other vessels, have proceeded or are about to proceed also for Baltimore and Berehaven, localities in which the destitution of the present year has been severely felt. Three hundred persons have been ready for the last fortnight to embark from Dingle, but not being able to get a ship to visit them sufficiently commodious for their accommodation, have been obliged to make the best of their way to Cork. Several vessels now lying at Passage will sail this day, among which are (from Mr. Murray) the Marian, for Quebec, with 250 passengers; the Ocean, for St. John's, with 200 passengers; and the Bacha M'Evors, for St. Andrew's, with 150 passengers. From the same office the Princess, the Albion, the Lord Glenelg, and his Effingham, will start some time in the present month. The Effingham, now lying at Cove, is one of the largest emigration vessels ever from Cork. She registers 1500 tons, and has accommodation for 500 passengers. The Ellen and Margaret, from the office of Mr. O'Neil, Merchant's Quay, and the Urania for Quebec, will sail this day for St. John's, New Brunswick, with about 240 passengers. The Thomas Hungerford, with 126 passengers, the Woodland Castle, 106 passengers, the Champlain, with 166, and Princess Royal, are also being despatched by the same agent. Many of these vessels are conveying cabin passengers, comfortable farmers, who do not like the prospects of the times at home. A great number of agricultural labourers are among the emigrants from the counties of Limerick and Tipperary. The Adirandock for New York, the Pallas for St. John's, and the Coxen, sailed since the middle of March, chartered at the office of Mr. M'Auliffe, and containing over 600 passengers—the vessels yet to be despatched from this office being the Brilliant, Try Again, Ohio, Trident, and Liberty, the aggregate freight of which will be over 1200 passengers. At a moderate computation about 9000 emigrants have, or within the next month will have left this port for America. It is to be hoped their anticipations will be realised. There can be little fear, however, that their condition could be worse, or their prospects more disheartening, than those which the "potato famine" in this country, little mended by the promise of Indian corn, had occasioned.—La faim chasse le loup hors du bois. To starve or emigrate are the only alternatives of the people.—Cork Reporter.

STATE OF TRADE.—We regret to state that the trade in this district is in a very languid state, and that a failure to a large amount has occurred during the last few days, which will very much affect the small manufacturers of Horton, Clayton, and that neighbourhood. Work at Mr. Rouse's mill has been partly resumed, in consequence of the Lord Chancellor having appointed a receiver and manager, and the differences among the partners having been to some extent arranged.—Leeds Mercury.

THE EARL OF ESSEX AND FREE TRADE.

The first annual meeting of the Watford Farmers' Club was held on Tuesday, the 7th instant, and was very numerously attended by the landlords and tenant-farmers of the district. After the routine business an animated discussion took place relative to tenants' rights, which terminated in the adoption of a resolution to the effect that the tenant farmer is entitled to receive from the landlord, upon quitting a farm, full compensation for any capital expended in improvements. The members of the club dined together in the evening at the Essex Arms, the President of the Society (the Earl of Essex) taking the chair.

The usual loyal and patriotic toasts having been drunk, The Noble Chairman rose to propose "Success to the Watford Farmers' Club." After alluding to the practically useful character of such associations, the noble Lord said, that although hitherto political topics had been excluded, yet he trusted he might be excused if he presumed to offer a few remarks upon a question of great importance to the agricultural community, and which had recently engaged the attention of the Legislature—he need not say that he alluded to the Corn Laws (hear, hear). At no period in our lives (said the noble earl)—indeed, at no period in the history of the country, has it ever been so absolutely necessary for all who are connected with agriculture to exert themselves to the utmost not only to advance themselves in the profession they have chosen, but even to keep their heads above water. That prop on which you have hitherto depended—on which you have been accustomed to lean for years, and which you have been accustomed to consider as conducive to your success—that prop, upon which you have so long relied is, I believe, about to be removed. I say that the broken reed, protection, which heretofore you have depended upon, is about to be taken away from you. The time is coming, gentlemen, when we must assist each other. I think you will all agree with me that if it was ever essential, it is now more than ever necessary that you should exert yourselves in order to evade that which you may at present regard as a calamity to the agricultural body. Let us calmly consider what is proposed to be done; and whatever the difficulties may be, let us endeavour to meet them manfully. No doubt, by a great measure of this sort, as by all great measures, however beneficial they may be to the mass of the people at large, some persons must suffer. That is the inevitable consequence of all great changes. On this occasion there are two classes of farmers who are more liable than any others to be injured. The first class comprehends all those who have been farming without capital—men who, I say, and I say it with greater freedom, because I believe there are none here in that situation—men who never should have been farmers at all; because it is clear, that if there is an occupation in which, owing to the vicissitudes of the seasons, capital is absolutely necessary, it is that of farming. I therefore frankly and freely say, that if those who are farming, as it is called, from hand to mouth—men who ought not to be farmers—if such men should suffer from this change, however much we may be sorry for the individuals, yet we shall not be surprised. The next class likely to be seriously affected is those who, having capital, possess not sufficient confidence in their own energies, or in the productive powers of the soil, to employ that capital to the best advantage. With regard to that class, I say that if, in addition to their unwillingness to employ capital, they should also feel an unwillingness to throw over their deep-rooted prejudices, and many of those antiquated ideas which still exist in the breasts of many farmers; if they feel themselves unwilling again to go to school, and to benefit by the advantages of science and the experience of others, both of which are now so lavishly offered them; if they are unwilling to enter the race of improvement which is now so general throughout the country; to those men, I must say, as their best friend, that they should leave their profession before they lose the remainder of their fortunes (hear, hear). For if they determine to stand still while others are advancing, they will find that those who are possessed of more energy and enterprise will outrun and cast them down. These are the classes of men who will suffer most from the great changes which are about to take place. There is another class, who have capital, and who, I believe, cannot better employ it than by putting it on the land; for of this I am convinced, that if you behave liberally and handsomely to the land, it will return a liberal and handsome interest. Those men who have the courage to avow and throw over their ancient prejudices, and who possess minds sufficiently intelligent to induce them to adopt all known improvements, those men, I believe, will live to see the day when these measures from which so much of evil is anticipated by them, will be found to confer the greatest benefit upon themselves, and the country in general; and agriculturists will arrive, I think, at a pitch of prosperity hitherto unknown. They will find that that which they have hitherto been disposed to depend upon as their best protection is most fallacious in practice; they will find that it robbed them of one-half of the energy, which, as Englishmen of intelligence, they ought to possess; they will find that they have been ignorant of what they themselves have been capable of doing, and of what the soil of England is capable of producing; they will find themselves as ignorant in these respects as a man who having been accustomed to go upon crutches all his life, is of what he could do were he restored to the use of his limbs. They will find that what is commonly called high farming, is the course which they must in future pursue—that they must not fear liberally to use the great advantages of farming with sheep and artificial manures, which last I look upon as a positive gift of Providence—above all they will find it necessary to increase their quantity of live stock; they will find it necessary to have such crops of turnips that they may still continue to keep as large a stock of sheep as they do now, and still be able to carry a third or a fourth of the crop from the yard to fatten bullocks, and thereby make such an increase in the quantity and quality of the dung as shall repay them. A few weeks ago, I saw in the yard of Mr. Reed, a tenant of mine, a number of fine, fresh looking bullocks, all of which had been kept on turnips, and which seemed in good condition, and ready for the butcher, without having cost beyond the value of the turnips upon which sheep had been fed at the same time. I would willingly see the same in the yards not only of my own tenants but of all the farmers of the country; and if that were the case—"a consummation most devoutly to be wished"—we should have abundance of corn and abundance of meat, the produce of our own soil, brought to market at prices, it is true, comparatively low with the present prices, but yet, by the abundance of the article, remunerative to the producer, and at the same time cheap to the consumer. Far from maintaining that high prices are necessary for our prosperity, I believe that the prosperity of our interest and that of our fellow countrymen depend not on the high prices of articles, but rather on their abundance. I believe, for instance, it is more advantageous for all of us to grow four quarters an acre at 40s. than three quarters at 50s. So with regard to meat, I should wish to see so great a quantity of meat produced in this country, that the farmers could afford to sell it at two thirds of the price it now fetches. What, I ask, would be the consequence of that? Why, that those who now only touch meat once or twice in the week at the utmost, would be enabled to eat it three times in the week; and thus as regards the producer, the increased consumption would more than equal the diminution in price (hear, hear). Now, with respect to the manufacturers, I believe that the measures to which I have alluded will prove most beneficial to them, and I am firmly convinced, from the sympathy which exists between the manufacturing and agricultural interests, that whatever is advantageous to the one must be conducive to the welfare of the other. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact, that one great cause of the prosperity of the manufacturers was, that, notwithstanding they have had taxes of all sorts to contend with, and also a high tax on raw materials which they manufactured, they have proved themselves superior to all the manufacturers of the world. And let us see why so? Why, for this simple reason—the British manufacturer has employed his capital skilfully and liberally; he has, on all occasions, adopted new improvements in mechanics, and invariably profited by the advantages which every fresh discovery in science could confer upon him. I would venture to hold out the same inducements to you as agriculturists, and say that the liberal and judicious employment of your capital will enable you, as it has enabled the manufacturer to compete, and that successfully, with the whole world. I have urged that which I think necessary to enable you, as farmers, to stand up against the coming changes. I recommend you to employ skill, science, energy, and capital. Skill and energy will not cost you anything, you may acquire skill from books, and from the publications of all sorts in which is offered the experience of others; the energy must come from yourselves. But, perhaps, you will say that capital costs something. Granted; most of you who are now present, I have no doubt, attended the meeting before dinner, at which the question of tenants' rights was very properly discussed. I need not repeat what was there said in reference to the employment of capital in agriculture. Perhaps I may be permitted, however, to observe that, as a landlord, I have long been and am still convinced that the tenant-farmers of this country are entitled to ample remuneration for all the improvements which they may make in their landlord's property (cheers). If they have put manure upon the land, or have improved the buildings, and if they leave their farms before the expiration of the value of those improvements, I, as a landlord, do not hesitate to state that they are fully entitled to be remunerated for the value of their unexhausted improvements; and I say to my tenants now, that when they are willing to make improvements in the buildings, or by increasing the value of the soil, I pledge myself that when they leave any of my farms they shall be amply remunerated for the unexpired value of such improvements as they may have made (loud cheers). I am now anxious to say a few words in reference to myself, and to the course which I propose taking at this momentous crisis. Many of you, no doubt, have been surprised, after hearing me address you not very long ago, at the meeting at St. Albans, on the subject of the Corn Laws—you must have been surprised, I say, to hear me express the sentiments I have just uttered (hear, hear). Gentlemen, I own, and I do so with a feeling somewhat akin to shame, that the sentiments I then expressed were adopted by me at the time when Providence first cast me amongst you, and previous to which I took little interest in this subject. I found myself cast amongst those whose lot was fixed to the soil; whose whole interests and property were dependent on the soil; and at a moment when the Corn Laws first became a subject of prominent interest among all those connected with the land. With that facility which most people are too apt to show in adopting opinions that apparently favour their own interests, I fell in with the view of those with whom I was classed; and I take shame to myself that I did so without duly inquiring into and fairly considering the subject. I continued to maintain those opinions until I saw that the question was coming to a crisis, and then I found, after due reflection and strict inquiry, that those opinions were erroneous. I saw that the time was approaching when, in the House of Lords, I should be called upon to give a vote on the question of the Corn Laws. I then felt that my preconceived opinions, however honest they might have been, were not sufficient grounds to give my vote on this important subject. I felt that, as a member of the House of Lords, I was bound to consider the question—as an honest man it was my duty to give an unbiased vote, and therefore to devote the same attention, and give the same good and careful consideration to every argument and statement made on one side of the question, as, I am ashamed to confess, I had heretofore given only to those advanced on the other side. The result was, that I came to the conclusion that the fears which are entertained on this subject will prove unfounded. I have already stated that I believe the new measures will be productive of great general good. I see now that we have been accustomed to regard this question only in a partial light—that we have not hitherto taken that wide and comprehensive view of it which its vast importance demands. When I consider the progressive state of the population of this country—a population increasing at the rate of 1000 per day—I cannot believe that the farming of this country, however much it has improved—and no one is more willing than I am to bear testimony to the fact that it has improved, and is still rapidly improving—still, I say, I cannot think that the farming of this country can possibly keep pace with the increase of the population. That is a strong argument in favour of the new measure. When you consider that the first want of all people is a sufficiency of food, I think that you will allow that the law is called for by the circumstances of the times; and I would have you take my word for it, that the employment of capital and the exercise of skill will not be injurious, but will produce the most beneficial effect. Every class will unite for the general good, old animosities be laid aside, and ultimately both the employer and the employed will become more contented, prosperous, and happy. The noble lord concluded by proposing "Success to the Watford Farmers' Club," which was drunk with the usual honours.

Several other toasts followed, amongst which was "The health of the Earl of Essex, President of the Association," and, notwithstanding the surprise excited by the noble lord's unlooked for declaration in favour of Free Trade, the toast was drunk with much cordiality, even by some of the more zealous advocates of protection, a compliment paid, no doubt, to Lord Essex in his private character as a landlord. Two or three of the subsequent speakers dissented from his lordship's view of the question, but the company separated in perfect good humour.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

KNOWLES, Appellant, v. BROOKING, Respondent.

Judgment.—CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—The question reserved for our determination by the revising barrister in this case is, whether the notices of objection against the name of a person being retained on the list of voters for the borough, which notices were signed by him as objector, with the addition of the true place of abode, but being another and different place from that inserted against his name on the list of voters, are sufficient? The revising barrister held the notices to be sufficient; and although the question may be subject to considerable doubt, and one of my learned brothers, for whose judgment I entertain the greatest respect, thinks differently, the opinion I have been compelled to arrive at is, that the revising barrister's decision was right. The forms of the law notices on which the precise question turns are there numbered 10 and 11 in schedule B in the Registration Act, 6 Vic., c. 18; and it is on the construction of those forms that the question must necessarily turn. But it may receive some light from the consideration of the form numbered 4 and 5 in schedule A of the same Act, and also from the form, since repealed, given in schedules H and J in the statute 2 Wm. IV., c. 45. The form in question, numbered 10 and 11 in schedule B, concludes thus: "Signed, A. B., of —," then there is "place of abode" in parenthesis—"on the list of voters for the parish of —;" and the appellant contends that these outer words operate as a direction given to the objector that he must fill up the "place of abode" by inserting it against his name "on the list of voters." But the respondent, on the other hand, contends that the words meant no more than a simple allegation that the objector's name is on the list of voters, as it was required it should be by section 17 of the statute; for it is to be observed, that the 17th section requires only that the name of the objector shall have been inserted on the list of voters for the borough, and that he shall give the notice of objection to the overseers, according to the form numbered 10 in the schedule B, "or to the like effect; or that he shall also cause to be given or left at the place of abode of the person objected to, as stated in the same list, the notice according to the form numbered" in the same schedule. So that the question substantially turns upon the construction of the form so referred to in the statute. And it appears to me that, looking to the concluding words of those two forms, they could not in any manner qualify the sense of what had preceded, namely, the "place of abode," or in any manner refer to the "place of abode" contained in the list of voters; but that the whole sentence is satisfied if the true place of abode of the objector at the time of giving the notice is inserted in the notice. The words between the parenthesis are only "place of abode," words which, taken absolutely and by themselves, and in their natural sense, would denote the true place of abode of the party objecting, for the words between the parenthesis are not "place of abode on the list of voters," which necessarily require the construction contended for by the appellant; nor are the words as "in the list of voters;" which latter form would also necessarily require the same construction. But the words within the parenthesis are simply "place of abode;" and the words that follow contain the distinction that such "place of abode" is not the "place of abode" to be found "on the list of voters;" and it appears to me to confirm this construction of the form, as in the 17th section, that gives the form of notice. The notice that is to be given to the parties, is directed to be left at the "place of abode" of the person objected to, as stated "in the list." Whereas the form itself, when referring to the "place of abode" of the objector, says no more than "place of abode;" and as that may be considered as actually inserted in the body of the 17th section, this distinction, with respect to the place of abode of the person objecting and that of the person objected to, still further sanctions the argument as to the interpretation to be put upon it. The former obviously refers to the corresponding notices in schedule A of the same Act, in cases of objections to the names of voters being retained on the register; and we hold this view of the objection is confirmed. But schedule A, No. 4, which is the form of notice to be given to the overseers, contains two columns; the one headed "Christian and surname of the voter objected to, as described in the list of voters;" the second is, "place of abode as described;" but the signature of the objector himself is only required to be "A. B." (place of abode), simply, and nothing more. In that form, the place of abode of the objector must in its natural sense be construed as the "place of abode" in which he then is, and no other; more particularly when contrasted with the requisition as to the place of abode of the party objected to, which is required to be "as described on the register." The form that immediately follows, schedule A, No. 5, leads to the same conclusion. The name and the "place of abode" of the party objected to, are required to be inserted "as described in the list;" the name of the objector to be signed "A. B., of —," (place of abode) on the register." We may finish the remainder of this form of notice, by number 5, in which the words are for the first time signed "on the list of voters." In all the preceding forms, both that given to the overseers, No. 4, and also in all the forms of notice given under the statute 2 Wm. IV., ch. 45, the signature is directed to be "A. B., of —" (place of abode), and nothing more. By the notice of objection under the statute of William, with those which direct only the form of notice of objection to be given to the overseer in the schedule A, No. 4, we are satisfied by adopting the place of abode of the objector at the time, no more than the old place of abode being required; while in the one of those cases there is certainly nothing in the reason of the thing that would call for the insertion of the very same place of abode of the objector as given in the list in the other remaining forms given by the statute. I cannot say that such an objection is made necessary by the enacting words of the statute in the forms of the schedule. The words "on the list of voters" appear to me no more than a simple allegation of the existence of a fact that has been made essential by the 17th section, namely, that the objector's name is on the "register" for the county, and the "list of voters" for the borough, as the case may be. The fact is one that may be determined by the overseers without reference to the list, or by the party objected to by inspecting such "register" or "list" that he has prepared, which they are not to do; and though it is objected that if the new description is given for the first time of the objector's place of abode, it must give rise to difficulty and confusion, it seems a sufficient answer that no real difficulty can follow, unless there happens to be more than one voter on the same register or list having the same Christian name and surname; and if there is but one, then it must be that of the objector, and no other; and if there be but one, all the difficulty will be removed if there is a proper description, namely, in the case of the borough franchise. If therefore the identity of the objector must be made out, then the mentioning and giving the true place of abode of the objector must afford a better opportunity of inquiry and communication than the adding of the old place of abode, which it must be assumed for some cause or other is incorrect with regard to giving the notice. On the ground, therefore, that the construction above given of the form of notice appears the most natural and correct, and that it is confirmed by the heading of the forms as above adverted to, I have arrived at the conclusion that the decision of the revising barrister is right. It would be futile to enter into an examination of the relative convenience or inconvenience that should arise from this view of the case, because it appears to me that whatever may be the result in that respect, our determination ought to rest on the words of the statute.

Mr. JUSTICE COLTMAN.—I concur with the Lord Chief Justice in the opinion he has expressed on the subject of the present appeal. I am not able to go so fully into a consideration of the construction contended for, but I am, however, of the opinion held by the Lord Chief Justice, and I think it the most plain and natural meaning, and it is that which ought to be adopted; for it seems to me the words "place of abode," at the bottom of the form number 10 in the schedule B of the Act of Victoria, c. 18, in their natural sense do mean the true place of abode; and it must be so understood, unless some words of qualification are added to it. The following words on the list of voters for the parish of —, "do describe the quality of the objector himself, but not, as it seems to me, the quality of the place in which he lives. John Brooking, the objector, is truly said to be on the list of voters for the parish of St. Saviours," and it cannot be said with propriety of language, as of "Higher-street, Dartmouth, on the list of voters for the parish of St. Saviours." If the intention of the Act had been to require him to state, not the true place of abode, but that described in the list, it would have said so in plain terms, and the forms would have been "place of abode as described in the list, or to the like effect." And I have been rather led to this conclusion from the use of the terms "to that effect," in the form of the schedule A, number 4 and 5, the words used in number 4 being place of abode, as described, and the words in number 5 being place of abode, as described in the list. The reasons for the construction I have put on the forms principally in question have been already stated, and are so distinctly shown by my Lord Chief Justice that I do not think it necessary to add anything further.

Mr. JUSTICE ERLE.—I fully concur in the judgment given by my Lord Chief Justice and by my brother Colman. It was objected that the notice of objection was void because it did not contain that which is stated on the list of voters to be his place of abode. The question turns upon the proper construction of the words directing the signature in the forms 10 and 11, schedule B, in the 6th of Vic., c. 18, "A. B. (place of abode) on the list of voters for the parish of B." The appellant contends "on the list of voters" is indicative of the place of abode. By the 2d William 4, c. 45, he is required to give the place of abode, signed A. B., place of abode, and those words require the true place of abode. By the 6th of Victoria, the insertion of the name of the objector in the list of voters is the whole qualification; and the forms 10 and 11 require not only the name, but the addition of "on the list of voters." According to the reasonable construction, as it seems to me, of the words used, the two statements denote the same office as the additional words employed, though not really containing a statement as to the qualification. According to the appellant, the words, "on the list of voters," applied to the place of abode, are construed as meaning, "A. B., on the list of voters." To this there were several objections: 1st, the words must be altered before they express this meaning, for they are incapable of such an application; 2d., when so altered, they will contain a material statement when so applied to the name that is material to show the qualification; 3d., the meaning contended for could not be given to the same words, as the two Acts are in pari materia; and 4thly, if, to describe the place of abode was intended, those words would have been used; where they are used in both statements, the notice is referred to the last place of abode. There is no reason to say, on looking at the forms numbers 10 and 11, and what is required to be given in respect of the place of abode, that he is to give any other than his true place of abode. I cannot discover any good effect from requiring "place of abode in the list," instead of the true place of abode. If a communication is contemplated, by giving the true place of abode, where the name occurs only once, the identity is clear without any more being said; if the name occurs twice, the defect is easily remedied. For these reasons I concur in the judgment that has been given.

CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—My brother Maule is not able to attend to-day, but he has given his judgment to Mr. Erle, who will read it for him.

[Mr. JUSTICE ERLE then read the judgment of Mr. Justice Maule, as follows.]

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the borough of Dartmouth. It was contended that the notices of objection which had been given to the overseers, and to the persons objected to, were sufficient. These notices concluded with the words "(signed) John Brooking, Higher-street, Dartmouth, on the list of voters for the parish of St. Saviours." The place of abode of the objector is mentioned on the list of voters referred to, as "New-road," and not "Higher street;" the fact being that, although he had offices in "New-road," his place of abode was "Higher-street." The notices were objected to, on the ground that they omitted the place of abode as mentioned in the list referred to. The Act 6th Victoria, c. 11, requires, in section 13, the overseers of every parish in the borough to make out the list of persons entitled to vote according to the forms numbered 3 and 4 in schedule B: that the Christian and surname of each person on the list shall be written at full length, with the true place of abode, and the nature of the qualification. The forms numbered 3 and 4 in question have columns for the Christian and surname, at full length, and the place of abode. Section 17 gives to any person whose name shall have been inserted in any list of voters for the borough, power to object to any other persons as not being entitled to have their names inserted on the list; and it provides that he shall give notice of his objection according to the forms numbered 10 and 11 in schedule B. The forms 10 and 11 conclude thus—"Dated this day of (Signed) A. B., of (place of abode), on the list of voters for the parish of —."

The question is, whether this provision as to the notices has been complied with; in other words, whether a notice is deficient which wholly omits all mention of the objection as it appears on the list of voters? For the appellant it was insisted that this section of the Act required the place of abode of the objector as it appeared on the list of voters to which the notice refers, and that it must appear on the notice; for in cases where there has been a mistake in the list of voters, or a change of abode since it was made out, it might or might not be necessary to add a mention of "the place of abode" at the date of the objection. For the respondent it was contended, the place of abode required to be mentioned was that at the date of the objection, and that the Act did not require any mention of the place of abode as it appeared on the list of voters. And the question to be decided depends upon the construction of the 17th section of the 6th of Victoria, c. 18, and the notice of objection therein prescribed. It may be convenient to consider the general nature and purposes of the Act in which the section in question occurs. The Act 2 Wm. IV., c. 45, "for the better representation of the people of England and Wales," contains, as incidental to the important changes it makes, certain provisions for forming the register of persons entitled to vote for members of Parliament. These provisions having been insufficient, the Act 8th Victoria, c. 18 was passed, of which the principal object was to make a new set of regulations for forming the register of voters. This Act has accordingly made many additions to, and alterations in, the provisions relating to the Registration Act of William, among which are to be noticed, first, the Act of William that gives in section 59 the power of objecting to the names of persons being retained on the list of voters in counties—not only to persons "on the register," but those who had claimed to be inserted "on the list of voters," whether actually inserted or not; while the Act of Victoria, by section 17, contains such a power of objecting to persons whose names are on the register; secondly, that in the forms given of the list of voters and claimants, and persons objected to in cities and boroughs in the Act of William, no mention of the place of abode is required, except in the cases of freemen, the rights of voting not depending there upon property; whereas, in the case of county voters, the place of abode was to be inserted; so that in the case of borough voters on the register, therefore, many voters under that Act could be described by their Christian and surname only, without any addition of place of abode. This is altered by the Act of Victoria, which requires in all cases, without exception, both in counties and boroughs, the place of abode as well as the name shall appear on the list. The third alteration is the form of notices of objection, which, under the Act of William, did not contain any statement that the objector was on the register, or was one of the claimants in a county, or was "on the list" of voters in the borough; and did not in any other manner show he was one of the class of persons to whom the right of objecting belonged. The Act of Victoria in all cases, with one exception, to be hereafter noticed, requires the objector to describe himself as "on the register" or "list of voters;" and to refer particularly to the parish "on the register" or "the list." The object of these alterations probably was to identify persons mentioned in "the list" more completely, so as to enable those whom it concerned to know in an easy and certain manner who the person named was, and to enable the party objected to, on referring to "the list," or portion of the register mentioned, to ascertain whether the objector had shown himself to have a right to object; and in case of its not appearing that he had such a right, to enable him instantly to disregard the objection, which the revising barrister would be bound to treat as not sufficient, and to call upon him to prove his qualification. The alterations are not only more adapted to effect this purpose, but they are also in conformity to the law, which in many cases has made it necessary, and which general convenience has in almost all cases made it desirable to identify the person by means of his Christian and surname, as well as his "place of abode;" and they are in conformity also with the rule which in cases of special authority or power to be exercised in writing requires the person assuming to exercise it should be one of those to whom it belongs. The former notice before referred to is an exception to the general rule, and under the Act of Victoria the forms of notices of objection require the objector to describe himself as "on the register," or "list." This confirms the view that the meaning of the form is to enable the party objected to to refer to the "list" or the "register," to ascertain whether the objector is to be found upon it. That exception is the form numbered 4 in the schedule of the Act of Victoria, which form is not a notice to the party objected to, but to the overseers of the county; and this form concludes with the words "A. B., — (place of abode)," without any statement of the objector being on the register. Now it is to be observed, the overseers have no concern whatever with the question, whether the objector is on the register or not. By the section 8 of the Act of Victoria, they are required to publish a list of persons against whom notices of objection have been given to them; and, by section 34, to bring the original notices before the revising barrister, who, and not the overseers, is to be judge of their sufficiency. The overseers have no interest or duty calling upon them to ascertain whether the objector is on the list; and a reference to it would not assist, but might embarrass them, as it might be calling upon them to refer to the list of the whole county. This view is in conformity with section 3 of the Act that requires the clerk of the peace to send to the overseer a copy only of such part of the register as relates to his parish; thus treating him as a person who could have no concern with the parts of the register relating to other parishes. It was not denied on the part of the respondent that the notices of objection in question ought to contain an assertion of the right to object; but it was contended that it was sufficiently stated in the words as contained "in the list of voters for the parish of —," and that the preceding words "A. B. (place of abode)," were intended to require a statement of the name in addition; the objector is inserted in the list with his name only, and without the addition at the time of signing the notice. It is material in this part of the discussion to observe that the immediate object of inquiry is, what is the meaning of a notice filled up according to the form? for it is such a notice, and not the form itself, that is sent to the party objected to. Want of attending to this, has, I think, produced some confusion. The form of notice has the words "place of abode" in italics, within a parenthesis; then the words "A. B."—"on the list of voters;" and this parenthesis is not to be retained in the notice when drawn, but is only meant to show the words within it are not to be the very words in the notice, but are only a direction as to what those words shall be. And this is manifest from the word

"of" being not within the parenthesis; so that the notice according to the form, to take an example, would run thus:—John Smith, of Broad-street, on the list of voters for the parish of St. Mary," without any parenthesis. The question is, how a notice in these words should be understood? and it is a mistake to treat it as if the parenthesis was retained. It is to be observed, the right to object given by the Act of Victoria, was not dependent on the right to be put on the list; for a party may have a right to be on the list, but he may have no right to object. If, in fact, his name is not inserted in the list, he may have no right to be put on; or if on the list, he may yet have a right to object in respect of being, in fact, on the list, the right to object being entirely dependent on some one entry on the list of voters, whether the name and place of abode be correctly stated in such entry or not. It seems to me where the construction of the form is more in conformity with general rules of law and the intention of the Act of Victoria, which requires the notices to be made out distinctly, that, if all entries on the list is that which is to be relied on as the foundation of the right to object, thus not merely giving the right of making a general assertion from which it would be inferred, but making it in conformity with the rule that prevails with respect to the objection—the power and authority by correctly stating a particular fact on which the right depends of enabling the voter to ascertain, by a simple inspection of the list referred to, whether the right to object which is relied upon, does really exist. A more minute consideration of the form of notice, drawn according to the Act, confirms this construction of the natural and obvious meaning of the words, "on the list of voters for the parish of St. Mary," following "John Smith, of Broad-street," to use the same example; and as the name of "John Smith," and "Broad-street" are mentioned on the list, the name of the objector is the person whose "name and present place of abode" is "John Smith, of Broad-street;" but whose "name and place of abode," on the list, may be the same or a different one. It cannot really be denied, in the absence of the parenthesis, the words, "on the register of voters for the parish of St. Mary," are meant to operate in like manner over the whole clause, "John Smith, of Broad-street," or it operates on no part of it; for it seems difficult to contend that they operate differently on the words, "John Smith," than the intervening words, "of Broad-street," so as to mean that the name of the voter on the list was "John Smith," but not to mean the place of abode at the time was "Broad-street;" and accordingly it was argued for the respondent, that the words, "on the list,&c.," did not import either the name of "John Smith," or the place of abode, "Broad-street," which was mentioned in the list. That is certainly a more reasonable construction than that which treats the words, "on the list,&c.," as operating on the words, "John Smith," and as having no operation on the intervening words, "of Broad-street;" which construction seems to rest on a tacit but erroneous application of the parenthesis which is found in the form, and the words of the actual notice in which it is not found; which notice is to be understood as not merely affirming that the objector is "on the list of voters," but that he has the right to object; and on referring to the particular entry, that is further confirmed by the form requiring the notices to be specified on a particular list in which the objector is to be found. If it were intended as a mere assertion of the right to object, it would be sufficient to state the objector was "on the list of voters for the borough," and, in the corresponding case, of the county, that the objector was "on the register," without seeing to the requirements of the schedule, No. 5, whether it was published. As long as the particular list is referred to, it is needful that the particular entry should also be referred to as being in furtherance of the same object. It was contended for the respondent by the construction contended for by the appellant, the voter who might wish to communicate with the objector must be prevented doing so in the case of an objector whose present place of abode was different from that on the list, as that must be the list referred to whether this difference arises from error or change. It is doubtful whether the Act contemplated any such commination; it does not authorise or require it; it imposes no duty to make, or coverts any right on the voter to make such a commination; but if it did contemplate such commination, such a case would most probably be very rare, and cases of error or change are a very small portion of the number of cases that can arise; such cases of change as would prevent the objector being reached by a letter directed to him at his place of abode, or the list must be a very small portion of the whole number of cases of error or change; and it may be observed in the case now in judgment, no such inconvenience did occur. The legislature in the more important cases of notices of objection, where, perhaps, it would be more reasonable that the voter would have a right to receive it, have considered that it is sufficient to send the notice to the "place of abode" mentioned in the list; indeed, the whole scope of the Act of Victoria seems to be that, for all purposes connected with the registration, the description on the list, with the name and place of abode, shall be taken to be the true description, and the effect of this provision will undoubtedly be, that every voter who takes an interest in the election, will take care the notices, if directed with the name and place of abode on the list, shall be forwarded to him. But, even supposing it was the object and intent of the Act to enable the party objected to to communicate with the objector, a distinct statement of the right of the objector is more important and desirable than the mere mention of the name. Though this purpose be the one which the notice was intended to effect, it may be in cases of error of places of abode. The notices should actually have the present description of the place of abode, as well as that on the list of voters; but it does not follow it shall suffice if there is a mere mention of the place of abode as mentioned on the list. An argument was drawn from schedule A, No. 5, where in the notice of objection the form was given thus: "To Mr. —, of — (here insert the name and place of abode of the person objected to as described in the list); and in the case of notice to the tenant of the qualifying property, insert his name and place of abode as described in the list." At the end of the form it is "(signed) A. B. of — (place of abode) on the register of voters for the parish of —," in the same words as the form in question, only putting "the register" for the list of voters." Here it is said the insertion of the words "as described" between the last and the first part of the notice, and the omission of the words "on the register," in connection with the words "place of abode" within the parenthesis, in the last part, shows the "place of abode" in the last part is not to be that on the register; but the insertion or omission of these words may be otherwise accounted for. In the first part, place of abode is mentioned " (place of abode) or the register of voters for the parish of —," and no such words as "on the list of voters for the parish of —," which occurred in the last part of the notice; and which, as I have said before, alone refer to the place of abode as that mentioned on the register. In this last it would be suspensum, to put within the parenthesis "as described in the register," because "on the register of voters for the parish of —," means exactly the same thing. With regard to the comparative convenience in practice of the two forms, there is no doubt that of the appellant is to be preferred; it enables the party, objected to before the revising barrister, to ascertain by inspection of the notices and the list, without any extensive evidence, whether the notice is sufficient, inasmuch as under that construction it would appear the place of abode is the same as that on the register. No question at all, in fact, can be made as to its validity; whereas, if the respondent's construction is to prevail, many questions of law will probably arise as to what is a sufficient description in the notice as to "place of abode," whether county, parish, or post town is mentioned; and these will be the more numerous and formidable from the uncertainty of what the object was by the insertion of the present place of abode as required by the Act; as in all cases it must be a matter of evidence—it may be of controversy, before the revising barrister, whether the place of abode be truly stated as it appears or not. It was also suggested that the identification of the voter by his "place of abode," "on the list" was unnecessary, except in the case of two voters of the same name being on the list; but this is answered by referring to the convenience arising from the rule by the insertion of the Christian name, surname, and place of abode. All three may be necessary in some cases, and they are required in all for the sake of uniformity, simplicity, and convenience. I think for these reasons that a due consideration of the principles of law that are applicable to the case, and the general intent of the Registration Act, and the due meaning of the particular provision that relates to the notices, leads to the conclusion that the appellant's construction is the true one, and it avoids great practical inconvenience that would arise from the adoption of that of the respondent; and, consequently, the decision of the revising barrister ought to be reversed.

REVIEW.

FOREIGN VIEWS OF FREE TRADE.—Revue Britannique; La Ligue Anglaise. Second Notice. London and Paris: Barthes and Lowell.

We return to the consideration of this very interesting article, and commence our extracts with a description of the present position of the League:

"The League has resolved to accept no compromise. Borne forward on the shoulders of the working classes, now definitely rallied to its cause, it will address to Parliament its eternal and immutable demand, 'the total and immediate abolition of the Corn Laws.' It knows that the ports, now partially opened under the pressure of necessity, may be closed to-morrow, and that thus what may be called sliding ports would be substituted for a sliding scale; it knows that the concessions of Government may indefinitely adjourn salutary reforms, and it will continue to agitate in consequence. With respect to the landlords—those, at least, who have not adhered to the new ministerial combinations, and they are tolerably numerous—they believe that the moment is come to make a desperate resistance; and they appear equally disposed to set themselves in opposition to the League and the demands of the nation. Each, like a new Brutus, is ready to immolate the election even of a son on the altar of the Corn Laws and of protection."

We cannot allow this bitter allusion to the Duke of Newcastle to pass without a word of comment. His Grace appears to approach that mental condition which Junius Brutus simulated, and should therefore be treated with the respect which Mahomedans accord to persons in his unhappy condition. There are other points in which the historical parallel fails. Brutus sacrificed his son to public justice; the Duke of Newcastle rejected Lord Lincoln merely to preserve consistency; he only applied to his son what he avowed to his tenantry, the principle of doing what he liked with his own. But we resume the description of the protectionist landlords:

"Their law, which Mr. Bright has ingeniously denominated 'a law for fine weather,' is attempted to be maintained in a season of storm and tempest; but have not they themselves given the signal for reform when, pressed by Mr. Huskisson and the exigencies of an industry fully developed, they consented to a modification of the silk duties and the Navigation Act, and more recently to the financial reforms of Sir Robert Peel? They believed that the public clamour would stop short before their traditional influence and feudal dignity; they believed that they could emancipate industry without emancipating agriculture; but the one is a necessary consequence of the other. Having lightened one scale, you must lighten the other to restore the balance. Free industry cannot be maintained without perfect freedom of raw material. Now corn is the most important of raw materials, and therefore ought to be free above all others. This logic is rigorous and as inflexible as Destiny. You have abolished manufacturing tariffs, you must abolish agricultural tariffs. The day that you accepted Huskisson, you evoked Cobden."

"But this blindness of the protectionists is explained by the extent of the reforms which the League brings in its train. We have said that it assails not merely the monopoly of corn, but the whole system of commercial monopoly. Now as all parts of the organisation of a people are connected together, political rejuvenescence will follow from economic rejuvenescence. The aristocracy perceives this consequence with far more terror than sagacity. Formerly, when commerce protested against feudalism, it was appeased by protecting it, and opening to it, often at the expense of national honour, distant markets. But now commerce will have nothing more to say to protections; it deems them pernicious, injurious to the rights and interests of citizens individually, and of the nation collectively."

In conclusion, the author tells his countrymen some powerful truths expressed in very forcible language.

"We wish not now to make any formal plea in favour of Free Trade, however useful it may be; but in conclusion we must tell the monopolists that they will not always have consumers to plunder and a country to impoverish. They have taken for their device the maxim of Herenschwand, who considered every economist as the enemy of the public welfare; and they are still, so far as progress is concerned, advanced no further than the system of the Venetian Sanuto. But in France, as elsewhere, this blockade of merchandise—which is virtually a blockade of genius and art—cannot endure for ever. The law of expansion is a universal law; it cannot yield to the French aristocracy of silk, wool, or iron, no more than to the English aristocracy of acres and of sugar-hogsheads. There was a time when the academies would not allow blood to circulate in our veins; Harvey came and the blood circulated. There was a time when ideas were not allowed to circulate freely; the revolution came, and ideas circulated. We are still at a time when the products of nature and of industry are not allowed to circulate freely; it is reserved for the League and its glorious chiefs to remove this last interdiction, and thus benefit the cause of humanity, of common sense, and of futurity."

There is one error in this very able article which we cannot pass over without notice. The author, like most of his countrymen, imputes to Pitt personally all the follies and all the infamies perpetrated by his colleagues and successors. Sad, indeed, would be the fate of his memory were he to be held responsible for the bigotry of Perceval, the fanaticism of Sidmouth, the stupidity of Portland, the despotism of Castlereagh, and the intolerance of Eldon. It is as unjust to take the Pitt Club to be an exponent of Pitt's sentiments as to infer the precepts of the gospel from the practice of the inquisition. The selfish system in commerce was abandoned by Pitt in his great treaty with France, as the selfish system in religion, so far as he is personally concerned, was abandoned at the time of the union with Ireland. But Pitt had neither the strength nor the courage which Peel has recently shown; he succumbed to the aristocratic combinations by which he was surrounded. In justice to his memory, let it be remembered that one element of the combination was a monarch never wholly free from mania, and ever exhibiting the mingled cunning and obstinacy of insanity.

The letters and diaries of Lord Malmesbury afford disclosures that should make our fathers tremble with rage and shame in their graves. At the beginning of the present century, England was literally "bribed by paupers, bullied by cowards, and duped by idiots." Pitt was a liberal in politics, in commerce, and in religion; but he believed the possession of power necessary to give effect to his liberality, and the means he employed were fatal to the end he pursued. The ambition of becoming another Pitt has been a dominant passion with our present Premier from infancy. So far as intentions go, he has selected no unworthy model; but he has advantages which his master could not command: he has an intelligent public and a patriotic Sovereign. Pitt had neither one nor the other. If he appealed to the sense of the public, some stupid cry of vulgar prejudice was sure to give the victory to nonsense; if he applied to George III., like his father, in the earlier part of the same reign, he could not trust to professions or rely on promises. Hence his career presents a sad series of miserable shifts and trumpery expedients; hence his policy was disastrous abroad, and injurious at home; hence he was the persecutor of those who held his own opinions, and the oppressor of those whose wrongs he was most anxious to redress. Thiers and his followers depict Pitt as the incarnation of premeditated wickedness; but he was wicked only because he was weak; he descended to acts in which inferior men were his masters, and was always beaten in the game. He was, when untrammelled, the advocate of Reform, Emancipation, and Free Trade; he did not abandon any one of those causes, but he adjourned them to "a more convenient season;" and to him, as to the Roman proconsul, that more convenient season never came.

The moral of Pitt's life is, that there can be no paltering with principle; no compromise with injustice; no concession to palpable wrong. We trust his illustrious disciple, who now wields the destinies of this country, will read that moral aright. We trust that he will see that bonds are no substitute for bread, or coercion for corn. He is ambitious of future fame; let him seriously reflect how his model and master stands in the estimate of the posterity which has arrived to pronounce judgment. The "heaven-born Minister" has now his origin assigned to a very different place; the "pilot that weather'd the storm" is now a blundering lubber that steered the ship into spots of danger, from which she was not extricated without sad damage and loss of cargo. A great name can only be maintained by great deeds; and no deed is great which contributes not to the good of humanity, the advancement of civilisation, and the common interests of all mankind.

The Library of Foreign Romance. Edited by J. C. James, Esq. London. Bruce and Wyld.

It is too late to inquire whether it is or is not desirable that fiction should form part of our current popular literature. The demand for it exists,—is spreading and increasing; it is an appetite which grows by what it feeds on, and we must therefore take it for granted that the demand will in this, as in other cases, ensure supply. Messrs. Bruce and Wyld are the largest caterers for this public appetite; they have brought cheapness of production to the lowest possible point, and it is but justice to add that they have combined with it excellence of selection. Among the eighty works published in their cheap Library of Romance, there are not more than two or three on which a question of admissibility could fairly be raised, and even in these cases we doubt whether a judicious jury would pronounce a verdict of rejection.

The new series is an enterprise of greater moment. Hitherto most of the translations of French romances have been the speculations of unprincipled traffickers in depravity; they have not only selected the most licentious productions, but have deepened the impurity of their objectionable passages in their translations. Paul de Koch and George Sand have been compelled to give their worst works to the English public, while the historical romances of a host of able writers are left untouched and unknown. Now, though it cannot be denied that there is a greater proportion of objectionable matter in French romance than would be tolerated in England, it must also be added that the productions of the best writers of fiction in France are every day becoming more marked by a tone of high and pure morality; and that the licentious authors are in fact but fourth or fifth-rate writers, who substitute coarseness for strength, and indelicacy for wit. It is, therefore, a useful service to bring before the English public those French works of fiction in which moral purity is combined with intellectual power. The readers once supplied with wholesome food cannot long be induced to prey on garbage.

Romances illustrative of existing manners are the most popular productions of our day; and it must be confessed that they convey more accurate information and more definite pictures of manners than could be obtained by formal disquisitions and grave dissertation. Miss Bremer's tales afford us clearer views of life in Sweden than could be derived from all the books of travel in that country which have ever been published. Soulié's "Mysteries of the Heath" explain the condition of a barbarous race, surrounded by civilisation, more definitely and more forcibly than the report of a Government commission.

The great Duke of Marlborough used to say, that the best history of England was contained in the historical plays of Shakspeare; we too may add that the Waverley Novels have great value as guides and aids to history. Ivanhoe gives a more accurate view of the state of England, under Richard I., than the pages of Hume or Lingard; Old Mortality teaches more of the wars of the Covenanters than the works of any Scottish historian. It is in fictions, illustrative of history, that French literature has become pre-eminently rich in modern times. Dumas, Nodier, and many others, have revived the past with an intensity of vigour and life which give it all the spirit and all the interest of the present. Caroline Pichler, and many others, have pursued the same course in Germany. Even Russia has contributed to this store of historical illustration, and enabled us to comprehend something of the Slavonic and Mongolian revolutions, which have imprinted on the east of Europe a phase of civilisation essentially different from that of the west. We do not regret that there is a Free Trade in these fictions; we wish that the minds of nations should be mutually interpreted to each other. Had we more of national explanations, we should have less of national jealousies and hostilities. It was once an article of popular faith, as Goldsmith tells us, "to hate the French because they were all slaves, and wore wooden shoes;" it is still too common to view them with dislike, on account of the depravity of what are supposed to be French principles. But depraved principles are as little popular in France as in England. We have judged the French by the worst of their productions, which is just as unfair as if they had estimated English literature by the publications in Holywell-street.

It is curious that the first origin of this error was simply a blunder of translation. Marmontel, to expose the profligacy of his age, published a series of tales illustrative of the licentious manners which prevailed, and called them Contes Moraux. The stupid hack by whom they were "done into English," translated the title into "Moral Tales," and everybody who read lifted his hands in amazement at such specimens of French morality! Marmontel thus got credit for the very opposite to his real design; the manners he condemned were supposed to be the morals he inculcated.

The publishers of this Library of Foreign Romance have undertaken an enterprise involving grave responsibilities. The harvest before them is indeed most abundant; but never was there a crop in which tares were more profusely mingled with the wheat. The task of selection will require great care, prudence, and caution, in the editor; and will, perhaps, demand an occasional exercise of forbearance on the part of the public. Cheapness is not valuable, unless accompanied by goodness; on the contrary, it becomes an aggravation of evil when it aids the circulation of that which is vicious and depraved.

We have only the prospectus of the undertaking before us, and that certainly promises very fairly; but as the performance may be either highly beneficial, or extensively mischievous, we shall watch the progress of the series—ready to applaud if its course shall tend to the diffusion of intelligence and virtue, and equally ready to sound an alarm should there be any symptoms of pandering to impure passions or prurient curiosity.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.—Felix Summerley's Home Treasury.—Tales from the German &c. London: Cundall.

It is gratifying to find a taste for the national literature of the Nursery reviving in England; for legends and traditions form an essential part of the mind of the people, and rising intellect runs a chance of being denationalised when they are banished. Mr. Cundall deserves much credit for having decidedly set his face against those novels of the nursery which have been issued from the Minerva Press with such lavish profusion, and which, however moral in their purpose, were far from being wholesome in their influence. They had one and all a direct tendency to transform boys and girls into premature men and women; while, for their own sakes, as well as for the sake of all connected with them, it is desirable that children should simply be children. It has been sometimes doubted whether works of fancy or imagination should be placed in the hands of the young; but the faculty of imagination has been bestowed by the same Omniscient Being who endowed us with reason. He gave it to be cultivated, not to be neglected or destroyed. It is a grievous error to suppose that works of avowed fiction tend to weaken the love of truth. The entire question depends on the child's being deceived. The poet Cowper justly says:

That even the child who knows no better
Than to interpret by the letter
The story of a cock and bull,
Must have a most uncommon skull.

The novel-like stories intended to supersede our hereditary nursery literature were indeed open to this objection; they had a tendency to deceive, for they professed to be pictures of actual life. Now we hold, that an accurate picture of actual life may be and often is, more deceptive than an extravagant fiction. Take, for instance, that very able collection of stories, Miss Edgeworth's Parent's Assistant, and it will at once be felt that the story impresses the mind as a portraiture, not merely of actual, but of average life. Pictures of vice and crime, delineated with equal acuteness in detecting motive and graphic power in developing character, give an air of stern reality to each tale. The child's impressions are true, but the child's inferences are false. He takes neither character nor incident in its individuality, but he generalises both; and his theory becomes false, delusive, and perhaps dangerous. Who ever dreamed of such a result following from Fables and Fairy Tales? Cinderella gratifies a child's fancy, but has not the slightest tendency to pervert the reason. The pet-lamb of Simple Susan is received as a plain truth, but Jack's bean-stalk never finds a moment's credence.

In reviving the national legends of the English nursery, the publisher was fortunate in obtaining the aid of so competent an editor as Mr. Felix Summerley. He is evidently a gentleman gifted with much fancy, and trained to a pure and cultivated taste. But, what is still more important, he has carefully studied the youthful mind, and made every one of his tales stimulate the curiosity and spirit of enquiry necessary for that self-education which is in truth the only sure means of acquiring intelligence. If Felix Summerley be a real name, which we have no opportunity of determining, it is a little surprising that his name is not more frequently heard in connection with antiquarian and legendary lore. He has in these little works displayed at once a deep knowledge and a thorough appreciation of the elements which constitute the intellectual life of a nation; and he has thus made his work subservient to the preservation of the genuine English character, by teaching the value of genuine English traditions.

The illustrations of these little works belong to a much higher style of art than has hitherto been used in juvenile works; and had they no other merit than their effect on the artistic training of the eye, they would deserve very high commendation. But they have singular merit as faithful delineations of character and costume; the plates in the little volume of Robin Hood, for instance, are perfect lessons in history.

This is one of the seasons when gift-books are usually presented to young folks; and we have therefore deemed it a proper time to make some remarks on juvenile literature, especially as the subject has often been pressed upon us by correspondents. It is only justice to add that the juvenile literature of fancy as distinguished from the juvenile literature of fiction has found favour with the rising race of booksellers, and that we have selected the meritorious publications of Mr. Cundall merely as types of a class.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Paulton, Esq., Samuel Harrison, Esq.,
Richard Potter, Esq., Dr. James Carlisle,
William Leavers, Esq., John Gadsby, Esq.,
William Wilson, Esq., H. Hull, Esq., Uxbridge.
R. G. Welford, Esq., Richard Burnett, Esq.,
Sidney Smith, Esq., J. Matson, Esq.,
Charles Swaisland, Esq., Crayford.

TREASURERS.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace, Islington.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place.
Captain Cogain, Upper Mill, Hammersmith.

BANKERS.
Messrs. Prescott, Grote, & Co.

SOLICITOR.
Josh. Ivimey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.

CLERK.
Mr. Frederick Farrand, Priory Villa, Peckham.

PROSPECTUSES may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Offices, East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street. The Rules (4d. each) are now ready, and may be had as above.

Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately.

The Society's Offices will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

As the Second Subscription is about to be called for, parties intending to avail themselves of the benefits of the Association are requested to make application for shares immediately. Until the Second Subscription is called in, shares can be obtained on the same terms as those which have been already taken up. Attendance at the Offices, East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from six to nine o'clock.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3s. 3d. by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 18, 1846.

The Corn Laws continue to aggravate the fearful evils of Ireland to such an extent, that the starving population has had recourse to deeds of violence for the purpose of checking their mischievous and destructive operation. These laws offer a prize on the exportation of corn from a starving country; they give an artificial price in the English markets to pay artificial rents for Irish land; they snatch the food from the perishing, and wrest sustenance from those dying of inanition. And yet such reasoners as the O'Briens, the Shaws, and the Bentincks point to these exports—these evidences of landlord rights enforced, and landlord duties neglected—as proofs of present plenty and future sufficiency. Well may we exclaim with that exquisite and true poetess, Miss Barrett:

"The rich preach 'rights' and future days,
And hear no angel scoffing;
The poor die mute—with ardent gaze
On corn-ships in the offing."

In Clonmel and Tipperary, the famishing multitude has arrested the corn on its way to the ships; but landlordism has no bowels of compassion. Armed with the terrors of the law, it protects the export of food with cannon and with bayonets; and it calls for additional powers, under the name of a coercion, that it may be protected in spreading famine and extending fever. Had the ministerial Corn Bill passed into law before the Easter recess Irish corn would have been kept at home to feed the Irish people, and the English markets would have been abundantly supplied from other quarters. But, by the exquisitely absurd arrangement which has found favour with the legislature, millions are doomed to starve until the powers of monopolist oratory is exhausted. The speech of a Miles, or a Bentinck, is purchased at the cost of as many lives as the orator utters sentences. We protest in the name of common humanity against such preposterous and cruel trifling at a crisis of such great and imminent danger. There are yet three months of scarcity to be faced, and every hour of delay aggravates the difficulty of providing against the total desolation of an integral part of the empire. The pressure of distress in Ireland cannot be exaggerated; it already transcends every thing that words can express, and almost every thing that even the imagination can conceive. "Plague, pestilence, and famine," rage triumphant; and our liturgy has taught us to associate these with "battle, murder, and sudden death." The proverb tells us, that "Hunger will break through stone walls," and assuredly the desperation of its excesses will not be restrained by the clauses of an Act of Parliament. You may set death as a penalty before the perpetrators of outrage, but of what avail is the menace when death in a more cruel form, and with greater certainty of operation, urges him on from behind? The very journals which raised the cry of exaggeration are now raising the note of alarm in louder tones. The reproach they bring against the Government is, that the measures of relief are suspended and delayed. The responsibility for this delay must rest somewhere, and it may be atoned for by a fearful reckoning. We therefore earnestly urge those who value the salvation of the empire, to allow of no further huxtering and truckling with the destructive agencies of monopoly. We have abundant evidence that if agrarianism slays its thousands in Ireland, landlordism is slaying its tens of thousands. There is still time for the righteous justice of England to interpose, and taking its stand between the living and the dead, to cause that the plague should be stayed. Let us have no more dawdling with worthless points of etiquette. A story is told of a Cantab who saw a fellow-student drowning, and regretted that etiquette prevented him from taking the liberty of saving him, as they had never been formally introduced; but nations must not be sacrificed to such miserable punctilios. The cry from Ireland is, "Save, or we perish!" Rescue life first, and then settle the etiquette of first readings and second readings, according to the most approved precedent that comes in your way. To the re-assembled Commons of England, and to the anxious people of England, we address the same warning. Delay, in all cases, is dangerous, but at the present crisis it involves the peril of imminent and wide-spread destruction.

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. April 11	MON. April 13	TUES. April 14	WED. April 15	THUR. April 16	FRI. April 17
Bank Stock	206½	206½	206	206½	206	..
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	95½	95½	95½	95½	94½	94½
3 per Ct. Con. Ann.	96½	96½	96½	96½	95½	95½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann.	97	97½	97	96½	96½	96½
Long. An. Ex. 1860	10½	10 7-16	..	10½	10 3-16	..
Cons. for Acct.	96½	96½	96	96½	..	96
Exc. Bills, pm.	24-28	24-27	24-28	27	18-22	..
Ind. Bds. un. 1000l.	..	25-28	30	25-30	28-30	..
Venezuela 2 per Ct.	42	..
Do. deferred
Belgian 4½ per Ct.	98
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	..	81½	..	81
Chilian	99½	96½	..
Columb. ex. Venez.	87½
Danish
Dutch 2½ per Cent.	59½	59½	59½	59½	59½	59½
Dutch 4 per Cent.	92½	92½	92½	92½	92½	92½
Mexican	32	31½	..	32	31½	31½
Peruvian	57½	57½	58½	58	57½	..
Portug. conv.	57½	57½	110½	..	110	..
Russian 5 per Cent.	25½	25½	24½	24½	24½	25
Spanish 5 per Ct.	36½	36½	36½	36½	36½	36½
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, APRIL 13.—With a very moderate show of samples on all the Wheat stands, there has been some difficulty experienced in effecting sales at last Monday's prices; as before, fine samples meet a better demand than other qualities; no change has taken place in the prices obtained this day week. The Foreign Wheat trade is excessively dull. Late rates are barely maintained on Barley, though the arrivals are not by any means large. About 10,000 qrs. of Irish Oats appear in the return; except this the quantity arrived is very trifling. Buyers continue cautious, but the sales made to-day have been pretty considerable, and the prices are the turn in favour of the seller. English Oats are very scarce. Beans and Peas are without variation in prices from this day week.

	BRITISH.	Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Essex,	Red 54 to 60	White 58 to 66
Kent, & Suffolk	49	58
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	47	54
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	23	25
Ditto	Black	23 6
Ditto	Polands	New 27
Scotch Feed	26	27
Limerick	25	26
Ditto	Fine New 27 29	Old Fine none
Cork	24	25
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	23	24
Sligo
Galway	19	21
Barley	26	33
Beans, Mazagan	31	33
Harrow	33	37
Small	39	40
Peas, White	Boilers	38
Grey	30. 32	32
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs.	45
Norfolk and Suffolk	46

FOREIGN.

	FREE.	IN HOND.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	58 to 60	54
Rosstock	56	50
Stettin	52	58
Humburg	52	50
Odesa	48	50

Odesa Polish	50	51
Russian	soft
Ditto	hard
Spanish	54	60
Blauquillo	56	62
Australian	60	69
Barley, Grinding	27	28
Distilling	29	31
Oats, Archangel	25	26
Danish	23	24
Swedish	23	24
Stralsund	22	23
Dutch Feed	22	23
Brew	27	29
Polands	25	26
Black

Beans, Egyptian	34	36
Peas, White	42	..
Ditto Boilers	34	36
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 196 lbs.	36	37
United States	28	30
Dantzic

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from April 6 to April 11, 1846, both days inclusive.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	3379	4716	1918	1270	396
Scotch	16348
Irish	1508	2940	16921	580
Foreign	29874

Flour, 4116 sacks; 2791 barrels.

FRIDAY, APRIL 17.—We have had a fair amount of English, and a largish one of Foreign, Wheat during the week. Good conditioned English supports late prices; but unless the quality is fair, some slight decline must be submitted to in order to effect sales. There is no alteration in the Barley trade. A few English Oats, most of which were sold on Wednesday, have come to hand during the week. The show to-day is very scanty, both of that description and of Irish; 6d. to 1s. advance from Monday is obtained. Were holders generally willing to accept 6d., a large sale might be made; but as it is, only a limited business is done. From all accounts it appears that the quantity of Oats at present on the way from Ireland is extremely limited. Beans and Peas as on Monday. The duties fell 1s. on Wheat and Barley, and rose 1s. on Peas.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 10th of April to the 17th of April, both inclusive.

	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	6610	..	20410
Barley	3020
Oats	4060	1180	2930

Flour, 1840 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending April 14, 1846.

	Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	5116	61s. 10d.	Rye	266 36s. 2d.
Barley	3791	30s. 10d.	Beans	1502 33s. 3d.
Oats	18729	23s. 4d.	Peas	559 36s. 11d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Mar. 5, 1846.

Wheat. Barley. Oats. Rye. Beans. Peas. Flour.

In London, 442560 17299 61192 .. 6144 5462 112776

Unit. King. 1138950 82919 96983 .. 13413 8127 837355

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.
a. d. s. d. a. d. s. d. a. d. s. d. a. d. s. d. a. d. s. d.
7th March	54	10	39	3	21	10
14th "	54	3	29	4	21	9
21st "	55	1	29	10	22	0
28th "	55	5	30	2	22	1
4th April	56	9	30	7	22	3
11th "	56	0	30	9	22	3

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 55s. 3d.; Barley, 30s. 0d.; Oats, 22s. 2d.; Rye, 33s. 9d.; Beans, 34s. 11d.; Peas, 33s. 9d.

Duty. Wheat, 17s. 0d.; Barley, 8s. 0d.; Oats, 6s. 0d.; Rye 9s. 6d.; Beans, 8s. 6d.; Peas, 9s. 6d.

MEAT MARKET.

The small supply tended to keep up the prices, although trade was exceedingly heavy.

PER STONE OF 8 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.

Prime Beef .. 3s 10d to 3s 6d Middle Mutton 3s 10d to 3s 8d

Middling do. 3s 6d to 3s 2d Veal, from .. 5s 0d to 4s 0d

Plain, or inf.. Small Pork .. 5s 0d to 4s 4d

Prior Beef ... 3s 0d to 2s 6d Large, or inf..

Prime Mutton 4s 4d to 4s 0d Rior Pork .. 3s 4d to 3s 0d

THE LONDON GAZETTE

FRIDAY, APRIL 10.

BANKRUPTCIES SUPERSEDED.

J. Whalley and C. Whalley, nurserymen, Liverpool.

J. Reding and W. N. Judd, printers, Horsehoe-court, Ludgate-hill.

BANKRUPTS

E. Foley, victualler, Stoke Newington-green. [Messrs. Dimmick and Burbey, Size-lane.]

Robt. Weatherhog and Rich. Weatherhog, farmers, Stone, Kent. [Messrs. Tripp, Adelaide-place, London-bridge.]

H. C. Langley, apothecary, Suffolk-place, Hackney-road. [Mr. Wheatley, Wallbrook.]

T. Matthews, draper, Aldgate High-street. [Messrs. Sole and Turner, Aldermanbury.]

W. Davey, coal merchant, St. Austell, Cornwall. [Mr. Smith, T. Rickards, watchmaker, Wootton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire. [Messrs. Husband and Wyatt, Gray's-inn-square.]

J. B. Oram, brewer, Birmingham. [Mr. Bartlett, Birmingham.]

M. Illingworth, W. Smith, and J. Wright, worsted spinners, Bradford, Yorkshire. [Mr. Wells, Bradford.]

C. H. Cartwright, grocer, Warrington. [Messrs. Sharp and Co., Bedford-row.]

H. Roe, jeweller, Liverpool. [Messrs. Bridger and Blake, London-wall.]

J. Knight, mercer, Preston. [Messrs. Reed and Langford, Friday-street.]

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

Fleming and Richardson, Glasgow, accountants.

J. McMaster, Ardrossan, Ayrshire, grocer.

J. Macharg, Glasgow, tea merchant.

D. M. Rose, Rarichies, Rosshire, corn merchant.

TUESDAY, APRIL 14.

C. Collins, Kidderminster, yarn maker.

BANKRUPTS.

T. Groham, Chard, Somersetshire, baker. [Mr. Church Bedford-row.]

J. Wallace, Durham, tea dealer. [Messrs. Soles and Turner, Aldermanbury.]

R. Roe, Manchester, drysalter. [Messrs. Gregory and Co. Bedford-row.]

J. Davies, Shrewsbury, mercer and draper. [Messrs. Clarke and Co., Lincoln's Inn Fields.]

SCOTCH SEQUESTRATIONS.

D. Coghill, F. Coghill, and T. Coghill, Ayr, glass and china merchants.

J. Jamieson, Paisley, draper.

J. Oswald, Edinburgh, sharebroker.

P. Dawson, Dundee, draper.

EXPORTATION OF OATMEAL.—

One dealer in Wick has this season sent upwards of a thousand bolls of oatmeal to the Edinburgh market, which is a new addition to the exports from that port, and bids fair to be considerably extended.

as above said — Saturday, April 19, 1846.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 135.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE DELAY.

"When the time comes, honourable gentlemen will see whether her Majesty's Government are sincere or not in the course which they have taken. I can tell the honourable member that there is no PROOF OF SINCERITY with regard to this Bill which shall not be given in the event of its failure or ALTERATION in its progress through Parliament. But I, for one, will not condescend to answer that accusation. I should have thought that the facts themselves would have been a complete refutation of it, in the mind of any honourable member."—SIR ROBERT PEEL, March 30.

We entirely believe the Premier. We accept the pledge of unflinching devotedness to the national cause, thus proudly and boldly tendered, and await its fulfilment without the shadow of a doubt or misgiving. Even the vexatious and harassing delay, of little less than a month's duration, which has intervened since these words were spoken in the hearing of England and the world, has in no way impaired the force, or perplexed the import, of those "facts" which, of themselves, are a "complete refutation" of any charge or suspicion of unfaithfulness. Sir Robert Peel is in earnest—if ever man was. It were sheer childishness to doubt the Free Trade Minister's determination to carry through, at whatever cost, a measure with which he has linked his name, fame, and fortunes—whose principle he so thoroughly understands, so heartily espouses, and so luminously and forcibly expounds—and for which he has freely made some of the largest and most painful sacrifices which conviction and the sense of duty ever exacted of a public man. Sir Robert Peel is in earnest—cannot but be in earnest. He will pass his bill—though he dissolve Parliament for it. He will pass his bill—though he create peers for it. He will pass his bill—and not any other bill that the faction may dare offer him and the country in its stead. He will pass his bill as it stands—or, it may even yet be, with a "total and immediate" amendment—the only sort of amendment his acceptance of which lies within the compass of possibility. He means the whole of what he says—and will do it. We honour unhesitatingly the Premier's draft on our confidence, and rest, with unqualified assurance of faith, on the promise, that "THERE IS NO PROOF OF SINCERITY WITH REGARD TO THIS BILL WHICH SHALL NOT BE GIVEN IN THE EVENT OF ITS FAILURE OR ALTERATION IN ITS PROGRESS THROUGH PARLIAMENT."

And the country believes this, too. And this is why the country endures—with a patience that would otherwise be inexplicable—that seemingly interminable delay which a strange and unlooked for combination of circumstances has interposed between the virtual and the formal realisation of its will. Very mortifying, very harassing, very injurious to all public and private interests, is the present stoppage of the business of legislation, when we were so near the goal—when majorities, so large and sweeping as to be irreversible by any power of political accident, had, after debates universally felt to be exhaustive of the whole question, affirmed the Bill, both in its principle and its details, and nothing remained but to put it through its last formal stage, and send it up to "another place," stamped with the fiat of the united statesmanship and matured intelligence of the empire—then to have it thrust aside and hung up, to wait for the completion of a tedious and unprofitable formality with respect to a totally different and unrelated measure! Still, we bear it. We can ill afford to wait, yet we do wait, tranquilly relying both on the perfect integrity of purpose of the Prime Minister, and on our own power to bear him and his Bill victoriously through all obstructions.

Disappointing and vexatious as is the present entanglement of the public business, we are not disposed to speak with anything approaching to bitterness, either of the one or the other of those parties whose conflicting views of public duty have occasioned it. We freely credit both the Government and the Irish members with upright intentions, however widely we may dissent from the propriety and prudence of the course which they have respectively taken, and however deeply we must deplore the result. Of the particular motives that have induced the Premier to consent to postpone the third reading of the Corn Bill to the merely formal first reading of the Coercion Bill, we do not profess to give any precise account. Whether his intention was simply to comply with the requisitions of a customary courtesy towards the other branch of the legislature, or whether he had been led to believe that the progress of his Free Trade measures in the Upper House would be thereby smoothed and facilitated—or by whatever other motive, or combination of motives, he may have been actuated—we cannot undertake to say. We have, in any case, no more doubt that his decision was taken in perfect good faith, than we have that it was adopted on erroneous premises, and has been productive of injurious consequences. It must, in common fairness, be borne in mind, that sustained and systematic opposition to a measure on its first reading, is extremely unusual—that the formality which the Government have insisted on maintaining is one which ordinarily passes as a matter of course—and that for a minister to rescind a decision of this sort, when it has once been announced and acted on, requires an exercise of moral courage of which very few public men are capable. It was a great mistake, certainly—but perhaps not an unnatural one, and, once committed, retreat was difficult and embarrassing.

Of the conduct of the Irish members in this unfortunate affair, we must likewise speak with the candour and fairness which they are entitled to expect at our hands. We do not assume any right to condemn them for the course which, in their judgment, the duties they owe to that portion of the United Kingdom which they more immediately represent, have imposed on them. Much as we lament all that has happened, we are not aware of anything in the conduct of the Irish members which implies either the absence, or the weakness, of the highest motives that should govern public men; and it is impossible to deny that their departure from the ordinary practice of the house, in such cases, has, thus far, been incidentally productive of some highly useful results, by fastening public attention, with unwonted fixity and earnestness, on the real nature and causes of the disorganisation of society in their landlord-ridden country. We trust, however, that they will not think it necessary further to prolong this course of action, without most fully taking into account all the elements of the case on which they have to decide. Without pretending to judge for them, we may express our own strong opinion that the practical purpose of their opposition to the first formal stage of the Coercion Bill, has been already most abundantly answered. They have sufficiently marked their sense of the obnoxious character of this measure, and their determination to use every possible exertion to prevent it from becoming law; and they have brought home to the public mind and heart an amount of knowledge respecting the real condition and wants of Ireland, to which it is scarcely conceivable that any further protraction of this debate should contribute any material addition. We trust that, remembering that the Corn Bill is, at least, as much an Irish as it is an English measure—that, in fact, the necessity to which we owe its introduction now is mainly an Irish necessity—they will be able to reconcile it to their sense of duty, to oppose no further obstacle to the observance of a customary Parliamentary formality, and to reserve until another occasion an opposition whose possible and incidental advantages bear now so small a proportion to its certain and direct evils.

At the same time that we are solicitous to reassure those of our friends throughout the country, whose confidence may have been shaken by the present disappointing and mortifying obstruction, we must warn all Free Traders to be on the alert, and hold themselves prepared for all contingencies. We have no desire to take an alarmist tone for which, in truth, we perceive no real occasion—but we cannot too earnestly deprecate everything like over-confidence at a crisis so full of all kinds of contingent possibilities. The delay of the past month may, indeed, in some respects, have operated to increase the security of the Free Trade measures in the House of Lords—but there is no saying, and it is at least equally possible that the effect may have been the other way. In any case it is well not to be too sure. If anything is to be taken for granted, we say, take the worst for granted, and be ready accordingly. The political atmosphere is, just now, charged full with those rumours which commonly precede a storm. A dissolution of Parliament is talked of—rejection, or "amendment," by the Lords is talked of—very likely, without a particle of foundation, other than the wishes, or the fears of the talkers—still, there is no knowing. Very likely, all is right—yet it is quite possible that all is wrong. Sir Robert Peel has never undertaken to answer for his Bill passing the Lords, without a previous "appeal to the people"—nor have we. He has answered for nothing but his own unmoved and immoveable fidelity to its great principle; and we can answer for nothing but our own will and power to see that principle fairly on the statute book, let who will say nay. The people have done it all thus far—and there is no knowing but that the people's minister may find it necessary now, before all is over, to bid them finish their own work.

GRANDMAMMA'S VIEWS ON THE MANUFACTURING SYSTEM.

"The paper, after you, Sir, if you please," said a gentleman of our friend Punch's acquaintance, to a neighbour who was enjoying his chop, and seemed to be enjoying his newspaper, in one of the dining rooms of our metropolis. "It is the Morning Herald, Sir," was the response. "Oh, then," rejoined the applicant, "pray do not trouble yourself—I thought it was a newspaper." For our own part, being very much of Punch's friend's opinion and liking to read only newspapers that are newspapers, it is not often that we dip into that Stygian fluid of nonsense and scurrility which runs—or rather, does not run, but dolefully stagnates—through the columns of the Morning Herald. But accident and temptation occasionally overrule the wisest purposes and the most settled habits; and it did so happen, on Wednesday morning last, that the chance sight of a Number of this indescribable print—containing something which presented to the eye the appearance of a leading article, stretched out to the extraordinary length of some two columns and a half—excited a curiosity, which our idleness could not resist, to learn the precise nature of this inordinate impost on the time and patience of elderly and gaitered gentlemen. So we read (if it can be called reading) the article, (if it can be called an article); and as it seems a pity that labours so onerous should be altogether unprofitable, we have thought fit to furnish the public in general with some account of our observations in a rarely-visited and little-explored region.

So far as we can make out what may be called, by courtesy, the “meaning” of a writer whose early grammatical studies were evidently superintended by a preceptor morbidly averse to the infliction of corporeal punishment—and whose logic always gives one the idea of a brain, naturally of the weakest, preternaturally obfuscated by undue indulgence in the coarser descriptions of beverage familiar to the humbler classes of metropolitan toppers—the Morning Herald's theory of the present state and prospects of the empire seems to be as follows: The manufacturers of Great Britain are a gang of “desperadoes and profligates,” with one “Mirabeau” Peel for their captain, and certain “Cobdens, Ashfords, and Brights” for lieutenants, —“Ashford” being the Herald's way of spelling the name more usually written “Ashworth.” And the said Mirabeau Peel and his profligate desperadoes described, for shortness' sake, as a huge collective “mammoth of pampered vanity and cupidity”—have entered into a vast mammoth-like conspiracy for the establishment of a new UNIVERSAL MONARCHY, the capital of which is to be Manchester. “To accomplish this object,” proceeds the dismal monomaniac, “we perceive an array of MILLIONS OF COTTON-SPINDLES under the direction of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, and BRIGADED and COMMANDED by Cobden, Bright, Sturge, &c, (that essence of philanthropy) ARRAYED TO MARCH and to accomplish the object—the conquest of the world”—and “TO RENDER EVERY NATION SLAVES to their capital and to their manufacturing profits.” However, the brigaded millions of cotton spindles, before finally setting out on their march to conquer the world and render every nation slaves, must make sure that they do not leave behind them the elements of a successful revolt, that would nip their hopes of empire in the bud. Tyranny, like charity, to begin well, must begin at home. The first thing, therefore, the brigaded cotton spindles have to do is “to reduce the whole agricultural population everywhere to the condition of serfs;” for it is a well-known fact that “the Free Trade array” uniformly describe the “unfortunate agriculturists” as “beings as ignorant as their cattle, and consequently fit only to be slaves to the manufacturers.” Having subjected the unfortunate agriculturists, and completed and sealed the conquest by the original expedient of actually “devouring the land, or real property of the country” (they have stomachs, these ogres, for anything), the brigaded spindles will be at liberty to proceed on their “crusade against the powers, the intelligence, the industry, and the capital of more than THREE HUNDRED MILLIONS OF CIVILISED MEN, INHABITING DIFFERENT COUNTRIES ON THIS GLOBE.” For the plan of the campaign, which we regret that our space does not allow of our giving in detail, the curious reader must consult for himself the “amusing print”—where he will likewise learn what dreadful preparations for the war are daily going on in the very bosom of certain Manchester and Glasgow families. Now we add, that the Herald's facts are all “learned from good authority.”

We are not familiar with the statistics of the sale and circulation of this most extraordinary literary and political phenomenon, and we find the densest ignorance on the subject prevailing in the circle of our more immediate friends. Perhaps, however, we may trust to the kindness and research of some of our readers to supply us with information on one or two points on which our curiosity is somewhat vividly excited. We should greatly like to know whether, and to what extent, Manchester and Glasgow gentlemen are in the habit of patronising this singularly enlightened and polite journal? Also, whether, and to what extent, the managers of public news-rooms in the manufacturing districts consider themselves at liberty to expend the five-pences of their subscribers in disseminating a publication, whose fitness to express and guide local opinion is so happily demonstrated by the intimate local knowledge evinced in the allusion to the great manufacturing house of “Ashford?” On some other points on which our inquisitiveness has been excited, we ask no questions, for we are sure no answer can be forthcoming. How any editor can pen such incomprehensibly stupid trash, and call it a “leading article”—how any proprietor and capitalist can draw a cheque on his bankers to pay for such leading article being written—and how any news-man can make a living by selling it when it is written—are questions on which we can only resign ourselves at once to absolute and perpetual nescience.

THE NICE YOUNG MAN.

“Let laws and learning, arts and commerce die,
But leave us still our old nobility.”
Poems by Lord John Manners.

The characteristically pompous and silly stuff which this well-meaning, but singularly weak-headed young nobleman, addressed, the other day, to the members of the “Birmingham Athenic Institute”—an association formed for the purpose of reviving old English sympathies, old English affections, old English sports, and old English everything, under a Greek name and a Latin motto—has, on the whole, received ample justice at the hand of the Examiner; and it would be a work of supererogation to repeat the castigation due to the inanities and impertinences of his lordship's harangue. We cannot, however, forbear a word of comment on one point, not touched by our contemporary—the nice young man's sneer at political economy and economists in particular, and philosophy and philosophers in general. Lord John Manners delivered himself to the congregated Athenics in the following strain:

“Political economy has still many abstract votaries; and it rests mainly with you, and with societies like yours, to show that the sobriety, morals, intelligence, ay, and the industry too of the people, is promoted by a fair mixture of recreative leisure and amusement with their time of toil and labour. * * * Well, gentlemen, they may call us what they please—these dry philosophers, these party politicians, we will pursue the even tenor of our way—lightening the toil, elevating the tastes, giving vigour and health to the frames of the working youths of Birmingham.”

So then, it seems, political economy and dry philosophy frown on “recreative leisure and amusement,” and hold in particular aversion whatever tends to “lighten the toil, elevate the tastes, and give vigour and health to the frames” of the working classes; that is to say, the science which expounds the laws of the production and distribution of wealth stands in antagonism to the natural and best uses of wealth—and it is the express purpose of philosophy to aggravate the toil, debase the tastes, and impart debility and disease to the frames of the working classes. Political economy and philosophy abominate the “mens sana in corpore sano,” and have a decided grudge against the working Athenic youths of Birmingham who have associated themselves for the realisation of this inestimable blessing. The Athenics may, however, be of good cheer. Lord John Manners is in the field against political economy and philosophy, and will enfranchise the degraded and oppressed victims of these common enemies of mankind with cricket matches and may-poles. David and his sling against Goliath of Gath—Lord John Manners and his bat against philosophy, though she come in the guise of Athéné herself. Lord John Manners and the Athenics will, among them, despite all “obloquy and misrepresentation,” redress the evils of “our present arbitrary and artificial state of society”—“disperse the mists of money-getting prejudice”—restore “the frankness and freshness of old English character”—and “carry this little island of ours through all straits and dangers,” &c. &c.

After all, Lord John Manners is not so silly as he seems. There is a sort of shrewdness about him, which admirably balances and corrects any over-tendency to frankness and freshness. He is quite right to be against political economy and philosophy, for political economy and philosophy are most decidedly against him. He feels himself in a false position—this sentimental monopolist—this frank and fresh bread taxer—this fine old English supporter of the shabbiest and dirtiest of legislative iniquities. He feels himself in a false position. Speaking to Birmingham men, whose industry he shuts out from its natural and rightful markets—whose wages he fines down, by enhancing the cost of that on which wages are expended—whose recreative leisure he abridges by arbitrarily increasing the difficulty of supplying those wants which wait on no man's leisure—whose amusements he invades with those chilling and heart-withering anxieties incident to suspended and irregular trade, which eat out the very faculty for being amused—whose toils he multiplies, prolongs, and aggravates by superadding to the natural and necessary cost of life the artificial cost of landlordism's black-mail—whose tastes he lowers, by curtailing time and opportunity for their culture—and whose healthful vigour he would prematurely waste away, by maintaining a cruel and vicious system which the economists, the philosophers, and the statesmen, have demonstrated to be “THE CAUSE OF PENURY, FEVER, MORTALITY, AND CRIME, AMONG THE PEOPLE!”—Lord John Manners feels himself to be in a false position;—and he makes believe to put himself right, by running out against the science that shows him to be wrong.

Lord John Manners is a young man—young enough to learn; and, notwithstanding his frivolous and empty sneer at wiser and better men than himself, we are willing to remember that he has given some signs of readiness and ability to learn. May we suggest, that he would do wisely to make at once that final election between right and wrong which, in these times, as he will not be long of finding, no public man can hope to evade. The old English philanthropy that taxes poor men's bread, and the old English frankness and freshness of feeling that plunder poor men's cupboards, are coming very rapidly to be rated exactly for what they are worth. If Lord John Manners means to qualify himself for popularity among Birmingham artisans, he must cease to sneer at truths which even artisan intelligence appreciates, to talk a rhodomontade which artisan common-sense scorns, and to give his vote and interest to a sordid iniquity against which the artisan soul indignantly revolts. The Athenics themselves will not stand it at the next anniversary. If Lord John Manners cannot put himself through an entirely new course of mental discipline—including liberal and constant doses of “political economy,” and “dry philosophy,”—he had better, to save time, trouble, and mortification, go back to the castle and the hounds, and settle down at once into a lord.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY OF MINERAL WEALTH IN THE NORTH OF ABERDEEN.—We understand that Mr. Dixon, of Glasgow, has become lessee of part of an extensive mineral field situated near Beith. The ore proposed to be wrought is a species of Brown Hematite, yielding sometimes as high as 50 per cent. of pure iron; it exists in immense abundance, forming strata of many feet in thickness, throughout the parishes of Beith, Kilbirnie, and Dalry. In the latter parish, in the farm of Howrat, the property of Captain Blair, of Blair, it forms a strata from fifteen to twenty feet thick. We believe that the first discoverer of the importance of this mine was John Jack, Esq., manager of the Eglinton Iron Works—a gentleman whose great experience and scientific knowledge have done much to develop the immense mineral wealth of this district.—Ayr Advertiser.

On Friday, a party of 18 men, belonging to 30th Regiment, were obliged to make a detour of several miles, when on the march to Athol, of being able to procure refreshments at Ahsacragh.—Limerick Examiner.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Fourteenth Week, ending Saturday, April 25.

For anything which as yet appears to the contrary, the Easter recess might have lasted a fortnight instead of a week. The House of Commons re-assembled last Friday (week), and at once proceeded to resume the debate on the first reading of the Irish Coercion Bill. Yet, at the present moment, this debate is just as far advanced as it was three weeks ago. The Irish repeal members have taken a leaf out of the book of Lord George Bentinck; and they seem disposed to "better the instruction" which he has given. All legislative function is paralysed; the Government seems helpless; and rumour runs about, muttering ominous threats of an impending dissolution of Parliament.

The appalling condition of Ireland was part of the theme of Friday night week. In answer to an appeal from Mr. Smith O'Brien, in which he adduced evidence that the people were starving, Sir James Graham regretted the inadequacy of the remedies to meet the actual exigency, but reminded the house that the Government could not, and did not, undertake the task of feeding the indigent population of Ireland. All they proposed to do was to regulate the market price, by permitting freedom of supply, as to enable food to be procured at a moderate price. But the Government did more than this. They had provided for the possibility of the landlords of Ireland failing in their duty, and had undertaken that the grants of public money might be exceeded on the responsibility of ministers, in order to meet any possible extension of the calamitous circumstances which afflict Ireland. He appealed to Irish members to permit the first reading of the Coercion Bill, in order that they might afterwards proceed with the Corn Bill.

Similar sentiments were uttered by Sir Robert Peel. He reminded the house that a short time ago the Government had been accused of exaggeration when they pointed to the probability of a famine in Ireland. If it were possible to alleviate the calamity, no pecuniary consideration should interfere. But let them take care that by interference they might not do more harm than good. It was a hazardous experiment to undertake the feeding of a people; no Government should interfere with the natural course of supply and demand. Their great object was to enable wheat, oats, Indian meal, and other grain, to be supplied at moderate and natural prices; and for the farther mitigation of the impending calamity, the wealthy classes and not the Government were responsible.

The debate, however, went on, the only exception to a dreary night being an excellent speech from Mr. Ward, who spoke with much spirit, temper, and good sense on the subject of Ireland. He complained of the "disgraceful" state of the House, engaged as it was in the discussion of a great constitutional question. This was an allusion to the attendance of members during the night, which had been scanty. Were they, he asked, for ever to pursue this miserable and vulgar policy of coercion? They had tried it during successive years, and it had continually failed. The first vote he had ever given in Parliament had been in favour of a coercion bill; but at that time he knew less of Ireland than he did of Mexico, and he reposed confidence in the Ministry which proposed it. Universal testimony showed that the Irish endured unexampled privations—was it marvellous that patience should be occasionally exhausted, or that despair should break out into outrage? He depicted the social condition of the people, quoting Kohl's opinion as to the comparative depth of their degradation and misery, borne with religious cheerfulness and content—and was this the people whom we were called on to coerce, and to shut up every night in their hovels, under extreme pains and penalties? Their business was to grapple, not so much with the criminals as with the causes of crime; the evils of Ireland were social, not political; and the remedy for them, he contended, was not to be found in such measures as the bill before the house, but in large comprehensive plans for the amelioration of the condition of the country.

The Irish members compelled an adjournment of the debate till Monday. On Monday there was "No house." One member only was required to make up the forty, which enables the SPEAKER to retain the chair; and Dr. Bowring, who had been detained by a tardy omnibus in his way from the Bank to the House, arrived a minute too late. But the fact of there being "No house" immediately set people to speculation. It was conjectured that the Cabinet was in a crisis, and consequently that a dissolution was at hand. All this spreads about the idea that Sir Robert Peel feels the difficulty of his position, and is losing that disciplinary firmness which used to characterise him. It would be a pity for the country, in its present commercial condition, were the monopolists to deceive themselves into the folly of precipitating the contest which they affect to desire. But perhaps, after all, it may be ultimately better that the contest should come, for the raising of a nation might be the cause of securing a larger amount of ultimate advantage for the people than the blunderbores dream of.

On Tuesday, the House of Lords re-assembled, but did nothing, except that Lord Brougham made the House laugh by sneering at the House of Commons as being incapable of doing its business! In the House of Commons, however, in the early part of the evening, there occurred a matter which, as bearing on Free Trade, we must notice.

Lord George Bentinck got up, and in a solemn, lugubrious way, intended to make a great impression, spoke to the following effect:

Lord GEORGE BENTINCK rose to obtain some explanation of a false return laid upon the table respecting the prices of Memel timber. He had moved for this document, applicable to the last six years, in the last week of January or in the first week of February, and the part which appeared to be false was dated 13th February; it was then in the hands of the Board of Trade, although it had not been laid upon the table until the 1st April. The object his lordship had in view was to throw light on a pending discussion of the timber duties, and the return showed that the following were the prices of Memel timber. [The noble lord here stated a series of figures which turned out to be, as he said, the correct prices, and not those given in the return; he accordingly withdrew them.] The following were the prices of Memel timber, duty paid, as they stood in the return of which he complained:

1840	from	£8 0 0	to	£8 5 0
1841	7 15 0	8 0 0
1842	7 15 0	8 0 0

The duty which was stated to have been paid being then 55s. per load. The average of those three years, according to the return upon the table, was 87. 1s. 1d. In the year 1842, the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government introduced his changes. He then reduced the duty by 25s., and he took off a further 5s. in 1843. The return went on to give the subsequent as the prices after the reduction of the duty:

1844	from	£5 5 0	to	£5 10 0
1845	5 0 0	5 10 0
1846	5 12 6	5 17 6

Making an average of 57. 12s. 6d. The result of the return was to show the house and the country that the consumers had gained by the remission of the 30s. duty, not only the whole amount of that duty, but 19s. 2d. over and above it; in other words, that the consumers had gained 49s. 2d. upon every load of Memel timber. He believed the fact to be that so far from this being true, the return, if correctly made out, would have shown that the following were the prices:—In 1840, 57. 10s.; 1841, 57. 5s.; 1842, 57. 5s. Showing an average of 57. 6s. 8d., with a duty of 55s. already paid. During the last three years, when the duty had been reduced to the extent of 30s., the subsequent were the correct prices of Memel timber:—In 1844, 47. 5s.; 1845, 47. 5s.; 1846, 47. 12s. 6d., showing an average of 47. 7s. 6d. Thus the consumer, on an average of three years since the duty had been reduced, as compared with the three years before it was reduced, instead of having gained, as represented in the return, 49s. 2d., being all the reduced duty, and 19s. 2d. beyond it, had really gained only 19s. 2d., while 10s. 10d. were put into the pockets of the foreign growers. Comparing the last year with 1842, before the duty was reduced, there was put into the pockets of the British consumers, not 42s. 6d., as represented by the return, but 12s. 6d., out of the 30s. of reduced duty. Out of the reduced duty of 30s. the foreigner, in 1846, was enjoying benefit to the extent of 17s. 6d., while the British consumer was a gainer to the extent of only 12s. 6d. This seemed to him (Lord G. Bentinck) a most important matter, inasmuch as the house expected to be able to rely upon the truth and honesty of the statistical documents laid upon the table, as valuable guides to legislation. He had at first contemplated the fitness of calling to the bar the subordinate officer who had made out the return, in order that he might explain how the error, or fraud, which had been imposed upon the house had occurred. It was all very well for honourable gentlemen connected with the commercial interests to slight this subject; but he (Lord George Bentinck) maintained that the misrepresentation was an important one, and it could not be denied that it had passed current with the house and the people. So striking was it, that the learned editors of newspapers had remarked upon it in leading articles, and had drawn an argument from it in favour of the reduction of duty on Baltic timber. He had, therefore, thought it right to call upon Ministers to explain how it came to pass that, after so long a delay as seven weeks, the Board of Trade had at length laid upon the table a false return, which had been most appropriately presented on the 1st of April.

Sir Robert Peel thus disposed of this "mare's nest."

Sir R. PEEL did not think that he should be justified in entering into any argument with the noble lord (cheers), but he would simply state the facts of the case as regarded the error in the return. His attention had not been called to the subject until he heard from the noble lord yesterday. Although, in one sense, documents of the kind were presented by ministers, yet, if only on account of their number, it was utterly impossible that they should undertake to be responsible for their accuracy (hear, hear). At the same time he willingly admitted the great importance of accuracy, and the parties preparing them, and not preparing them accurately, were in truth answerable. Immediately he understood that an error had been committed, he had directed that if that error were found to exist, a document not liable to the same objection should be made out forthwith and laid before the house. He believed that an accurate return would be laid upon the table to-morrow. He had also made a communication to the Board of Customs requiring to be certified in what department the mistake had been committed; to this communication an answer had been received, and the best course would perhaps be to read the letter. It was in the following form, and addressed to one of the secretaries of the Treasury:—"April 21, 1846.—Sir—In answer to your requisition, calling upon me to state in what department the error in the return of the values on Memel and Canadian timber arose, I have to regret to state that it was in the landing surveyor's department. The nature of the mistake is, that the prices were necessarily taken from the Prices Current, which are not official Customs documents, but a mercantile list, in which some of the values quoted include the duties, whilst others do not. The heading of the space containing the values, viz. "value in bond," led to the error. It applied only to the upper half of the columns, and not to that part in which these prices were entered, and this distinction was not observed. I have to express my regret at this error, and remain, Sir, your most obedient servant, M. Sturt.—E. Cardwell, Esq." He (Sir R. Peel) had only to add the expression of his regret that the error had occurred; he had taken the necessary steps to correct it immediately, but he must repeat that public officers must be held responsible for mistakes of the kind."

The rest of Tuesday night was spent in a kind of miscellaneous discussion on the Poor Law Commission, the Post-office, Irish railways, &c. Tuesday is an open night, for the motions of individual members; and it, of course, depends on their nature whether or not the discussions on that night are of general importance.

On Wednesday, during the day sitting, there was a somewhat curious discussion, showing how fearful the "country gentlemen" are of anything which may tend to diminish their influence, or their control over the county constituencies.

Mr. Elphinstone moved the second reading of his County Elections Bill, the object proposed by which was to limit the time of polling in counties to the same period as in boroughs, namely, to one day.

Colonel Thomas Wood met the motion by a direct negative, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

In the course of the somewhat curious discussion which ensued,

Lord Worsley, who supported the bill, adduced evidence to show that the bulk of a county constituency actually polled on the first day of an election.

The noble lord read the following statement:

Return of the number of votes recorded in County Elections in 1841, showing that a large proportion of the registered constituents recorded their votes on the first day:

	Total Votes Recorded.	First Day Poll.	Second Day Poll.
Buckinghamshire	5571	6938	1641
South Essex	5127	4218	909
Hertfordshire	6445	7919	1496
South Northamptonshire	3675	4865	850
West Yorkshire	4972	41239	8283
North Northumberland	3880	2762	718
East Cumberland	5753	5777	590
North Lincolnshire	13713	11163	2640
East Sussex	2392	4290	1012
South Derbyshire	13629	8645	2375
South Leicestershire	7593	6936	627
East Cornwall	7456	6951	495
East Norfolk	8313	6863	1450

Lord Worsley also amused the house by assuring it that he was cognisant of the fact that many county electors imagined, and sometimes attempted to act on their misconception, that as the law allowed two days for polling, they could vote on the first day for one candidate, and on the second for his opponent; and that they supposed they were deprived of a legal right when they were prevented.

Mr. Newdegate expressed his apprehensions that if county elections were limited to one day, associations, such as the Anti-Corn-Law League, would take advantage of the facilities which railways now afforded; and, by concentrating bodies of electors at particular stations, pour down upon the polling booths and decide the contest. Mr. Cobden had threatened that within three years he could unseat one hundred county members, unless they changed their principles, and acted against their own convictions and those of the constituencies which they represented.

Mr. Bright remarked that all the arguments against the present Bill resembled in colour and texture the arguments which had been used in support of the old obnoxious system, on which the present practice was admitted to be a great improvement.

Mr. Beckett Denison knew of many instances in which the result of an election had been changed by the interval afforded between the first and second day.

Sir James Graham admitted that the change to one day in boroughs, and two days in counties, had been a great improvement on the old system. But elections in boroughs extended only over a radius of seven miles; while in counties there was no specific limitation, and instanced the county of York. He did not think the Bill to be necessary, and therefore opposed it.

After some further debate—during which Mr. Escott affirmed his knowledge of corrupt practices in the night between the two days, and Colonel Sibthorp hoped that the day was distant when money would not freely circulate at elections, and Lord George Bentinck renewed his attack on Mr. Escott, for alleged abandonment of principle—the house went to a division, when the Bill was thrown out by a majority of 55 to 32.

Thursday night was devoted, in both Houses, to the introduction of the Railway Relief Bill, and the discussion of a new sessional order, for the purpose of stopping all Railway Bills now before Parliament, until it is ascertained that a majority of the shareholders are clearly in favour of proceeding; while to those who wish to withdraw from their schemes the opportunity is given of winding up their concerns. The subject does not precisely come within our range, except to notice that the "gangway section" are anxious to seize every opportunity of attacking the Government. Lord George Bentinck, on hearing the Chancellor of the Exchequer talk about appealing from "Philip drunk" to "Philip sober," got up and accused Sir Robert Peel personally, and the Government generally, as having had a great share in making the people railway drunk. And then Ben D'Israeli, the "Philosopher of Shrewsbury," should get up to repeat the same thing, and to preach an essay as to the virtues which should be possessed by a "great statesman," with a "great idea." Philosophie Ben imagines, apparently, that unborn statesmen will yet suckle from him the art of Government.

It is really becoming intolerable that a knot of pedants and puppies "under the gangway," should bestride every public question, like the Old Man of the Sea.

Late in the evening, (the railway debate lasting till past eleven o'clock,) Lord Sandon brought on a motion relative to the reduction of the duty on TEA, which was seconded by Mr. Moffat, in an able statistical speech, which the lateness of the hour alone prevented from receiving due consideration. But, from the reply of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we may infer that the subject will be taken into the serious consideration of the Government.

IMPORTANT FROM BRAZIL.—PETITION TO LORD ABERDEEN.

(From the Economist.)

The question of our relations with Brazil becomes more and more complicated. Our readers will remember that, at various periods last year, we called attention to the dangerous position in which property in Brazil belonging to British subjects, dying either there or here, is placed in such an event by the expiry of our treaty. It is now a year ago since a deputation of merchants from Liverpool had an interview with Lord Aberdeen on this alarming state of our Brazilian relations. At that time Lord Aberdeen, fully admitting the importance of the case, assured those merchants that he had every reason to believe that, at that moment, a treaty of amity was on its way home, which would secure a restoration of the rights of British subjects in Brazil.

To this day no more has been heard of the Brazilian treaty; the truth being, that the disappointment felt at our continued refusal to admit their sugars, by the bill of last year, and further the passing of a law towards the close of last session, giving to our Courts of Admiralty jurisdiction over Brazilian subjects, in certain cases, under the treaty of 1826, and which Act was passed in the face of the most explicit opinion expressed by one of the greatest law authorities in Parliament, and we think we may safely say, under a considerable doubt on the part of all, that it was an Act of direct variance with the law of nations,—under these circumstances, the Brazilian Government immediately instructed the commissioners who had been appointed to negotiate the treaty in question, to suspend all further intercourse on the subject with Mr. Hamilton, until these obnoxious and injurious laws were altered.

Meantime a private committee was appointed at Rio de Janeiro, for the purpose of endeavouring, by every means in their power, to prevail on the Government to grant them the same privileges regarding the property of deceased British merchants as is possessed by the French, under treaty, and which they also possessed until the expiry of the late treaty. After spending months in futile attempts, without obtaining any concession from the Government, and living in the greatest terror of the operation of the law upon their property, this committee have addressed to Lord Aberdeen, through Mr. Hamilton, a petition, of which the following is a copy—the original, no doubt, having been received this week at the Foreign Office. The petition itself fully explains the difficulties and dangers under which from four to five millions' worth of British property is at this moment almost in a state of the most imminent danger. And for what? In order to maintain a distinction with respect to the introduction of slave-labour sugar, most ineffective for its pretended objects, and which fairly exposes us, in all our efforts on behalf of the slave, to a suspicion of insincerity and hypocrisy, and exhibits us to the whole world in the daily commission of the most glaring and flagrant inconsistencies. This has become a serious subject, which it will be impossible for the British Government to stave off much longer. The following is the petition:

May it please your Lordship,

The undersigned British subjects resident in Brazil, request permission, in the most respectful manner, to lay before your Lordship, her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the very exposed and dangerous position in which all property existing in Brazil belonging to British subjects is placed, by a certain law, entitled, "Decreto, No. 160, de 9 de Maio, de 1842, Dando Regulamento para a arrecadação dos bens dos defuntos e Ausentes, vagos e de evento," being made applicable to them, "as subjects of a nation with which Brazil has no treaty." Your memorialists beg leave to state the difference of the positions of French and British subjects. A British subject is bound to make his will according to the forms of the Brazilian law, and is further obliged to bequeath such of his property as may be existent in Brazil, wheresoever he may reside, in obedience to the tenor of the law of coheirship (Lei de Partilhas), which gives certain relatives of the deceased a legal claim on a certain portion of his property, and forbids its being otherwise bequeathed; but a French subject is at liberty to will his property in accordance with French law.

On the death of a British subject in Brazil—or, indeed, any part of the world, who may have left property in Brazil, whether he should have died intestate or otherwise, the local authorities claim (under the law alluded to) an intervention in the administration of it, which would render the settlement of any claim against the estate of the deceased so difficult and vexatious, that the credit of any commercial establishment which might come under its influence would, of a certainty, become seriously injured, if not ruined; but, by perpetual articles (of an expired treaty), French subjects are entirely protected from the interference of the law your memorialists have so much reason to dread and complain of; thus the French subject can offer a protection and security to property placed under his charge, no longer enjoyed by the subjects of Great Britain in this country.

If a French subject die in this country, or any other, the dispositions he may have made relative to property would be carried into execution here, by the sole intervention of the French consul; and should he have died without leaving any will or dispositions, the French consul has then the power of naming curators, &c., to administer the property, so that a French mercantile establishment, under either event (that is, whether a partner had died intestate or otherwise), would not be exposed to ruin or injury, but might continue its transactions without any interruption.

Should a British merchant die in Brazil, whether he left a will or dispositions for the carrying on the establishment with which he had been connected or not, the local authorities claim a prejudicial intervention with—and the law insists on the liquidation of—the establishment! and the vexatious proofs required, as well as the tardy attention which would be paid to them, before the most clear commercial claim would be acknowledged, would cause a virtual stoppage of payment, and lead to almost certain ruin; thus involving not only the property of the deceased, but the interests of his partners in Great Britain, and probably of others who might have trusted the establishment with the care of their property in this country.

To be as expressive of their meaning as possible, your memorialists may state to your Lordship, that a British subject who might be about to retire from Brazil, under the existence of the law referred to, would leave his property with much greater security in the custody of a French subject than under the care of one of his own countrymen. In the latter case the property would be exposed to a double risk, as either the death of the owner or the agent would equally throw it into the hand of the local authorities, whilst with the French subject, as principal or agent, no interference of the local authorities could occur.

Your Lordship's memorialists have alluded to the case of mercantile establishments, particularly, to show more evidently the risks which those in Great Britain and elsewhere run, who may trust to them as agents, as well as to prove to your Lordship how serious and prejudicial the interest of British commercial establishments connected with the trade to Brazil must be injured by these vexatious laws.

The British merchant here can no longer offer to those in Europe or elsewhere the same security against the intervention of the local authorities in local affairs as French subjects can; neither, indeed, can they do so now to the natives. A circumstance which formerly added much to support British credit in Brazil, was the practical knowledge of the natives, that although a British subject should die in this country, no interference by the local authorities would take place with his property, and his debts would be paid without subjecting the claimants on his estate to loss or litigation. Your memorialists did entertain hopes that the security granted to French subjects by perpetual articles of treaty made between France and Brazil, within twelve months previous to the date of the last treaty made between Great Britain and this country, had been secured by the following article of the 5th article in the said British treaty:

"And, generally, it is agreed, that the subjects of the high contracting parties respectively shall enjoy in all the territories of the others, with respect to their persons, any rights, privileges, favours, or exemptions, which are, or which may be at any time hereafter, granted to the subjects of the most favoured nations."

But recent occurrences have tended to perplex them on the subject, especially the case of the late George March (a British subject), whose estate was administered for a short time by two British subjects, in accordance with the dispositions left by the late Mr. March, and under the authority of her Majesty's consul. Ultimately, however, the local authorities have interfered; and, disavowing the consul's authority, have laid an injunction on the property, named a curator, and subjected the administrators to the law of which your memorialists so much complain. A more REPLY OF THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE TO THE ADDRESS FROM THE "SOCIÉTÉ DES ÉCONOMISTES" OF PARIS.

The following letter was forwarded some time ago from the Council of the League to the Society of Political Economists in Paris, in reply to the address transmitted from that Association to the League, which has already appeared in our columns. The letter appears in the last Number of the "Journal des Économistes," and the interval that has elapsed between the transmission and publication is accounted for by the fact that the "Journal des Économistes" is published only once a month. We subjoin a copy of the original letter, together with the translation:

Londres, 18 Mars, 1846.

A Messieurs CHARLES DUNOYER, Membre de l'Institut, Président; HORACE SAY, JOSEPH GARNIER, et les Membres de la Société des Économistes, à Paris.

MESSIEURS.—Veuillez ne pas attribuer le long retard que les chefs de la Ligue ont mis à vous répondre à un manque de courtoisie de leur part, mais simplement à une grave indisposition qui, pendant plusieurs semaines, m'a tenu séparé de mes compagnons de travaux dans la cause du libre échange. En leur nom comme au mien, je vous prie d'agréer cette tardive expression de notre gratitude. Nous avons été sensiblement touchés à la lecture de votre lettre, où vous nous exprimez en termes si éloquentes la cordiale sympathie des économistes de Paris pour les Free Traders d'Angleterre.

Je n'ai jamais douté que, lorsque les travaux et les intentions de la Ligue seraient connus au dehors, il n'éveillassent de nombreuses sympathies au sein d'un peuple aussi généreux et aussi éclairé que le peuple de France. Si ces travaux, pendant plusieurs années, n'ont point attiré l'attention des étrangers, c'est qu'ils paraissaient n'être dirigés que vers un but spécial et n'avoir pour objet que le redressement d'un grief purement domestique. Pourtant, dès l'origine, les promoteurs de la lutte contre les lois céréales avaient tendu à une fin bien autrement noble et générale que la simple destruction d'un monopole injuste. Dans leur pensée le rappel de ces lois devait conduire à l'abolition complète du régime protecteur. Ils sentaient que le grand principe de la liberté commerciale était au fond de la querelle, et qu'à la solution d'une question toute spéciale se liait inévitablement le sort d'un système qui intéressait le présent et l'avenir, non-seulement de l'Angleterre, mais du monde entier.

Je suis charmé, Messieurs, que le retard involontaire que j'ai mis vous répondre me permette de vous annoncer que l'événement confirme ces prévisions, et que la réforme aura un objet infiniment plus étendu que n'avait paru l'annoncer son titre.—Le libre échange, non-seulement en matière de subsistances, mais en toutes sortes de produits, devient aujourd'hui la politique commerciale avouée de la nation Anglaise. Non-seulement tous nos principaux hommes d'état, abjurant un système erroné, se sont prononcés pour l'introduction pratique dans la législation Anglaise des principes de Smith et de J. B. Say; mais encore la grande charte de nos franchises commerciales, promulguée par Sir Robert Peel, a été scellée par le vote des représentants de peuple Britannique.

Je n'ai pas besoin de dire à une Société aussi éclairée que celle des Économistes de Paris, que les suites d'une révolution si considérable ne sauraient se renfermer dans les limites étroites de Royaume-Uni, et que elle est destinée à s'étendre. Vous savez aussi bien que nous, Messieurs, quelle est la vive tendance des idées justes et fécondes à se propager, et combien il est difficile, lorsque une grande nation en a fait l'heureuse application chez elle, que les autres ne soient pas bientôt entraînées à l'imiter. Aussi longtemps que les peuples ont été uniformément soumis au régime des restrictions commerciales, ils ont pu lutter sur le pied de l'égalité: chacun trouvait une sorte de protection dans l'erreur commune à tous. Mais quand une grande nation maritime s'est affranchie des liens du monopole, je ne comprends pas trop comment les autres pourraient consentir longtemps à retenir ce lourd fardeau et à demeurer placées dans des conditions de travail et d'activité si évidemment désavantageuses.

Nous espérons, Messieurs, que la société française, si éclairée, ne tardera pas à sentir les désavantages de cette situation, et qu'elle ne voudra laisser à aucune autre l'honneur de prendre sur le continent l'initiative des mesures favorables à la liberté commerciale. Il n'y a pour votre patriotisme qu'un moyen de la préparer à cet heureux affranchissement: c'est d'initier vos populations à la connaissance de leurs intérêts et de leurs droits. Il est tout à fait désirable que les saines notions économiques cessent enfin de demeurer confinées dans le cabinet des hommes qui les cultivent ou dans quelque cercle savant, et qu'elles commencent à devenir familières à la masse de vos compatriotes. Il n'est donné à aucun gouvernement, quelque excellent que puissent être ses intentions, de faire prévaloir une législation raisonnable, s'il n'est soutenu par une opinion publique éclairée. Vous devez l'avoir éprouvé chez vous, car nous ne cessons d'en faire l'expérience en Angleterre. Il y a dix ans, le gouvernement de ce pays n'eût pas même conçu la pensée de proposer au Parlement ces mesures au triomphe desquelles est aujourd'hui subordonnée la durée du cabinet de Sir Robert Peel. Pour préparer ce résultat, pour donner au peuple d'Angleterre l'intelligence de ses vrais intérêts et le déterminer à manifester constitutionnellement son vœu, il a fallu écrire, discuter, imprimer durant beaucoup d'années. Vous n'aurez pas moins à faire sans doute. Vous ne serez pas plus dispensés que nous, d'user avec énergie et persévérance de ces trois grands agents de tout progrès moral, la parole, la plume et la presse, avant qu'aucun homme d'état intelligent consente à vous suivre et à introduire le principe de la liberté dans la législation industrielle et commerciale de votre pays. Mais à qui, plus qu'à vous, Messieurs, appartient le privilège de propager parmi vos compatriotes les vérités de l'économie politique? et quelle plus recent case has also occurred, where the local authorities at once took charge of the property of a deceased British subject—a person who belonged to the poorer class; but the circumstance equally shows the principle of the law. If the ostensible be the only real object of the law stated and complained against—namely, to afford protection by preventing embezzlement, no apparently justifiable motive can be offered for not rescinding it, so far as regards those foreigners whose Governments might be desirous to release Brazil from the responsibility.

Your memorialists trust to the penetration of your Lordship to take a full and correct view of the incalculable evils which must be entailed on British commercial interests by the novelty of the Brazilian Government establishing one principle of security for the property of the French subject, and another inferior for the property of British subjects.

Your Lordship's memorialists rely with implicit confidence that her Majesty's Government will give the subject of this memorial that consideration which it may merit.

Rio de Janeiro, the eleventh of February, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

London, 18th March, 1846.

Messrs. CHARLES DUNOYER, Member of the Institute and Acting President; HORACE SAY, JOSEPH GARNIER, and the Members of the Economical Society of Paris.

GENTLEMEN.—I entreat you not to attribute the long delay in answering your address to the prominent members of the Anti-Corn-Law League to a want of courtesy on their part, but to a tedious illness which has for several weeks separated me from my fellow-labourers in the cause of Free Trade. In their behalf and my own, I beg you to accept this tardy expression of our grateful acknowledgments. Your address has been read by the members of the League with the liveliest feelings of admiration for the eloquent terms in which you have communicated the cordial sentiments entertained by the economists of Paris towards the Free Traders of England.

I never doubted that, when the labours and the motives of the League were comprehended abroad, they would secure the sympathies of the enlightened and generous people of France. For many years those labours failed to attract the notice of foreigners, because they seemed isolated in their object, and directed to the removal of one solitary domestic grievance. But the promoters of the struggle against the English Corn Law perceived from the beginning, that in the success of their efforts was involved a far nobler triumph than that of the removal of an injurious monopoly. They foresaw that the repeal of the Corn Law would be the signal for the downfall of every protective duty—that the great principle of commercial freedom was at stake; and that not merely England, but the world at large, was now and for all future time, interested in the issue of the struggle of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

Fortunately, the delay which has occurred in answering your address enables me to congratulate you upon the recent confirmation of those views. Free Trade in corn, and every other commodity, has now become the recognised policy of the English nation. Not only have all our leading statesmen, with a wise disregard of their former acquiescence in an erroneous system, declared themselves in favour of the practical application of the principles of Adam Smith and J. B. Say to the legislation of England, but the great Charter of our commercial liberty, promulgated by the Government of Sir R. Peel, has received the sanction of the representatives of the British people.

To a body so instructed as the Economists of Paris, I need not say that this step, on the part of England, involves, as a necessary consequence, a revolution, sooner or later, in the fiscal policy of the whole civilised world. It is a maxim, applicable alike to the discoveries in moral and physical science, that nations cannot afford to stand still whilst others are advancing in the march of improvement. So long as all countries subjected themselves to the fetters of the restrictive system, they were upon an equality in the race. The folly of all was the protection of each. But when one great maritime people casts off the trammels of monopoly, it will be in vain for others who retain the burden to attempt to preserve their true position in the scale of nations.

Pardon me for adding, that if your enlightened body share these opinions, your patriotism will prompt you to endeavour to confer upon France the honour and advantages of leading the Continent of Europe in the path of commercial freedom. Be assured that there is no other mode of accomplishing this end but by instructing the people in a knowledge of their economical rights and interests. The theories which have hitherto been confined to the studies of the learned, or the circles of scientific societies, must be made familiar to the minds of the mass of your countrymen. No Government, however well disposed, can enforce a wise legislation, unless it be sustained by an enlightened public opinion. This truth is as applicable to England as to France. Ten years ago, the Government of this country could not have dreamed of being able to carry through Parliament the measures upon which Sir Robert Peel now stakes the existence of his Cabinet. It required many years of writing and discussion, of printing and lecturing, to convince the people of England of their true interests, and rouse them to a constitutional expression of their opinion and wishes. The same mighty agents in all moral progress—the tongue, the pen, and the press—must be called into wide and persevering use, before your statesmen will have the power to embody the principles of industrial freedom in the legislation of France. To whom so properly belongs the privilege of instructing Frenchmen in the truths of political economy as yourselves? What a glorious mission, to take a great nation by the hand, and lead it forward in the path of freedom, civilisation, and happiness—a path which will assuredly conduct us to that goal of Christianity, the universal peace and brotherhood of mankind! But let me not disguise from you the difficulties of the task. You will encounter the combined and active op-noble et plus glorieuse mission pourriez-vous vous proposer que de prendre en quelque sorte vos populations par la main et de les conduire, en les instruisant mieux de leurs vrais intérêts, vers cette sainte fin du christianisme, la rapprochement des nations, la paix universelle et la fraternité du genre humain ? Ne vous faites pourtant pas illusion sur les difficultés que vous aurez à combattre. Vous allez vous heurter, comme nous, contre l'opposition active et combinée de tous ceux qui s'exagèrent les profits du monopole, et qui croient leur fortune liée à la perpétuité du régime exclusif. Vous aurez à les suivre dans les argumentations les plus subtiles, à réfuter des sophismes qui se produiront sous les formes les plus diverses et les plus compliquées, à déraciner des préjugés aussi anciens que le monde. Ne vous laissez ni surprendre, ni décourager; la vérité est douée d'une si grande énergie virtuelle ! Nous n'avons pas moins à faire que vous ; nous avons à attaquer le monopole sous sa forme la plus formidable, et pourtant nous l'avons vaincu. Pourquoi ce que nous avons si heureusement accompli vous serait-il donc impossible ?

C'est avec une vive émotion, Messieurs, que je rends à votre honorable Société l'expression des sentiments affectueux qu'elle a bien voulu exprimer au président et aux membres de la Ligue. Oui, c'est une ère glorieuse et nouvelle que celle qui est témoin de ce généreux échange de sympathiques manifestations entre les citoyens de deux peuples autrefois victimes d'une haine aveugle et d'un antagonisme insensé, mais destinés, j'en ai la ferme espérance, à ne rivaliser désormais que dans l'accomplissement de ces exploits pacifiques qui font la prospérité et la vraie gloire des nations civilisées. Recevez, je vous prie, Messieurs, de la part de mes collègues et de la mienne, l'assurance de mes sentiments de considération et de sincère estime.

(Signé)

RICHARD COBDEN.

THE RUMOUR OF A RUMOUR.

(From the Times.)

There is a rumour of an immediate dissolution; or, to speak more correctly, there is the report of a rumour to that effect. What is the ground and origin of this report—whether the wish is father to it, or the fear is father to it—whether the protectionists wish Sir Robert to think that he must resign, or Sir Robert wishes the protectionists to think that he will resign—whether an immediate dissolution of Parliament is not a mere blunder for an immediate dissolution of railways, or, after all, the report only expresses that indefinite dissatisfaction with the existing state of things which led Miss Squeers to exclaim, "I wish I was dead—I wish all the world was dead"—it is not necessary for us to decide. The report exists, and is put about with diligence. The question is propounded. Something is to be gained, it is thought, by looking upon the event as possible. As the question is forced upon us, we have scarcely an alternative but to reply. It is by no means an edifying theme. When there is nothing else to talk of, the public generally begins to talk of a dissolution, just as some men, whenever they have nothing else to do, immediately begin to think of apoplexy, suicide, and such horrors. In fact, every time within these twenty years that things have come to a standstill, there has been a report of a dissolution. Anybody, without an opinion in his head, can venture an estimate of the odds for or against that casualty.

Perhaps it is beside the question to ask who is to gain by a dissolution? The Miss Squeers who suggests the idea has probably given up all thought of gain. It is enough that somebody would lose something; or, if not damaged, will be at least disgraced; or, if not disgraced, yet stigmatised. The vision of a dozen agricultural constituencies, in addition to those which have already changed their numbers, turning out four-and-twenty "apostates," with an immense deal of pother, with much bluster and invective, and giving us in their stead four-and-twenty raw young men who have yet to apostatise, is enough to console these satisfied dreamers for the absence of any tangible advantage. Sir Robert Peel would "get it." Many speeches would be made and circulated at a penny a piece. Many prophecies would be uttered. Heaps of statistics and financial statements would be collected for the benefit of those who are ignorant of facts and not versed in arithmetic. Tamboff and New Orleans, the Vistula and the Ohio, would again become names of terror. We should have a Saturnalia of apocryphal facts and impossible estimates. In the midst of the clamour there would perhaps be a dozen victories; though, perhaps, on the contrary, there would not be one. But granting the said dozen victories, whose would be the gain, whose the loss, in the day of reckoning? What would the protectionists have gained by a dissolution?

It is due to public peace and quiet not to canvass electioneering probabilities till the occasion actually arises. It is rather an American than an English usage to keep the elective contest always on foot. Therefore we will not attempt to go through the counties, and cities, and boroughs, in anticipation of a new Parliament. We expressed at the time a gentle demur as to the wisdom and taste of Mr. Cobden's masterly and hitherto unanswered review of the British constituencies. But we certainly do not see where the protectionists can hope to find the means of turning the scale in another Parliament. Why do they not favour us with the names of the constituencies that are to settle the business? They talk of the 112. A balance of 56 changes in their favour, therefore, will be sufficient, not indeed to decide the question in favour of protection, but to bring the legislature to a standstill. Where will you get your 56? Name, name, name? How many cities and boroughs have been lately converted to the sliding scale? But your trust is in the counties—the English counties. They have already done almost their worst. They have left no margin for extraordinary efforts. All the county seats will be insufficient for the purpose.

With so little to encourage even from the most friendly quarter, what is it that the protectionists hope to gain from the dissolution? What at least beyond two or three stray triumphs, counteracted by many more defeats, and the ephemeral pleasure of agitation, misrepresentation, and abuse, of indulging without stint in false logic, false facts, false statistics, false finance, false politics during the hubbub of a general election? They would find these a poor compensation for all but certain results—either one or the other object of their wrath securely settled in the seven years' lease of a Parliament to his mind. The chapter of accidents may do much, if not to accomplish their views, at least to satisfy their vengeance, in the course of this and the following session. Peel may have fallen by his own weight before the winter of 1847. New questions may then have arisen fatal to his cause on the registry and the hustings. A dissolution position of those who take an exaggerated view of their vested interests in monopoly. You will have to unravel sophisms the most subtle, to refute fallacies which, Proteus-like, will assume different forms; to uproot prejudices as old as France. But be of good courage; truth will enable the champions of Free Trade to surmount all difficulties. We have encountered monopoly in its most formidable shape, and overcome it. Frenchmen will never find that to be impossible which Englishmen have already accomplished.

In conclusion, let me avow the heartfelt gratification that I feel, whilst reciprocating the affectionate sentiments expressed by your Society towards the President and prominent members of the League. It is a new and glorious era which witnesses this generous interchange of sympathies between the citizens of two great nations, heretofore the victims of mutual hatred and unreasoning hostility, but destined, I fervently hope, to become henceforth rivals only in those peaceful achievements which minister to the prosperity and true glory of civilised communities. I entreat you to accept from my colleagues and myself the assurance of our high consideration and esteem, and I have the honour to remain

Sincerely and faithfully yours,

RICHARD COBDEN.

now is a dissolution on the Corn Law. A Parliament elected now will be a Free Trade Parliament; and if, for the comfort of the agriculturists, the story of the late Westminster election should be repeated a hundred times over, the result will be only more permanently, more decidedly, and more offensively adverse to the feelings and supposed interests of the aristocracy.

THE BEDFORD LEVEL CORPORATION.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

There is life in protection yet. The Easter recess has not converted all the friends of native industry. Lord Essex has succumbed; but the fens are firm. A meeting of the Bedford Level Corporation was held on Thursday last. The Duke of Bedford was in the chair, and the Earl of Hardwicke was among the speakers. At that meeting the corporate seal was affixed to a petition to both Lords and Commons against the repeal of the Corn Laws, as destructive to the prosperity of the Bedford Level.

The Bedford Level Corporation has a great faith in high prices, and a most ungrateful disregard for science. The petition attributes "the present prosperous state of the Bedford Level mainly to the encouragement given to agriculture by the restrictive duties imposed on the importation of foreign corn," and declares "that the improvements which have been effected in the drainage of the level and the cultivation of the land would not have taken place if the prices of agricultural produce had not been fairly remunerative." We could imagine a much more faithful statement of the case than this. What if we were to put the advance of science as the primary cause of the prosperity in question, and substitute for the "restrictive duties" the public spirit and enterprise of the successive Dukes of Bedford, aided by their intelligent agents, whose present representative is Mr. Tycho Wing?

It is very natural that the dying utterances of protection should rise from the fens. The inhabitants of this Bæotian region have always been staunch protectionists. They were as sturdy protectors of the fens themselves, while they stagnated over the level, as they are now of the Corn Laws. In 1630, when Sir Cornelius Vanmayden was defeated in his projects for draining the fens of Cambridgeshire by the protectionists of that day, the arguments urged against the scheme by these supporters of domestic industry were exactly parallel to those maintained in favour of the Corn Laws by the speakers at Ely. Imprimis, the draining, said they, was an experiment. Many had burnt their fingers in these operations, and instead of draining the fens, emptied their own estates. So with Free Trade: it is an experiment also, and therefore to be condemned. The argument that water would find its level was disregarded in the one case; the axiom that demand will regulate supply is pooh-poohed in the other. Again, there was in the seventeenth century the same marvellous regard for existing rights. "The fens," it was argued by the sapient defenders of things as they are, "afforded great plenty and variety of fish and fowl, not to speak of sedge, turf, and reed, which would be destroyed by draining, and none be accessible but at excessive prices." The fen-bred mallard, or mud-flattened pike of the Nene or Ouse, was sweeter to your marsh man than the fat ox of Essex or the sheep of Leicestershire, then, just as the small loaf of Level wheat is sweeter than one twice its size of Dantzic flour. Again, there was great consideration for the thousands of poor people maintained by fishing and fowling in the fens, who would be thrown out of employment by the draining of their homesteads, the swamps and flats of Outwell and Ramsey. There is the same benevolent regard for the half-fed labourer of the present day, and the same forgetfulness that the evils of scanty food and wretched wages are not aggravated by a change which promises to give more both of one and the other.

"However," says Fuller, in giving the pros and cons of the drainage and anti-drainage parties, "the generality were possessed with a firm opinion that the project was impossible to be brought to pass."

It is a pity that the science which drained the fens cannot be brought to bear upon the fen men. The steam-engine can draw off the muddy waters of the Welland or the Cam, but is powerless against the stagnant settlements of prejudice and ignorance. We may substitute corn for sedge, and barley-field for bog, but who shall so manure mind that truth shall spring in the place of bigotry, and the green crops of activity on the ground beset by the rank overgrowth of contented stupidity and unquestionable indolence?

The Earl of Hardwicke supported the petition in a speech worthy of that document and its framers. Nothing more daring in assertion or more vicious in logic has seen the light, even in the palmy days of protection, before Sir Robert announced his conversion. His lordship, however, took two or three new positions:

"The manufacturers said that they existed by means of art and science. Now he (Lord Hardwicke) replied that they could use the same language in the Bedford Level for there they existed by the very means of which the manufacturers make a boast. They existed there by art and industry; that great country had been brought into its present state of high cultivation by the art, and science, and industry of man (here, hear, hear). It was drained by the steam-engine; that great mark of the progress of human knowledge had been seized upon, not only by the manufacturers of cotton, but also by the manufacturers of wheat. Therefore they stood in the same position with the manufacturers of the north in that respect, inasmuch as their prosperity was founded upon art and science."

We are glad to find agriculture boasting that it stands on the same ground as manufactures. There used to be a disposition to oppose green fields to smoky towns, and village spires to factory chimneys. The Bedford Level, having now found out its sisterhood to Manchester, should go further, and borrow arguments instead of machines—convictions as well as steam-engines. If the Bedford Level cultivators are like the Lancashire cotton-spinners, why do they not, like them, defy the world and disclaim protection?

Lord Hardwicke himself gives us a very original answer to this natural and pertinent query:

"Let the Corn Laws be once repealed, and before long the progress of science in other countries, and the advantages we gave them for the purpose of rendering the British agriculturist powerless in raising food, would cause the millowner of Manchester to supplicate Parliament for protection for his industry, and skill, and capital (cheers). Facts would soon come forth to show that a great pressure upon the cotton manufacturing interest—caused probably, in some measure, by our sending out steam-engines to facilitate the manufacture of cotton at the very place where the raw material is grown, had been to the manufacturers a fearful notice of the risk they must run by competing unprotected with the advancing science of other countries. The cheap loaf was a sort of last hope to them. They thought if they could get a cheap loaf even for a time, they might so reduce the wages of labour as to hold up a little longer against the competition they had brought upon themselves. There might be, doubtless there were, persons connected with the Free Trade movement who had ulterior objects, but the immediate object of the movement was personal gain."

This, it must be confessed, is a new view of the subject. The fear that foreigners will manufacture is an argument against supplying them with manufactures of our making. Russia is madly bent on shirt-making—Manchester is paving the way to her own ruin by supplying her with shirts ready made. Europe has corn, but is deficient in broad-cloth—England has broad-cloth, and is deficient in corn. Suicidal England, says Lord Hardwicke, which would exchange the fabric of her looms for the grain of her foreign customer! Lord Hardwicke contrasts the disinterested motives of the protectionist peers with the selfishness of the Free Traders. Repeal of the Corn Laws is to have a tremendous effect upon prices. Wheat is to come down by the run, but somehow the great landholders are not to be affected. We have often maintained the latter half of this argument, but we do not remember having coupled it with the former. If the disinterestedness of the protectionist lords is to be supported by this pair of stools, something must come to the ground which it is not decorous to particularise. Lord Hardwicke's remarkable statement is worth preserving:

"He was of opinion that the House of Lords and the highest ranks of society were, of all others, the least interested in this question of Free Trade. Could it be believed that if his noble friend on his left, the Duke of Bedford, were to find his property reduced one-fourth, or more, in value, it would make any very material difference in his comforts as a great and a proud British nobleman—proud from his descent, but noble from his virtues? But look at the condition of the artisan; if he suffer a diminution in his earnings, what a fearful effect is produced upon his comforts and those of his family! It was on this ground that he (Lord Hardwicke) was prepared to support, in his place in the House of Lords, the present system of protection to the industry of land."

We beg to draw up a case in proportion. As the Duke of Bedford's rental from land is to his whole income, so is the price of his bread to the artisan to his whole expenditure. The repeal of the Corn Laws will diminish the value of land, says Lord Hardwicke, therefore it will diminish the Duke of Bedford's rental. But it will lower the price of bread. We cannot see how Lord Hardwicke makes out that it will, therefore, lessen the comforts of the artisan. However, Lord Hardwicke, like Orlando in "As you Like it," is not asked to please us—he is asked to speak. His auditory was not a very critical one. It was of the fens, fenish—and the speech was worthy of the hearers. Protection, like the early Britons, has been driven from the haunts of civilisation to swamps and inaccessible morasses, and we cannot hail in Lord Hardwicke the Prince Arthur who is to lead it forth for daring deeds against the sturdy Saxons of the League, or the traitorous band who have forfeited their nationality for the good of the country, and shaken hands with those potent invaders, common sense and sound argument.

THE MANNERS MIXTURE, OR INFALLIBLE SOCIAL SPECIFIC.

(From the Examiner.)

It is a good thing for lords to mix with labourers. It is a good thing to play at cricket and quoits. There is merit in the promotion of sports and pastimes, but nevertheless Lord John Manners is mistaken in supposing himself the regenerator of the nation.

Things might be better than they are if there were more Lord John Mannerses in the world, more cricket and more quoits, but nevertheless things as they are, are not so bad as Lord John Manners describes them. It is, however, the good fortune of Lord John Manners to be his own specific. He bewails the alienation of classes; he finds that admixture is what is wanted; and so he mixes Lord John Manners for the improvement of the social elements. At Birmingham, at Manchester, at Liverpool, the remedy, according to the words of the Apothecaries' label, is, the mixtures as before.

How great must be the happiness to a benevolent man of finding, in his own person, the remedy for a nation's evils, and that for the great work of social amelioration he has only to give the people a little more of himself. So when Lord John Manners surveys the wants and woes of the country, he has the comfort of knowing that he has only to mix to supply what is deficient, and to amend what is amiss. He confers improvement with his company. He mixes with the people, and they are better, and he is the better too, as he condescendingly explains; so that the Manners mixture is always improving, and the Lord John who regenerates Birmingham by mixing is ten times the Lord John who regenerated Manchester by mixing three years ago. As the more he mixes the greater becomes his mixing virtue, to what a pitch of perfection by due and active process of mixing must he attain!

We look upon Lord John Manners now as the circulating medium of virtue, but with a property that no other circulaling medium possesses, of imparting its value wherever it goes, and endowing it at the same time. The country then requires him to circulate himself actively. England expects Lord John Manners to do his duty. He must not spare himself; he must dine diligently, but and bowl assiduously, and mix copiously. As the demand, "more Manners, more Manners, the mixture, the mixture," rises, he must bestir himself to confer himself. His spirit of self-devotion is happily great. He is the very Curtius of Banquets, always ready to leap into the gulf of the chair; and the vast sacrifice he is ready to make, to give the people the inestimable good of his presence amongst them, may be learnt from this declaration at the Birmingham Athletic Institution. His lordship began with a moral:

"I have learnt one practical lesson, which has taught me that it is not well to talk to one's neighbour at dinner."

We were idle enough to think that Lord John's neighbour had resented the interruption of his feeding; and our sympathies, we confess, were with his neighbour, whom we set down to be in the right of preferring his meat to his lordship's moralising, but we were all at fault, for see what the lesson really was:

"When I introduced to my friend on my right that but for brotherhood I should have been at the meet of my father's hounds, I had no idea that he would thus introduce it as a compliment; however, I assure you that had your anniversary have been on the 15th of April, on that day, instead of the last, it would not have preceded my breakfast."

Prodigies! Typus magnus stupens ludum Paridemque reliquit. For the great object of mixing with the people he would even desert the hounds! This indeed is patriotism.

How great is the bounty of this nobleman! How he gives his presence to his countrymen, knowing that it is the one thing needed, and that wherever he bestows himself he effects regeneration, leaves men wiser, happier, and better. They have only to see the lord among them, and to improve.

Considering what his sense of his own patrician attributes is, he may well have written these lines:

"Let laws and learning, arts and commerce, die,
But let us still our old nobility."

Which, by the way, intimates very truly, no doubt, that the extinction of learning would be quite compatible with the survivorship of the old nobility, who could continue to exist as well as ever without laws, learning, and arts.

Lord John Manners boasts proudly of the progress he has made in national regeneration, and the announcement reads like a passage in a Royal speech:

"In the rural districts a great advance has been made; the May-pole is again erected in Kent, and cricket and other manly games are not only encouraged."

We are very glad to hear it, especially of the May-pole in Kent, though we are not without misgivings that the hop-pole may have been mistaken for it; and we cannot but regret that Lord John Manners was not a little more particular as to the whereabouts of the May-pole, as many worthy persons might be disposed to make a pilgrimage to the sign of social regeneration. We rejoice, too, at the news of cricket; but much as we prize these restorations, we do not think it necessary to their welcome and appreciation to represent the whole country as having been a cave of Trophons before the advent of Lord John Manners, and his juxtaposition with the industrious classes.

What in the world is such language as this about?

"Away, gentlemen, I say, with the cant that would have us believe all old feelings are dead—all English sympathies extinguished—all national affections chilled. There is not a sequestered nook in the lakes of Cumberland; in the mines of Cornwall; in the dim, close, hot alleys of Manchester or Stockport; in the smoky streets of your own Birmingham, in which the gallant, trustful, manly English spirit is dead. Be it ours, then, to call it forth; to exercise it, and through it to carry this tight little island of ours through all straits, through all dangers; and this, gentlemen, rely upon it, we can if we will."

It is quite unnecessary to cry, Away with the cant that English sympathies are extinguished, national affections chilled, the spirit dead, &c.; no one asserts any nonsense of the kind, and the cant, if cant there be, is Lord John Manners' cant of conjuring up a cant that he may have the glory of laying it by exorcisement.

Be it ours, says the modest nobleman, to call forth the English spirit. Bah! Pap for the million! Curds and whey for the English spirit. He sets up a May-pole, and conceits it calling forth the English spirit, and glorifies himself as a regenerator. Let him restore the fool's cap to its pristine uses, and that motley costume so symbolic of the Manners mixture, and we shall see his services requited in their appropriate honours.

THE THREE YEARS' EXPERIENCE.

(From the Topic.)

All the elements of proof lie in a small compass. It is only necessary statistically to compare the three years before, and that three years subsequent to the introduction of the new system by Sir Robert Peel. From 1839 to 1841 our foreign exports fell off from fifty-three millions in value to forty-seven millions. But in the next three years pending a reduction of duties, the value of the exports rose from forty-seven millions to fifty-eight millions. Nor was the reduction in the customs' duties unpromising to the revenue. The total amount of the various reductions effected in the three years exceeded four millions sterling; and, as many of the duties had been totally repealed, the loss could not be compensated by increased consumption. But these four millions were not lost to the revenue. On the contrary, the revenue had increased, and the returns of the present 5th of April prove that it is as buoyant as ever. Neither had these relaxations been inimical to those branches of native industry, believed to be most dependent on protection. Flax afforded a striking instance. It has been freely imported, yet, in face of a rapidly increasing foreign importation, the price has been higher. Wool inculcated the same lesson; the import duty was abolished; importation, in consequence, increased; but prices in the home market were not depressed by the competition. Foreign cattle was another example. The most alarming predictions were indulged when the prohibition on the importation of foreign cattle was removed in 1842, and foreign cattle were admitted at a small fixed duty. Have the graziers been ruined? No; in despite of an increasing importation of oxen, and sheep, and swine, prices have been unaffected, and public contracts for the supply of provisions have been higher than previously. Further, experience has shown that no concomitancy subsisted between high prices and high wages. The first comparative term of three years was a period of scarcity; food was dear, and employment being scarce, wages were depressed; but in the second term of three years, bread was cheap, and labour being in demand, wages rose. But the most gratifying test was of a moral import. Criminal statistics showed a connection between the increase and decrease of crime, and a declining or prosperous state of the country. In 1843 there had been a decrease of crime to the extent of five and a half per cent.; in 1844, of not less than ten per cent.; in 1845, of five and a half per cent.; and the decrease of last year was especially marked in the most prosperous districts,—those of manufacturing. Thus, while the legislature had been occupied in reducing customs' duties, in other words, gradually destroying protection to native industry, the interests of the labouring classes of commerce, and of morality, had been promoted.

In this way were the former prepossessions of the Premier overwhelmed by the evidence of his own executive measures, and he was constrained to advance, if possible, at an accelerated rate, in a course productive of so many public felicities. His first steps had been marked by timidity, if not aversion, to his task; but practice seems to have reconciled, and success emboldened him. Accordingly, the new tariff is more explicit in its principles and more comprehensive in its relaxations than its predecessors. His first aim has obviously been to prepare a scheme as closely consistent with his adopted principle of Free Trade, and as extensively satisfactory as possible; and next—not to attempt too much at once—load himself with a heavier charge than he will be able to carry. Anything short of the ultimate repeal of the Corn Laws would have been scouted, as he himself admits, by the commercial and manufacturing interests, and left a reserved bid of great temptation with his opponents; while immediate repeal might have met a lion in the way in the Upper House.

A second leading principle bears emphatically on the general consumption of the masses. The Corn and Provision Laws had fallen with crushing weight on those who live by labour. The expenditure of the working man is not in luxuries, but in the necessities of life, in bread, meat, and vegetables, of which the poor consume equally with the rich; but the income of the two classes being unequally apportioned, it is clearly unjust to subject them to the same ratio of pecuniary contribution. Such, however, was the tendency of the old system, which absorbed, either through the indirect operation of protective duties, or direct fiscal imposts, a large portion of the wages of labour. In consequence, the industrious orders have not participated equally with the rest of the community in the general progress of the country; and it is to remedy this disparity of condition, as well as mitigate a gross injustice, that the policy of Sir R. Peel is directed. The resources placed at his disposal by the property-tax afforded one means of grappling with this exigency of our social state, and the projected alterations of the tariff manifestly embrace the same equitable purpose. All articles that enter into the common sustenance of the nation will be placed more within the reach of the consumer. The bread-tax is at once reduced from a protective duty of 20s. to 5s., and will expire entirely in three years. But corn from Canada, or other colonial possessions out of Europe, will be immediately admitted duty free. On all other articles, apart from grain, that constitute human food, either vegetable or animal, there will be a repeal of the import duties, including cattle of all kinds, sheep and pigs; potatoes and vegetables of every sort; bacon, fresh beef, or slightly salted; pork fresh or salted (not hams). On other articles, considered, we presume, as a species of bucolic manufactures, duties have been retained, but reduced to about one-half; namely, on ale and beer, from 42s. per barrel to 20s.; on butter, from 21s. to 10s. per cwt.; on cheese, from 11s. to 5s. per cwt.; on hops, from 94s. to 45s. per cwt.; on cured fish, from 2s. to 1s. per cwt. The duties on rice have been reduced; also those on foreign soap, and on candles the reduction is one-half of the import duty. The preference duty on colonial coffee was relaxed in 1842; and in this session, sugar, another item in general use, will be dealt with. No concession, however, will be made in favour of slave-grown sugar, but on the sugar of Cuba and Brazil there will be an abatement of 3s. 6d. per cwt. in the differential duty.

From the alterations essentially affecting the labouring classes we proceed to those affecting their employers, and which may be said to constitute the Premier's third principle of fiscal revision. His aim has obviously been equality of sacrifices. It was not with the landed interest that the protective system originated, but the commercial and manufacturing classes, who till recently, as we have already shown, very tenaciously adhered to the mercantile policy. From the latter, therefore, fully with the former, it was fair to call for concessions. In favour of the manufacturing interest, every duty on the raw materials of manufacture had been previously abandoned, with the exception of tallow and timber, on both of which relaxations are proposed. These form their compensation for relinquishing the protective duties on the coarser articles of manufacture, in wool, linen, and cotton, and for the reduction of protection on the finer description of goods, from twenty to ten per cent. At present, the duty on silks, as before stated, is called thirty per cent., but is often still higher. It is proposed to adopt a new principle in the levying of the silk duties, and to impose 15 per cent. ad valorem, instead of 30 per cent. Finally, relaxations are intended on the import duties on manufactured metals, dressed hides, boots, shoes, straw, plate, carriages, and paper-hangings. But for every loss the Premier has dexterously made some kind of return to the sufferers, either by affording them greater protection from illicit competition, as in the silk manufacture, or by giving them freer access to raw materials. The agriculturists are embraced in this principle of equivalents. They may suffer by the free admission of provisions and live cattle, but then, in the fattening of stock, they will save largely in their present outgoings for linseed cake and rape-cake, by the substitution of maize, on which the duty is repealed, as also on buckwheat; further, the reduction of the duties on seeds, especially clover, to about one half, will be favourable to them. Other compensations are intended in place of former invidious monopolies by the removal of special burdens, by an amendment of the law of pauper settlement, and the consolidation of the 16,000 parish authorities of England into 800 district boards.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE COSTLY DELAY.—If we were to estimate the cost to the industrious classes of this country, of the suspense arising from the procrastination of THE GREAT MEASURE, at a million pounds sterling per week, a sum equivalent to all the state taxes, we should not be accused, by any thoughtful calculator, of attaching an exaggerated importance to the mischiefs we are now enduring.—Liverpool Mercury.

HEALTH OF TOWNS.—In one of the Government reports on the sanitary condition of the country, it is stated that there are more lives annually lost in England, from removable causes, than were sacrificed at the battle of Waterloo! Nor is there any reason to question the accuracy of the assertion. We ought to endeavour to realise this startling fact—to bring it home to our minds and consciences—and to take it as a basis for general and local legislation. There is a strong disposition at present to dwell on the evils of war, and to paint the horrors and miseries consequent on that frightful calamity. These can scarcely be exaggerated. It is fearful to think of hecatombs of human beings offered up to the gory god; of limbs lopped by shining steel, and bodies torn by shattering shot; and of the long train of after evils—the sad heart and sore struggles of the widow, and the untold hardships of the orphan. Such scenes and sufferings appeal alike to the feelings and to the imagination. They are striking and dramatic. Poetry enshrines them in deathless verse—Oratory proclaims them to the world in well-turned periods—and History records them on her enduring page.

But there are other Waterloos—annual Waterloos—where death strikes down his thousands as surely as in the battle-field; where men meet a far more painful end than that of the gallant soldier slain in a good cause; and where the victims, if not "unwept," are, at all events, "unhonoured and unused." Fever takes his stand in the undrained street, the narrow alley, and the crowded court, and slays his thousands and tens of thousands. But Poetry sings not of the strong mechanic stretched on his bed by typhus; oratory dwells not on the nameless ailments of the sick wife struggling with daily cares in a noxious atmosphere; and history takes no account of such insignificant units as little children poisoned by miasma from foul sewers and other receptacles of garbage. Yet there is nothing more certain than that "such things are." It has been demonstrated, over and over again, that there are districts in our large towns where fever is ever present. Eminent physicians have traced the course of undrained districts by the presence of fatal epidemics; and a higher rate of mortality, and a lower state of existence, are the acknowledged consequences of want of water, bad air, and insufficient sewerage. Let us, then, not lose sight of this "great fact," that "more people die annually in England, from removable causes, than were killed at Waterloo." Intemperance has its victims amongst all classes; but the "removable" causes here alluded to, are those from which the working and poorer classes principally, though by no means exclusively, suffer. These are, scarcity and ill-quantity of water, bad air, and deficient drainage and sewerage—the bad air, and deficient drainage and sewerage being generally consequent on the scarcity of water.—Bristol Mercury.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION UNDER THE SEA.—The British Government, by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the French Government, by the Minister of the Interior, have granted permission to two gentlemen, the projectors of the sub-marine telegraph, to lay it down from coast to coast. The site selected is from Cape Griznez or from Cape Blancenez, on the French side, to the South Foreland on the English coast. The sounding between these headlands is gradual, varying from seven fathoms on the shore on either side, to a maximum of 37 fathoms in mid-channel. The Lords of the Admiralty have also granted permission to the same gentlemen to lay down a sub-marine telegraph between Dublin and Holyhead, which is to be carried on from the latter place to Liverpool and London. The sub-marine telegraph across the English Channel will, however, be the one first laid down. The materials for this are already undergoing the process of insulation, and are in that state of forwardness which will enable the projectors to have them completed and placed in position, so that a telegraphic communication can be transmitted across the Channel about the first week in June. When this is completed, an electric telegraph will be established from the coast to Paris, and thence to Marseilles. This telegraph throughout France will be immediately under the direction of the French government, as, according to the law of 1837, all telegraphic communications through that country are under the absolute control and superintendence of the Minister of the Interior. Upon the completion of the submarine telegraph across the English Channel, it is stated that a similar one, on a most gigantic scale, will be attempted to be formed, under the immediate sanction and patronage of the French administration. This is no less than that of connecting the shores of Africa with those of Europe by the same instrumentality; thus opening a direct and lightning-like communication between Marseilles and Algeria. It has been doubted by several scientific men whether this is practicable, and, indeed, whether even the project between the coasts of France and England can be accomplished; but it has been proved by experiments the most satisfactory in their results, that not only can it be effected, but effected without any considerable difficulty.—Globe.

A FUNERAL-GOING DOG.—A correspondent of the Edinburgh Courier tells the following dog story:—I knew a dog a few years ago, belonging to Mr. Henderson, late post-master, Fort William, which attended every funeral that took place in that village and neighbourhood. There was nothing remarkable in his appearance. He was a rough, thick-set, stout little animal, a cross between a cocker and a terrier. His master taught him nothing, nor seemed to take much notice of him. Gilliemor was his name; and a sulky, surly little fellow he was, as all the little urchins that used to play about the post-office could testify; for he had a mortal enmity to their noise, as he had also to beggars, at whom he would bark and snap furiously. He did not seem to be particularly attached to any person; nor did he care much about being caressed, neither did he associate with other dogs. The only remarkable feature in his character was his predilection for attending funerals. Whenever a funeral happened, although it were 10 miles distant; and although he had to cross ferries, rivers, and often arms of the sea, the moment the coffin appeared, Gilliemor appeared also, and never left its side until it reached the burying-ground. There he would look anxiously on while the body was being interred; and that melancholy duty over, he would immediately trot away home, or set off to attend some other funeral. He has been known to attend many funerals in different parts of the country in one day. When any person died near his master's residence, on the day of the funeral Gilliemor, as usual, employed himself in driving away the noisy children and beggars, till within a few minutes of the hour specified in the funeral letters, when he would shake himself as if dressing, and trudge away to join in the mournful procession.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

In our last Number we gave accounts of the state of distress in Ballymote, Bay, Glenties, Handford, Cork, &c., up to the 11th inst. when riots of a very serious nature broke out in Clonmel, and the military were called out. The following details will show that the calamity is increasing, and that provisions of a very serious nature are becoming of ordinary occurrence:

CARRICK-ON-SUIR, APRIL 15.—Letters from the town announce the breaking out of riots similar to those which have already taken place in Clonmel and Tipperary; and which, it is to be feared, are but the forerunners of more scenes of turbulence consequent upon the scarcity, or panic—it signifies but little—when together with the want of permanent employment for the labouring class. The riots occurred here on the day after those at Clonmel, which is another town in Tipperary, higher up the river. It was evidently a premeditated outbreak. The bells both of the Carrick and the Carrickbeg chapel tolled, and the mob increased to a fearful gathering of all the country round about. With this reinforcement they paraded the principal streets, and having fixed on Mr. O'Donnell's stores, rushed with one accord into it, and in a second completely emptied it. Flushed with this success, they attacked Mr. O'Neill's, and succeeded in like manner in emptying his store. They then went to Mr. Bourke's, but he had prudently sent his stock away. At last the military appeared, which checked their progress in a degree; and the stipendiary magistrate, Mr. Redmond, having read the Riot Act twice, and assuring the mob if they persevered in their outrageous course he would be compelled to order the military to fire, had, in a degree, restored quiet. Of this you may be satisfied, that neither famine nor fever had anything to say to this insurrection. It was a deliberate attempt to begin a general plunder; and whether the attack will be renewed again to-morrow, time only will tell. There is not a sufficient military force here, and the police are totally unable to repress such an audacious outbreak as the present.

CORK.—The reports from Cork are of the usual unfavourable nature. The Southern Reporter says:—"We have at this moment at least 30,000 people destitute in Cork, and of this number our workhouses cannot safely accommodate 3000. The labouring class has no employment, and their daily food has more than doubled in price, as will be seen by the following returns from the mayor's office:

Return of Loads of Potatoes brought to Cork Markets for six days, ending April 12, 1841, 1842, 1843, 1844, 1845, and 1846, with price per weight at 100 lbs.		Loads.			Whites.			Minions.
					d.	d.	d.	d.	d.	d.
1841—April 12th....	873	...	31	to 4½	...	5½	to 6	...	5½	to 6
1842—do.	622	...	4½	to 5	...	5	to 6½	...	5	to 6½
1843—do.	926	...	2½	to 3½	...	4	to 4½	...	4	to 4½
1844—do.	564	...	1	to 2	...	5	to 6	...	5	to 6
1845—do.	922	...	3½	to 4½	...	5	to 6	...	5	to 6
1846—do.	467	...	7½	to 10	...	10	to 12	...	10	to 12

According to the Constitution, symptoms of insubordination had, it seems, manifested themselves in that town on Tuesday:

"A number of people assembled, and went, it is said, to, among others, Mr. Collins, parish priest, and demanded food. He reasoned with them, as did some of the gentry, endeavouring to dissuade them from violence, and told them that what could be done towards procuring them food should be done as soon as possible. He succeeded in inducing them to disperse; but they did so with a threat that, unless something was done soon, they would return and help themselves from his potato pits. We give this narrative as we have heard it; but we are not able to vouch for it, though we should not mention it had we not reason to believe it true."

The demands for Indian meal are daily growing stronger; but complaints of its dearth are still prevalent, as example:

"In consequence of the supply of Indian meal which the relief committee procured from Liverpool being rather of an inferior quality, for which, however, they were not to blame, they deemed it advisable to make a pressing application to the commissary for a loan of a portion of that which the Government have in store. Mr. Hewetson having kindly complied with their request, 20 tons of the best description of white Indian meal was yesterday sent to the depots established by the committee, and thus any prejudice which might be created against this wholesome article of food by reason of the bad quality of that purchased in Liverpool, will be effectually removed. The whole meal, which is also being sold at the rate of 1½d. per lb., is considered by the people much too dear, and they prefer purchasing coarse flour at 10d. per weight of 7 lbs., than taking the whole meal at 10½d. We are assured that the whole meal is by far more nutritious; and if the committee thought it advisable to make some reduction in the price, it would be a better class of food for the poor people. The demand for Indian meal is very great; and of course the fund in the hands of the committee must be proportionably diminished."

TIPPERARY COUNTY.—MORE PROVISION RIOTS ON APRIL 16.—The Tipperary Free Press announces the breaking out on Thursday evening, the 16th, of further riots at a place called Kilsheelan and Fethard. The accounts, which are very brief, say:

"The boats coming up from Waterford were attacked at Kilsheelan on this day by a numerous band of men, women, and children, and the miscellaneous goods with which they were laden carried off in all directions. Informations being received, the military and police were immediately on the spot; a considerable quantity of wheat belonging to Messrs. Hughes was recovered, and 13 persons made prisoners. It was a most barbaic robbery, as the articles taken were in a raw state. The stipendiary magistrate, Major Shaw, had a narrow escape; his horse having taken fright, jumped into the river with him, and swam a considerable distance."

"FETHARD, Thursday.—There was a rising here to-day, and Mr. Harvey's store attacked, from which three sacks of flour were taken; the mob attacked Mrs. Wilson's store, but were repulsed. They were finally dispersed through the praiseworthy exertions of the parish priest, the Archdeacon Laffan, and quiet restored."

The Drogheda Conservative severely censures that portion of the press which denies the existence of more than ordinary distress in the country, and says:

"How can any man with 6s. or even 7s. per week—and there are hundreds of labouring men working for sd. per day—get a sufficiency of food? Potatoes in this town are 8d. per stone—they are now considered a luxury by the poor. Oatmeal is on the advance, and the marketing of a few stones would exhaust all his wages; then there is rent, which is exacted weekly, with additional rigour, for the landlord dreads the famine prices as much as the poor labouring tenant. We are glibly informed, that there never was more food in the country—more corn in store! It is of this we complain—that in the midst of plenty, so much distress should exist in this unfortunate country. The staple food of the Irish (potatoes) has failed, and the low rate of wages paid the labouring classes precludes them from obtaining a sufficiency of bread or other food. Let us take a case in point:—A labourer earns 6s. per week—he has a family of five to support out of this (we speak of towns like Drogheda). His expenditure may be reckoned as follows:

Rent, per week	8	d.
Fuel	0	9
One stone of oatmeal	2	2
One stone meslin meal and baking	1	7
Milk, &c.	0	6
		6	0

"Thus, the whole of his miserable pittance is expended on procuring a scanty supply of food; as for potatoes, they are out of his reach. Now, will any man in his senses dare maintain, that the poor labouring class can live on such scanty diet? Why, the paupers in the workhouse are far better fed. As to the lodgment of the poor, we are informed, by an agent who collects the rents of 70 cabins weekly, that in almost every instance the inmates are destitute of bedsteads, blankets, sheets, and coverlets; and that he has seen several grown-up girls, who toil from early dawn to eight in the evening in the factories, lying on straw, with no other covering over them save the clothes which they wore during the day. At market on this day potatoes were 8d. per stone. Oatmeal, Indian corn, &c., are on the advance; the prospect before the poor is getting more gloomy; three long months must intervene before the new potato-crop can come into market; and in the name of an all-wise Providence, are the poor to be allowed to suffer all the accumulating horrors of privation?"

In the mean time large supplies of Indian corn and meal continue to arrive at the Irish ports. The Cork papers announce the arrival in that port on Friday of the American packet-ship Camelia, register 1090 tons, with a cargo (about 25,000 bushels) of Indian corn, and 10,000 barrels of meal. Money alone is all that seems to be required to render perfect the precautionary measures of Government to counteract the evils of scarcity.

EMIGRATION.—The Waterford Chronicle of yesterday gives returns of the number of passengers in the vessels which have left that port for America; by which it appears that 2162 persons have already emigrated, and that several emigrant ships have not yet sailed. In addition to this, three large vessels have sailed from Ross, containing, it is supposed, between the three, some 800 persons. The Chronicle thus comments upon these facts:

"There will have gone after the season is over upwards of 3000 individuals from this country by this port alone. Not to talk of the rearing of these people—the trouble and expense of bringing up a healthy man, woman, or child, and especially leaving out the irreparable loss to society in this country of their affections, hopes, and family ties—all now sundered and destroyed—not to talk of the countless living deaths of wholesale emigration from a feeling and warm-hearted mother country—the amount of capital taken by these 3000 is immense. Assuming that each individual expends 10l. in his passage, and before he settles; and that he has 10l. more to establish himself, here is direct taking away of hard cash to the amount of 60,000l., gone out of one of the bleeding pores of Ireland to increase the misery which is left behind. We are in possession of facts which show that many cunning landlords are sending the people away yearly, but by degrees, and not in such a manner as to subject themselves to a 'clearance' notice. If this system be continued, we shall be tempted to give names. After these things, who will blame the people for outbreaks occasioned by famine? There is nothing plentiful in the land but ruin! Employment is scarce—money is scarce—the people are being thinned—farms are being consolidated—bullock land is progressing:

"I'll fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where cows accumulate and men decay."

"Since the foregoing was in type, we have learned that 100 pigs, on their way from the fair of Fethard to Carrick-on-Suir, were seized at Thorny bridge by the country people, and carried off towards the foot of Slievenaman mountain. We have also been informed that a vast number of persons are still watching for the boats laden with provisions, in the neighbourhood of Kilsheelan, where the attack was made on Thursday."

A letter from Carrick-on-Suir, of Friday's date, says:

"Yesterday there was a meeting of magistrates, gentlemen, and merchants held in the Temperance-hall of this place, when the demands of the people of getting 1s. a day wages were yielded; and this morning 200 men were set to work on the roads, under the direction of Capt. Peebles, who has been indefatigable in his exertions to forward the intentions of the Government and to direct the labour in some useful channel; and accordingly he has selected the roads in the vicinity of the town, which are in a wretched state. Trifling as the increase of wages is, still I look on this concession as laying the foundation for other demands, which you may rely on it will give rise to other outbreaks, which it will not be in the power of the small military force stationed here to repress."

The intelligence from the west to day is of a very unfavourable character. In the district of Annaghdown, in the county of Galway, distress is represented to prevail to a most alarming extent. One account says:

"The people of the place have openly declared that if employment be not immediately given, they can no longer withstand the distress they are labouring under."

A meeting of the gentry has been held, and a petition for relief forwarded to the Irish Government. One of the resolutions adopted on the occasion thus describes the prospects of the poor as affected by the potato blight:

"Our parish was remarkable for its great and abundant crop of potatoes. It was the storehouse of the summer supply to our neighbouring towns, and we may say, county. But, unhappily, in our richest soil and best tilled crops the rot prevailed to the most awful extent, which leaves the pauper, who in other years would get provisions on credit, now dependent on a benign Government, and a very limited benevolence of his neighbours."

STATE OF TIPPERARY.—THE FAMINE.—(From the Special Reporter of the Freeman.)—Cahir, Tuesday, April 21.—I am firmly persuaded, that were it not for the praiseworthy exertions of the Roman Catholic clergy of this and other districts, it would be a difficult task to restrain a portion of the people, at least, from acting with violence. The clergy are going through their parishes encouraging the people to peace and perseverance, and, up to this time, they have succeeded, and I trust their efforts will be crowned with enduring success. At the same time, if the Government do not step in and assist the local committees; I cannot say how the business will terminate. The relief at present afforded is all owing to the local committees; and much apprehension is entertained for the coming summer; and I now repeat, what I have already stated, that not only within twenty miles round Clonmel there will not be a single potato on the 10th of May, but there will not be one in the entire county of Tipperary by the end of that month, or, perhaps, before it. This I give you on the most satisfactory authority, coupled with the evidence apparent to my own eyes. * * The shop-keepers of the town have contributed very handsomely. On Sunday Mr. Bianconi, the respected mayor of Clonmel, proceeded to his newly-purchased property at Longfield, beyond Cashel, and made arrangements to give such of his tenantry as wanted it work at fair remuneration, and he also gave orders to have a sufficiency of provisions supplied to those not able to work and not having the means of procuring food. Mr. Power, of Gurteen, subscribed 200l. on Sunday, and employed over one hundred men at one shilling per day, and told the people he would do all in his power for them. I regret I cannot say as much for the generosity of landowners in the county. There appears to be a kind of drowsy apathy on the part of the landed gentry as regards the wants of the people; but amongst this class I cannot include Capt. Bernal Osborne, whose conduct on the late occasion and since has endeared him to all the county. At a place called Barnes, about three miles from Clonmel, I met 64 large drays containing 100 tons of flour, escorted by Mr. Swan, stipendiary magistrate, and two officers with a heavy body of the 13th Light Dragoons. The flour belonged to Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Grub, of Clonmel. Both these gentlemen possess large mills here (Cahir); and as they feared an attack on the drays, the dragoons were called out to escort them to Clonmel, where the provision is to be shipped for Waterford, and thence to England! There was no attempt made on the drays.

The little village of Barnes contains a great many cottages. Several persons were picking potatoes behind their houses. I went into about 20 haggards (farm-yards), where the people were engaged at this work, and I protest I never beheld anything so utterly deplorable. One sound potato there was not in every ten. The people were absolutely crying over them; and the invariable answer to my question of "What will you do?" was, "God is good; and we have hope still." The houses I mention were rather of the better sort, the occupiers possessing from two to five acres of land. The remaining portion of the houses—about 30 in number—had not a single potato at all. The people I observed picking the potatoes, told me they were endeavouring to pick out a few for seed; but, as in other places, they said that any already sown in the neighbourhood had failed, and the only hope they had for next year was oats, if they could procure the means of purchasing the seed. There never was, they said, a year, for the last fifteen, that they had such a prospect of potatoes as they had last season; but now all were gone.

The village of New Inn is on the road leading to Cashel; and in this extensive parish, with about 1500 inhabitants, you would with difficulty find as many sound potatoes as there are persons. These assertions may startle, but they are true, and beyond the power of human contradiction. There is another small village at a place called the Pass of Lough Lougher, a beautiful glen through which the direct road passes, and sweeps away round the mountain. Not a solitary potato with any person here. For two miles at either side of the road from this place to Cahir, there is not with the inhabitants even the trace of a potato. I was prepared, from all I had heard, to meet with great misery and distress; but I confess the actual reality far outstepped my worst anticipations; and at every step the horrors of increasing scarcity in the prime article of food were terribly manifested. Between Clonmel and Cahir I visited every hamlet worth calling at, and also very many isolated dwellings, and I found the same prevailing distress everywhere.

On arriving in Cahir I at once put myself in communication with gentlemen who, from their position and knowledge of the country, and the state of the people, were best calculated to afford me accurate information. The town and surrounding districts belong to Lord Glengall, who resides here. After the attack on the flour drays, a meeting of the inhabitants and gentry was held, and subscriptions entered into in order to give employment to the people. Lord Glengall, the proprietor of all the soil, gave 50l., whilst the Rev. Mr. Tobyn, P.P., contributed, out of his own scanty purse, TWENTY GUINEAS. Government has done nothing here yet, but I understand that a person has arrived from the castle to make inquiry as to the state of the people. In order to afford some temporary relief to the people, about 100 persons were put to work, making sewers, breaking stones, and repairing the streets and adjoining roads. The wages allowed are from 10d. to 1s. a day, but this is considered totally inadequate to support persons having more than one in a family—and the majority of them have five each—in consequence of the high price of provisions. I saw a number of the men at work; most of them had a pale, yellow, sickly-looking hue; and I assert, on the best authority, that the majority of these poor people subsist on one meal a day, and that previous to their being employed, they had not a meal of victuals once in forty-eight hours! As I before stated, the people in this locality are very quiet; but when the temporary relief is exhausted, there is no calculating what may occur. There are a few potatoes in the neighbouring farmers' places, but three out of every five are black (diseased), and these roots were selling here to day—bad and good, without being picked or engaged—at 8s. 6d. per barrel. The Rev. Mr. Tobyn, P.P., gave me a fearful picture of the state of his large and populous parish. Seven-eighths of the people have not a potato, and the remainder—even the more wealthy farmers—won't possess one on the 10th of May. The landlords, as a body, are doing nothing—this opinion is not of my forming—either by giving or endeavouring to procure employment for the people. Employment is all that is looked for. There are over 17,900 acres of uncultivated land in Tipperary, and most of this is highly reclaimable. Could not the people be engaged in some profitable manner on this land? The country also abounds in lead and other mines, and there are very rich veins of coal in many districts that could be worked with great advantage. I should have mentioned that Mr. Sargeant, the extensive miller of this town, subscribed 30l. to the relief fund, and the Catholic curates of the parish 10l. each. Everything is tranquil so far, but time must reveal the future.

EARLY RISING.—Emulate the habits of the homely yeast, which, though it is working night and day, never fails to rise the very moment it is stirred.

Just Published,
M. R. COBDEN'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Friday, February 27th, 1846—Revised. Price One Penny, 16 Pages.
M. R. BRIGHT'S SPEECH in the House of Commons, on Tuesday Night, Feb. 17. Price One Penny.
M. R. GIBSON'S SPEECH in the House of Commons on Monday night, Feb. 18. Price One Penny.
 Leased Office, 7, Fleet Street, London; J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, and 4, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Where may be had,
THE GOATACRE MEETING.
 Just published, price One Penny, or 5s. per 100.
VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATACRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.
 Upwards of 100,000 copies have been printed.
 Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of the League, 1s. in cloth.
JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY, By Mrs. Mancer. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.
TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE TRADE, By Earl Ducie, Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, Bright, Gibson, O'Connell, McCullagh, Baines, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, April 22, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
*Ormerod, A., and Brothers, Todmorden	..	50	0 0
*Austie, Paul, Devizes	..	10	0 0
*Atherton, T. and H., Lees, near Manchester	..	3	0 0
*Hutchinson, Richard, 19, Bondary-street, Hulme, do	..	1	1 0
*Mellor and Greenhalgh, Fairfield-street, Butler-st. do	..	1	1 0
*Burrows, Thomas, and Friends, 14, Hadfield-street, do	..	1	0 0
*Parr, James, 22, Oxford-street	..	1	0 0
*Piggott, Ellis, Bromley-street, Ashley-lane	..	1	0 0
*Whitaker, Simon, 10, Sickle-street	..	1	0 0
Bedford, James, 33, Dorset-street, London	..	1	0 0
*Dean, John, Broad Holden, near Haslingden	..	1	0 0
*Acton, Thomas, Chapel-lane, Wigan	..	1	0 0
*Marsden, James, Wallgate, do	..	1	0 0
*Lincolne, Wm., Halesworth, Suffolk	..	1	0 0
*Jones, W. H., 9, Barbican-terrace, Barnstable	..	10	0 0

Stockport.	*Gouldthorpe, J., Wellington-rd., north	..	1	0	0
	*Hurst, John, Mill-lane	..	1	0	0
	*Leigh, John, Wellington-st., Portwood	..	1	0	0
	*A Free Trader	..	2	8	0
	Washington, John, Lightcliffe, near	..	1	0	0
	Wood, James, Brighouse, near	..	1	0	0
Halifax.	Mitchell, James, do	..	0	10	0
	Rayner, Henry, do	..	0	10	0
	Noble, John, do	..	0	10	0
	Greenwood, Richard, do	..	0	8	0

	*Harris, Richard, and Sons	..	100	0	0
	*Biggs, John, and Sons	..	100	0	0
	*Stokes, Thomas, and Nephews	..	40	0	0
	*Drewin and Whetstone	..	40	0	0
	*Fielding, Joseph	..	20	0	0
	*Ellis, J., and Son	..	20	0	0
	*Whetstone and Gittens	..	10	0	0
	*Orange, D., and Co.	..	10	0	0
	*Corah, N., and Sons	..	10	0	0
	*Billson, Charles	..	10	0	0
	*Biggs, Thomas	..	10	0	0
	*Burgess, Alfred	..	10	0	0
	*Stone and Paget	..	10	0	0
	*Westermann, N.	..	10	0	0
	*Carter, R., and Son	..	10	0	0
	*Underwood, Joseph	..	10	0	0
	*Munton, Robert, and Co.	..	10	0	0
	*Frisby and Chawner	..	10	0	0
	*Reddels, C., and Co.	..	10	0	0
	*Noble, J. W., M.D.	..	10	0	0
	*Whitmore, J.	..	10	0	0
	*Kirby, S.	..	10	0	0
	*Robinson, C. B.	..	10	0	0
	*Paget, Thomas, surgeon	..	10	0	0
	*Thorp, John, and G.	..	10	0	0

Leicester.	*Sanderland, Thomas	..	5	0	0
	*Fielding and How	..	5	0	0
	*Toller, R. and G.	..	5	0	0
	*Cripps, Joseph	..	5	0	0
	*Hull and Shenton	..	5	0	0
	*Baines, John	..	5	0	0
	*Higginson and Coleman	..	4	0	0
	*Sargeant, T. and Sons	..	4	0	0
	*James, W. K.	..	4	0	0
	*Legge, Rev. Geo., L.L.D.	..	2	0	0
	*Hill and Brevard	..	2	0	0
	*Bates, Wm.	..	2	0	0
	*Perry, Rev. C.	..	2	0	0
	*Clarkson, M.	..	2	0	0
	*Bowmar, Charles	..	2	0	0
	*Harvey, J. and J.	..	2	0	0
	*Newton, E.	..	2	0	0
	*Archer, T. and W.	..	2	0	0
	*Hutchinson, W. E.	..	2	0	0
	*Swain, Joseph	..	1	0	0
	*Vickers, Geo., and Son	..	1	0	0
	*Baines, Samuel	..	1	0	0
	*Thompson, Thomas, and Son	..	1	0	0
	*Burton, J. and G. Smallfield	..	1	0	0
	*Baines, W. and G.	..	1	0	0
	*Palmer, Robert	..	1	0	0

	*Curtis, James	..	2	0	0
	Peppercom, John	..	1	0	0
	Kingstone, Francis, House	..	1	0	0
	Rutherford, Peter	..	0	10	0
	Batchelor, Richard	..	0	10	0
Harpenden.	Ellis, John	..	0	5	0
Herts.	A Friend	..	0	5	0
	Simons, Wm.	..	0	5	0
	Swain, Stephen	..	0	5	0
	Walker, Wm.	..	0	4	0
	Simpson, Henry	..	0	2	6
	Bayley, Thomas	..	0	2	6

Dunfermline.	*Aitken, Henry, Reid's Park	..	1	0	0
	*Gibson, Rev. James	..	0	5	0
	Russell, John	..	0	2	6
	Cook, David	..	0	2	6
	Small Sums, per Robert Kilpatrick, weaver, Tower Green	..	1	0	1

Leeds.	*Wilkinson and Co., flax-spinners, Hun-	..	60	0	0
	slot, near	..	20	0	0
	*Holdsworth, W. B. and Co., do	..	20	0	0
	*Standish and Wace	..	10	0	0
	*Bower, Joshua, Hunslet, near	..	10	0	0
	A Friend, per Charles Hindle, 4, Wel-	..	10	0	0
	lington-street	..	10	0	0
	*Webster, A., 4, Wellington-street	..	10	0	0
	Firth, Wm., 178, Wellington-street	..	10	0	0
	*Dickinson, Jonath., and Son, Water-la-	..	6	0	0
	Smalpage, Robert, Albion-street	..	5	0	0
	*Brown, Jones, and Son, Holbeck	..	5	0	0
	Moorhouse, John, Park-lane	..	5	0	0
	*Pearson and Sons, Holbeck	..	3	0	0
	Burrows, Joseph, New Park-street	..	1	1	0
	Hartley, Wm., Kirkgate	..	1	1	0
	Hindle, Charles, 16, Meadow-lane-road	..	1	1	0
	Heaps, C., jun., Burnan Tofts Hall	..	1	1	0
	*Naylor, Abraham, Basinghall-street	..	1	1	0
	Finn, Wm., Corporation-street	..	1	1	0
	Hall, Matthew, Wortley	..	1	0	0
	Heap, George, Cross Bank-street	..	1	0	0
	Asquith, D., at Cash and Totham's,	..	1	0	0
	Bishopgate-street	..	1	0	0
	Pool, Robert, Briggate	..	0	8	0
	Winpenny, J., West-street	..	0	5	0

Blackburn.	*Briggs, Edward, Henry-street	..	20	0	0
	*Wilding and Fisher, St. Alban's-place	..	4	0	0
	*Knox, George, Lord-street	..	2	0	0
	*Veavers, Thomas, St. Alban's-place	..	2	0	0
Welshpool.	*Powell, Samuel, Gungroo Cottage	..	1	0	0
	Parker, Griffith, Broad-street	..	1	0	0
	Jones, George, do	..	0	2	6
	Hughes, Wm., High-street	..	0	2	0
	Small Sums	..	0	2	0

	*Morrison, Charles, 104, Fore-street, City	..	40	0	0
	*Gosnell, J., and Co., Three King's-court, Lombard-st.	..	20	0	0
	*Hickson, Wm. and Sons, 20, West Smithfield	..	10	0	0
	A Barrister	..	5	0	0
	*Warner, John, and Sons, 8, Jewin-crescent	..	5	0	0
	*Gibson, Thomas F., 23, Spital-square	..	5	0	0
	*Wild, Robert, 45, Houndsditch	..	5	0	0
	*Southam, Henry, Lansdowne Crescent, Worcester	..	5	0	0
	Wansey, Wm., Lime-street, City	..	5	0	0
	*Bevington, Timothy, 67, King William street, City	..	2	0	0
	*Reddish, Mrs. Agnes, Cross Hall Mill, Chorley	..	2	0	0
	*Clifton, C., Frenchwood-street, Preston	..	1	10	0
	*Myatt, J., Manor Farm, Deptford	..	1	1	0
	*Wade, George, 4, High-street, do	..	1	1	0
	Constable, George, Horley Mill, Surrey	..	1	1	0
	*Constable, Charles, do	..	1	1	0
	Higgs, Wm., 48, Newington-place, Kennington	..	1	1	0
	*Gurney, John, Oakley-street, Lambeth	..	1	0	0
	*Macdonald, Alex., 4, St. James's-place, Greyhound-	..	1	0	0
	road, Bermondsey	..	1	0	0
	*Townshend, John, 17, Howland-st., Fitzroy-square	..	1	0	0
	*Wansey, Francis, Arbor Field Mill, near Reading	..	1	0	0
	*Tonks, W. and S., Church-street, Wolverhampton	..	1	0	0
	*Westrope, W. G., Burford	..	1	0	0
	Duthie, A., and Co., Bervie, N.B.	..	1	0	0
	*Fletcher, Robert, Hanover-square, Newcastle-on-Tyne	..	1	0	0
	*Pollard, Wm., Brunswick-square, Bristol	..	1	0	0
	*Wade, John, Lower-road, Deptford	..	1	0	0
	Cook, James, 22 and 23, Queen's-buildings, Brompton	..	0	10	0
	*An Association of Operatives held at George the	..	0	6	0
	Fourth, Bagnidge Wells Road, 9th Subscription	..	0	6	0
	Lloyd, Mr., Hatfield-street, Stamford-street	..	0	5	0
	Pike, Frederick, High-street, Borough	..	0	5	0
	Smart, George, Saw Mills, York-street, Lambeth	..	0	2	6
	Watts, Charles, baker, High Fulham	..	0	2	6

St. Albans.	Bennett, Joseph	..	1	0	0
	Peppercom, James	..	1	0	0
Herts, per	Lanrigge, Edward	..	1	0	0
C. H. Latt-	Lewis, John	..	1	0	0
more.	Richardson, Thomas	..	1	0	0

	Dale, Joseph, 40, King-street	..	1	0	0
	Cowlyn, Wm., 11, Chapel-street	..	0	2	6
Devonport.	Hill, Jonathan, 1, York-place, Stoke	..	0	2	6
	Perry, Richard, 42, St. John-street	..	0	2	6
	A Man without a Shirt	..	0	2	6
	Small Sums	..	0	2	0
	*Browning, John	..	1	0	0
	Sturt, Francis	..	0	2	6
	Jeffrey, W.	..	0	2	6
	Vince, C., jun.	..	0	2	6
Farnham, Surrey.	Tiley, T.	..	0	2	6
	Jeffrey, Samuel	..	0	2	6
	Williams, Charles	..	0	2	6
	Hackman, T.	..	0	2	6
	A Friend	..	0	2	6
	Wareham, James	..	0	1	0

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA AT BLOWS FOR WANT OF BETTER TO DO.

NARRATIVE OF A SAILOR.

"To enable us to annoy the commerce of Great Britain, or to otherwise operate against her to her injury, through naval means, we would recommend that the number of her steamers like the Mississippi, but rather enlarged, should be increased to thirty, and our sloops of war to forty."—The Secretary of the American Naval Department to the Legislature, March, 1846.

"The bond of nations is free commerce."—Mr. Walker, Secretary to the American Treasury, 1845.

"Commercial intercourse is the only sure guarantee of the peace of nations."—The League.

"The keystone of monopoly is the Corn Law; remove it, and the whole fabric of injustice and impolicy must fall to the ground."—Mr. Cobden.

"We will struggle for the Corn Law inch by inch."—Duke of Richmond and Lord George Bentinck.

At the village of Bladen, near Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, on the 12th of July, 1810, a boy named Samuel Leech was seen by the inhabitants of that place with his face turned towards London, and his back turned on his home and on them, trudging up the green lanes with the settled thought in his head of going as a sailor-boy on board a man-of-war.

He joined the Macedonian frigate at Gravesend, and in due time was initiated into the duties of the naval service. During the first two years and five months of this lad's sea life, the Macedonian was chiefly employed in blockading the French fleet in Brest Harbour, and in harassing the commerce of the ports situated on the Bay of Biscay. A trip was also made as far as Madeira, and from thence to the coast of Virginia in America, where on board the Macedonian the conversation became common that England and America were likely to go to war with each other. They returned, however, to the coast of France, and were again engaged in the blockade and the prohibition of French commerce before they heard any positive rumours that England and America had declared war against each other. When they heard those rumours, they, the men before the mast did not know their truth, but the conduct of the captain, who had been officially informed of the fact, indicated that he knew something not known to the crew.

He was on deck almost all the time (says Samuel Leech); the look-out aloft was more rigidly observed, and every little while the cry of "Mast-head there," arrested our attention. Thus we passed several days, the captain running up and down, and constantly hailing the man at the mast-head. Early in the morning he began his charge to keep a good look-out, and repeated it until evening. The crew of the Macedonian had no doubt that if there was to be war with America their success was certain.

On each Sunday they were dressed and paraded in their best clothes, and enjoyed a kind of holiday, the captain frequently reading the church service. On Sunday, December 25, 1812, which was also Christmas Day, they found some other work to do. A stiff breeze was blowing favourable to fast sailing; they had hardly finished breakfast when the man at the mast-head shouted, "Sail-ho!" The captain rushed upon deck, exclaiming, "Mast-head there!" "Sir?" "Where away is the sail?" The man aloft replied. Then the captain asked, "What does she look like?" "A square-rigged vessel, sir." After a few minutes, the captain shouted again, "Mast-head there!" "Sir?" "What does she look like?" "A large ship, sir, standing towards us."

By this time most of the crew were upon deck, eagerly straining their eyes to obtain a glimpse of the approaching ship, and murmuring their opinions to each other on her probable character. Then came the voice of the captain, shouting, "Keep silence, fore and aft!" Silence being secured, he hailed the look-out, who, to his question of "What does she look like?" replied, "A large frigate bearing down upon us, sir."

A whisper ran along the crew that the stranger was an American frigate, which was confirmed by the command, "All hands clear the ship for action, ahoy!" The drum and fife beat to quarters, bulkheads were knocked away, the guns were released from their confinement; the whole dread paraphernalia of battle was produced; and, after the lapse of a few minutes of hurry and confusion, every man and boy was at his post, ready to do his best service for his country, except the band who, claiming an exemption from the fray, safely stowed themselves away in the cable tier. We had only one sick man on the list, and he at the cry of battle hurried from his cot, feeble as he was, to take his post of danger. A few of the junior midshipmen were stationed below on the berth deck, with orders, given in our hearing, to shoot any man who attempted to run from his quarters.

As the approaching ship showed American colours, all doubt of her character was at an end. We must fight her, was the conviction of every breast. Every possible arrangement that could possibly ensure success, was accordingly made. The guns were shotted and the matches lighted. A lieutenant then passed through the ship, directing the marines and boarders, who were furnished with pikes, cutlasses, and pistols, how to proceed, if it should be necessary to board the enemy. He was followed by the captain, who exhorted the men to fidelity and courage, urging upon their consideration the well known motto of Nelson, "England expects every man to do his duty." In addition to all these preparations on deck, some men were stationed in the tops with small arms, whose duty it was to attend to trimming the sails, and to use their muskets provided we came to close action. There were others also below, called sail trimmers, to assist in working the ship should it be necessary to shift her position during the battle.

My station was at the fifth gun on the main deck. It was my duty to supply my gun with powder, a boy being appointed to each gun in the ship on the side we engaged for this purpose. A woollen screen was placed before the entrance to the magazine with a hole in it through which the cartridges were passed to the boys. We received them there, and covering them with our jackets, hurried to our respective guns. These precautions were observed, to prevent the powder taking fire before it reached the gun. Thus we all stood awaiting orders in motionless suspense. At last we fired three guns from the larboard side of the main deck. This was followed by the command, "Cease firing, you are throwing away your shot." Then came the order to wear ship and prepare to attack the enemy with our starboard guns. Soon after this, I heard a firing from some other quarter, which I at first supposed to be a discharge from our quarter deck guns, but it proved to be the roar of the enemy's cannon. A strange noise, such as I had never heard before next arrested my attention. It sounded like the tearing of sails just over our heads. This, I soon ascertained to be the wind of the enemy's shot. The firing, after a few minutes' cessation, recommenced. The roaring of cannons could now be heard from all parts of our trembling ship; and mingling as it did with that of our foes, it made a most hideous noise. By-and-by I heard the shots strike the sides of our ship. The whole scene grew indescribably confused and horrible; it was like some awfully tremendous thunder storm, whose deafening roar is attended by incessant streaks of lightning, carrying death in every flash, and strewn the ground with the victims of its wrath; only in our case, the scene was rendered more horrible than that by the presence of torrents of blood which dyed our decks.

wound; the other had a grape or canister shot sent through his arm. A stout Yorkshireman lifted him in his arms, and hurried with him to the cockpit. He had his foot cut off, and was thus made lame for life. Two of the boys stationed on the quarter-deck were killed; they were both Portuguese. A man who saw one of them killed afterwards told me that his powder caught fire, and burned the flesh almost off his face. In this pitiable condition the agonised boy lifted up both hands, as if imploring relief, when a passing shot instantly cut him in two. I was an eye-witness to a sight equally revolting. A man, named Aldritch, had one of his hands cut off by a shot, and almost at the same moment he received another shot, which tore open his bowels in a terrible manner. As he fell, two or three men caught him in their arms, and, as he could not live, threw him overboard. One of the officers in my division also fell in my sight. He was a noble-hearted fellow, named Van Kivell. A grape or canister shot struck him near the heart. He fell, and was carried below, where he shortly afterwards died.

Mr. Scott, our first lieutenant, was also slightly wounded by a grummet, or small iron ring, probably torn from a hammock den by a shot. He went below shouting to the men to fight on. Having had his wounds dressed, he came up again, shouting to us at the top of his voice, and bidding us fight with all our might.

The battle went on. Our men kept cheering with all their might. I cheered with them, though I confess I scarcely knew for what. Certainly there was nothing very inspiring in the aspect of things where I was stationed. So terrible had been the work of destruction around us, that it was termed the slaughter-house. Not only had we had several boys and men killed and wounded, but several of the guns were disabled. The schoolmaster received a death wound. The brave boatswain, who had come from the sick cot to the din of battle, was fastening a stopper on a backstay which had been shot away, when his head was smashed to pieces by a cannon ball. Another man, going to complete the unfinished task, was also struck down. One of our midshipmen likewise received a severe wound; and the wardroom steward was killed. A fellow named John, who for some petty offence had been sent on board as a punishment, was carried past me wounded. I distinctly heard the large blood-drops fall pat, pat, on the deck. His wounds were mortal. Even a poor goat, kept by the officers for her milk, did not escape the general carnage; her hind legs were shot off, and poor Nan was thrown overboard.

Suddenly, the rattling of the iron hail ceased. We were ordered to cease firing; a profound silence ensued; broken only by the stifled groans of the brave sufferers below. It was soon ascertained that the enemy had shot a head to repair damages, for she was not so disabled but she could sail without difficulty; while we were so cut up, that we lay utterly helpless. Our head braces were shot away; the fore and main topmasts were gone. The mizen mast hung over our stern, and carried several men over in its fall. We were in the state of a complete wreck.

A council was now held among the officers on the quarter-deck. Our condition was now perilous in the extreme. Victory or escape was alike hopeless. Our ship was disabled, many of our men were killed, and many more wounded. The enemy would without doubt bear down upon us in a few moments; and as she could now choose her own position, would doubtless rake us fore and aft. Any further resistance was therefore folly; so in spite of the hot-brained lieutenant who advised them not to strike, but to sink alongside, it was determined to strike our colours. This was done by a brave fellow named Watson, whose saddened brow told how sincerely it pained his lion heart to do it. To me it was a pleasing sight, for I had seen fighting enough for one Sabbath, more than I wished to see again on a week day. His Britannic Majesty's frigate, Macedonian, was now the prize of the American frigate, United States.

When the crew of the United States first boarded our frigate, to take possession of her as their prize, our men, heated with the fury of the battle, exasperated with the sight of their dead and wounded shipmates, and rendered furious by the rum they had obtained from the spirit room, felt and exhibited some disposition to fight their captors. But after the confusion had subsided, and part of our men were snazily stowed away in the American ship, and the remainder found themselves kindly used in their own, the utmost good feeling began to prevail. We set to work to cleanse the ship, using hot vinegar to take out the scent of the blood that dyed the white of our planks with crimson. We also aided in fitting our disabled frigate for her voyage. This being accomplished, both ships sailed in company towards the American coast.

I now felt myself perfectly at home with the American seamen; so much so, that I chose to mess with them. My shipmates also participated in similar feelings, in both ships. All idea that we had been trying to shoot each other so shortly before, seemed forgotten. We ate together, drank together, joked, sung, laughed, told yarns; in short, a perfect union of ideas, feelings, and purposes, seemed to exist among all hands. A corresponding state of unanimity existed, I was told, among the officers.

Soon after reaching America, Samuel Leech entered that service; and in the United States brig of war, Syren, was employed on the coast of Africa in "annoying the commerce of Great Britain, and in otherwise operating against her to her injury," doing in the spring of 1813 what the American Secretary of the Navy recommends as requisite to be done in the spring of 1846, in the event of England and America going to war.

The orders of the commander of the Syren was to sink, burn, and destroy all English merchantmen, and every other English vessel with which they might engage and prove more than a match for. Leech says:

"The first land we made was Cape Mount. The natives came off to a considerable distance in their canoes, clothed in nothing but a piece of cloth fastened round the waist, and extending downward to the feet."

Those people needed clothing, were desirous of obtaining it, were offered it by the merchants of Liverpool and manufacturers of Manchester, and were willing and anxious to pay for it by exchanging the products of their country, which the merchants of Liverpool and manufacturers of Manchester had a desire to obtain; but the orders to the American ships of war and to the English ships of war had been in the spirit of war, to sink, burn, and destroy the trading ships of each other's country, consequently the half-naked inhabitants of Africa had to go with such imperfect clothing as they could obtain through an obnoxious trade, and the manufacturers and all their workpeople had to do less work and subsist on lower profits and lower wages, while England nationally was so much the poorer in not having such products of Africa as she was in need of.

And why was this? Because England and France were at war; because England and America quarrelled, in so far that America would not refrain from trading with France.

Samuel Leech continues to say of the natives at Cape Mount and of the English traders:

"As we approached the shore, we saw several fires burning; this we were told, in the broken English spoken by our sable visitors, was the signal for trade. We bought a quantity of oranges, limes, cocoa nuts, tamarinds, plantains, yams, and bananas. We lay here for several days looking out for any English vessel that might come here for the purposes of trade." (After much cruising and little success), "We saw a sail standing in towards St. Thomas. Hoisting English colours, our officers also donned the British uniform. We soon came near enough to hail her; for not doubting that we were a British brig, the merchantman made no effort to escape us. Our captain hailed her, 'Ship ahoy! hallo! what ship is that?' 'The ship Barton.' 'Where do you belong?' 'To Liverpool.' 'What is your cargo?' 'Redwood, palm oil, and ivory.' 'Where are you bound to?' 'To St. Thomas.'"

Just at that moment, our English flag was hauled down; and to the inexpressible annoyance of the officers of the Barton, the stars and stripes of America supplied its place.

"Haul down your colours," continued Captain Nicholson. The old captain, who up to this moment had been enjoying a comfortable nap in his very comfortable cabin, now came upon deck in his shirt sleeves, rubbing his eyes and looking so exquisitely ridiculous, that it was scarcely possible to avoid laughing. So surprised was he at the unexpected termination of his dreams, that he could not command skill enough to strike his colours, which was accordingly done by the mate.

"After taking out as much of her cargo as we desired, we proceeded to set her on fire. It was an imposing sight to behold the wild antics of the flames leaping from rope to rope, and from spar to spar, until she looked like a fiery cloud resting on the surface of the water. Presently her spars began to fall; her masts went by the board, her loaded guns went off, the hull was burned to the water's edge; and what a few hours before was a fine trim ship, looking like a winged creature of the deep, lay a shapeless charred mass, whose blackened outlines, shadowed in the clear still waves, looked like the grim spirit of war lurking for his prey."

This was not all; but it is all of the naval engagements we have room to quote here. Those who incline to read more, as related by Samuel Leech, may find it in a book entitled "Thirty Years from Home: or, A Voice from the Main Deck, being the experience of Samuel Leech."

At the conclusion of his narratives of the two years of unnatural war between England and America—a war all the more disastrous that it was directed against the commerce of each other; all the more unnatural that each nation had an equal interest in the preservation of peace; and all the more horrible that the crews and officers of the war ships of each spoke the same language, and used that language, as we have seen in the case of the brig Syren and the brig Barton, to delude, by tricks and falsehoods, the unwary merchantmen into destruction—"annoying each other's commerce, and operating to each other's injury"—as recommended against Great Britain in this year, 1846, by the American Secretary, in the event of a devastation of war;—when Samuel Leech concludes his narrative of that war of 1812, which began because England insisted that America and France should not trade together, and which ended in 1814, when peace with France and England removed the cause of quarrel between America and England, he says:

"The Americans, as is well known, were most successful in their naval warfare (more successful than in their field warfare); but after all, that was a trifling compensation for ruined commerce, and for being brought to the very verge of national dismemberment. The losses of the British never made any distinct impression on the nation, otherwise than in teaching a tolerably sound lesson in discretion, and leading to many important improvements in naval affairs. I sincerely trust that both nations, united by a thousand inextinguishable ties, and profiting by experience, will in all time coming, avoid every description of warlike collision, and exist on the happiest terms of amity and peace."

Amen. But the extremes of the democracy of America, and the extremes of England, seem to exist beyond the pale of common sense. We have it in our power to stop the tongues of the western men of America, who speak so loudly for war; or if not their tongues, we may stop their hands. We can instantly—by the next packet, if our lords so will it—send those men to their spades and their ploughs to grow corn for us, to help us to live and make clothes and implements of labour for them. We may do more than beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-knives. The virgin steel now fashioned for bloodshed lies yet on the anvil, and it rests with us to fashion it for peace or for war, for swords or for ploughshares.

REUBEN.

DAGUERRETYPE PORTRAITS.—The improvements made in these portraits by the recent discoveries is truly astonishing. By the use of improved lenses, a much more distinct drawing is obtained, exhibiting not only the extremes of light and shade, but an easy semitone as well. But the principal alteration consists in the application of an entirely new process of colouring. Hitherto a coating of paint has been laid on, which has had an opaque and plastered appearance; but now the colours are so applied that they harmonise and blend with the metal, by which the transparent effect and the mellow softened tints of drawing on ivory are secured. In examining the collection of portraits at Mr. Beard's rooms, in King William-street, we were much pleased with some very striking likenesses of several of the leading men in the political as well as the religious world. Monsieur Phœbus is in reality a brilliant genius. It may be said of him literally that he takes a high walk in the art, and that no artist of ancient or modern days can touch him, or indeed come anywhere near him.

A MUSICAL BED.—The last novelty from Germany is a musical bed, which receives the weary body and immediately "laps it in Elysium." It is an invention of a mechanic in Bohemia, and is so constructed that by means of hidden mechanism, pressure upon the bed causes a soft and gentle air of Auber to be played, which continues long enough to lull the most wakeful to sleep. At the head is a clock, the hand of which being placed at the hour the sleeper wishes to rise, when the time arrives, the bed plays a march of Spontini, with drums and cymbals, and in short, with noise enough to rouse the seven sleepers. This unique bed becomes, therefore, the ne plus ultra for the wakeful as well as the sluggish.

AGRICULTURE.

LEASES AND TENANT RIGHTS.

A DAWN OF HOPE FOR THE TENANT FARMERS.

It has been pretended that the tenant farmers of England are stupid, unreasoning protectionists,—that the band of Parliamentary monopolists who talk, in the name of the farmers, incoherencies leading to doubts whether the speakers betray most of the ruffian or the simpleton, are the expounders of the farmers' opinions; yet nothing is further from the fact. The Bentincks, the O'Briens, the Mileses, and the Bankeses, the representatives and advocates of the tenant farmers!!—as much as wolves represent the sheepfold, or foxes the poultry yard; and no more. But, in truth, farmers have been, and are more entirely unrepresented than any class in this country. Landlords are the legislature, and help themselves to all that legislation can give them. The commercial, manufacturing, and trading classes, by their activity, combination, and intelligence, have, year by year, acquired greater power of enforcing attention to their interests, and their grievances; whilst fears of driving the masses to desperation, visions of riots in the populous districts, and of incendiarianism in the agricultural, have ever compelled our dominant landocracy to pay a certain degree of attention to the complaints and more pressing wrongs of the labouring classes. But who ever heard the tenant farmers mentioned in public affairs, except to cover some scheme for enhancing rents, or diminishing the charges on landed property? Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Villiers, are literally the only members of Parliament from whose speeches a stranger to rural affairs could have suspected that any diversity exists between the interests of landlords and tenants. Deep and growing dissatisfaction has long existed on the part of tenant farmers with the state of the relations of landlord and tenant, and with the law by which those relations are governed; and in proportion as agriculture has improved has that dissatisfaction been growing deeper and deeper.

Nor is this surprising when we consider that the art of husbandry, as practised by our best farmers, is of very modern origin. Fifty years ago, the farmer was a sort of appendage to an estate, who gathered, by means of a rude system of cultivation, a humble livelihood, and looked up to his landlord as almost a master. The independent cultivators of those days were the yeomen, the men who lived on their own little farms. The tenant farmer was but one degree better than "his honour's" bailiff. Now, however, the business of a farmer has become one requiring capital, energy, and enterprise, to an extent altogether incompatible with that humble bearing and dependent position formerly deemed the natural condition of a farmer, and to which the landowners would gladly tie him still. But then, if they do so, they cannot derive that increased income from their land which improved husbandry will afford; and it has now become a question, whether landowners shall reduce their rents to something like the standard of 1792, or accede to a new system in the economy of landed property which the spirit of the times demands?

Eventually, we have no doubt that the landowners will adopt the new and improved system which their own interests and those of the community alike require; but, to the actual occupiers of land, the present race of tenants, it is of vital importance that a new system should commence without delay. It has been the fashion to say that farmers are slow to improve; and it is undeniable that the soil is not usually made to produce anything like what it is capable of doing; but we utterly deny that the farmers as a class are to blame. On the contrary, farmers are vastly ahead of their landlords. The cultivation of the land is far better than, from the tenures on which it is held, and from the burdens to which it is subjected by the landlords, could have been expected. At this moment, a very large proportion of English farmers, holding their farms from year to year, have so invested their property in the soil, that they could not quit at a year's notice without sustaining very serious loss. Yet nothing stands between them and the caprice or cupidity of landlords but yearly agreements; and it must be remembered that landowners are more dangerous persons to deal with than men of business. They are full of prejudices and caprices; they are the spoiled children of society. And then they are, as a body, profoundly ignorant of the business and requirements of agriculture. The best farmer can never be sure that some offence given to the steward, some fracas with the gamekeeper, or some political difference with the landlord himself, may not cause him to be turned out of his farm, and subjected to a heavy confiscation of property. Then there is no doubt, that after the farmer has greatly improved his farm for a few years, the landowner begins to think that he should have some share of the improvement the tenant has effected by his own capital and industry, and the rent is advanced. Thus it is that rents have been got up, and kept up, under the system of yearly tenancies. The state of the cultivation of this country is far inferior to what it might be if the tenants generally had long and liberal leases; but it is far better than can be continued with safety to the farmers under yearly tenures. The farmers are now becoming fully aware of this, and in consequence are very generally discussing the questions of "leases and tenants' rights." The following passages from a reported discussion of the sort at the Burton-on-Trent Farmers' Club, which we extract from the Derby Reporter, will show the practical way in which the farmers deal with the subject. It seems that a circular from the London Farmers' Club induced the Burton Club to depute some of its members to draw up a report on the subject; which, after stating the hazard at which yearly tenants carry on their business, proposed the following resolutions for the adoption of the Club:

"That a tenant of land from year to year, ought to enjoy a legal claim to compensation for such improvements as he shall have made during his tenancy, and for which he shall not have received the whole benefit which he is fairly entitled to claim.

"That the tenant has under a tenancy at will a fair claim to the enjoyment of his improvements for as long a period as a good farmer would require, if the length of his occupancy were made a matter of agreement beforehand.

"That impartial arbitrators chosen mutually by the landlord and tenant would, without difficulty, form a correct estimate as to what belonged to the tenant on this principle of adjustment.

"That it appears to the Club to be advisable for the general body of farmers to join in petitioning the legislature to make a law which would give to the tenant a legal right to recover from the landlord such compensation for improvements made by him as impartial and competent arbitrators would decide to be his equitable right."

This does not go to the full extent of the necessity of the case, but it goes a good way in the right direction. But why is this confined to yearly tenants? Assuming this can be effected by the legislature, which, however, is not quite so simple an affair as some persons not fully acquainted with the law of real property in this country, seem to suppose. Upon that point, however, we shall not enlarge at present. The discussion on these resolutions was opened by Mr. Bass, who remarked that as the tenant is now liable for any dilapidations he may make upon the land, he ought to have an equivalent right to recover improvements against the landlord. And he appealed to the experience of the farming body to say, "whether improving tenants compelled, from the force of circumstances, to quit their farms before they have had time to reap the benefit of their improvements, ever do receive fair compensation for them?" The tenant commonly quits under circumstances which do not conciliate towards him the good will of the landlord or his agent; and the claims for improvements are not, therefore, often considered in a friendly spirit. The time for making a safe arrangement for the tenant is upon his entry. To rely on the personal character of any landlord, however honourable, is to trust to the chapter of accidents; he may change, he may become embarrassed, he may sell his estate, or he may die, and so the property pass into other hands, at whose mercy the tenant will be. Mr. Bass said:

"The state of agriculture is changing every year, and new modes of culture are discovered by which land may be made to grow a larger amount of produce, and at a less expense, than is possible until these new means are tried. The farmer who adheres to the old system is brought into competition with others who have abandoned it, and his profits are every year becoming less. To enable him to keep pace with the forward movement, he must begin by investing additional capital on his land. Without reckoning such improvements as draining, the merely increasing the fertile power of the soil by manures cannot be done without considerable outlay. Without a stronger guarantee than he now has, the tenant-at-will cannot prudently incur a large outlay, and without such outlay he cannot prosper."

Yet landlords are averse to giving the requisite security. He added

"The longer I attend to the subject, the more I become convinced that the many impediments to proper agreements between landlords and tenants will not be overcome, except by giving the tenants a legal claim where there is no special agreement. There are impediments on both sides. Though many landlords are desirous of having their land highly farmed by their tenants, and are willing to give security for the capital invested in improvements, yet there are too many who are careless, or even averse to putting the tenant in an independent position. On the other hand there are many tenants too timid to undertake leases, and many others occupying small farms with small means, to whom it would not be advisable to grant them. Nothing but agreements from year to year, with clauses providing for compensation for improvements, would be accepted by this numerous class of tenants."

Now these last propositions are unsound. The weaker the tenant's capital, the longer must be his rotation of crops, if he is to farm well, and therefore to such tenants a lease is indispensable. But if it be meant that these tenant rights will enable the system of small capitals and yearly tenancies to be continued, then we say that they will do more harm than good, for it is only by tenants being "placed in independent positions" that any general improvement will take place.

There is, however, no practical difficulty in the way of such valuations of improvements as are proposed. Mr. Bass said:

"I have observed that in the discussion of this subject at the London Farmers' Club, none of the eminent farmers who spoke seemed to have any doubt that a just valuation of tenants' rights could always be made by competent land valuers. If a farmer has a beneficial interest in a lease, and is at liberty to dispose of it to another, there is never any difficulty in estimating its worth, and in what does this case differ from that of a tenant leaving unenjoyed improvements in a farm held at will?"

The only way of effecting it is to appoint arbitrators in each case, and he added:

"It seems to me that the whole subject relating to the mutual claims of the off-going and in-coming tenants, and of the landlord, requires a thorough revision by the legislature."

This is a position nobody can doubt, who has known anything of the management of landed property.

The next speaker was Mr. Richard Chawner, whose remarks bespeak a fuller knowledge of the requirements of agriculture than is commonly met with. He said, he must make one objection to the report, that it placed the subject on too narrow a basis by not recognising the interest of the consumer. But, in fact, that is comprised in the consideration of what is best for the tenant, who, like the consumer, is interested in growing the largest quantity at the least proportional cost. Mr. Chawner thus enforced the necessity of a lease:

"In what position then ought the tenant to be placed? First of all he requires security of tenure. He must have the security of a lease for years, say 21, renewable every seven with the consent of the contracting parties. A long connection with college property has satisfied me upon this point. No prudent man will expend his capital—no skilful man can have the opportunity of carrying out his projected improvements (the result frequently requiring years for its development) unless he be insured in the possession of his farm for a certain term of years (Cries of "Hear, hear"). The next point of importance relates to the conditions of the tenure, the covenants in the lease,—and here the same principle must be kept steadily in view—viz., the good cultivation of the soil. This may be called the landlord's right; and in order to secure it, he should have the power of entering by himself or agent to inspect the state of cultivation, and of referring any question of dilapidation or neglect of the rules of good husbandry to competent and impartial authority. The schedule which should be appended to every lease, containing the system and state of cultivation of the farm, would be a very sufficient guide to any competent arbitrators between the parties. In addition to the respectability and capital of the tenant, the ever-ruling principle of self-interest is a security to the landlord; for it is notorious that in the good cultivation of the soil, and in that only, can the tenant hope for any adequate return for the expenditure of his capital and labour (hear, hear). On the other hand, the tenant ought to be allowed the uncontrolled power over his own skill and capital; he must be allowed to cultivate his farm as he thinks proper."

This is the just and sound view of the subject, and it is that to which farmers must adhere, if they mean to effect any sufficient alteration in the present system. And this we believe is more likely to be obtained by contract than by legislative interference; and it is far better that farmers should try to improve their own contracts with their landlords than rely upon legislative aid. They have had somewhat too much of that already; and he must be but an indifferent observer who supposes our landlord legislators will, at present, consent to pass any general measure tending to promote the independence of the farmers. Mr. Chawner well said:

"We talk of confidence in landlords; but where is the confidence in the tenant, who is required to cultivate his farm according to a certain and unvarying system, to pursue the same course of cropping under all circumstances? We have but to reflect upon our changeful climate, our 'weeping skies,' the change in markets, the difficulty of procuring manures suitable for certain crops, to be convinced at once of the absurdity of the present system. And here I would ask those objectors to the ignorance of the English farmers to reflect upon the restrictions and difficulties under which the tenant farmer has hitherto pursued his useful avocations."

That goes home to the mark; and he added:

"And now, gentlemen, I would gladly pause, but that it is necessary to consider that worst of all tenures, tenancy-at-will. Unfortunately there are circumstances under which this system will be continued; I deeply regret it, because the soil can never be cultivated according to its capabilities under such a system of tenure. Some members of our Club may consider that I lay too much stress upon the good cultivation of the soil; but I ask you to contrast well cultivated districts with neglected ones. Compare Lincolnshire and parts of Norfolk with Wilts and Dorsetshire. In the former case it is well with all interests—the owner, the occupier, and the labourer; but in the latter how true—miserably true—is the reverse. The unsatisfactory state of tenant rights may be illustrated by what takes place in courts of law. Evidence is produced for the plaintiff as to the custom of the country: equally respectable is the evidence for the defendant; but how conflicting, how totally opposed each to the other. The learned Judge, in despair, declares there is no law in the case; it must be referred, and it is, to a gentleman as remarkable for his impartiality as for his total ignorance of the subject in dispute."

And he further said:

"If this miserable system of tenancy-at-will must be continued, I would venture to make a suggestion, which, if it please neither landlord nor tenant, may at least protect the soil. It is this: As the off-going tenant seeks to do as little as possible for the farm which he quits, so the on-coming tenant schemes to pay as little as possible, and the soil (i.e., the consumer) suffers; and as every practical man knows, the farm where the tenant is frequently changed requires a constant increase of capital to restore its cultivation; 'to stay the plague,' I would place the landlord as the in-coming tenant. Let him pay the off-going tenant liberally for his cultivation up to the end of his term, and then charge the outlay upon the succeeding tenant in the shape of rent. The tenant will thus have his capital in hand to proceed at once with the cultivation of his farm. And here I would ask you to consider the difference of entering upon a farm in a good state of cultivation, and one in a dilapidated condition. I have trespassed too long upon your attention. The importance of the subject must be my excuse. It must be sifted to the bottom; it must be discussed at every Farmers' Club—aye, and at every market table in England (cheers). We take no selfish view of tenant rights; we desire, above all things, the good cultivation of the soil. If we succeed in placing tenant rights upon a secure basis, we shall equally protect the rights of landlords, and promote to the utmost of our ability the prosperity of the land we live in."

These remarks were deservedly received with much applause.

Mr. Govan said:

"He hoped to see the day when the landlord and tenant would be placed on a footing of equality. He never yet saw an agreement that he was disposed to sign, because agreements were generally all on one side; and he was satisfied that the day was about to dawn when one-sided things could exist no longer" (cheers).

Mr. Greaves advocated a legal right to be paid for improvements; saying:

"A law declaring the tenant to be entitled to just compensation for unexhausted improvements would at once effect more than would be effected by 50 years' agitation of the subject by the farmers. I am not prepared to deny that the common system of tenancy-at-will is favourable to a certain class of tenants where they hold under the best landlords; but I take the liberty to say that it is only in the case of the best landlords and the worst tenants, that it is the most favourable."

This seems to say but little for tenancies-at-will, even in the excepted cases.

He then asks:

"Can the tenant's rights be fairly ascertained? I have not the least doubt that they can; and I agree with the report of our Committee that this can only be done by a valuation made by arbitrators having a discretionary power to award compensation according to the particular circumstances under which the improvements have been made. It is sometimes said that a tenant's permanent improvements alone ought to be allowed for; but, as the report of our committee very justly argues, all improvements are more or less permanent, for there are none for which the tenant is immediately repaid. If a tenant took land for two or three years, would he expend money in manures, or lay part of it down to grass, or subsoil it, or even give it a thorough cleaning? The tenant has just as good a claim to compensation for such improvements as he has for buildings erected, or for drains laid in the soil. In one respect, I think the report of the Committee falls short of what is required to ensure good farming in all cases. It only recommends compensation in the case of tenancy from year to year; but it was very properly remarked, that in the case of a lease, farmers were obliged to remit their improvements towards its termination, and get all back which they could, and thus injuring the land and their landlords, while if they were allowed for improvements made during the latter part of the lease, the interests of all would be better cared for. By the law, as it now is, the landlord can recover for dilapidation of his land; but everybody acquainted with farming must be aware how very unequally and unjustly the law operates. A tenant may have improved his land to the amount of many hundreds of pounds, but if he has omitted to crop a single field according to the custom of the country, or has failed to repair a barn, or clean a ditch, or mend a fence, his landlord may recover from him; although, if a fair balance were struck, a large compensation would be due to the party who was actually obliged to pay it."

Mr. Bass, in reply, observed:

"The question as to the best mode of tenure was decided by the club long ago in favour of long leases. The sole object of the meeting that night was to take some specific act, and to coalesce with other clubs in petitioning the legislature to place the tenant on an equal footing with his landlord. For himself, he was of opinion that the whole law of land should be revised.

And

"Mr. Chawner suggested the propriety of sending a formal notice to the landlords of the district, informing them of the decision of the club, and requesting their co-operation in petitioning the legislature. He had heard many landlords express themselves favourable to the resolutions."

That some of the landlords will aid in this "agricultural movement," we have no doubt; but in the main, it must be carried out by the exertions of the farmers; and the discussion at Burton-on-Trent shows that there are men amongst them who are able and willing to work out the independence of the rural middle classes.

HOPE FOR THE SQUIRES YET.

In Scotland, at all events, the landlords are not under the necessity of abandoning their land on account of coming Free Trade in corn, as witness the following:

"GRASS FARMS AND CATTLE SALES IN SCOTLAND.—In various places in the south, grass parks are letting at a considerable advance on the prices of former years. In the neighbourhood of Dundee prices are from seven to eight per cent. higher than last year. In Perthshire, the average is from ten to twenty per cent. higher. At Clow, in the Ochils, a park of nearly twenty acres, well laid down, and for the first time depastured, brought upwards of 80l. on Monday, the 6th instant. At a sale of stock at the same place, cattle fetched very high prices. Blackfaced three-year-old widders brought from 23s. to 26s. a head; ewes, from 20s. to 25s. 6d.; Cheviot hogs, 20s. to 21s. The Dumfries Courier states that the far famed Closeburn annual grass let, on the estate of Sir Charles Monteath, Bart., came off at Brownhill, on the 3d instant. Those upon the western side, or Shaw's estate, commanded upwards of 16 per cent. above the last year's let, while those on the eastern, or Hall side, were only a trifling shade below a similar per centage. The same respected proprietor and eminent agriculturist, on his estate of Mansfield, Ayrshire, last week, let his grazing fields at a rise of fully 14 per cent. above that of the preceding year."—Glasgow Courier.

And as we have peculiar satisfaction in giving comfort and support to the agricultural mind, we reprint the following for its consolation and instruction. The lessons it conveys are, Beware of panic; and whatever you do, don't lessen your stock:

"HIGH PRICE OF CATTLE AND SHEEP.—The prices which farm stock have brought at all the markets this year far exceeds the average of many preceding years, and indeed, as regards fat sheep, the rates are wholly unprecedented. No doubt, to some extent, the higher wages for labour now current will account for so much of the rise as has been caused from the increased demand; but we understand that other causes have concurred in producing the present state of the market. The chief want in cattle is in two and three-year-olds, which are those usually bought for fattening for the market, and there is a great deficiency in the supply of these, owing to the panic caused by the tariff three years ago, which had the effect of checking the operations of many stock growers. As regards sheep, the high price is generally attributed to the great demand for England, consequent upon the extensive losses from foot-rot in many districts last year. At late markets the supply has uniformly been under that of the previous year, owing to the large sales of the six-quarters and two-year-olds last autumn; and to make up stocks adequate to the demand is attributed the rise in rents of pastures of all kinds this year."—Perthshire Courier.

Let us offer the farmers a word of advice: whatever dangers take place, let them never act under the influence of panic, induced by the representations of the monopolist landlords, until those landlords give evidence, real evidence, that they have belief in their own prophecies, by coming forward and offering handsome and permanent reductions of rent. Let farmers act steadily on this advice, and they need fear no panic.

FANCIFUL DISTINCTIONS.

"GUANO TRADE.—It appears from a return issued yesterday by order of the House of Lords, that in the year 1841, there were seven British vessels (and no foreign ones) engaged in the guano trade, of 1,733 tons, and engaging 87 men. In 1842, there were 11 British vessels, occupying 360 men, and 29 foreign ships, employing 59 men. In the next year, there were only 13 British (and no foreign vessels) engaged, visiting 202 tonnage. In 1844, however, there were 288 British vessels (engaging 4,343 men), and one foreign ship (with 18 men); and in 1845 no fewer than 675 British (engaging 11,434 men) and four foreign vessels (with 52 men). This return is prepared from John Covey, Registrar of Shipping at the Custom-house, and is dated the 11th ult."

Doubtless the peer—perhaps the Duke of Richmond—at whose instance this return was ordered, hugged himself with the notion that he should thereby show what an important article, to the commercial classes, foreign manure had become, and to build upon it some monopolist fallacy. These artificial scarcity gentlemen are always especial advocates of the use of guano,—against which, however, in fit circumstances we do not say a word,—probably because they imagine it to be a short cut to high produce without security of tenure or reduction of rent. But what is guano? It is ready-made, completely manufactured manure. Well, but we could import vast quantities of manure, in the form of grain, oats, barley, rye, beans, peas, maize, and so forth, for the manufacture of manure in this country—that is, for the feeding of stock—which, during the process of manufacture, would afford profit to our farmers, and supply great additions to the animal food of the people. Yet the protectionists exult over the extension of the guano trade, and deny the farmers of this country liberty to import cheap food for their stock.

BLOOD FOR THE HARE!

"GAMEKEEPER SHOT.—Henry Jackson, head gamekeeper to Sir George Sitwell, Radshaw Hall, and who has only recently been appointed such, went out near the hall on his rounds on Tuesday night. He had not been out long before three men suddenly came towards him, and one of them fired a gun at him, but missed his aim. The same man fired again and shot him in the thigh. By some means he got into the hall, when medical aid was soon procured for him, and about a dozen of the shots extracted. Information was forwarded to the Sheffield police early in the morning, and an officer who had a knowledge of the locality and its inhabitants was promptly dispatched to apprehend the offenders, who were known by the wounded man. In the course of the day the police succeeded in apprehending four of the persons who were suspected to have been concerned in the murderous attempt. They were taken before a magistrate at Eckington, and remanded to Sheffield."—Sheffield Mercury.

Are these the deeds of civilised, Christian men? We know not whether the poor men who have to risk their lives in defence of the game, or those who, having been demoralised by game preserving, would madly have murdered their fellow-creature, are most to be pitied. Towards the game preservers and the upholders of the Game Laws, there can be but one sentiment, that of indignant condemnation. We are glad to see, however, that some landowners are becoming alive to the mischievousness of game preserving:

"DESTRUCTION OF GAME.—During the last season upwards of 21,000 hares and rabbits were killed upon the estates of Thomas Clifton, Esq., of Lytham, besides a large number of pheasants, partridges, and other game. We understand it is intended to thin the number still further, as Mr. Clifton is determined that the destructive ravages of game shall not be a source of complaint amongst his tenants another year."—Lancashire Paper.

We wish we could say the practice of game preserving was decreasing. But game preservers must have the public eye of the intelligent and humane of this country strongly directed towards them, before they will abandon their selfish and pernicious pleasures.

INDIAN CORN.

The following has been sent us by a lady, and we recommend her practical receipts as deserving of wide circulation:

"Heigham, near Norwich, April 14, 1846.

"We lived six years in New York state, and have used Indian corn almost daily for the last fourteen years in our family, which is large. I always have found that our servants, after a very short time grew as fond of it as we are. I venture to send you my receipts, which I had printed in hopes of 'diffusing' this branch of 'useful knowledge.' I sent some to Father Mathew at Cork, and he tells me he has had a few thousand copies reprinted for circulation. I have just sent a sheet to Dr. Lindley, and Mr. Gedge, of the Bury Post, hoping they will aid in the circulation; and perhaps you will find a vacant corner in the League."

A DOZEN RECEIPTS FOR COOKING INDIAN MEAL;

By a Person who has used it many years in her family.
1. Bread of Indian Meal and Flour.—2. Indian Meal Dumplings.—3. Johnny Cake.—4. Mush.—5. Fried Mush.—6. Boiled Indian Pudding.—7. Baked ditto.—8. Plain ditto.—9. Indian Meal Gruel.—10. Indian Pancakes.—11. Corn Cake, or Corn Bread.—12. Sweet Corn Cakes.—13. Light Corn Bread.—14. Plain Corn Bread.—Remarks.—15. Hominy, to make.—16. Hominy, to cook.

Yellow Indian Corn is far more nutritious, and tastes better, than White Indian Corn.

Indian Corn Meal must not be ground too fine; it generally requires to be sifted, and the coarsest bran taken out; this when boiled is good food for pigs.

Bread cannot be made of Indian meal alone: one-third of meal to two-thirds of wheat flour is quite as much as the bread will bear; more meal would make it too sweet and sticky. To make bread, take for example 7lbs. of Indian meal, and pour boiling water on it till it is all wet; it never knots like flour: then let it stand till it becomes milk-warm, and stir in one stone and a half of flour with the hands; proceed then exactly as you would with wheat bread; of course but little more water will be required. It takes rather longer to bake than wheat bread.

Indian Meal Dumplings are made exactly like suet dumplings; or if you prefer them without suet, mix them with milk instead of water; they require longer time in boiling than flour dumplings. If any is left to be cold, it is good cut in slices and fried.

Johnny Cake, which is in fact a pudding, and eaten hot, is made thus. Take about two pints of Indian meal and mix with it about one table-spoonful of melted pork lard or clear beef dripping. Dissolve one tea-spoonful of salt, and half a tea-spoonful of soda in a tea-cup, with cold water; pour milk into the meal till it forms a stiff batter; add the salt and water, and one beaten egg. Grease a shallow tin, such as is used for Yorkshire puddings, and pour the batter in. Bake it in a brisk oven for about two hours. You may make Johnny Cake without milk, by putting rather more lard in it, or if you please you may make it with milk and water, as convenient. N.B. Johnny Cake should never be made thick; an inch deep is enough.

Mush is Indian meal added into cold water, or milk and water, quite thin, and then boiled for about half an hour. It thickens very much, so that it is necessary to stir it frequently, and to add cold water occasionally. It is also called Indian basty pudding, and it is usually eaten with treacle or with milk.

Fried Mush.—If any mush be left, when it is cold stir in more Indian meal till it is very stiff; cut it out of the pan in pieces about half an inch thick, and fry it in beef or pork lard. It is excellent.

Boiled Indian Pudding.—Make a stiff batter by stirring Indian meal into a quart of milk or water. Add two table-spoonfuls of flour, three of brown sugar, two tea-spoonfuls of ginger, and two of salt. If you make it with water, mix in a little chopped suet and one egg, but with milk these are not required. Tie rather loose, and boil for three hours at least.

Baked Indian Pudding.—Boil three or four pints of milk, according to the size of the dish you mean to fill, and stir in Indian meal till it becomes about as thick as soft butter. Stir in two or three ounces of butter, and half a tea-cupful of brown sugar. Add according to taste either a little grated lemon peel, or any spice you like. Butter a shallow earthen baking-dish, and bake in a moderate oven for three-quarters of an hour, or longer if needful. When cold it will easily turn out, and this pudding is better cold than hot.

Plain Indian Pudding.—Seal a quart of milk, and stir in seven table-spoonfuls of Indian meal, one tea-spoonful of salt, one of ginger or cinnamon, and half a tea-cupful of treacle. Grease a baking dish, and bake for about two hours.

Indian Meal Gruel.—Stir a table-spoonful or two of meal into cold water; boil it till it is thickened as much as you like.

Indian Pancakes.—Mix about a pint of meal with sufficient milk or water, and one beaten egg to make a thin batter; fry them in as small a quantity of lard as possible.

Corn Cakes, or Corn Bread.—Pour boiling water with a little salt in it on Indian meal; mix it as stiff as you can with the hands; roll it into balls the size of an orange, then flatten the balls, till the cakes are about half an inch thick. Fry them in a small quantity of beef lard, merely sufficient to prevent their sticking to the pan, or burning. They are to be eaten hot, generally as a breakfast dish.

Sweet Corn Cakes.—Mix one quart of milk, one beaten egg, a tea-spoonful of salt, and half as much soda, and two table-spoonfuls of treacle. Pour this on meal and stir it well till it becomes thoroughly mixed, and stiff enough to make into flat cakes like those in the last receipt. Fry them for 15 or 20 minutes.

Light Corn Bread.—Stir four pints of Indian meal into three pints of tepid water; add one large tea-spoonful of salt; let it rise for 5 or 6 hours, then stir it up with the hand; use as much dough for each roll as can be conveniently shaped in the hand; make oblong rolls about an inch and a half or two inches thick; bake in a brisk oven.

Plain Corn Bread.—Take six pints of Indian meal, one tea-spoonful of salt, four pints of hot water, and mix thoroughly with the hands; let it stand for half an hour or more, then form it as in the last receipt, and bake it in a hot oven.

Remarks.—All kinds of corn bread require a hotter oven than flour bread.

Never grind the corn too fine, or sift it through a fine sieve; no matter how coarse the meal if the husk is removed.

The hotter the oven or Dutch oven, so that it will not burn the dough, the softer and sweeter will be the bread.

Hominy is a dish hardly known in this country except by name. It is a western word, and a dish most common in the Western States of America; it is simply "hulled corn." The way to prepare it is this: Send the corn to the mill, and have it cracked or ground as coarse as possible. If there is any meal amongst it, sift it out, and retain only the cracked corn for hominy. The mill will have disengaged the skin, so that the cook can wash it off; this should be done in cold water, rubbing it with the hands, and changing the water two or three times. Another method of getting rid of the skin is to soak the corn for about ten minutes in soda and water, or in lye, and then pound it in a mortar, but this is tedious. When the hominy is thus prepared, put it into a large pot of cold water, and boil it steadily for six or eight hours. Add hot water frequently whilst boiling, otherwise the hominy will burn and become dark. It should be perfectly white, like well boiled rice. Send it to table dry and hot.

The usual way in the Western States is to boil hominy twice a week, and set it by in an earthen vessel for daily use. When wanted for breakfast or dinner, put a piece of butter into a baking-dish, melt it, then fill the dish with hominy well mashed down; let it heat thoroughly, and it is fit to eat. Some people allow the bottom to bake, then turning it topsy-turvy in the dish, the crust serves to keep it hot.

For frying fish, use coarse Indian meal instead of bread crumbs.

For stuffing, use Indian meal instead of grated bread.

PROSPECTS OF CHEAP AND GOOD FOOD.—Amongst the matters at present exciting interest, nothing is more important, or displays more the character of the commercial enterprise of the day, than the steps now taking for insuring a future supply of food. Within a very few days, there has been rivalry between the American and Norwegian merchants in ice, turkeys, and capons, many of which have arrived in a state fit for the domestic table. Within the last three years, nearly 500,000 pine apples have been imported from the West Indies: turtle in abundance; and even preserved apricots from Port Philip, in Australia. The measures of the proposed tariff have, in many instances, been anticipated by intelligent speculators in the city, and reciprocated by agriculturists abroad. One intelligent firm in Monument Yard alone have added, within the last two years, many luxuries and necessities to the table, including pine apples and turtle from the Bahamas; new potatoes from the Azores; salmon from Labrador, imported by the Hudson's Bay Company; pork and bacon from Lisbon; preserved meats from Australia; hops, smoked beef, and tongues, from the United States, &c. The most extraordinary results, however, perhaps from anticipated Free Trade, have been in the importation of American cheese. The potatoes, introduced as novelties from the Azores last spring, have now become absolute necessities, as they are the chief source on which a future healthy crop can be looked forward to. The Horticultural Society has not been behind in anticipating the future wants of the community, by introducing several new sorts of food. Two new articles in farinaceous food have been added recently in the importation of yams and bananas. In connection with these statements, it is a matter of notoriety that the want of Irish beef and pork for ships' provisions is such, and has been so for months, that the ships could not leave port without a foreign supply.—Leeds Mercury.

REVIEW.

ECONOMIC FALLACIES (Sophismes Economiques, par M. F. Bastiat.) Paris: Guillaumin; London: Dulau.

M. Frederic Bastiat's able work, entitled, "Cobden and the League," has already introduced him to the favourable notice of our readers. He is a philosophical economist of the highest order—a man who unites profound science to active benevolence, a sincere love of truth to a firm resolution to assert its cause, and who combines a thorough hatred of falsehood with large power and resolute will to expose its delusions. The greater part of the work before us is devoted to the exposure of the fallacies of protection, which, though confuted here to the satisfaction of the great bulk of the people, have still some influence over public feeling in France, where the monopolists have been far more successful than they have been on this side of the Channel in fencing round their selfish interests by appeals to popular prejudice. But M. Bastiat does more than overthrow: he builds up. We may say of him, in a different sense from the poet—

"Diruit, edificat, mutat quadrata rotundis."

That is, he throws down sophistry, he erects the system of sound principle, and he changes the angular forms of mere superficial extent for the circular of greatest capacity. In bringing this work before our readers, we believe that an analysis of the reasoning will be more instructive to them, and more equitable to the author, than a mere selection of specimens. In this instance, quotations would too closely resemble the brick which, according to Hierocles, the Greek blockhead carried round as a specimen of his house. Instead of picking out a few bricks, we shall endeavour to give a plan of the edifice.

M. Bastiat opens the discussion by stating as the first point in issue the comparative merits of Plenty and Scarcity.

There is something repulsive to common sense and common humanity in supposing that any man would deliberately assert abundance to be an evil to be deprecated; and want, a good to be sought. But we have sad evidence that this monstrous assertion finds advocates in the press and the senate. "You will be inundated with foreign corn," exclaims Lord Stanley; "Deprive not the Irish of your markets for their corn, else they will die of a plethora when consuming at home," whines forth that most self-complacent patriot, W. S. O'Brien; "Let bread be dear, and the farmers will be rich," is the great aphorism of M. Bugeaud on one side of the water, and Lord George Bentinck on the other. It is sometimes attempted to disguise the naked wickedness of this legislation to produce want by substituting the word cheapness for abundance, and the words high price for scarcity; but the terms are obviously identical. Cheapness is merely the sign of abundance, as dearthness is of scarcity. High prices and famine prices are one and the same thing; and those who legislate to secure high prices for food are speculating in scarcity, and driving a trade in starvation. They deliberately plan the destruction of one portion of the population to extort high prices from the survivors. But we may be told that this view of the case carries the protective system to an extreme not intended by monopolists. But we say, if their principle is sound, it must sustain all its consequences; it must be valid for famine if it be valid for insufficiency of supply. The question between protection and Free Trade is simply a question between artificial scarcity and natural abundance; the extent of the scarcity is indifferent to the issue. Protection, however, has its logic, and we shall fairly state the argument by which it is supported. The producer who obtains a high price for his products, generally obtains a high profit—that is, a large remuneration for his industry. By rendering these products artificially scarce, he increases their price in the market, and therefore increases the amount of reward obtained for his labour. If, then, any special branch of industry be protected from competition, the price of its products will be thereby raised, and the remuneration of all engaged in the production will be increased in the same proportion. Apply this to all branches of production in a country, and you will secure the prosperity of all classes of producers. Such is the logic of scarcity as it is enunciated very distinctly every morning in the Post, and sometimes stated with great rhetorical skill. The same principles are maintained by Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Gamp, but the unfortunate creatures have not the skill to give it even the form of an argument.

We do not deny that this argument, as it has often been stated by the Morning Post in its special application to some one branch of industry, is specious; in fact, the syllogism is not false, it is simply incomplete. It presents the truth, but not the whole truth; and it may deceive, because the truth asserted must be present to the mind, while the truth omitted may escape the cognisance even of the imagination.

There are, in fact, two truths omitted—a lesser and a greater; which, however, are intertwined with each other. Let us consider the lesser first. It is assumed in the reasoning that high prices are coincident with high profits, and that consequently artificial scarcity will always increase the remuneration for production. But if instead of producing one article at a profit of five shillings, the producer at the same proportionate outlay can bring three articles to market at a profit of half-a-crown, though the price of each article is lowered by 2s. 6d., his ultimate gain is increased by the same amount. This at all events shows a possibility of profits being realised on abundant production, as well as by a system of artificial scarcity, and points to a serious flaw in the logic of protection, even when applied exclusively to the interests of the producer.

But men produce to consume; every man is a consumer, as well as a producer. The logic of scarcity only regards him under the productive aspect. Let M. Bastiat state the supplementary case:

"The consumer is so much the richer, as he purchases the articles of which he is in need at a cheaper rate; he purchases them cheap in proportion to their abundance, and consequently abundance enriches him; and this reasoning extended to all consumers forms the theory of abundance."

M. Bastiat very justly remarks that the theory of scarcity would never have been put into opposition with the theory of abundance, had not men been misled by illusive notions of exchange. Were man a solitary animal, incapable of making exchanges, the theory of want would be a palpable absurdity. Robinson Crusoe in his desert island would never have complained that the fruits of the earth grew in too great a quantity, or that the chests of the seamen which floated ashore contained too large a supply of clothes. But, as Archbishop Whately has well observed, "Man is essentially a catallactic animal,"—that is, an animal which makes exchanges. For this description of man, in his economic relations, the archbishop has been severely rated by some ignorant and conceited sentimentalists, who would substitute for sound science pedantic vanities and puerile conceits. But exchange, as M. Bastiat shows, is the principal fact in the inquiry; and the fallacies which prevail, arise from misapprehension of its nature and import. Let us first take M. Bastiat's comparison of the theory of want and the theory of abundance as applied to an individual and isolated human being:

"If man had been a solitary animal, labouring exclusively for himself, and consuming the fruit of his toil,—in a word, if he made no exchange, the theory of want would never have been introduced into the world. It would be too evident that abundance would be advantageous to him, from whatever source it might be derived; whether it had been the result of his own industry, or of ingenious implements and powerful machines which he had invented; whether it was due to the fertility of the soil, the liberality of nature, or even to a mysterious invasion of products which the waves might have brought him from abroad and cast upon the shore. The man would never have deemed it necessary to encourage himself, to find employment for his labour, by breaking the implements which abridge his toil, neutralising the fertility of the soil, or throwing back into the sea the articles which it had brought to his shore. He would easily comprehend that labour is a means, not an end, and that it would be absurd to reject the object of labour, through fear of injuring the means. He would understand that, if he spends two hours of the day to provide for his wants, every circumstance (no matter whether it be machinery, fertility, or gratuitous gift) which spares him an hour of this toil, the results remaining the same, places this hour at his disposal to make some further addition to his welfare; in fact he would comprehend that the saving of labour is progress."

But exchange raises two antagonistic interests. On the one hand, it is our interest to sell dear; on the other hand, it is our interest to buy cheap. The question then arises, whether legislation is to be guided by the interests of producers, or by the interests of consumers? Now it is, in the first place, evident, that all men are consumers, including the producers themselves; and in the next place, it is evident that it is impossible, and idle if it were possible, to extend protection to all classes of producers. So far, then, as the greatest happiness of the greatest number should be an influential principle in legislation, the interest of the consumers and the theory of abundance are unquestionably entitled to the preference.

All legislation for the exclusive benefit of producers is obviously and essentially anti-social, being designed to restrict the supply of the wants of society. The system of protection, that of the Corn Laws, for instance, stands in this dilemma; it either excludes provisions, and thus produces artificial scarcity, or it does not. If it does, then the advocates of protection confess that they are injuring consumers—that is, the entire nation, to the utmost extent of their power. If they deny that these laws produce such scarcity, it follows that they do not raise prices, and consequently they are of no use to producers. PROTECTION, then, is EITHER MISCHIEVOUS or USELESS; there is no other alternative.

The second sophism exposed by M. Bastiat is that which confounds wants with wealth, and obstacles with causes:

"A physician, for example, does not employ himself in making his bread, fabricating his instruments, weaving or stitching his clothes. Others do these things for him, and in return he combats the diseases of his patient. The more numerous, the more intense, and the more frequent these diseases are, the more people are willing, and indeed the more they are compelled to labour for his personal interests. In his point of view, disease, that is, the general obstacle to human happiness, is the cause of general prosperity. All producers make use of the same reasoning in whatever personally concerns themselves. The carrier derives his profits from the obstacle called distance; the agriculturist from that named hunger; the weaver from that named cold; the schoolmaster lives on ignorance; the jeweller on vanity; the lawyer on cupidity, just as the physician does on disease. It is then true that each profession has an immediate interest in the continuation, and even the extension of the special obstacle which is the object of his efforts."

Intimately connected with this sophism is a third, which attributes economic value to efforts instead of to results. It is the sophism of the Post on the necessity of employing the population irrespective of the consideration whether the employment be productive or unproductive. As this sophism, pushed to its remote but legitimate consequences, would find its full development in the fable of Sisyphus, eternally doomed to roll a huge stone up a hill, which tumbled back again so soon as it approached the summit, M. Bastiat calls the system Sisyphism. Let us remember the description of that hero's punishment:

"With many a weary step, and many a groan,
Up the high hill he hurls the huge round stone;
The huge round stone, resulting with a bound,
Thunders impetuous down, and smokes along the ground."

There are two systems with regard to labour; one recommends the production of the greatest amount of result with the least possible expenditure of toil; the other avers that to abridge toil and economise labour is an injury to society. The clamour against machinery is pure Sisyphism. Sentimentalists, when they hear that the steam engine saves the labour of hundreds and thousands of men, exclaim that machinery is taking away employment. Sisyphism is particularly eloquent on behalf of native industry. In Ireland it expends an abundance of bad rhetoric travestied from Ossian and Carlyle in recommending the exclusive use of Irish manufactures. Its first and last panacea for all the evils of humanity is, "give employment." Now we, who are not Sisyphists, believe it advantageous to give employment, when the labour employed leads to remunerative production; but so far as the result is unremunerating, the employment is but a rolling of the stone of Sisyphus, with the additional hardship that the toil is imposed where no punishment is merited.

But Sisyphism is a sad hypocrite; there is not one of its professors who does not exercise his intelligence to economise his own time and his own toil as much as possible. What Sisyphist, aspiring to be a statesman, does not look for a short cut to Parliament or place? What Sisyphian agriculturist does not endeavour to obtain the richest harvest by the least proportional outlay? What Sisyphist on the turf does not aim at winning as much as he can on every race? In fact, no man ever applies Sisyphism to his own individual cause. The conduct of every Sisyphist in the world is a practical refutation of his own doctrines.

We have only gone through one division of M. Bastiat's work, for which we venture to predict a permanent European reputation. We hope that the friends of Free Trade beyond the Atlantic will exert themselves to secure for it an extensive circulation in the United States. The lessons which it inculcates are not more important to France than they are to America.

The Topic, Nos. 1—4. London: Mitchell.

This is a new periodical, designed to furnish a condensed view of all the information necessary to comprehend the nature and bearing of whatever great question has the most prominent claim on public attention. The four numbers published respectively discuss the state of the Punjab, the Oregon question, the new tariff, and the condition of Poland. Each is a very fair digest of the knowledge attainable on the several subjects, written in a calm style, and with an impartial temper. We wish every success to this new literary enterprise. So far as it has gone, we find it perfectly satisfactory; but a larger experience is necessary before we can fairly estimate the skill required of the conductors in selecting subjects, or the ability displayed in their discussion.

THE COLISEUM.—To those who love to spend an evening of quiet and innocent recreation, this place continues to afford an agreeable attraction. The magnificent circular room, in which are placed the statues, forms a delightful promenade. In the evening, the whole establishment is brilliantly lighted up. The most pleasing and extraordinary feature in the exhibition is the view of London by moonlight. This is managed so well, that any one, unless previously acquainted with the place, might suppose that he was surveying the great and busy city at his feet, and that a veritable moon and stars were shining over his head. The mimic caverns of Heidelberg are well worth seeing.

VALUE OF A MARKET.—In the last six days of which we have accounts from New Orleans, there were shipped to foreign ports 21,000 bbls. flour, and corn and other products without measure, chiefly to England. Can any man suppose our western people to be such enormous fools as to sacrifice this vast market for a war about the whole of Oregon.—American Paper.

THE PLYMOUTH FREE TRADE ASSOCIATION.

The Free Trade Association of Plymouth has rendered good service to the cause of commercial freedom by its activity and earnestness. For several years gratuitous courses of winter lectures have been delivered under its auspices, and sound principles disseminated in a healthy and attractive form. We have just received a printed copy of the last of these lectures delivered, on the 26th of February, by the Rev. W. J. Odgers, "On the tendency of Free Trade to promote permanent and universal Peace." The lecturer has treated the subject with great eloquence and ability. We regret that our space will only allow us to give an extract or two from its pages:

MONOPOLY IN THE OLDEN TIME.

"In 1306 a law was passed prohibiting the use of coal in London, because some of the nobility and gentry complained that it infested the air with a noisome smell." Hackney coaches are said to have made their first appearance in London, in the year 1626. They were then only 20 in number for the whole of the capital and contiguous parts, and they did not ply in the streets, but were sent for, by those who wanted them, to the stables of certain inns where they stood. Ten years later, however, we find the King publishing a proclamation, in which he declares that the great number of hackney coaches of late time seen and kept in London, Westminster, and their suburbs, and the general and promiscuous use of coaches there, were not only a great disturbance to his Majesty, his dearest consort, the Queen, the nobility, and others of place and degree, in their passage through the streets, but the streets themselves were so pestered, and the pavements so broken up, that the common passages were hindered and made dangerous; and besides, the prices of hay and provender made exceeding dear. 'Wherefore,' concludes the proclamation, 'we expressly command, that no hackney or hired coaches be used or suffered in London, Westminster, or the suburbs thereof, except they be to travel at least three miles out of the same. And also, that no person shall go in a coach, in the said streets, except the owner of the coach shall constantly keep up four able horses for our service (the King's service) when required.' Such an edict as this, so insolent in its tone, so arbitrary and absurd in its exactions, enables us to measure the distance between the 16th and 19th century. Yet I am fully persuaded that to those who may be living 50 years hence, many of the restrictions which now fetter the commerce of this country, will appear little less absurd than this law about the hackney coaches appears to us. I must beg leave to offer you one specimen more of this vexatious Parliamentary interference with the trading concerns of the community. In 1363, an Act of Parliament was passed, from which the following are quotations. The preamble sets forth 'the extravagant and excessive apparel of several sorts of people beyond their estate and degree, to the destruction and impoverishment of all the land.' And then it prescribes the food and dress of different classes of the people. It enacted, that 'men-servants of lords, as also of tradesmen and artisans, shall be content with one meal of fish or flesh every day; and the other meals daily shall be of milk, cheese, butter, and the like. And the cloth they wear shall not exceed the price of two marks for the whole piece; neither shall they use any ornaments of gold, silver, silk, or embroidery; nor their wives and daughters any veils above the value of twelve-pence.'

"Further, 'Artisans and yeomen shall not wear cloth above the value of forty shillings the whole piece' (our finest cloth was then worth about six pounds per piece), 'nor the ornaments before named. Nor their women any veils of silk, but only those of thread made in England.'

"Ploughmen, carters, shepherds, and such like, not having 40s. value in goods or chattels, shall wear no sort of cloth, but blanket or russet lawn of twelve-pence, and shall wear girdles or belts; and they shall only eat and drink suitable to their stations. And whoever wears other apparel than is prescribed by the above laws, shall forfeit the same.'

"Lastly: 'Clothiers shall make suitable quantities of cloth of all the before-named prices; and mercers and shopkeepers in towns and cities shall keep due sortments thereof, so that these laws may be duly observed.'

"But the best specimen I have met with of restrictions on our inland trade, in the olden time, is that imposed by Henry III., in 1245. He proclaimed a fair to be held in Westminster, on which occasion he ordered that all the traders of London should shut up their shops, and carry their goods to be sold at the fair, and that all other fairs throughout England should be suspended during the 15 days it was appointed to last. The King's object, no doubt, was to obtain a supply of money from the tolls and other dues of the market. What made this interference to be felt as a greater hardship was, that the weather all the time of the fair happened to be exceedingly bad, so that not only the goods were spoiled, exposed to the rain as they were in tents covered only with cloth, and that probably imperfectly enough; but (the historian tells us) the dealers themselves, who were obliged to eat their victuals with their feet in the mud, and the wind and wet about their ears, suffered intolerably. Four years afterward the king repeated the same piece of tyranny, and was again seconded by the elements in a similar fashion. This time, too, scarcely any buyers came to the fair; so that it is no wonder the unfortunate merchants were loud in expressing their dissatisfaction.

"Now this is a picture of monopoly, worthy, I think, to engage the inimitable pencil even of Punch himself; and yet, absurd and unjust as this great Westminster market seems to us of the present day, do we not see combined in it all the elements of the larger monopolies of subsequent times? As King Henry III. caused this fair to be proclaimed that he might raise money for his own use, just so the land-holding legislators framed and supported the Corn Laws and other restrictive edicts to put money into their own pockets. As the King ordered all the shops to be closed in London, and all fairs to be suspended throughout England during the 15 days of his Westminster market, just so legislators of after times would not allow English manufactures to be purchased except at certain 'staple towns,' which they chose to fix on. The miserable condition of the dealers themselves, exposed to the wind and rain with their feet in the mud for 15 days, and the absence of customers, may serve to represent the depression, and the physical sufferings produced by monopoly in all ages. And, lastly, as the merchants and shopkeepers of London and Westminster 'were loud in expressing their dissatisfaction' at this vexatious interference with their commercial transactions, so (as I shall by and-by show you) restrictions on a larger scale have repeatedly set nations at war.

WARS HAVE GROWN OUT OF COMMERCIAL RESTRICTIONS.

"I shall now point you to some facts to prove how, on the other hand, monopoly leads to contention, plunder, and bloodshed. In 1429, the Court of Denmark, for their own private advantage, prohibited the resort of foreign ships to fish on the coasts of Iceland; and required that they should, instead, come to Bergen, in Norway, and nowhere else, and there buy fish from the Norwegians, at their own price. The ship-owners of London, Bristol, Hull, and other places, refusing to comply with such an unreasonable demand, resorted, as formerly, to the coast of Iceland, for the fishery of cod and ling. The consequence was, that contentions frequently took place between the crews of the English and Danish ships, and damage to such an extent ensued, that an Act of Parliament was passed, in the reign of Henry VI., for the purpose of obtaining redress for the extensive plunder that had been committed, and prohibiting any Danish subjects from coming to this country to trade, until restitution was obtained. Similar contentions continued in later times to be produced by the same cause.

"As the next illustration of the tendency of monopoly, I refer to the atrocious massacre at Amboyna, in 1623. Amboyna is one of the Molucca or Spice Islands, in the eastern seas. In 1521 this island was taken possession of by the Portuguese, who practised on the natives every species of tyranny and cruelty. At the commencement of the 17th century, the Spice Islands were taken from the Portuguese by the Dutch. The natives, however, experienced very little better treatment from the Dutch than they had done from their former oppressors. Hence the inhabitants of Amboyna were continually in arms, and the country became the constant scene of strife and desolation. At a very early period after its first formation, the English East India Company endeavoured to appropriate to itself a share of the Spice trade. In 1612, the Company formed a settlement at Cambello, in this island, from which the settlers were forced to retire in June, 1614. An attempt was made to accommodate the dispute between the English company and the Dutch, relative to the right of trading with the Spice Islands, and a treaty for this purpose was concluded in London, in July, 1619. But so many disputes occurred in executing the provisions of this treaty, that the grounds of contention appear to have been multiplied, rather than reduced, and at length reached such a point, that, under the accusation of conspiring to surprise the garrison and expel the Dutch from the island, Captain Towerson, and nine Englishmen, with nine Japanese and a Portuguese sailor, were seized at Amboyna, tried, pronounced guilty, and executed. This event, known as the 'Massacre of Amboyna,' excited the greatest indignation in England, and became the subject of the most formal remonstrances on the part of the British Government.

"During the war with Holland, in 1796, Amboyna was captured by a British force under Admiral Raineir. It was restored at the peace in 1801, was taken again by the English in 1801, and was again given up to Holland, at the treaty of Paris, in 1814.

"And what was it that led to all this contention and bloodshed? It was in one word, monopoly. The main object of the different European powers, who endeavoured to possess themselves of Amboyna, was to monopolise the trade in cloves, the cultivation of which spice forms the principal object of industry with the natives. With the desire of keeping the cultivation of the clove-tree completely within their own power, the Dutch caused it to be extirpated from every island, with the exception of Amboyna, where they provided for a sufficient production of the spice, by compelling every native family to rear a certain number of clove-trees. In the prosecution of their plans the island was divided into 4090 allotments, each one of which was expected to support 125 trees; and a law was passed in 1792, rendering it compulsory upon the natives to make up the full complement. Such are the 'tender mercies' of monopoly! According to this statement, the number of trees upon the island amounted to 509,000, the average produce of which exceeded one million of pounds of cloves annually.

"The next evidence I shall adduce to show that monopoly leads to war, is the famous Navigation Act, framed and passed for the purpose of monopolising all the carrying trade of Great Britain. The foundation of this Act was laid during the protectorate, and the system was perfected by the 12th of Charles II. This Act provided that no merchandise of either Asia, Africa, or America, should be imported into Great Britain in any but English-built ships, navigated by an English commander, and having at least three-fourths of their crew English. The system now described continued to be steadily and pertinaciously maintained during more than 160 years, and was looked upon as a monument of wisdom and prudence, to which was mainly attributable the degree of commercial greatness to which we had attained.

"But Adam Smith very justly says, 'The Act of Navigation is not favourable to foreign commerce, or to the growth of that opulence that can arise from it. The interest of a nation in its commercial relations to foreign nations is, like that of a merchant with regard to the different people with whom he deals, to buy as cheap and to sell as dear as possible. But it will be most likely to buy cheap, when by the most perfect freedom of trade, it encourages all nations to bring to it the goods which it has occasion to purchase; and, for the same reason, it will be most likely to sell dear, when its markets are thus filled with the greatest number of buyers.'

"But what was the effect of this monopolising Navigation Act? One of its first consequences was undoubtedly the war with Holland, which broke out the year after it was passed. It is admitted also by a writer who ranks amongst the most zealous eulogists of this Act, that it 'occasioned at first loud complaints that, though our people had not shipping enough to import from all parts whatever they wanted, they were, nevertheless, by this law, debarred receiving due supplies of merchandise from other nations, who only could, and till then did, import them.' In reference to the war occasioned by the Navigation Act, the same writer (Anderson) says, 'In the year 1652 and the following year almost incredible destruction and captures were made of merchant ships, as well as of ships of war and sailors, on both sides; there having been, in only nine months of the year 1652, four general naval engagements, besides lesser ones.' And all this is to be laid to the charge of monopoly!

"I have next to refer to Mr. Colbert's famous tariff of 1667, by which the importation of all manufactures into France was prohibited. Upon this, the Dutch immediately retaliated by prohibiting the wines, brandies, and other productions of France. This commercial warfare produced open hostilities in 1672, and a war that lasted six years. All this, likewise, is to be placed to the account of monopoly!

"I may next refer to the war with Spain commenced in 1739, as another illustration of the 'tender mercies' of monopoly. The English merchants claimed the right of cutting logwood on the shores of the bay of Campeachy, in Mexico: But the Spaniards wished to monopolise this power, and resolved to annihilate the claims of the English. Great cruelties were inflicted on the crews of many of the English merchant ships, some of whom were seized and sent to dig in the mines of Potosi. Loud complaints were made by the English merchants to the House of Commons. The consequence was, that this matter of cutting logwood in the bay of Campeachy, which, as Goldsmith says, 'was considered as an object of too little importance to make a separate article in any negotiation,' finally led to a war which lasted nine years and cost us nearly fifty-four millions of money! This, again, is to be placed to the account of monopoly!

"Thus, how small a matter often leads to war! And it was an equally small matter which led to the war between this country and France, which immediately followed that between England and Spain. In reference to that war, a celebrated French historian says, 'France lost in the course of this fatal war, the flower of her youth, more than half the current coin which circulated in the kingdom, her fleet, her commerce, and her credit. It was believed (he continues), that it would have been easy to have prevented so many misfortunes, by accommodating matters with England for a small disputed territory, in the neighbourhood of Canada; but some ambitious persons, to gain importance, and render themselves necessary, precipitated France into this fatal war. The same thing happened in 1741, when the vanity of two or three people was sufficient to spread desolation through Europe.'

"We see another illustration of the blighting and hostile influence of commercial restrictions, in Napoleon's Berlin Decrees, whereby he declared all the ports of Great Britain in a state of blockade, and forbade all trading with us, or in the articles of our produce and manufactures. This led the English Government to adopt measures of retaliation, which, as Porter says, 'proved directly and immediately injurious to our trade, in a greater degree than all the efforts of the enemy would probably have succeeded in accomplishing.' And many who now hear me can well remember the mischief and misery occasioned by these retaliatory measures.

"I might also refer to the American revolutionary war, as having been likewise occasioned mainly by monopoly. 'Whoever,' says the celebrated Daniel Webster, of America—'whoever has looked deeply into the causes which produced our revolution, has found, if I mistake not, the original principle far back, in this claim, on the part of England to monopolise our trade, and a continued effort on the part of the colonies to resist or evade that monopoly.' And what were the consequences of that war to this country? It involved us in a debt of more than a hundred millions sterling, lost us the colonies altogether, and excited in them a hostile spirit fraught with evils, which have been ever since and will long continue to be felt."

THE HORRORS OF WAR.

"The expense of war is only one item, and a comparatively small one in the great account. The next item, and it is a larger one, is the amount of suffering produced by it. War is necessarily associated with suffering. Read the accounts just received from India, of forced marches immediately followed by fierce and protracted engagements, and then attempt to picture to yourselves the field of battle, with the 4000 killed and wounded men on the one side, and probably an equal or a larger number on the other. Bring home to yourselves only a single instance from that awful and uncounted aggregate of horrors, and how can you be unmoved by it! 'Death, come when and where it may, be it on the bed of down, or on the supporting bosom of affection—is a solemn visitation. The agonies and shudderings of nature proclaim it to be the great trial-hour of human destiny. But that hour—in the hot assault, or amidst the lingering agonies of the battle field, or where the groans of the crowded hospital are its harbingers—how does it come? No pillow of down, no supporting arms are there to receive the victim; no kind voice speaks to him; no noiseless step of affection approaches, nor looks of love hang over him, like a pitying angel's countenance; but he goes down—man as he is, with all a man's sensibility, it may be with all a man's ties to earthly home and love—he goes down amidst groans and execrations, and horrors darker than the shadow of death that is passing over him. This is but one death, such as war visits upon the human race; and yet it would not be in human nature actually to witness one such instance, without the most agonising desire to afford relief. But now, what facts are these which the history of war unfolds to us? The single campaign of Buonaparte in Russia carried death, and such death!—not to one thousand, nor to five thousand, nor to fifty thousand, but to five hundred thousand human beings. Alexander and Cæsar, it is computed, caused, each of them, the death of two millions of the human race; and the wars of Napoleon bring up the whole number of victims sacrificed to the ambition of three men, to six millions! Six millions of human beings! The aged, the young, the manly and strong, the fair and lovely, the imploring mother, the innocent child—and death, death to each one, without discrimination and without mercy! Six millions of human beings, sacrificed to but three ministers in the dark kingdom of war! But this is only an item, a single passage in the history of its fearful dominion. There have been in Christendom, since the reign of Constantine, nearly three hundred wars. What a mass of calamities, of rapine and violence, of crime and misery, is included within the brief description of these three wars, three hundred wars—what waste of the treasures of nations, what woe in the abodes of millions, it passes all human power to calculate! But all this, nevertheless, has been experienced, though it cannot be calculated or imagined. Human hearts have felt it all. Not one drop of this ocean of ills but has fallen, a burning drop, upon nerves and fibres that have quivered with agony at its touch."

"One who was an eye-witness to the horrors of the sacking of Moscow, in 1812, says, 'On one side, we saw a son carrying a sick father; on the other, women, who poured the torrent of their tears on the infants whom they clasped in their arms. Old men, overwhelmed by grief still more than by years, weeping for the ruin of their country, lay down to die, near the houses where they were born. No respect was paid to the nobility of blood, to the innocence of youth, or to the tears of beauty.' The late Sir Charles Bell saw the wounded in the hospitals after the battle of Waterloo, and he says, 'It is impossible to conceive of their sufferings. Turn which way I might, I encountered every form of entreaty from those whose condition left no need of words to stir compassion. I know not,' he continues, 'what notions my fellow-countrymen have of 30,000 wounded men thrown into a town and its vicinity. They still their compassionate emotions by subscriptions; but what avails this to those who would exchange gold for a bit of rag to bind up their smarting wounds. My heart sickens at the contemplation," he says in conclusion, "and I am obliged to turn away from this picture of human misery caused by pride, ambition, a love of military glory, and the folly of mankind, in paying adoration to their destroyers. Would not angels weep at such a scene as this? But is this all? Ah! no! Each of these dead or wounded soldiers had a mother, who had watched over his cradle, and had attended him in his sickness, and shed over him the tears of maternal solicitude. Many had wives and lovers, to whom they were dearer than the light of the sun; many had children, who had looked to them for support and protection. We may rationally suppose, that for every man who was killed or wounded in this deadly conflict, the hearts of at least ten persons—parents, wives, children, brothers and sisters, were lacerated. Oh, what hecatombs of sacrifices on the bloody altar of Moloch! How long, heads, 'will mankind continue to be accessory to such crimes, by bestowing praises upon their perpetrators? How long will it be, ere every human being will deem it his imperious and solemn duty to disseminate the principles of peace, and extend her empire?"

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Crediton, Tuesday, April 21st, 1846.

SIR,—If any proof were wanting of the perfect indifference with which the agriculturists in this part of the kingdom regard the effect which a repeal of the abominable Corn Laws will have on the value of land (however they may in their after-dinner speeches at agricultural meetings and elsewhere pretend to regard it), the following fact will supply such proof.

On Thursday last, the 16th instant, an auction was held by Mr. Thomas Hussey, auctioneer, at the Ship Hotel, in this town, for selling the fee of a small estate in this parish, about one mile and a half from the town, belonging to John Pidsley, Esq., called Yew, otherwise Yew, containing 90 acres of land, now rented as an overland by Mr. Philip Francis (who lives on a small estate of his own, called Moore, adjoining Yew estate) at the yearly rent of 140*l.*, and whose term therein will expire at Ladyday, 1848, at which time he will have held the estate for two terms, one of 14 and the other of 10 years, which, after a smart competition, was knocked down to Mr. Francis, the occupier, at the sum of 5520*l.*, being but a fraction less than 39½ years value at the present rent of the farm.

It must be observed that scarcely any improvement can be effected on this property. Mr. Francis, who is an excellent practical farmer, and for many years following a successful competitor for prizes for sheep at the Devon Agricultural Cattle Shows, held in the Castle Yard, at Exeter, having, during his tenancy, got the estate into a high state of cultivation, as has been, without hesitation, admitted by all who looked at the property with a view to purchase, previous to the day of sale. I am, Sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. E.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—In addition to the observations made in your paper of the 11th inst., regarding both the benefit to the agriculturist and the country to be derived from the culture of flax, it may be stated, that land in the limestone districts of Yorkshire, not found to be worth more than 6*s.* per acre to rent, has, since the discovery has been made of the beneficial culture of flax, acquired a value of 15*s.* and 20*s.* per acre, entirely owing to the benefits derived from the culture of this article, it having been found the best preparation for a wheat crop succeeding bountifully afterwards, and that the stimulus has been so great, as for even limestone lands, perhaps scarcely three inches depth of soil, producing 25 or 30 bushels of wheat per acre.

As it has been remarked, flax or line is not an exhausting crop, as during its growth it covers and smothers the land, as well as fertilises in a superior manner to any other system of management, even far superior to the benefits of a summer fallow; but as to the crop itself, the best management, preparing it for such culture, is giving to the land from one-third to half a ton of rape-cake, broken into nuts, or ground into dust, to the acre, and from which as bountiful crops of wheat have been produced as from the best clay soils in certain limestone districts in Yorkshire, alternately bearing a crop of flax, wheat, and seeds, the latter one year mown and a second year entirely for sheep pasture; that system has substituted in a great measure the necessity of using rape-seeds or dust for the next rotation of crops.

FREE TRADE MEETING IN PARIS.—From fifty to sixty of the principal representatives of the industrial interests of Paris met on the evening of Tuesday, the 14th, in the Casino des familles, Custom-House Street, (rue de la Douane), to be present at a conference on Free Trade, in which MM. Louis Leclerc, D. Polonié, Frédéric Bastiat, Alcide Ponteyraud, Joseph Garnier, and Pepin, gave utterance to their sentiments. The details and illustrations into which these different speakers entered were listened to, for nearly three hours, with the most lively interest. Before separating, the meeting unanimously adopted the following resolution: "This meeting approves the formation of a Free Trade Association, and resolves to give thereto its cordial adherence and support." At the request of the greater part of the members of this assembly, a new conference will be held in a few days, at which a greater number of the producers of Paris will be called together. This first attempt at a meeting (in front of the Custom House!) augurs well; and, besides, the question is everywhere becoming the order of the day. The Agricultural Club of the Rue de Beaume, frequented by the greatest proprietors of France, has likewise expressed a wish to hear from M. Blanqui an account of the struggles of the League, and its great champion Mr. Cobden. —Journal des Economistes, Paris, April, 1846.

SMUGGLERS.—A gentleman once asked the celebrated Abernethy if he thought that the moderate use of snuff would injure the brain? "No, Sir," was Abernethy's prompt reply, "for no man with a single ounce of brains would ever think of taking snuff!"

A Chester contemporary complains that England should be "daily and hourly bearded by a shillingleague ragabond, whom the same circumstances has made the President of the United States. This is outdoing Jonathan at his own weapons."

CORN LAWS OF ATHENS AND ROME.

ATHENS.

Attica is a promontory about fifty-four miles in length, and with an area of only seven hundred square miles, equal to a moderate-sized English county. Its surface is mountainous and rocky, but it is situate in the neighbourhood of more fruitful regions. In the well-known introduction to his history, Thucydides states that Thessaly, Boeotia, and the chief part of the Peloponnese were fertile; but that Attica was an unproductive district, on account of the scantiness of its soil. Owing to the remarkable intelligence and practical energy of the Athenians, and the excellence of their political institutions as compared with those of other Greek communities, their numbers and wealth increased and became great, notwithstanding the barrenness of their territory. In the prosperous times of Attica the population was about 520,000, of whom not less than 400,000 were slaves; which gives an average of about 700 inhabitants to a square mile. The population, however, was not equally diffused over the entire country, but a large part of it was collected in Athens, which, with its appendages, Piræus, Munychia, and Phalerum, must have contained nearly 200,000 inhabitants.

In comparing the food of an ancient with that of a modern nation, it must not be forgotten how many articles, now in general consumption, were then unknown; bread, meat, fish, cheese, with some of the commoner garden vegetables; wine, milk, and honey, formed nearly the whole range of their diet, both solid and liquid. Tea, coffee, cocoa, sugar, spices, spirits, beer, butter, rice, potatoes, and oranges, as well as tobacco, were not consumed in ancient Greece or in Italy. From a very early time wheat and barley were the two sorts of grain used by the Greeks for food, as well as by the inhabitants of Palestine; oats and rye were not cultivated. The Athenians claimed the honour of having first made wheaten bread, and taught the use of it to mankind;—a topic derived from their mythological story, on which their eulogists were fond of dwelling; and in the historical age, the common or household bread of Athens was considered by gourmands as the best which was made in Greece. The staple article of food for the large population of Attica, and particularly for the slaves, who formed nearly four-fifths of the whole, was wheaten bread. The annual consumption of corn probably amounted to about 2,800,000, or 3,000,000 medimni, (556,638 quarters); and we learn from Demosthenes, who appeals to the official record, that of this quantity about 800,000 medimni (184,147 quarters) were imported by sea from foreign countries,—one-half of the imports being obtained from the Black Sea. Strabo informs us that the Tauric Chersonese, now the Crimea, was the district on the Black Sea, which supplied this corn; the flat part of this peninsula was, he states, exceedingly fertile in grain, yielding a return of as much as 30 to 1, and was inhabited by a more civilised race than the Nomads of the neighbouring region. Pericles, in his funeral oration in Thucydides, extolling the power of Athens, says, that on account of its greatness and wealth all things were imported into it from all countries; and Demosthenes affirms that no other nation in the world consumed so large a proportion of imported corn as the Athenians.

ROME.

In the first place, it may be observed, that the Roman Corn Law was, in fact, a Poor Law. The existence of slavery seems to render a poor law both unnecessary and impracticable; unnecessary, because the working classes are slaves, and therefore maintained by their masters; impracticable, because an inducement is afforded by it to emancipate old and unserviceable slaves, in order to entitle them to public relief. The number of needy freemen at Rome was, however, sufficient to render them dangerous to the Government, and to create a necessity for appeasing them by donations of food. Notwithstanding the existence of slavery in the ancient Republics, there was always a large body of indigent citizens—a wretched and hungry populace, as Cicero calls it—who exercised a most important influence upon the character and administration of the Government. Every reader of Aristotle's "Politics" knows, that all his characteristics of democracy are founded upon the preponderance and supposed interests of the poorer section of the citizens. This class existed in Rome, as in other less powerful commonwealths. Philip, during his tribuneship in the year 105 B.C., said that there were not 2000 men of property in the state. From its first introduction, therefore, the system of free gifts of corn increased rapidly. The feeling which led to its extension is illustrated by an anecdote of Piso, surnamed Frugi (the honest), who had always spoken against the Corn Law of C. Gracchus. After the law had passed, Gracchus, seeing him standing among those who had come to receive their allowance, reproached him for his inconsistency. Piso's answer was, that he should not wish his own property to be divided amongst the citizens; but if it were so divided, he should claim his share. The system of corn distributions was reprobated by Cicero, on account of its tendency to destroy industry; and of its large drains upon the treasury. Both Cæsar and Augustus diminished the number of the recipients of the public corn; but the improvident system, which they could not eradicate, was naturally continued by their successors. With respect to the emancipation of slaves, in order to entitle them to receive the public corn, it seems that the existence of a permanent list, and the examination which took place before a new name was admitted upon it, afforded a sufficient security against this abuse. We read, however, that many manumissions were made for the sake of extraordinary largesses of Pompey and Augustus.

Not only was the Roman Corn Law in fact a poor law, but it was a partial poor law. It was confined to the city of Rome. The distributions of corn were made only to the indigent freemen of the capital. Italy at large derived no benefit from them. Sicily is called by ancient writers (as we have already remarked) the granary, not of Italy, but of Rome. This restriction of the public bounty tended to give a disproportionate size to the capital, and to attract to it a worthless and needy multitude from all parts of Italy and the empire.

Above all, it was a poor law derived, not from local funds, or even from a taxation common to the empire at large, but from the tribute of the provinces. The corn was not purchased from the proceeds of a tax levied on Rome or Italy: it was not a poor law in which the wealthier inhabitants of a district contributed from their surplus means to the maintenance of their poor neighbours. It was a poor law in which the populace of the conquering city were maintained at the expense of the conquered cities. It was as if several hundred thousand of the poorer classes of Paris had, during the government of Napoleon, been supported by taxes levied in Italy or Germany; as if the populace of Madrid had, in the sixteenth century, been fed at the cost of Flanders and the Indies; or as if the paupers of Vienna were maintained by a poor rate collected in Lombardy. This poor law, therefore, had neither, on the one hand, the spirit of charity, nor, on the other, the safeguards against abuse which belong to such a poor law as that which exists in Great Britain. It was a contribution wrung from the weak by the strong; not an assistance given voluntarily by the richer to the poorer classes. Being a tribute exacted by the dominant part of the empire, and being used for the purpose of appeasing the hungry population of Rome, it grew rapidly, and there was little inducement for those who administered it to check its increase."—Edinburgh Review.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

WILLS, Appellant; ADY, Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL: There was a case which stood over among the appeals, the only one remaining, that of the borough of New Saum. It is a case which turns upon the very same points as the former case from Dartmouth, Knowles v. Brooking (given in the Number of THE LEAGUE for April 18th), in which the Court gave their judgment. We can see no difference between them. My brother Maule wishes me to say that he still retains his opinion and the view he took of that case, but the majority of the Court decide that the same judgment must be given for the respondent.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Paulton, Esq., Samuel Harrison, Esq.,
Richard Potter, Esq., Dr. James Carlisle,
William T. Levers, Esq., John Gadsby, Esq.,
William Wilson, Esq., R. Hall, Esq., Cambridge,
R. G. Welby, Esq., Richard Harriet, Esq.,
Sidney Smith, Esq., J. Blanton, Esq.,
Charles Swaisland, Esq., Grayford.

TRUSTEES.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Barbican-terrace, Islington.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place,
Captain Cogan, Upper Mill, Hammondsmit.

BANKERS.
Messrs. F. T. Scott, Grote, & Co.
SOLICITOR.
Josh. Ivimey, 17, 25, Chancery-lane.

SECRETARY.
Mr. Frederick Farrand, Priory Villa, Parkham.

Prospectuses may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Offices, East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street. The Rules (6d. each) are now ready, and may be had as above. Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately. The Society's Offices will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.

The Second Subscription is now called for, and will be paid on Tuesday, May 5th, up to which time parties wishing to join the Society may take up Shares without additional entrance fees. Attendance at the Society's Rooms (East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street), for the purpose of enrolling new members, on Tuesday, the 25th April, and Friday, the 1st May, from 6 to 9 o'clock in the evening. The First Meeting for the sale of Shares will be held on Tuesday, the 12th May, at 7 o'clock in the evening.

TO COUNTRY SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person forwarding 3*s.* 3*d.* by Post-office order to the Publisher, 67, Fleet-street, London, will have one quarter's copies of the LEAGUE forwarded by post on the days of publication. Subscriptions for the paper may also be left with J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, Manchester; and the LEAGUE may be had by order of any news-agent in town or country. Subscribers who receive coloured envelopes on their papers must bear in mind that their subscriptions are due.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, April 25, 1846.

We live in strange times. Lord G. Bentinck denounces gambling, and Mr. D'Israeli preaches up consistency. There would be a perfect trio if Ikey Solomons distinguished himself as an advocate of honesty. The petty impertinence, the vulgar taunts, and the malignant sarcasms with which Sir Robert Peel is assailed by the champions of protection, are so utterly contemptible in themselves, and so thoroughly naked in their motive, that they have become not merely offensive, but disgusting. Such splenetic effusions of mortified vanity and disappointed ambition are, however, not unacceptable as evidences that a bad cause always prompts bad advocacy. Lord George Bentinck has had large opportunities for studying the pernicious nature of gambling; and there are probably few legislators who could better explain the niceties of that ornithological operation, denominated "pigeon-plucking." The turf is an admirable school for efficient training in gambling morality; and as his lordship is said not to be wholly destitute of abilities, we may believe that he has profited by that course of education which has the stable for its school, and the race-course for its university. He may have obtained no honours in Cambridge, but we question not his title to the rank of senior wrangler at Newmarket. We are, however, a little surprised to find him reproaching the Premier with the encouragement of gambling. It is sufficiently notorious that the only legislative measure with which his lordship's name is associated was one intended to protect illegal gamblers against the consequences of their violation of public law. We thought then, as we think now, that the Minister and the Parliament earned no honour for themselves by shielding aristocratic delinquency from the penal consequences of immoral and illegal practices. We believe, that had the qui tam actions been permitted to proceed, there would have been startling revelations of systematic frauds, so gross, that indelible disgrace would have been attached to practices which still endure, because they remain unexposed. We are, of course, bound to believe that Lord George Bentinck knows nothing of such practices, and that the holy horror of gambling to which he gave utterance, when assailing the Premier, is a conscientious atonement for the shelter he afforded to the delinquents of the turf. As we are bound to believe this, of course we must believe it; but we confess that the demand on our credulity is a little excessive.

The course adopted by Mr. D'Israeli is purely a matter of taste. Spite and malevolence are incidental to literary humanity as well as to the other forms of social existence; but we doubt the expediency of yoking intellectual strength to moral weakness; we question the utility of presenting the worst motives in the best language. Sarcastic bitterness is a very different thing from senatorial wisdom; it is the sting of the wasp instead of the grasp of the eagle. Mr. D'Israeli has been misled by his historical precedents. It is only in despotic countries that Ministers are overthrown by epigrams. Sir Robert Walpole was never in the slightest degree endangered by the quips and cranks of Bolingbroke, who, in our estimation was a greater master of sarcasm than the author of Vivian Grey himself, formidable as that gentleman may be in his own estimation. Parliamentary wasps should remember that the pain of the sting is, after all, but of brief duration; and that it does sometimes happen that these annoying insects leave their life in the wound.

The feeling with which these petty peevish personalities inspire men of plain sense and independent character was admirably stated by Mr. Bright in a speech, which we quote entire, as a specimen of manly sense and sturdy English spirit:

Mr. BRIGHT said it might be as well to remind honourable members opposite that her Majesty's Government did not intend to stop any railway companies which might choose to proceed with their bills. The noble member for Lynn (Lord G. Bentinck) had taken a most unjust and ungenerous course in laying all the distress resulting from railway speculation at the door of the ministry. Time was when the noble lord was as loud as any in the praise of the present Government, and it was only when they formed their determination to lend themselves no longer to any system to keep up the price of food that the noble lord discovered they were not worthy of his confidence (hear, hear). The great cause of railway speculation was the restriction which existed on trade. Through the operation of that restriction they had years of depression succeeded by years of excitement, when men who had carried on business with little or no profit, following as they thought the advice of the old adage, to make their hay while the sun shone, were seized with a rash and almost insane desire to obtain in one year that amount of profit which under ordinary circumstances would be spread over two or three years. After those resolutions had been passed, the investments of capital and the state of the markets would be much more steady. They would be no longer prostrate on the earth one year and elevated to the clouds another. The fluctuations which had such an injurious effect, had arisen from the interference of the house with the trade of the country, and he firmly believed they would exist no longer after the measures of Government had been carried. As to the accusations of the noble lord (Lord George Bentinck) against her Majesty's Government for having encouraged gambling speculations, he (Mr. Bright) thought the noble lord should be the very last person in that house to make such a charge. When he (Mr. Bright) first took his seat in that house, he found the noble lord, night after night, attending in his place for the purpose of watching over a bill to defend persons who had been engaged in mad speculation, and who had been implicated in very dangerous gambling, contrary to the spirit and the letter of the law (hear, hear). He thought if the noble lord were to look back and reflect a little, he would see he was the very last man in that house to set himself up as a grave authority in matters connected with speculation and gambling (hear, hear.)

THE PROTECTIONISTS AND THE CHURCH.—At a numerously attended meeting of the ratepayers of the parish of Northfleet, Kent, on Easter Monday, the proposition of the vicar, "That it is expedient to enlarge the accommodation of the church," and proposing a rate for that purpose, was negatived by a large majority; the meeting, which consisted chiefly of supporters of "agricultural protection," being of opinion, that they were already sufficiently taxed for the support of the church; and now that the Government proposed to remove from them all protection, and at the same time relieve them of some of their "peculiar burthens," they could not by any means consent to lay any additional burthens on their land, for church support or church extension.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—This admirable institution has been visited during the week by perfect mobs of the Easter sight-seers. There was something to suit all tastes; and amongst those which seemed to excite more extraordinary attention were the portraits of the distinguished leaders of the Sikhs, together with several of our own gallant officers, who by their talents and courage have left an undying name. The "Dissolving Views" excited nearly as much attention as the last-named pictures, as they consist of many views in the Oregon territory. This series of views is well worthy of public patronage. They are taken from sketches, made on the spot by a gentleman, who resided there for nine years, and they convey a much better notion of the appearance of the country than can be understood by reading, or by the generality of engravings. Besides these, there were lectures on Chemistry, by Dr. Ryan, and on Natural Philosophy, by Dr. Bachofner. Both gentlemen deserve great commendation for the able and pleasing manner with which they illustrate and deliver the discourse. The Swing Bell and the Diver are among the wonders of the place, and excited particular attention; more particularly the Diver, who exhibits various evolutions in the water, both above and below; more especially one in which he proved the advantages to be derived by using Wilson's patent coat, as it is quite capable of keeping three persons afloat at the same time, and does not alter the appearance of the garment. The music, conducted by Dr. Wallis, is one of the most pleasing features of the establishment; for while it pleases the ear, it gives an agreeable finish and zest to the whole. Another machine is also deserving of notice; it is for the purpose of cutting envelopes for letters, which is done with extraordinary rapidity, precision, and power. The museum is now arranged with great taste, and with a proper knowledge of what science requires, and the public are entitled to, by those who have the management. We therefore must do justice to the extraordinary exertions of the secretary, Mr. Longbottom, who devotes his whole time and abilities to carry out this truly national task, which hitherto by him has been so ably done.

THE FUNDS.

	SAT. April 18	MON. April 20	TUES. April 21	WED. April 22	THUR. April 23	FRI. April 24
Bank Stock	205½	204½	205½	205½	205½	..
5 per Ct. Red. Ann. ..	94½	95	94½	94½	95	95½
3 per Ct. Con. Ann. ..	95½	95½	95½	95	96½	96½
3 per Ct. Red. Ann. ..	96½	96½	96½	96½	97	97½
Long. An. Ex. 1860 ..	103.16	103	103.16	103.16	103.16	..
Cons. for Acct.	96½	96	96	96½	96½	96½
Exc. Bills, pm.	25	26.22	25.22	25	25.26	..
Ind. Bds. em. 1000 ..	25	26.30	..	28	30.27	..
Venezuela 2 per Ct.	42
Do. deferred	13
Belgian 4½ per Ct.	98½
Brazilian 5 per Ct.	82
Cullian
Columb. ex. Venez.
Danish	87
Dutch 2½ per Cent. ..	59	59½	59½	..	59½	59½
Dutch 4 per Cent.	92½	92½	92½	92½	92½	..
Mexican	31½	31½	..	31½	31½
Peruvian	36
Portug. conv.	58	57½	57½	57	..
Russian 5 per Cent. ..	110	..	110½
Spanish 5 per Ct.	25½	25½	..	25½	25½
Do. 3 per Ct. ex. dv. ..	36½	36½	36½	..	37	36½

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, April 20.—The show of English Wheat is again moderate to-day; the quality of most of it is inferior, and the trade slow, but about 1s. advance is obtained from the prices of this day week. There is another large arrival of Foreign Wheat; without any extensive transactions taking place. The maiting season is nearly over; the consequence is, that though there is by no means a liberal supply of Barley to-day, all, except the very finest description of Chevalier, are 1s. cheaper than this day week. Oats come forward very sparingly, both from Ireland and this country; there has been a large business done to-day at fully 1s. over the prices of last Monday. Beans and Peas continue the same as last week. S. H. LUCAS.

BRITISH.

	Per Imperial Quarter
Wheat, Essex,	Red 54 to 60 White 58 to 66
Kent, & Suffolk	49 58 56 63
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire ..	47 54 54 62
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed ..	23 25
Ditto	23 6 26
Ditto	23 6 26
Scotch Feed	26 27 Potato 28 29
Limerick	25 26
Ditto	25 26
Cork	24 25
Waterford, Young's, & Cork Black ..	23 24
Siligo
Galway	19 21
Barley	26 33
Beans, Mazagan	51 53
Harrow	33 37
Small	39 40
Peas, White	38 42
Grey	30.32 Maple 32 34
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs. 45 56
Norfolk and Suffolk	43 46

FOREIGN.

	Per Imperial Quarter	IN POND.
Wheat, Danzig, high mixed	54 to 66 54 60	..
Ro-took	56 60 50 54	..
Statia	52 58 50 54	..
Hamburg	52 57 50 52	..
Odesa	48 50	..
Russian Polish	50 51	..
Ditto
Spanish	54 60	..
Manilla	56 62	..
Australia	60 68	..
Barley, Grinding	27 28	..
Distilling	30 31	..
Oats, Archangel	25 26	..
Danish	23 24	..
Swedish	23 24	..
Stralsund	23 24	..
Dutch Feed	22 23 20 21	..
Brew	27 29 23 24	..
Poland	25 26	..
Black
Beans, Egyptian	34 36	..
Peas, White
Ditto Boilers	42	..
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 166 lbs. ..	34 36	..
United States	30 37 28 30	..
Danzig
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from April 15 to April 18, 1846, both days inclusive.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	7890	4355	351	150	254
Scotch	50	350
Irish	1657
Foreign	22032	..	7755	2450	680

Flour, 3805 sacks; 2800 barrels.
FRIDAY, APRIL 21.—We have again to report a liberal supply of foreign Wheat, which is of course being landed in bond. Small quantities are imported by messrs. on contract. There is very little English Wheat offered; and the only substantial Barley, Beans, and Peas are purchased for immediate consumption. There are fair arrivals of English and Foreign Oats; but of Irish, the quantity cannot be held in not so large. There has been a moderate sale today, at very moderate prices; but no further advance can be established. S. H. LUCAS.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 17th of April to the 24th of April, both inclusive.

	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	4650	..	18120
Barley	5910
Oats	7200	6020	4000

Flour, 4570 sacks.
LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending April 21, 1846.
Wheat .. 5674 58s. 2d. Rye .. 172 34s. 4d.
Barley .. 2808 54s. 10d. Beans .. 1017 34s. 1d.
Oats .. 19446 24s. 6d. Peas .. 325 35s. 3d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Mar. 5, 1846.
Wheat. Barley. Oats. Rye. Beans. Peas. Flour.
In London, 442500 17299 61102 .. 614 3402 112976
Unit. King. 113950 82019 96983 .. 13413 8127 897355

IMPERIAL AVERAGES, Weeks ending
Wheat. Barley. Oats. Rye. Beans. Peas.
s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d. s. d.
14th March .. 54 3.29 4.21 9.34 2.35 2.34 9
21st .. 55 1.20 10.22 0.33 10.34 4.33 4
28th .. 55 5.30 2.22 1.34 0.35 0.33 3
4th April .. 55 9.30 7.22 6.33 7.34 10.34 2
11th .. 56 0.30 9.22 9.33 4.35 1.33 8
18th .. 55 10.30 5.22 9.35 5.34 9.34 5
Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 55s. 5d.; Barley, 30s. 2d.; Oats, 22s. 4d.; Rye, 34s. 1d.; Beans, 34s. 10d.; Peas, 33s. 11d.
Duty. Wheat, 17s. 0d.; Barley, 8s. 0d.; Oats, 6s. 0d.; Rye 8s. 6d.; Beans, 8s. 6d.; Peas, 9s. 6d.

MEAT MARKET.
The wet weather had considerable influence on the trade; otherwise prices would have been higher.
PRIME STONE OF 5 LBS. BY THE CARCASE.
Prime Beef .. 3s 10d to 3s 6d Mutton 4s 0d to 3s 8d
Middling do. 3s 6d to 3s 2d Veal, from .. 5s 0d to 4s 0d
Plain, or info. Small Pork .. 5s 4d to 4s 8d
Prime Beef .. 3s 0d to 2s 6d Large, or info.
Prime Mutton 4s 4d to 4s 0d Prime Pork .. 3s 4d to 3s 0d

THE LONDON GAZETTE

FRIDAY, APRIL 17.
BANKRUPTCY SUPPLEMENT.
G. A. Absalom, victualler, Portsea.
S. Evans, cotton-spinner, Aspin, Lancashire.
W. J. Idenden, tailor, Salmon's-lane, Limehouse.
J. H. Banks, engraver, Great Newport-street.
BANKRUPTS.
T. Bedford, baker, Croydon Common. [Messrs. Russell and Co., High-street, Borough.]
E. Sankey, surgeon, Canterbury. [Messrs. Richardson and Co., Bedford-row.]
B. Billings, victualler, Harlow, Essex. [Mr. Butt, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury.]
W. Stearns, carpenter, Princess-street, Chelsea. [Mr. Smith, New Inn, Strand.]
W. Mills, glove manufacturer, Foster-lane, City. [Messrs. Fisher and Co., Aldersgate-street.]
H. R. Morley, merchant, Kingston-upon-Hull. [Messrs. Hobden and Co., Hull.]
A. M. Beaumont, merchant, Honley, Yorkshire. [Mr. Cumming, King-street, Cheap-side.]
G. J. Jackson, sharebroker, Liverpool. [Messrs. Cornthwaite and Co., Old Jewry Chambers.]
T. Figden, shoemaker, Liverpool. [Mr. Kirk, Symond's Inn, Chancery-lane.]
A. Lord, dyer, Collyhurst, Manchester. [Messrs. Gregory and Co., Bedford-row.]
TUESDAY, APRIL 21.
BANKRUPTCY ANNULLED.
C. Goldsmith, Bristol, saddler.
BANKRUPTS.
S. M. Latham, Dover, banker. [Messrs. Bridges and Co. Red Lion-square.]
R. Stephenson, Southwick-street, Hyde Park, apothecary. [Messrs. Chamberlayne and Meaden, Great Jan-street.]
T. E. Deacon, Corner Hall, Hertford, tanner. [Mr. Matthews, King William-street.]
R. Brailsford, Enfield, common brewer. [Messrs. F. and H. Palmer, Mitre-court-chambers, Temple.]
J. Biggs, Houndsditch, undertaker. [Messrs. J. T. H. Baddeley, Lemon-street.]
J. B. Crampen, Wharf-road, City-road, coal merchant. [Messrs. Parker and Co., Raymond's-buildings.]
J. and H. Pace, St. Michael's-alley, Cornhill, merchants. [Mr. N. Lindo, King's Arms yard, Moorgate-street.]
J. Salmon, Beaumont, Essex, carpenter. [Mr. Ambrose, Chancery-lane.]
J. Clarkson, Barnsley, plumber. [Messrs. Jacques and Co., Ely-place.]
J. Walker and B. Wilkinson, Leeds, sharebrokers. [Messrs. Wigglesworth and Co., Gray's Inn.]
W. Cross, Weymouth, shipowner. [Mr. Sowton, Great James-street.]
T. Taylor, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, grocer. [Messrs. Chisholme and Co., Lincoln's Inn.]
T. Allen, Littleworth, Staffordshire, hotel-keeper. [Messrs. Read and Langford, London.]
J. Topham, Brewod, road-contractor. [Mr. Turner, Wolverhampton.]
D. Antrobus, Andley, Staffordshire, apothecary. [Mr. Williams, Hanley.]
W. Bennett, Wolverhampton, tinplate-worker. [Mr. C. Brown, Bilston.]
W. Belshaw, Manchester, victualler. [Messrs. Gregory and Co., Bedford-row.]
B. Dawson, Bursill, Lancashire, wool manufacturer. [Messrs. Norris and Co., Bartlett's-buildings.]
C. Stephenson, Colne, Lancashire, worsted manufacturer. [Messrs. Johnson and Co., Temple.]
H. Fowkes, Manchester, sharebroker. [Messrs. Milne and Co., Temple.]
D. Johnstone, Chorlton-upon-Medlock, Manchester, joiner. [Messrs. Gregory and Co., Bedford-row.]
H. L. Fitzjames, Walcot, Bath, furrier. [Messrs. Webb and Son, Bath.]
H. Hutchinson, Liverpool, merchant. [Messrs. Sharpe and Co., Bedford-row.]
W. Kelly, Chester, brewer. [Messrs. Humphreys and Co., Chancery-lane.]
J. R. Croft, Liverpool, commission merchant. [Messrs. Vincent and Co., Temple.]
G. J. Hughes, Liverpool, commission merchant. [Mr. Wilkin, Furnival's Inn.]

BRITISH CONSULS OFFICE, PHILADELPHIA.—Know all Persons to whom these presents shall come that I, GILBERT ROBERTSON, Esq., his Britannic Majesty's Consul, do hereby certify, that R. WATSON, Esq. (who attests to the efficacy of

OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA,

(IN RESTORING HAIR).

is Mayor of this City, and that M. RANDALL, Esq., is Treasurer of the Court of Common Pleas, to both whose signatures full faith and credit is due. I further certify that I am personally acquainted with J. L. INGLIS, Esq., another of the signers, and that he is a person of great respectability; and that I heard him express his unqualified approbation of the effects of OLDRIDGE'S BALM, in restoring his Hair. Given under my hand and seal of Office, at the City of Philadelphia, December 29, 1825.

(Signed) GILBERT ROBERTSON
Price 3s 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine. OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

On the 1st and 15th of each Month, every Part containing Four highly-finished Portraits, price One Shilling,
THE PEOPLE'S NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY
Of Illustrious and Eminent Personages of the Nineteenth Century, engraved by first rate Artists, from Paintings by Lawrence Reynolds, West, Shee, Hoppner, Beechey, Phillips, Carrick, &c. &c.
With Memoirs by W. COOKE TAYLOR, LL.D.
Fisher, Son, and Co., the Caxton Press, Angel-street, Newgate-street, London.

On the 1st of May will be published,
DOUGLAS JERROLD'S SHILLING MAGAZINE.
No. XVII.
London: Published at the Public Office, 85, Fleet-street.

OLIVER TWIST.
By CHARLES DICKENS.
With Illustrations by George Cruikshank, and the latest corrections and Alterations of the Author.
No. V. will be published on the 30th instant, price 1s. To be completed in Ten Numbers.
London: Published for the Author, by J. B. Whittaker and Evans, No. 90, Fleet-street, and Whitefriars.

MUSIC FOR THE MARY.
THE MUSICAL HERALD, Edited by an Eminent Writer, containing four quarto pages of Select Music, and four of entertaining and instructive Musical Literature, will be published on the 2nd of May, and every succeeding week, for the small charge of only TWO-PENCE. Notwithstanding its unprecedented cheapness, all lovers of music are invited to inspect this specimen of a new era. To be had of all Booksellers.

WISDOM AND CHEERFULNESS.
THE FAMILY HERALD, Parts 34 and 35 of this popular and interesting literary miscellany, price only Sixpence each, contain Malina Gray; by Mrs. Stephens—The Lady Helen—Valerie, or the Young Italian—The Selfish Wife—The Sleep Walker; by Zischokke—La Vendetta, or the Feud; by Hjalmar—Uncle John and his Nephew—Alonso and Zamora; the Fugitive Slave; and several other entertaining tales, with a variety of useful, moral, entertaining, and instructive reading for the intelligent and reflecting of all classes. Everybody reads the FAMILY HERALD, the most universal favourite ever published, and just the kind of periodical for willing away a leisure moment agreeably and profitably. To be had of all Booksellers.
With No. 157 (the commencement of a New Volume) will be presented, GRATIS, the First Number of the MUSICAL HERALD, containing eight 4to pages of Music and Musical Literature.

Just published, demy 8vo., price 10s. 6d., cloth,
THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRADE, or Outlines of a Theory of Profits and Prices; including an Examination of the Principles which determine the relative Value of Corn, Labour, and Currency.
By PATRICK JAMES STIRLING.
"A valuable treatise—clear and convincing. Every merchant and trader in the land should make himself master of it, and legislators and political economists may gain useful information from its pages."—Critic.
"With calmness and simplicity, the author proceeds from general to particulars, now re-leaping over a step in the demonstration or arrangement to reach a more attractive subject, and never giving a word of partisan argument or rhetorical embellishment. It is that species of writing which Lord Carnarvon compared to leveling work—the more the labour the less it is apparent. By his manner of treating the subject, Mr. Stirling has been able singularly to disengage himself of those misleading influences which have so often led economists astray."—Scotsman.
"Clear, methodical, and well written, we have no doubt that it will speedily take its place among the standard works of the age."—Glasgow Courier.
Oliver and Boyd, Edinburgh. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., London.

NEW EDITIONS OF DR. COMBE'S WORKS:—
I. On DIGESTION AND DIET. Sixth, or People's Edition, price 2s. 6d.
II. PHYSIOLOGY APPLIED TO HEALTH AND EDUCATION, People's Edition, price 2s. 6d.
The Twelfth Edition of the same work in a neat volume, 8vo., price 7s. 6d.
III. On the PHYSIOLOGICAL AND MORAL MANAGEMENT OF INFANCY, for the Use of Parents. Fifth Edition, 6s. 6d., published by Macmillan, Stewart, and Co., Edinburgh. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., London; and all Booksellers.

Just published, People's Edition, price 2s., royal 8vo.,
MORAL PHILOSOPHY; or, The Duties of Man considered, in his Individual, Domestic, and Social Capacities. By GEORGE COMBE. People's Edition, revised, corrected, and enlarged. Also, uniform with the above.
THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN. Price 1s. 6d.
London: Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.; Longman and Co.; and W. S. Orr and Co., Edinburgh: Macmillan, Stewart, and Co.

Second Edition, just published, fcap. 4to., price 6d.,
A Railway Traveller's Reasons for adopting UNIFORMITY OF GAUGE. Stated in a Letter to I. K. BRUNEL, Esq.
Joseph Cundall, 12, Old Broad-street.

READY WITH THE MAGAZINES.
Part I., fcap. 4to., price 1s., sewed,
THE INDIAN WAR—THE TARIFF—THE OREGON QUESTION—POLAND. Reviewed and fully discussed in Part I. of "THE TOPIC," each article by an eminent writer. Also published weekly, price 3d. each number.

"The plan of this new periodical is original: it is to furnish one article each week of the same kind that the established reviews do quarterly; and to fulfil this object, authors whose talents have already been acknowledged in such mediums will alternately provide the requisite essay. So far the engagement with the public, and judging from what has appeared, it has been fully carried out. If perseverance in its commencement the public will be gainers by the undertaking, and we heartily wish success. It has an advantage over the slower march of the quarterlies by seizing the topic of the day at the precise moment of its interest and urgency, and of submitting it to a searching investigation."—Atlas.
"As a business-like digest of facts, 'The Oregon Question' may be recommended to those who wish to have a succinctly complete view of all its parts."—Spectator.
"Judging from the specimens already published, promises to be characterized by great ability."—Morning Chronicle.
"No. 1. contains a condensed history of the Indian War. The essay is eloquent, truthful, and spirit-stirring, evidently written by one to whom the country, its policy and impolicy, are well known. We need scarcely attempt to recommend a work that so forcibly recommends itself by its intrinsic worth."—Sunday Times.
"The New Tariff forms the subject of the second Number. These papers, or rather essays, are written by first-rate writers."—Weekly Chronicle.
C. Mitchell, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street.

Dr. Robert Culverwell's Guide to Health and Long Life.
(300 pages, pocket volume; price 1s. by post, 1s. 6d.).
WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID; with Diet Tables for all Complaints. By J. L. CULVERWELL, M.D., M.R.C.S., L.A.C., &c. Contents.—How to insure perfect digestion, tranquility, a good night's rest, a clear head, and a contented mind. By an observance of the instructions herein contained, the feeble, the nervously delicate, even to the most shattered constitution, may acquire the greatest amount of physical happiness and reach in health the full period of life allotted to man. To be had of Sherwood, 23, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand, who may be advised with on these matters daily till 3; evenings, till 9.

CORNER'S NEW HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading.
Each History, commencing with the earliest authentic records, is continued to the present time, faithfully portraying, also, the Manners, Customs, and States of Civilisation of the People.
Bound with Questions. Without Questions.
England and Wales; five fine plates, and map, - - - - - 3s. 6d.
Poland, three fine plates, and map, - - - - - 2s. 6d.
Scotland; three fine plates, and map, - - - - - 2s. 6d.
France; three fine plates, and map, - - - - - 2s. 6d.
Spain and Portugal; three plates, and map, - - - - - 2s. 6d.
Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; with two fine plates and map, - - - - - 2s. 6d.
Germany and the German Empire; 3 fine plates, and map, - - - - - 3s. 6d.
Poland and Russia; with three fine plates, and map, - - - - - 3s. 6d.
Italy and Switzerland; three fine plates, and map, - - - - - 3s. 6d.
Holland and Belgium; with two fine plates, and map, - - - - - 3s. 6d.
The object of these works is peculiarly suited to schools and Families;—to furnish the reader with a faithful History of each Nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the Religion, Customs, National Characteristics, State of Civilisation, and Domestic Habits of the people, in various periods of their history—to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of detail; and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.
London: Dean and Co., Threadneedle-street; and, by order, of all Booksellers.

THE LADIES' GAZETTE OF FASHION FOR MAY, price 1s., contains Double the Number of Summer Fashions given in any other work, and is the only Work that contains the Royal Dresses, the Paris Fashions, and everything new and worthy. A superb coloured Giant Plate (size 10s inches), and Walking-Picnics, Children's Dresses, Bonnets, Pelisses, &c., in extraordinary variety: 160 Figures, 150 New Patterns; Portraits of the Queen, Albert, and Royal Children, Patterns of their Dresses; Descriptions, Tales, Poetry, Music, Guide to the Signs of London, &c. Post-free, 1s. 6d. Berzer, Holwell-street, Strand, and all Booksellers.

THAMES TUNNEL.—Brilliantly lighted with "Lowe's" Patent Naphthalized Gas, is open as a thoroughfare day and night—Toll, One Penny.
Tableau of Public Interest, which has been Eight Months in Preparation.

THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert caring their Four lovely Children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F. Tussaud, the Costumes by Mrs. F. Tussaud, is now added to the Collection. —BAZAAR, Baker-street, Portman-square.

Admission, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4, and from 7 till 10.
RICHARD COBURN, ESQ., MP.—THE ENGRAVING OF THE PORTRAIT OF RICHARD COBURN, ESQ., M.P., engraved in the highest style of art by F. C. Lewis, Esq., engraver to the Queen, is NOW READY. The Portrait has been produced under the patronage and sanction of the Council of the Anti Corn Law League, and is the only authentic engraved portrait published. The likeness is a most characteristic one, and has received the unqualified approbation of Mr Cobden's personal friends.
First class Proofs, with autograph, - - - 11 6
India Proofs - - - - - 1 0
French Paper Proofs - - - - - 0 6
Printed - - - - - 0 0

Uniform with the above, Mr. Agnew has published a series of Portraits of the Members of the Council of the League, all of which are engraved in a fine and finished style. The following are now ready:—
Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P. John Bright, Esq., M.P.
Hon. C. P. Villiers, Esq., M.P. Right Hon. Earl Radnor.
George Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the League. Colonel Thompson.
Dr. Bowring, M.P. Minier Gibson, Esq., M.P.
Henry Asworth, Esq. William Rawson, Esq., Treasurer of the League.
J. Brotherton, Esq., John Lubbock, Esq.
Sir Thomas Potter.

Arrangements have also been made to publish the Portraits of William Brown, Esq., of Liverpool.
Edward Baines, Esq. Lawrence Heywood, Esq.
Right Hon. Earl Macleay. Right Hon. Lord Morpeth.
Robert Hyde Crag, Esq., &c. &c.
All executed the same size, and forming one of the most interesting Gallery of Portraits ever brought before the public. The Portrait of WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., which is being engraved by James Thomson, Esq., of London, will be ready shortly, and parties wishing to subscribe will please to forward their names without delay, to secure good impressions.
Manchester: published by THOMAS AGNEW, Repository of Arts, Exchange-street. London: Messrs. Ackerman and Co., Strand.

HENRY PEACH BUCKLER,
Foreign and Colonial Wool Broker,
29, Basinghall-street, London.
Samples sent post to any part of the country.
Orders executed at the Public Sales.

THE VETERINARY ART.—A Veterinary Surgeon, practising within a few miles of London, and who has been the tutor of several successful practitioners of the art, is anxious to instruct any persons persevering habits in the Veterinary Art, so as to enable them in a very few months to practise satisfactorily to themselves and their employers. Premium, £30. Also every branch of the Gastric Art, which valuable addition may be acquired in two or three months. Premium £2. Mental and physical exercises are studied at the same time, a reduction of £2 will be made upon the last mentioned premium. Board and lodging, if required, at 12s. per week. Address, post paid, C. J. care of Mr. Westron, 23, High-street, Whitechapel, London.

GEORGE AND JOHN DEANE, SADDLERS and HARNESS MAKERS, invite attention to their Gig, Bandon, and Carriage Harness, manufactured on their own premises, by workmen of much experience, and under the direction of foremen of superior ability and skill. Their leather is invariably dressed by first-rate London curriers, the furniture is also of the best town manufacture, and G. and J. Deane warrant that the production of their manufacture cannot be surpassed for beauty, strength, and cheapness, by any other house. Horse-clothing made to order; canopies of best seasoned wood. Deane's London-made whips, and all articles for stable and travelling use in large variety.—No. 2, Arthur-street East, opening to the Monument, London-bridge.

FENDERS AND FURNISHING IRONMONGERY.
—RICHARD AND JOHN LACK, 336, Strand, opposite Somerset House, have just added to their hitherto immense stock of Fenders many quite new designs of most elaborate finish, surpassing in elegance of style any before offered. Bronzed scullery and steel bar fenders from 18s.; ornamental iron ditto from 45s. 6d. Also the best selected stock of furnishing ironmongery in London, at prices 30 per cent. under other houses. The money returned for any article not approved of. Their book of prices, containing upwards of 200 engravings, gratis, or post free. Established 1816.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN LANDLORD
SECOND BRITISH BUILDING AND INVESTMENT COMPANY. Enrolled.
Established on Macarthur's Simplified and Improved Plan.
Monthly Subscription, 10s. per Share.
No Redemption Fee.
Office, 3, Ivy-lane, St. Paul's, London.
Hours, 10 till 4.
Commenced in March, 1846.

TESTIMONIES.
William Anderson, M.R.C.S., 12, Old Broad-street, Mddelton-square.
William Farrer, 29, Charlotte-terrace, Barnsbury-road, Islington.
James Staley, Tiberton-square, Islington.
Thomas Sheppard, 5, Gainsford-place, Barnsbury-road.
All letters should be directed to The Second British Building and Investment Company, 3, Ivy-lane, St. Paul's, London.
The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies. The British Building and Investment Company was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1500 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about £10,000 to its Shareholders for the purchase of property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of

THE LEAGUE.

No. 136.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE FREE TRADE MINISTER COMPLETE.

"The progress of the discussion, the lapse of time, and intervening events, have more strongly confirmed the feeling with which I spoke when I proposed the permanent and final settlement of the corn question. I will not deny that, during the debates on the question, my opinions on the subject have undergone a change, and it is this—that restrictions, which I at first believed to be impolitic, I now believe to be unjust. Consequently, the sense of their injustice PRECLUDES ANY COMPROMISE ON MY PART. That which I have proposed, both as to the amount of duty, and as to the continuance of that duty, is ALL I AM ABLE TO OFFER; and in answer to those injurious suspicions, I think it enough to say that I shall be perfectly ready to testify, BY ANY PUBLIC ACT, the sincerity of my intentions."—SIR ROBERT PEEL, April 27.

We were sure it would be so. The affinities of truth with right—of policy with justice—of sound economical doctrine, with broad and honest moral principle are too close and all-pervading, not to force themselves on the mind that has once heartily espoused either the one or the other half of this great dualism.

There is no such thing as partitioning off the domain of intellect from that of morals. Whatever holds in the one, will by-and-bye be seen to hold equally in the other. Force of moral volition is next of kin to clearness and fulness of intellectual perception; and a great truth, once fairly apprehended and comprehended by the understanding, will gradually surround itself with all the sanctities of ethical obligation, and become transfigured into a great duty. Those who have watched Sir Robert Peel's public course, since his first unreserved and practical adoption of Free Trade principles, and noted the course of thought indicated by his successive Parliamentary defences and expositions of those principles, must have perceived the traces of that mental process, whose final result was announced to the world on Monday night. The last stage of one of the most remarkable and important political conversions on record, is now finished—the FREE TRADE MINISTER is now complete.

These words of the Premier's evidently come from a great depth of conviction. He is now at the root of the matter. His opinion has become a principle. He has long since believed monopoly to be impolitic—he now sees and feels it to be unjust. Before, it was a gross mistake—now, it is a monstrous fraud. Before, it was a grievous mischief—now, it is a crying oppression and iniquity. Before, he would not compromise the totality of its abolition—now, he cannot. "THE SENSE OF ITS INJUSTICE PRECLUDES ANY COMPROMISE." The thing is wrong—and there is no more to be said.

This is better even than "experience"—clear and cogent as is that experience of the last three years, or the last six years, which Ministerial lips have so lucidly expounded and illustrated. A conviction thus grounded and fortified is far more to be relied upon than one that rests on the basis of mere induction from an accumulated mass of exterior facts. It is simpler and grander. It goes deeper down. There is more of motive force in it. All men understand it. All men can put faith in it. It is something to build on. There can be no mistake about it. It excludes uncertainty, and repels modification. It is essentially intolerant of negotiation, compromise, and "adjustment." Policy and expediency have their shades and degrees—and very puzzling these are to the common eye. There is always a latitude of choice—a margin open for "arrangement"—a question of a little more or a little less. Morality is absolute and unqualified—speaks only in the imperative mood. When we come to a question of right and wrong, there is an end of choice—the answer must be a simple Yes or No.

This is the view which we of the League have always taken from the first. We have ever held that monopoly was a wrong, in any and every of its actual or possible shapes and forms—and that neither truce nor treaty could be made with an iniquity. And our steady and unwavering assertion of that principle of social justice, of which the totality of our demand is the obvious corollary, has been our sheet-anchor through all that storm and stress of Parliamentary conflict and popular agitation in which we have been working for upwards of seven years. We cannot express in too strong terms the satisfaction we feel at seeing this broad and plain view of the matter publicly and solemnly authenticated by the First Minister of the Crown. In any other sort of advocacy we have never been able to place much faith. The men who say, "A moderate or fixed duty would be a good enough thing in itself—perhaps the best thing, if we could only get it passed quietly—but we don't so much care about it; and as no other alternative seems open, why, suppose we say 'total repeal,' as anything is better than the sliding scale," are not the champions to be relied upon in those moments of difficulty and peril, which try what men are made of. Give us the man who says, "The landlords' tax on the people's bread is essentially and intrinsically UNJUST, and I can make no terms with injustice—I am precluded from a compromise with wrong." This is the man to brave the storms of open enmity, and baffle the chicane of treacherous intriguing, and lukewarm partisanship, and carry the people's cause, through all difficulties and obstructions, to a triumphant consummation.

It was hardly necessary for Sir Robert Peel to assure us, in so many words, that he "will be perfectly ready to testify, by any public act, the sincerity of his intentions." That is a thing of course. It is already sufficiently implied in the very nature of his present convictions. The moral protest against monopoly, as not only an impolicy, but an injustice, tells us all we desire to know. The vigorous denunciation of the wrong is pledge enough of the energy and effort needed for its extirpation.

This is a most timely and cheering manifesto from our Free Trade Minister. It makes our way very clear before us. It dissipates a host of perplexing rumours, and "reports of rumours." We see exactly where we are. What will the Lords do, and what will the Rigbys do—what curious and cunning scheme of "adjustment" has been, or may be, concocted among the select and secret committees of Pallmall—are questions now of extremely slender moment. We know the worst. There would, undoubtedly, be great temporary inconvenience in the protracted delay consequent on a Parliamentary success of the monopolists; but nothing more. Not the shadow of a shade of doubt overhangs the final issue. We have now got the Premier's ultimatum—the Bill, and the whole Bill, or SOMETHING BETTER than the Bill—something more thoroughly in accordance with those views of the morality of the question which the author of the Bill has now deliberately espoused, and which would constitute the basis of his "appeal to the people."

We can remember no fact or utterance of any English minister more strongly entitling him to an unreserved and entire popular confidence, than this of Sir Robert Peel's. He throws himself loose of all other reliances; casts away all other aids; plants himself and his policy firmly on the eternal rock of PRINCIPLE—and leaves the people to do the rest. And perhaps, after all, the people may have to do it. Nobody knows. It was, no doubt, a highly prudent and politic declaration of the Premier's—but only in that largest sense of the word, in which courage is prudence, and honesty policy. This bold and broad assertion of principle, this resolute refusal of compromise, while it gives him invincible strength with the country, may not by any means strengthen him in Parliament. It will be beyond measure offensive in many quarters where he might else have counted on quiescence or co-operation. It will raise up against him not a few bitter and determined enemies. Those who have hitherto amused themselves with the dream that he might be induced to allow certain protectionist modifications of his bill, and who have accordingly given him a dubious and half-hearted support, are now once for all undeceived, and we may look to see their precarious friendship changed into settled and vehement hostility. It now remains for the people of the United Kingdom to show themselves worthy of the Minister who, first among English statesmen, has enunciated the highest of social and political truths from the seat of official authority—staked official existence on the successful realisation of popular rights—and pledged the uttermost resources of official power to the subversion of an old-established and deeply-rooted public wrong.

PROTECTION TO NATIVE INDUSTRY IN SHETLAND.

The case of the Shetlanders, to which Mr. Forster and Mr. Milner Gibson so urgently besought the attention of the House of Commons on Wednesday last, is one of the completest and most palpable illustrations we know, of the iniquitous cruelty of that monopoly which bestrides the industry of these realms like a night-mare. There seems no escaping from landlordism anywhere. This baneful power pervades the entire circuit of the Queen's dominions with a sort of malignant omnipresence, and makes its detestable domination felt, in full force and potency of mischief, even at the Ultima Thule of the empire.

It is a very simple story—the case of these hardy and honest islanders. Their soil is poor, their climate cold and ungenial, their agriculture rude and unimproved, and incapable, even in ordinary years, of feeding more than half of their little population of 32,000 souls. They are miserably ill off for corn—have next to no money—and manufacture nothing for the foreign market. Yet they are far from destitute of native wealth, and are very rich in native industry—if they could protect this from being "protected." Their seas swarm with excellent fish; and they have the stoutest hearts, the strongest and skilfullest hands, and the best tackle of any fishermen in her Majesty's dominions. And they have—or might have—the best of customers for their fish. It seems that Shetland fish is particularly relished in Spain, and that Spain is ready and willing to take it to any amount. But as Spain, too, is short of money, and bare of manufactures, the transaction can be completed only on one condition;—the Shetlanders must take out the price of their fish in corn and flour—commodities in which it so happens that Spain is particularly rich. There is an obstacle, however. The landlords stop the way. Landlordism keeps a Custom-house in Shetland (under the same roof with her Majesty's commissioners,—steps in between these two parties, just as the mutually gainful and necessary barter is about to be consummated—and says to each, No, you shan't. Spain shall not have the fish, and Shetland shall not have the corn, except on terms which neither Shetland nor Spain can conveniently comply with. There is a little trade done, it seems, between the two. Some eight or ten sail of Spanish vessels are in the habit of annually sailing northward for a cargo of fish, but they carry no corn. At this very moment, we are informed, "a vessel from Spain is now actually on the way to Shetland, in ballast, to load a cargo of fish, and would have taken a cargo of flour could the repeal of the Corn Laws have been depended upon."

Why landlordism does this—what claim landlordism has on the Shetlanders, that it refuses them the right of exchanging their fish for other people's corn—landlordism does not say. Oppression is never fond of exhibiting its title deeds. Our landlords have done nothing to further or facilitate this native Shetland industry. They do not catch the fish, nor find the boats and tackle. They have never so much as given the Shetlanders a new idea in the art and science of fish-catching. Shetland industry is altogether "native," in the strictest sense of the term. Shetlanders know nothing even of the existence of the landlords, except through the medium of the law that prohibits Shetland from buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest—that chains down Shetland industry, and takes toll of Shetland hunger. Possibly, some of them may have heard the name of RICHMOND, the chivalrous protector of the Great British fish interest—but all that these fishermen really know about the fish protection, is, that they are disabled from earning and eating bread.

This standing case of grievance and oppression has lately received a fearful aggravation in the shape of failing corn crops, and rotting potato stores. In the document read to the house on Wednesday, by Mr. Forster, we are informed, that "Letters recently received from Shetland all concur in stating that the islands are on the brink of famine. The crops of corn, at no time adequate to the subsistence of more than half the population (about 32,000 souls), were very ill got in last season; and to add to the calamity, the stock of potatoes which the people are in the habit of keeping in pits during the winter, and on which they rely in a great measure for sustenance during the spring and early part of the summer, have been found, on opening the pits, nearly all destroyed by rot."

Accordingly, the Shetlanders have petitioned Parliament for relief. A more moderate and simple petition Parliament never saw from a distressed interest. There is not a particle of mendacity about it. The poor Shetlanders' prayer is not for grants of money out of the taxes, nor for loans to promote public works and private employment. Poor as they are, they seem perfectly able to manage the interest on their own mortgages—and they are absolutely silent on the subject of portions for their daughters. Nor do they say a syllable about protection for their fish. The people of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, may buy fish where they will, and at what price they can, and Shetland will make no objection. There is nothing eleemosynary in the relief prayed for by our brave Shetlanders. They only ask to be allowed to do what they will with their own, and dispose of the products of their native industry to the best advantage. If they could but buy their bread, as they are ready to sell their fish, at the honest market price of Europe and the world, they would be absolutely without a grievance to complain of.

Such is the Shetlanders' petition. As it is respectfully and constitutionally worded, the House of Commons has no objection to receive it, and has even gone the length of permitting it to lie on the table. But any attempt to discuss it, to press and enforce it, to bring home its simple facts and logic to the House's understanding and conscience, is ruled to be "wasting the time of the House." The recital of this touching narrative of cruelty and wrong was, it seems, received with "expressions of impatience from the protectionist benches, which were very much crowded"—crowded not with a view to the better protection of native industry in Shetland, but to trip up the heels of a Free Trade Government on a factory and philanthropy question.

Well might Mr. Milner Gibson ask, in his excellent speech on the subject, "whether this Shetland case was not quite conclusive with reference to the corn question?" Every honest man's answer will be, Yes; quite conclusive—conclusive not only with reference to the corn question, but with reference to the moral pretensions of Corn-Lawing landlords as protectors of "native industry."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Fifteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 2.

On Friday night week the protracted debate on the Irish Coercion Bill produced some remarkable and noticeable "circumstances and accidents." First, Mr. Smith O'Brien intimated to the House that he had been privately coquetting with Lord George Bentinck, the object of both being a double defeat, to be brought about by a disgraceful coalition—Lord George Bentinck is one of those who say that the Coercion Bill is essential, imperative, and should be passed without delay. His principles of protection, he loudly protested, did not lead him to protect "the broad day assassin or the midnight murderer." Yet to effect the paltry, miserable advantage of annoying Sir Robert Peel, and still farther protracting and delaying the Corn Bill, Lord George Bentinck did not hesitate to enter into a private correspondence with Mr. Smith O'Brien, the object of which was to defeat the Coercion Bill, which the noble lord is panting for, as well as the Corn Bill, which he deprecates! Alas, for this country, if it is any longer to be governed by men whose political morality is infected by the flavour of the turf! Lord George Bentinck has never, of course, been an agricultural labourer; but the art, the science, the mystery of "HEDGING" is quite familiar to him.

On the "order of the day" for resuming the debate on the Irish Coercion Bill, Mr. Smith O'Brien made a long speech, in the course of which he avowed that he was not a Free Trader, but an advocate of a fixed duty; and concluded by the following question:—"Although he was not prepared for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, yet, looking at the existing necessities of the people of Ireland, he considered the crisis must be met by admitting oats and wheat free of duty till the next winter; and he begged to ask the noble lord (Lord G. Bentinck) whether he and his friends would consent to suspend for three months the operation of the present Corn Laws, so as to admit those descriptions of grain, free of duty, into Ireland?"

Lord George Bentinck was "under the gangway," waiting for the question. He commenced his reply in this way:

"Under ordinary circumstances, it would not be fair towards an independent member of this house to ask him what course he would assent to with regard to particular measures introduced by her Majesty's Ministers. But under the peculiar circumstances in which we are placed, when we have a minister endeavouring to govern the country with but 112 members who place confidence in him, and when the party with which I have the honour to serve numbers 240, which with the Irish members constitute a majority of this house, I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. S. O'Brien) is entitled to put the question to me, and I will endeavour to give him a frank and an honest answer (hear, hear). The question put to me is this—Whether my friends around me would support her Majesty's Ministers were they to introduce a measure, not for the abolition but for the suspension of the Corn Laws as regards Ireland for a few months?"

And then he went on to say, in effect, if not precisely in terms, that though disbelieving in the universality of Irish distress, he and his friends were nevertheless prepared to adopt what, on his own showing, was the needless and useless proposition of opening the ports for three months—not in Great Britain, no!—but in Ireland!

In the course of the discussion, Mr. O'CONNELL, true to his principles, thus mildly but emphatically rebuked Mr. Smith O'Brien:

"Sir, I was sorry to hear my honourable friend, the member for Limerick, so adverse to the total repeal of the Corn Laws. My conviction is that nothing can do good to Ireland but that repeal (loud cries of "hear, hear"). The existence of the Corn Laws has done us no good (hear, hear). Can any man contradict that (hear, hear)? They have been concomitant with increasing misery—concomitant with increasing destitution; and therefore, if any man praise the Corn Laws to me, he must draw on his imagination, for as to Ireland the facts of the case are against him (hear, hear). Corn Law repeal would increase manufacturing enterprise, it would raise wages—agriculture cannot raise them—the Corn Law has not raised them (hear, hear, hear). They say the Corn Bill was passed to keep up wages. Is there any country where wages are so low? Notoriously none. The only chance of raising them is in the repeal of the Corn Laws, and I wish to Heaven you would set about it at once (hear, and cheers)."

Mr. Smith O'Brien, after this, had the singular infelicity to get up, and ask Sir Robert Peel if he would substitute a three months opening of the ports for a total abolition of the Corn Laws! Here is the question, and the answer:

MR. SMITH O'BRIEN: Perhaps the right honourable gentleman would tell me whether he has made up his mind as to my question? If not, I shall repeat it on Monday.

SIR R. PEELE: Though somewhat indistinctly put, I can answer the question at once, and without hesitation. The honourable gentleman wishes to know, as I take it, whether I am willing to substitute for the measure of the Government, leading ultimately to the utter abolition of the Corn Laws, a proposal for a suspension of those laws for three months. As regards Ireland, I say at once I can consent to no such proposal (loud cheers).

After that, we had Mr. Cobden, and every word of his telling speech must be read:

MR. COBDEN: I think we have rather lost sight of the origin of this discussion. This somewhat irregular discussion arose from a question put by the honourable member for Limerick to the noble member for Lynn, in consequence of a private communication which took place between them (loud cries of "hear" from the Opposition). The question was this—whether the noble lord and the party acting with him were willing to vote for the suspension of the Corn Laws for three months, and that immediately, and to make that suspension applicable only to Ireland? Now we have another proposition before the house, not to suspend, but to abolish the Corn Laws (loud cries of "hear" from the Opposition); and I presume that the proposal of the honourable member for Limerick is, that, instead of their abolition as to England, Scotland, and Ireland, we should substitute their abolition for three months in Ireland alone (loud cries of "hear" from the Opposition). Now, I beg in the first place to say that, before the honourable member for Limerick and the noble member for Lynn, there are other parties to be consulted as to this proposition. There are the people of England (loud cheers from the Opposition). I do not mean the "country party," but the people who live in towns, and who will ultimately govern this country. I tell him (loud ironical cheers from the protectionists) the English people, the Scotch people, and, I believe, the Irish people, too, are determined not to be content with the suspension of those laws, but are bent on their abolition (loud cries of "hear," amongst others from Mr. O'Connell). I think this matter has been taken out of the hands of this house altogether; and I rejoice that this question of the Corn Laws can no longer be affected by the manoeuvring or private communications or compacts of any members of the legislature (cheers from the Opposition). It has been disposed of and settled out of doors; and though artifice may delay the measure of Government, though it may occasion great anxiety out of this house, the more certain is the bill to be carried (loud cheers); and the only proposal which can be successfully substituted for that of the Government is the total and immediate repeal (renewed cheers). When I hear the noble member for Lynn talk with a complete unconsciousness of past arguments which have been utterly refuted—showing an obtuseness which I can only account for by supposing that for several years past he has given his attention to subjects wholly unconnected with public affairs (much laughter from both sides)—when I hear him boast that he is backed by 240 of the gentlemen of England—while I hear them cheer him while he is giving such proofs of utter delusion as to the state of public opinion on this subject, I do feel anxious that the right honourable baronet should, if possible, appeal to the country (loud cheers from both sides), if it could be done without great inconvenience to the trade of the country and great derangement of the business of this house (ironical cheers from the protectionists). I say I wish the right honourable gentlemen could appeal to the country, and the country would make a moral example of the gentlemen below the gangway, which they little anticipate (loud and long-continued cheers from the Opposition). Now, as to the proposition of the honourable member for Limerick, has that honourable gentleman considered the practicability of opening the ports in Ireland, and keeping them shut in England? Is he ready with another measure, or can he give us the details of a bill to be brought in by the honourable member for Limerick and by the noble member for Lynn (loud cries of "hear, hear" amongst others from Sir R. Peel)? I suppose he has planned some contrivance for preventing the introduction of provisions from Ireland to England; because if he has not, seeing that there is no Custom-house at present between the two countries, there is no possible means of preventing the free circulation of corn from one to the other, and substituting for that brought from Ireland to this country the wheat of America and the Baltic (loud cries of "hear, hear"). The noble lord told us that what they wanted in Ireland was money, and not provisions, and I heard the settlement re-echoed on this side. Why, if I understand the accounts rightly, there is a failure, a positive deficiency of the staple food of millions of the people of Ireland ("hear, hear" from Mr. O'Connell). I presume that no one here will now deny that. Well, how is money to supply that deficiency of food? Why, if they could change into ingots of gold their perishing potatoes it would not feed the people. There is plenty of corn, an honourable member below me says, and it is sent to England. His proposal is to keep in Ireland this food for the people. But if we have a million of people here depending on the provisions to the value of 10,000,000/- exported from Ireland, and that supply is kept back, of course the million in England must want food (hear, hear, hear). But the honourable member for Limerick leaves out of his consideration the people of this country; nay, more, he would interfere with their free access to food wherever it can be procured, for he would continue the bread tax in England, while he opens the ports in Ireland (hear, hear). I am not about to detain the house with any arguments as to the Corn Laws, nor shall I attempt to show that Ireland would benefit by their abolition. When I laboured out of doors for the total repeal of those laws, if I wanted a stronger appeal than another, I felt I could always quote with the most effect the state of Ireland. We hear of the people there living on water-cresses, sea-weed, and turnip-tops. Can we have a stronger proof that the Corn Laws have been of no use in improving the condition of the people, and that their repeal can do them no harm (cheers)? I agree with the honourable and learned member for Cork, that the repeal of the Corn Laws would afford the best possible chance of introducing manufactures into Ireland. Give Ireland Free Trade in corn and other provisions, and the people must be idle (which they are not)—they must be slothful and unenterprising (which I utterly deny)—or they will avail themselves of the west coast of Ireland and its magnificent streams and waterfalls for the establishment of those manufactures with which they can purchase the provisions to be wafted to their shores across the Atlantic (cheers). I am most anxious not to take up the time of the house by making any lengthened observations so as in any way to impede the progress of the great measure on the Corn Laws. I have intruded little in these debates, and deeply regret that the measures before the house have come to a dead lock (hear, hear). I am quite sure that the people of England are utterly puzzled and perplexed at the present state of things. I am almost as much so myself (hear, and a laugh). During the recess I was called on to hold great public meetings in Manchester and in London, to remonstrate as to the present position of the Corn Laws. I asked, "remonstrate with whom?" I declare, on my honour, I can't tell now with whom we could fairly remonstrate. I can't blame the Government; and even if I were disposed to do so, I can't agree to add to the weight of censure heaped on them with an unsparing hand (hear, and a laugh). I have no right to blame the members for Ireland; and inasmuch as I claim for myself the right of deciding what course I shall take in opposition to measures introduced into this house, I consider them entitled to judge for themselves how far they may be entitled to resist the first reading of the Coercion Bill (loud cheering). I deeply regret, however, the obstruction which has taken place. May I remind the honourable member for Limerick that the Liberal members on this side are quite as near in alliance with him for the good of Ireland as the noble member for Lynn and his supporters (cheers from the Opposition). It is rather hard to hear censures dispensed on the Liberal members in the same breath in which compliments are paid to the noble lord and his followers. I do hope that, on this side at all events, there will be good humour and cordial feeling (hear, hear, and a laugh), and I don't despair that on another evening we shall make some advance in the Corn Bill; in the passing of which I believe sincerely Ireland is more interested even than England (much cheering).

Mr. Cobden's speech produced a marked effect on the House; and Sir Robert Peel, Sir James Graham, and other occupants of the Treasury benches, were amongst the most emphatic of the cheerers. Happening to be closely observing the House, we feel convinced that Sir Robert Peel did not cheer the particular sentiment which provoked the subsequent personal altercation. The secret of the whole affair is this. Mr. Miles, Mr. Newdegate, and others of the protectionists, were terribly annoyed by the speech of Mr. Cobden. Meantime, Lord George Bentinck had retired "up stairs," to refresh himself, after his speech on the terms of the "Holy Alliance." We are not quite sure that Mr. D'Israeli was in the house during the whole of Mr. Cobden's speech; we rather think that he was brought down while the member for Stockport was on his legs, and eagerly informed by Mr. Miles, Mr. Newdegate, and others, that Sir Robert Peel had committed the unpardonable audacity of cheering Mr. Cobden's definition of "the people," as being those who lived in towns! Of course, he was told that he must get up, and try his hand once more at flaying a Prime Minister. We were struck by the peculiar loudness of the tones of Mr. D'Israeli, so different from his usual cool, cold, sneering style: it looked as if he had suddenly imbibed an impulse, and was exotically excited. This, however, is an exoteric matter, and be it as it may, Mr. D'Israeli proceeded to pin the First Lord of the Treasury in the following style:

MR. D'ISRAELI: Before we go to a division on this question I wish to say a few words with reference to a circumstance which occurred during the discussion. I cannot help noticing an observation made use of by the honourable member for Stockport, relative to a subject which in any time or in any place is well deserving of notice. I therefore think I may be permitted to advert to it in a few words. In making that observation the honourable gentleman has favoured us with a definition—which, if public men were to indulge in very often, might be considered advantageous. He did more. He has threatened us with imputations (hear, hear), he has held up to us the terrors of popular reprobation (hear, hear), and has imitated the conduct of many great examples in not shrinking from adding a definition of that with which he has menaced us (hear, hear). The authority he has followed is familiar to all of us—even its locality is recollected—but I can inform the honourable member that the street in which the three celebrated individuals who conceived they were the people of England lived is not any street in Stockport (hear, hear, and laughter). We are told by the honourable gentleman, without the slightest exception—without the least modifying qualification, that the people of England are the people who live in the towns, and that definition was loudly cheered by one gentleman, the expression of whose opinion or of whose feelings must always make a great impression on this house and throughout this country ("hear, hear," from some hon. members behind Mr. D'Israeli, and cries of "no, no," from Sir R. Peel and several hon. members near him). I say, sir, the right hon. baronet the first minister of the Crown, at the moment that the hon. member for Stockport held up what he called the country party (renewed cries of "no, no," from the same quarter). I repeat it—I say again that the first minister of the Crown—at a moment when the country party was threatened by the hon. member for Stockport with the indignation of the people, when that threat was followed by a neat and terse definition of what the people are—namely, that they are the persons who live in towns—cheered that definition (expressions of dissent). Yes. There was a very warm cheer from the first minister of the Crown (no, no). The right hon. baronet immediately cheered that expression. The circumstance struck me at the time; for it came from the same right hon. individual who was once so proud of being at the head of the gentlemen of England (loud cries of "hear, hear" from the protectionists). At the moment that the hon. member for Stockport, in a tone of menace, threatened the country party with the control of public opinion, and said that a powerful sentiment of indignation would arise among the people of England at their conduct, in the most frank and open spirit he gave them his definition of what the people were, as being the inhabitants of the towns. The right hon. baronet cheered that sentiment—he accepted that definition:

While Mr. D'Israeli was proceeding, and evidently warming into a furious speech (for, as we have already remarked, he was more impetuous than usual), Sir Robert Peel rose, and raising his hat, exclaimed, in a very marked manner: "That I totally deny!"

Mr. D'Israeli, thus arrested, in the full swing of his speech, paused, and said: "If the right honourable baronet means to say that anything I have said is false, of course I cease—I sit down."

In justice to Mr. D'Israeli, we must remark that Sir Robert Peel's interruption was far more significant than the reporters have indicated. In all the newspapers, Sir Robert Peel is reported as saying, "I totally deny that," which to a reader looks comparatively harmless. But the actual words were, and they were uttered in a very marked manner, "That I totally deny!"

We need not enter into the particulars of the various speeches which followed. The Parliamentary quarrel was succeeded by a Parliamentary reconciliation; and Mr. Cobden gave the following explanation of the meaning of the phrase which had excited the "scene":

Mr. COBDEN begged to remind the house that the language used by the hon. member for Sirewsbury, which had been adopted by the right honourable baronet, had not been used by him. That language was not his (hear, hear). What he said was, that the majority of the people ought necessarily to control the minority, and he was strictly correct in saying that the majority of the people—the bulk of the constituencies—lived in towns. In all constitutional states that would necessarily be the case (hear).

The debate on the Irish Coercion Bill was adjourned from Friday till Monday. On that night, Monday, Sir Robert Peel spoke: and uttered the following emphatic declaration as to his intentions with respect to the Corn Bill:

"I need hardly," said Sir Robert Peel, "refer to the ungracious surmise which I heard held out during the debate, that the Government had become indifferent to the progress of the Corn Bill, and had interposed this discussion with the view of defeating or delaying the bill I have mentioned (cries of "No, no," from the Opposition). I heard some honourable gentleman say that, though he did not think this himself, such was the public opinion. I declare (without any unnecessary protestation as to the sincerity of my conviction), that I hope it is sufficient for me now to state, that the progress of discussion, the lapse of time, and intervening events, have more strongly confirmed the opinion I entertained as to the necessity of the permanent and final adjustment of the Corn Laws (loud and long-continued cheers from the Opposition). I will not deny that my opinion on this question has lately undergone much change; but it is that restrictions which I first believed impolitic I now believe to be unjust (cheers). Consequently, my sense of their injustice precludes any compromise on my part (renewed cheers). What I proposed in the shape of the amount of duty, and as to the time of its continuance, is all I am enabled to offer; and in answer to those injurious suspicions which have been expressed, I think it enough to say that I am ready to attest, by any public act or declaration that is thought necessary, the sincerity of my motives (loud and long-continued cheering). So far then from urging the uniform usage of Parliament, with respect to such a bill as this, as a ground of obstruction to the commercial measures which Government has proposed, I have no wish to defer for a single day the final decision as to those measures (cheers)."

Another adjournment took place on Monday, but with the understanding that another night would terminate the discussion on the first reading of the bill for the Protection of Life and Property in Ireland.

In the House of Lords, on Tuesday, Lord Brougham delivered the following significant speech:

LORD BROUGHAM called the attention of the noble and learned lord upon the woolsack, and also of the noble duke (the Duke of Wellington), to a motion he was about to make for five returns connected with the question of the importation of corn from Ireland. The production of these papers could not be objected to, because they had already been produced in the other House. It might naturally suggest itself to noble lords that he was rather premature in moving for returns which went to affect the discussion they were about to have upon that most important measure, the Corn Bill, which, he perceived by the votes of the other House of Parliament, had at various times and in different manners occupied its attention during many weeks of the present session. It was a measure which he perceived from the same votes—for of course he could only look to the votes for information—had made no considerable progress in that house. The state into which the business of the country had been brought, according to the votes—which were the only records he had access to by the constitution of the country, by the law of Parliament, and with the most perfect regularity he was bound to admit, was such that in the foreign capital from which he had lately returned he had heard grave doubts expressed respecting the expediency of our system by persons with whom no doubt he differed upon nearly all political questions. He had in vain defended our system against his friends at the French bar, and among French politicians. He had argued with them, that what they looked upon as the radical defect and vice of our system was only of a passive, temporary, and accidental nature—that it must be accounted for by the varied caprice of fortune, which placed certain men in certain positions of which they availed themselves, affecting to be a measure which in their hearts they hated, or affecting to be against a measure which in their hearts they loved, complaining only that it did not go far enough, but using their position for the purpose of postponing it. He had given this explanation to his friends in France of the present state of things with regard to the Corn Bill. "But," said they, "facts are against you; you do not get on; your business is stopped; there is an utter incapacity to carry on the business of the country; and how long is it to last, or what is to happen, who can tell?" His other answer had been this: the nature of the British constitution, and its singular excellence, is, that wherever there shall happen to arise any temporary mischiefs from the friction of the parts of the machine, or any resistance in the medium through which it moves, there is in that great political engine—the perfection of human polity, as he firmly, conscientiously, and seriously believed—a well-regulated constitutional monarchy, acting by means of a well-regulated representative system—a vis mediatric, a power of re-adjustment, self-corrective and adaptive, which never failed to get rid of any temporary obstruction, and to restore harmony in the working of the great machine. Their lordships possessed a power within themselves of applying the corrective, and of administering an effectual remedy. If in any quarter, of whatever colour of politics, the desperate hope was entertained of frustrating the intentions of Parliament, and of the country, by endless and vexatious delays, or of postponing the arrival of that great, and, in his conscience he believed, most salutary measure into their lordships' house till it should be too late to discuss it (for without ample discussion God forbid it should be carried) this session, then the remedy was in their lordships' own hands, for they had the power of anticipating the discussion, and of coming to a deliberate and well-considered opinion. And if, in the course of a fortnight, he should, by having recourse again to the votes, still find the same obstruction to this, and indeed to all business elsewhere—for it was not to the Corn Bill, but to all other business that the obstruction referred—he should deem it his bounden duty, as their lordships had the unquestionable right, to bring on the subject for discussion without waiting for the bill; and thus give noble lords an opportunity of discussing, and deliberating, and pronouncing their opinion upon the general principle of that great and most important commercial change. And when their lordships, after discussion, should have pronounced a favourable opinion upon the principle, as he earnestly hoped and confidently expected would be the case, then he might venture, without any gift of prophecy, to foretell that the passage of that and other measures would no longer meet with obstruction elsewhere. With the view, therefore, of preparing for the discussion—which might be wholly unnecessary, but which might also become absolutely necessary—he took leave to move for the returns.

The House of Commons on Tuesday, was engaged in a discussion on the conduct of Mr. Smith O'Brien, who had deliberately refused to attend a Committee, on the plea that as an Irish member he would only attend to Irish affairs. This was adjudged to be a contempt of the jurisdiction of the house; and he was allowed till Thursday to consider whether or not he would submit, or else take the consequences.

The care of Lord Ashley's Ten Hours' Bill has devolved on Mr. Fielden; and on Wednesday the second reading came on. The "gangway" section have been making great exertions to bring up country gentlemen to vote on this occasion—the only object being the impotent and contemptible one of finding, if possible, another occasion for injuring the Government.

On Wednesday, after the disposal of a mass of railway and other business, the order of the day for the second reading of the Factories Bill was proposed.

Mr. Hume urged the inconvenience of proceeding with the bill at a period when so much private and public business remained for consideration, and pressed Mr. Fielden to withdraw it for the present, and to obtain the assent of the Government to its being brought forward on some future Government night.

A desultory conversation arose, during which Sir Robert Peel intimated an opinion that he could not assent to any arrangement of the nature proposed. Various members having urged that the debate should proceed,

Mr. Fielden rose, and, in a speech of considerable length, moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Ainsworth seconded the motion, referring to the progress of public opinion on the subject, and suggesting that a compromise might be effected by which the duration of factory labour might be limited to 11 hours.

Mr. Hume, after arguing that the bill would be an unjustifiable interference with the freedom of commerce and trade, and an undue restriction on the employment of labour, moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. Ward seconded the amendment.

Sir George Strickland urged the expediency of regulating factory labour to the extent proposed by the bill, which he consequently supported.

Sir James Graham assigned reasons why the Government had determined to support the amendment. In our four great staple branches of manufacture, the cotton, woollen, silk, and linen, there were half-a-million of people employed, the amount of wages paid weekly was about a quarter of a million sterling, and the proportion to our whole annual exports borne by the exports of these four branches was no less than three-fourths, amounting to from 35,000,000*l.* to 40,000,000*l.* An error, therefore, would prove of vital importance. They were told not to treat this question as one of pounds, shillings, and pence. But capital, profit, and wages all resolved themselves into pounds, shillings, and pence; and they could not treat it otherwise than with reference to acknowledged principles. A diminution of one-sixth in the hours of labour would amount to a tax of 16 per cent. on the capital employed; and they could, therefore, only uphold wages by raising the price of the article manufactured. But the competition in foreign markets rendered this impossible, and the reduction must inevitably fall on wages. It was the hard lot of a man that "in the sweat of his brow he should eat bread," and as the only capital of the working man was his labour, let them beware lest, with the purest motives, they were not attempting to aggravate the condition of the working man. In France, the United States, Prussia, Austria, and other continental countries, the hours of factory labour were as long, or longer, than in this country; and we could not maintain with them an unequal struggle, burdened as we were with many restrictions.

He believed that the repeal of the Corn Law would effect more good to the working population, believing as he now did that it was not merely unwise, but unjust. On this subject he had changed his opinion, and had been exposed to some obloquy on account of it. But having had an opportunity of calmly reviewing his judgment on this matter, he was more and more convinced that the Corn Law was the great obstacle to the prosperity of the capitalist and the welfare of the working classes. On these grounds he joined in opposing the bill.

Mr. Mark Philips expressed his satisfaction with the statesmanlike speech which had been delivered by Sir James Graham, and urged the practical objection to the interference with adult labour.

Mr. Banks then moved the adjournment of the debate, which after some conversation was agreed to, being fixed for Wednesday week.

On Thursday, Mr. Smith O'Brien, still persisting in his refusal to obey the order of the house to attend a committee, was formally committed to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms. The remainder of the evening was occupied by business of a varied nature. Mr. Hawes gained a victory over the Government on the subject of the long-disputed Danish claims; carrying a motion for compensation by a majority of 18. Mr. Bouverie also obtained the appointment of a select committee, to inquire into the condition of labourers employed on railways and other public works, and to devise ameliorative measures.

In the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor proposed the second reading of the Government bill, called the Religious Opinions Relief Bill, the object of which is to repeal the various penal statutes which still slumber on the statute-book, against Papists, "recusants," Dissenters, and so forth. The introduction of such a bill, and its reception in the House of Lords, is a very striking proof of our progress. The Bishop of Exeter gave a slight note of opposition; but generally speaking the peers indicate that they have moved with the rest of the world on the subject of toleration. It is to be hoped that they will exhibit equal liberality on the subject of corn.

NOMINATION FOR THE FALKIRK DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

FALKIRK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29.—The nomination of candidates for the representation of the burghs of Falkirk, Airdrie, Hamilton, Linlithgow, and Lanark, took place here to-day, upon a hustings erected on a vacant space of ground called the Calender-Riggs, fused occasionally as a market-place for the sale of cattle. A good deal of interest was excited on the occasion, and but one feeling seemed to prevail, that Lord Lincoln ought to have taken the pledge prescribed to him—namely, that he should retire in Mr. Wilson's favour when a general election took place. The Liberal interest is divided to some little extent. Many are willing, under present circumstances, to give Lord Lincoln the benefit of their suffrages on account of the position he occupies in the present Ministry; but the great proportion of the Free Trade electors are determined to adhere to Mr. Wilson, the man of their choice, as they maintain that while Lord Lincoln goes along with them in the repeal of the Corn Laws, he will not be so fair an exponent of their views on other great questions of civil and commercial liberty.

The canvass has been prosecuted with great vigour, short as is the time since the candidates came into the field. According to Mr. Wilson's party, that gentleman has a majority of 100, as regards those electors who have pledged on both sides; but as there are fully more than 200 of the constituency who at present stand neutral, it is difficult to say who will be the successful candidate. The protectionist party are said to be united in their support of Lord Lincoln; and it is reported that all the influence of Lord Lincoln's father-in-law, the Duke of Hamilton, will be brought to bear on the constituencies of Hamilton and Lanark, in favour of his noble relative.

The two candidates, Lord Lincoln and Mr. Wilson, appeared on the hustings shortly after 12 o'clock, surrounded by a large body of friends. The crowd assembled on the occasion would not number much above 500 persons, who gave the candidates a fair and impartial hearing.

After the Sheriff had read the writ, and the Act against bribery and corruption,

Colonel HAMILTON, of Cairnhill, came forward and proposed Lord Lincoln, whose nomination was seconded by Bailie Swin, of Hamilton.

Provost DAWSON, of Linlithgow, seconded by Dr. Hamilton, Airdrie, nominated Mr. Wilson, of Dundee.

Lord LINCOLN then presented himself, and was but coldly received. His lordship commenced by referring to the position which he occupied as a member of the Cabinet, and the absolute necessity there was for strengthening the hands of the Government at the present moment by sending him to Parliament. He declared that he had no knowledge of the requisition which had been sent by so large a body of the electors some time ago to his opponent, Mr. Wilson, else he would not have come forward. In reference to not agreeing to the condition which was asked of him, that in the event of his receiving the support of Mr. Wilson's requisitionists, he would retire in that gentleman's favour when a general election occurred, his lordship stated that his sole objection to such a pledge was, that it would impose a condition on the constituency which was unconstitutional, inasmuch as it would prevent them, if they should be pleased with the manner in which he discharged his duties, from again asking him to come forward at a general election, which, however, he had no intention of doing. It could not be unknown to them, it was known to the whole world, and he wished to make no secret of the matter, and his colleagues did not wish to make any secret of it, that the force of the Government had been greatly weakened by their adopting measures of Free Trade. Nobody could read the newspapers without observing that the Government were not supported by the large body that used formerly to support their measures, and it could not fail to be observed that a great proportion of that party were bent, not only on defeating Free Trade measures, but on frustrating their passing. Was it not a fact, that within these few days an alliance had been attempted to be formed between the agricultural protection party in the House of Commons, and the repealers of Ireland? Nobody could have failed to see that an attempt of this kind had been made, and was in progress of completion, unless others should come forward and support ministers (hear, hear). Could anybody witness these things without seeing that nothing but the position in which the Government found themselves placed towards the country and towards the Queen, could induce them to persevere with these measures? Could anything be more painful, more irksome, and more onerous, than the position of the Ministers of the Crown at the present moment? They had not placed themselves in that position from a regard to any selfish object, or from a regard to any private feeling, or from any wish to retain power. For what, then, had they placed themselves in this position? It was done from a conscientious conviction that the measures which they had proposed were essentially necessary for the interests of the country. It must, however, be borne in mind that the protection party had more than once thrown it in the teeth of the Government that the country were not with them. They say, look at the election of South Nottingham. There their Irish Secretary was defeated by a considerable majority. Look at their Colonial Secretary. He was unable to obtain his re-election. The protection party say that in both these instances the members of the Government were defeated by the protectionists. Now he would come to the third instance. Did not the protectionists point, and with still greater force, to the defeat of Captain Rous in Westminster? Do they not say, Here was a man who professed himself an advocate of Free Trade measures? (A voice from the crowd—"He was a turncoat, as well as yourself.") They might call him (Lord Lincoln) a turncoat. He could assure them that such a phrase passed him unheeded and unconcerned (hear, hear, hear). He had not the slightest hesitation in avowing that he was not always a Free Trader, and therefore he gave the person who had made use of the term the full benefit of his observation (hear). But he was referring to the case of Captain Rous. Captain Rous was defeated, and he was defeated by the union of the protection party with the extreme Free Trade Liberal party (hear, hear). The protection party in Parliament pointed, and with justice, to such a victory, and said, "Was this a proof of the desire of the country for Free Trade measures?" It was true that there was a love for Free Trade, but the country loved individuals more. Could it be possible that if the country were so interested in the progress of Free Trade measures as was said to be the case, they would reject him who was not only able to give as much assistance as another in carrying them out, but who also, from his connection with the Government would be able more efficiently to do them service? This was the manner in which the protectionists reasoned upon the subject, and the use they made of the rejections he had referred to (hear, hear, hear). He had very little doubt that Mr. Wilson's powers and abilities were greater than his; but he did say that it had been proved, at this particular juncture, that the Government now in power was the only one which would be able to carry these measures out ("hear, hear," and "Oh.") When it was found that the interests of the country demanded these measures, which could no longer with safety be postponed, did not the present Government endeavour to hand over to others the power to carry them into effect? And what was the result? They were unable to do so. Lord John Russell himself had since stated, in the House of Commons, that he would have failed if he had attempted it. This being the case, he (Lord Lincoln) must ask, was it wise, in reference to these measures, to reject a member of the Government? Lord John Russell had failed, and it was proved that he could not carry them. Was it wise to reject a member of the Government, when by so doing they were destroying the moral effect which must attend the re-election of a member of the Cabinet as a representative in the House of Commons at the present moment? He was sure that if they were playing the game of the protection party, they could not play it more effectually and better than they were now doing (cries of "No, no," from the crowd). He heard a voice saying "No." But he would appeal to them whether, if Lord George Bentinck, or any of those acting with him in the House of Commons, were to dictate the course which a constituency like this should pursue, where he knew that the majority of the Free Traders was so great, they would not desire that they should take that course which had been taken in Westminster, and when they had two Free Traders to deal with, that the electors should reject the one connected with the Government and take the other? He besought the electors to consider the consequences that must attend his rejection. He was confident that his anticipations would be realised and that they would find that the Government measures would be retarded, he should not say even for a time, but absolutely defeated. He was confident that if the result of the election should turn out to be that Mr. Wilson was returned, however much the Free Traders of Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, and other places, at other times might rejoice, on this occasion they would deeply regret it. He was confident that in these great marts of commerce there would be lamentation and regret. He was equally certain that it would be the cause of joy and exultation in No. 17, New Bond-street ("hear, hear," and laughter). He would not, he was sure, ask any man to waive his political opinions to him. He would not do it himself to any man; and he would ask no man to do what he himself was not prepared to do; but he must say that no political opinion would be compromised by this course, and he was quite confident that if the electors took the course which he recommended, they would be furthering in the only way which they possessed the measures which they had so much at heart. Had he been addressing another constituency, he would have entered at some length into the question which was now before the House of Commons. He did so when addressing the constituency of South Nottingham, before he was defeated, because he felt that it was his incumbent duty to endeavour to convince them, however feeble might be his efforts. He felt, however, that the constituency he was now addressing required no conviction. He knew that they were satisfied of the importance of the measure of Free Trade, and, therefore, he felt that it would be a mere waste of time. An elector had called out to him that he was a turncoat, and Mr. Wilson, in his address, had stated that he was no new convert to Free Trade. He (Lord Lincoln) knew that such was the case, and he supposed that he meant to draw a contrast between himself and him (Lord Lincoln). If such was the case, he would say that he thought that if they taxed him with being a turncoat and a convert to Free Trade, they ought to bear in mind the sacrifices he had made in the matter, and that before they used it as a term of reproach they ought to consider what were the motives which could possibly influence him in changing his opinions. If there was any man amongst them who could assign any motive of a personal and improper character, they might brand him, if they would, and kick him out of the town (applause). Why, every interest connected with the maintenance of power, every interest in regard to his personal friends, every interest in regard to a constituency that he respected and loved, every interest of a domestic and private kind was at variance with the step he took (hear, hear). But he would not ask them to attach too much importance to that. He would not ask them to acquit him of any improper motives because his interests were all one way while his conduct was another; but he did say, that even as regarded this election the fact of his being a convert to these measures did not make him less fit to be the representative of these opinions than Mr. Wilson (hear, hear); and for this reason, that most frequently in public life nineteen-twentieths of the men who went into Parliament adopted their principles, not from accurate observation and study, but because they were brought up in a certain society, and because they were educated in those principles. If the men who have been brought up in these principles have subsequently, after mature reflection and study, and after testing them by observation and experience, changed their views without any appearance of corrupt and improper motives, he thought that was rather an additional reason, not only of the proof of the soundness of these principles, but a security that he was a fit and proper person to carry them into effect. Lord Lincoln then said that he had entered into this contest believing that he was acting in accordance with the wishes of the electors unanimously, or something nearly so. He concluded by requesting those who had promised to support him at the poll to come early on Friday morning, and to bring their friends along with them, and said that although the contest would be a close one, he had every reason to anticipate success.

MR. WILSON, who was received with great applause, made some introductory remarks as to the poor effect which the remarks he intended to make would have upon the meeting, coming, as they did, after the able address of the Earl of Lincoln, who was not only high in rank, but held the distinguished position of a Cabinet Minister. (A Voice: "It's not men, but measures that we want.") As, however, the electors who had been so kind as to put him in this position had not asked him to make any apology for them, he considered that he now stood in the high position of being for the first time on an equality with his lordship, as they were both seeking the same thing—the suffrages of the electors (cheers). The noble lord having stated his claims, it was now his (Mr. Wilson's) duty to do the same; but, before doing this, it might be necessary that he should say a few words on the position in which they respectively stood, as a great part of this contest, particularly as regarded Lord Lincoln himself, was in reference to the relation in which they stood to each other. He hoped and trusted that he would be able to show that this contest was not of his seeking. It had been already stated, but he would take the liberty of stating it to them again, that a requisition from the electors of five different burghs had been presented to him some months ago. That requisition, so numerously signed as to secure, in his opinion, his election, asked him when a dissolution took place—a vacancy was not the word, but he considered them the same thing—to allow himself to be named as a candidate for their suffrages. In answer to this requisition, he sent a letter to each of the electors, stating that he agreed to pledge himself to come forward whenever they required him to do so. Things remained in this position till Monday week, when an application was made to him on the part of the friends of Lord Lincoln, but not by himself, that, in the event of the late member, Mr. Baird, resigning his seat, he (Mr. Wilson) would waive his claim upon the electors at this time. The arguments used to induce him to do this were, in the first place, that Lord Lincoln was a Cabinet Minister, and that being a Cabinet Minister without a seat in the House of Commons, it was of great consequence that he should have a seat, so as to enable the present Government to carry through their Free Trade measures. His (Mr. Wilson's) answer at once was that for himself, he had not the slightest objection; but the question was, would the constituency go along with him? In order to ascertain this, he consulted the electors in the different burghs who had signed the requisition, and in three of the burghs it was carried unanimously to allow him to waive his privilege for the present in favour of Lord Lincoln. In two of the burghs there was a slight difference of opinion, but a motion to the same effect was ultimately carried by a majority. In allowing him to waive his claims for the present, they attached to it a condition, that his lordship should pledge himself not to come forward when a general election took place, as it was their intention to give their suffrages to a candidate whose principles were more in accordance with their own upon questions of general politics. After being through all the burghs, he (Mr. Wilson) called upon Lord Lincoln and communicated to him what had passed, and pointed out to him the condition to which he had alluded. His lordship frankly and immediately said, that that was a condition with which he feared he could not comply. He asked his lordship to reconsider the matter, because, if that was to be his answer, he was afraid that the arrangement would be broken up. The next morning he received a communication from his lordship, reiterating the same statement—that he still held that it was his duty to decline such a pledge. He was glad, however, to hear from what his lordship had stated in the address which he had just delivered, that he had now no intention to offer himself again as a candidate for those burghs. (Lord Lincoln—"I said so throughout.") He wished his lordship had stated to him (Mr. Wilson), when he applied to him what he had now stated; he would have felt it to be his duty to have communicated it to the constituency, and he would almost take upon himself to say that they would have so modified the written pledge, and allowed the field to be left open for Lord Lincoln. (A Voice—"Leave it yet.") He would therefore leave it with them to judge of the causes which had led to this contest. He thought that the pledge which was asked of Lord Lincoln was nothing more than reasonable. He was not so versed in court punetilio as to see the difference between his lordship saying that he would not stand and that he had no intention of standing (a laugh). He thought it was a distinction without a difference. He could assure them that he did not wish to say a word that would hurt the feelings of Lord Lincoln, in waiting upon whom he had received every courtesy and respect. He considered it right that he should now say a sentence or two upon his own political views (hear, hear). He would give his assistance to every thing which would tend to promote the spread of civil and religious liberty (tremendous cheering). With regard to the great question that was now agitating the country—that of Free Trade—it had his most hearty support.

He considered that they were all under a debt of great gratitude to the present Ministry, who had come forward with this bold measure—the boldest measure proposed in this country since the Reform Bill; and he hoped and trusted that, notwithstanding all the drags which were put upon it, it would yet come out of the House of Commons unscathed. (A Voice—"What length will you go in extending the franchise?") He would answer that question by and-by. While he thought they were under the deepest obligations to the present Ministry for proposing so enlarged a measure of Free Trade, he thought it would not do to leave the subject without expressing regret that they had not gone farther. But it was not the present Ministry that were entitled to all the honour connected with these measures. They must go farther back. They must go back to the people, who had brought their weight to bear upon the question. That great body, the Anti-Corn Law League, were the chief instruments in carrying this matter forward (cheers). In fact, that League had set up a new sort of representation in opposition to the representation of the House of Commons: and the members of that League formed a body which acted so energetically on Government, that they found there was no resisting it. And then there also came to the assistance of Government an ally of a very extraordinary kind in the shape of a failure in the potato crop; so that Ministers were obliged to consider the subject, and to devise the present measures. He thought that Government ought never to have clogged the measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws with the condition of three years. They ought to have repealed them at once (cheers). More than that, he would have had them to include, in this present bill, all the protective duties which exist, as protection was the worst of all ways to raise a revenue. He would also have all the import taxes taken off every article of food; especially of such articles as tea and sugar. He was also opposed to that clause in the Irish Coercion Bill, which declared that all parties who were found out of their houses between sunset and sunrise, and who were not able to give a reason for so being out of their houses, should be subject to such a heavy punishment as transportation (hear, hear, and cheers). He considered that this was unduly interfering with the liberty of the subject, and was actually a sort of forging fetters for the people of Ireland (hear). Other laws should be adopted for the state of Ireland than these. Mr. Wilson went on to say, that he claimed their suffrages because he knew that his political opinions were more in harmony with theirs than those of his lordship; and that it would be altogether an anomaly for such a Liberal constituency to return as their representative a Conservative. Mr. Wilson then answered the question put to him as to the extension of the franchise; and stated, that while he was for an extension of it beyond the present 10% qualification, he had not made up his mind as to the exact length he would go. He concluded amidst great applause.

The sheriff then called for a show of hands, when only about a dozen were held up for Lord Lincoln. A poll was demanded, on the part of his lordship, by Colonel Hamilton, and the polling was fixed by the sheriff to take place on Friday.

At this stage of the proceedings a person asked Lord Lincoln what length he would go in the extension of the suffrage; to which his lordship at once frankly replied that he would not extend it farther than it was at present.

The assemblage then quietly dispersed.

STATE OF THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS OF LANCASHIRE.

(From a Correspondent of the Times.)

MANCHESTER, APRIL 25.—There is a whisper floating here that it is the intention of the "protection" party, by means of an unholy alliance, to extinguish the Ministerial Corn Bill and Tariff.

If there be truth in this rumour—which Heaven forbid!—then will there be, for once at least, a fatal realisation of the truth of the well-known phrase, "Quos Deus vult perdere prius dementat."

It is difficult to believe that men professing to be enlightened, as the "protectionists" do, and pretending to be acquainted with the condition and the wants of the country, would venture to exhibit so besotted a state of mind as to arrest—for that is all they could do—a measure, the justice and necessity of which have been proved and re-proved at least a thousand times, by men of all ranks of life, and which could be enforced again and again, with the eloquence of truth and nature, and with a withering sarcasm, by thousands of our horny-handed and fustian-jacketed operatives in this district. Were it not that we have the history of the Reform Bill before our eyes, and the absurd and futile obstructions thrown in its way by men said to possess hereditary wisdom, we could scarcely give credit for a moment to such a report. But well recollecting that period, and witnessing the escapades of dukes, earls, and barons, who all anticipated revolutions and commotions which never existed anywhere but in their heated imaginations, we are disposed to place reliance on the statement that the monopolists intend to overthrow the Bill.

If such folly and wickedness be contemplated, the protectionists must have most erroneous views as to the condition of the manufacturing districts, and, like the ostrich in the hour of danger, must imagine that, by shutting their eyes to coming evils, they will thereby escape from their consequences. Before such an act was perpetrated, would it not be wise in some of them to visit this hive of human intelligence and industry, that an honest report of "the goolly land" might be prepared for the emergency? To see with their own eyes and hear with their own ears would doubtless be exceedingly inconvenient, as staggering facts and alarming statements, painfully true, might derange impending orations and produce some serious conversions. But if the protectionists will not examine for themselves into the state of the northern manufacturing districts, let them "lay not the flattering unction to their souls" that all the rest of the Kingdom are as blind, and partial, and indolent as themselves. To the great mass of the enlightened and liberal-minded people of England (in whom may be comprised men of every political shade of opinion) the state—the fearful state of the manufacturing districts, is fully and accurately known.

So long as the labouring community in this district are provided with full work and liberal wages they are contented and happy. A more peaceable, industrious, and honest population is not to be found within her Majesty's dominions. But deprive the people of employment and the means of subsistence, expose them to poverty and disease, and crime will not lag behind. Hunger is said to break through stone walls. How wise must be the policy of that Minister whose object is the maintenance of honest employment for our ingenious and able-bodied artisans and operatives, the continuance to them of good wages in return for their labour, and the plentiful supply of sound, wholesome and cheap food! In these gifts the Minister would form the best and cheapest defence of this and every other part of the nation, and without them the tranquillity of no populous manufacturing district can be preserved.

It may have been inferred, from the dead calm that appears to pervade all classes in respect to the great Ministerial measure of the session, that no public interest or anxiety is felt on the question. If such a notion prevail in any influential circle, a great error has been fallen into. The interest, the anxiety, the intense desire on the subject, are strong and powerful as ever; and it would have been strange indeed had it not been so; for the struggle here has not been one of party, but of principle. After the first week's debate in the Commons on the measure, some impatience was exhibited from the frivolous nonsense dealt forth by tenth-rate "Protection" orators; but, as it was felt that these gentlemen were indulging in a sort of last-dying speeches, charity and patience were extended to them with a liberal hand, in the hope that the force of opposition would soon pass away, and be followed by a measure of substantial justice.

The people here now appear to be in the transition state, from the passive to the active mood. Surprise and indignation seem to be spreading; and, if trickery or procrastination be tried as a hoodwink, the united voice of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Cheshire, will reverberate among the valleys and hills, that the sound will be heard within St. Stephen's, as on memorable occasions gone by.

Then, with reference to the League. A notion has been entertained that that organization is virtually extinct, and that its resuscitation would be impossible. "The wish is father to the thought." The League had never more vital elements within it than at this moment. Let the "Protectionists" kick out Peel's bill, and the League, in 48 hours afterwards would be reanimated and full of vigour "as a giant refreshed;" its strides would be over the length and breadth of the land; if a quarter of a million fund should not be sufficient, a half million, or a million fund would be raised to meet monopoly in its strongholds, and to vindicate the justice of Free Trade. This is no idle boast, as the Protectionists and their allies would soon find to their cost. The vast population in the manufacturing districts have set their hearts upon freedom from monopoly; and from the achievements of the past an opinion may be formed as to the successes of the future.

The opposition hitherto given to Sir Robert Peel's bill, too frequently "frivolous and vexatious," has been productive of extensive mischief. The staple manufacture of this district has been almost paralysed, and both masters and men have been driven nearly to the verge of ruin. The delay has been detrimental to all classes, and if much longer continued the effects will be disastrous. On all sides do we hear that the stagnation in trade will increase in proportion as the Corn Bill and the tariff are delayed. Manufacturers, merchants, and shopkeepers are haunted with uncertainty and indecision, not knowing, in this doubtful state of things, what to do for the best.

A gentleman here, very extensively engaged in manufactures, communicates as follows:—"The present state of trade is much depressed, there being no demand. The spinning department is a good deal depressed, compared with the last year; still, that may be considered to be about the best part of the cotton trade. The hands, generally speaking, are pretty fully employed, with the exception of hand-loom weavers; nor is there any alteration in wages. In the present state of the market, parties who have to manufacture even by power have great difficulty in maintaining their ground. There seems to be a deep regret that the progress of the Ministerial measure is so much retarded, as the delay tends to depress manufactures. It is thought that, if it were to pass into a law, a revival of trade would immediately follow; but, on the other hand, if it be delayed too long, there is very little hope of experiencing a brisker trade before the latter end of the year."

Another letter from a leading merchant, with no strong party predilections, has the following passage:—"That the present Free Trade measure before Parliament tends to depress there can be no doubt, arising from the uncertainty as to its results. But eventually, if passed, it is the opinion of parties in political society, whether Whig or Tory, that it will do a great deal of good; and the majority are anxious to have it passed."

It is proper to add, that at present there are upwards of 1500 hand-loom weavers in this town entirely unemployed. A communication made by two of the unemployed weavers to the writer of this letter is as follows:—"The present statement is to inform you that there is a great number of hand-loom weavers thrown on the streets for want of employment. The workpeople of Messrs. Aspinall, Turner, and Co., are 200 in number, all idle; of Messrs. Swainson and Birchwood, 300, all idle; of Messrs. George Faulkner and Co., 300, all unemployed; of Messrs. Peter Dixon and Sons, 400, a few employed. The fabrics of work manufactured by these gentlemen are chiefly coarse handkerchiefs, buff checks, and occasionally coarse gingham. We are told that our misery at present is caused by Sir R. Peel's measure in the House of Commons not taking its proper effect."

Such is the present state of this populous district. It is placed in imminent peril, and the consequences no man can predicate.

One word as to the result of Sir R. Peel's measures. Should the bill be passed, the effect would immediately be seen in the restoration of trade to general activity, in the employment of all classes of the working community, and in the diffusion of content and happiness among all ranks of the people in the manufacturing districts. On the other hand, if the bill should be thrown out, or further delayed, there would be no outbreak, no resort to physical force or violence, no tumult or outrage. The men who have guided the Corn Law agitation have taught a higher class of political ethics than dependence on riot and insubordination. Their appeals have constantly been to the mind, to the judgment, the reason, the entire thinking powers of their auditors. But, if the bill be thrown out we shall not be in a quiet or tranquil state; there will be no supineness, no inertness. The mottoes will be, "England expects every man to do his duty," "Up, Guards, and at 'em!" The intellects of the district will be in arms; a moral commotion, a mighty revolution will be heartily and simultaneously embarked in; and who of the Buckingham or Richmond faction will be powerful enough to arrest the headlong torrent? The struggle there will be, not for repeal in three years, but for total and immediate repeal. The cry will be for present, not procrastinated justice; and the victory will be decided in favour of the many, as surely as triumph has already crowned their exertions.

It is to be hoped, however, that the folly and hopelessness of arresting public opinion will be abandoned, and that decent submission to a force so irresistible will at length be resolved upon. By continuing their crusade, the protectionists can gain nothing but odium, contempt, and defeat. The people are too many for them; and the claims of justice are too powerful and too highly prized by the industrial millions of Great Britain to be given up, with regretful feeling, at the summons of a select party of men, whom a breath has made, and whom a breath can unmake.

FOREIGN NATIONS AND FREE TRADE.

(From the Times.)

The Continent of Europe and the United States are infested with one class of politicians and political writers, whose blind and ignorant hostility towards this country has led them first to ascribe to the Government of England certain general characteristics, infinitely remote from the true spirit of our policy; and, secondly, to shape all the incidents of our history to fit their preconceived errors. To support the doctrine that the views of the British Cabinet are invariably dictated by the most long-sighted cunning to the most selfish ends, these wretches indulge themselves with unlimited perversion of fact, and they invent the strongest theories to account for their construction of the simplest occurrences. According to this absurd class of observers, Great Britain made war upon the Chinese solely to enforce the sale of opium in the Celestial Empire, and it was not Sir Henry Pottinger, but the French Envoy, who opened the five Chinese ports to the trade of all nations. The Right of Search Treaties were crafty conventions, framed solely to enable British cruisers to harass the commerce of all other states. The emancipation of the negroes was a scheme for improving the cultivation of sugar and cotton in India by the voluntary sacrifice of 20 millions of money and the destruction of the permanent prosperity of the West Indian colonies. The late campaign upon the Sutlej was not the result of an unprovoked aggression by the Sikhs, but of the grasping designs of England upon the Panjab. So that, by dint of misstatements and misconstructions, the most glorious, humane, and praiseworthy traits of our history are obscured, and an attempt is made to throw suspicion upon each of those great changes in national policy which have of late years originated with England, but which are destined to make the circuit of the globe when they have triumphed over the prejudices of less enlightened communities. The onward course of this country is, indeed, by no means affected by these childish cavillings of our foreign detractors. We have no fear but that the best men of our own contemporaries and of all time will do justice to the services which England has rendered in this generation to the interests of freedom, religion, civilisation, and humanity. As long as public opinion at home is enlightened, and the public conscience sound, we care as little as any people ought to do for the censure or applause of the world; but we are conscious, and we may reasonably regret, that the complete accomplishment of the great public objects we have in view is sometimes postponed by the imperfect comprehension or the unfounded mistrust of other nations.

These remarks may be applied with particular cogency to the progress of Free Trade in foreign countries, and to the impression which the measure now before the House of Commons has produced in the world. It has at once stultified all the predictions and belied all the arguments of the Continental protectionists with reference to the policy of this country, and it has shaken the ground beneath them at home. After having denounced in every shape those commercial treaties by which England was, in their opinion, seeking to compass the destruction of every country with which she has an established trade, they see her, disdainful to make a mere political bargain where the laws of commerce insure her success, strike down the barriers even of protection, whilst they are still hugging the chains of prohibition. The competition which they dreaded before becomes infinitely more formidable since the industrious classes of England are to be supplied with food at the same rate as the rest of Europe. The protection which we are removing is not so much protection to the British farmer as to the foreign manufacturer; and instead of imitating our example, or the example of the unprotected manufactures of Switzerland, there never was a time when foreign Governments have been more likely to encounter a vigorous resistance to a reform of their tariffs.

But these delusions, these mistakes, and these pernicious remedies for artificial diseases, will ere long be corrected and discarded by the force of example, truth, and time. The whole argument against Free Trade is already narrowed from a general defence to a special plea. Some few years back the laws of public economy were themselves denied, and their application altogether resisted. But experience, and, above all, the example of this country in a variety of public and private transactions, have put down these absurdities. The defence of protection is now conducted by what the lawyers call confession and avoidance. Its foreign partisans do not venture to deny its general advantages, and they acquit England of any intention to commit a deliberate suicide; but they allege some peculiar obstacle or disqualification for the introduction of Free Trade measures amongst themselves. Free Trade principles have supported the public revenue in England, lowered prices, kept up wages, extended trade, and opened a new era of greatness to the people of this country; but the German minor States shrink with alarm from the moderate suggestions of commercial reform made by the Prussian Government. The Russian official journal declares that a long course of rigorous protection is an indispensable preparation for the dangerous indulgence of Free Trade; and that until the Emperor has created a Manchester by bounties and prohibitions, a premium shall be indirectly given to the cultivation of her agricultural produce elsewhere; so that, like the dog and the shadow in the fable, he drops the solid interests of the empire to grasp at a system of imaginary and fallacious improvement. In France, upon two recent occasions, the Minister of Commerce and of Finance have held language which, indeed, we expected from them, but which their colleagues, M. Guizot and M. Duchatel, must have blushed to hear. They are not even capable of understanding the principles which they reject. No doubt they may appeal with effect to the interests which predominate in the Chamber of Deputies and in the electoral body. No doubt they may pay for the political support they receive by sacrificing the practical interests of the community to the inordinate pretensions of capitalists enriched by the system of prohibition, and of men who themselves declare that without prohibition they should be nothing. But at no distant period the real interest of the consumer and of the people will be better understood. The French nation will inquire what it is that constitutes the difference between themselves and their neighbours, and makes prohibition so indispensable on one side of the Channel and Free Trade on the other. They will ascertain that in England a vast system of financial reform has been in progress for many years, by which the burden of many millions sterling of taxation has been removed from the people, from the necessities of life, and from raw materials. They will remember that since the Revolution of July no remission of taxation whatever has taken place, with the single exception of the duty on the sale of wine in 1831, though during the whole of that period the prosperity of the country and the public revenue have gone on to increase. A private member of the Chamber of Deputies recently brought forward a measure for the reduction of the salt duty from 3d. to 1d. per kilogramme; and so irresistible was the case he established, that in spite of the Minister of Finance, the Chamber adopted the proposal. For the first time for many years the interest of the consumer has thus been boldly and fairly pressed upon the French Legislature. M. de Lamartine, more especially, has distinguished himself by the enlightened sagacity with which he has taken up the cause of the labouring population; and we have no doubt that if he will apply his eminent capacity and his independent character to promote the application of a more liberal commercial policy, he will render the greatest services to his country.

It is true that we confidently anticipate that Free Trade will secure great advantages to this country, and we are far more anxious to make those advantages our own than to obtain the assent of foreign nations to the principles we profess. This is now the extent of those interested and designing views which some of those nations impute to us. We invited them to accompany us; upon their refusal, we condemn them to follow us. They will seek in vain to strengthen the bolts and bars of protection. The wall of China would not save them now; for men will not always believe that the welfare of society depends on making things artificially dear which are naturally cheap, or on raising obstacles to the free intercourse of mankind, to which they mainly owe whatever of wealth, enjoyment, and civilisation they already possess.

THE O'BRIEN AND BENTINCK COALITION.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

The well-timed and most effective speech in which, on Friday night, Mr. Cobden brought back the wandering attention of the house to the real question before it, and did prompt and sharp justice on the authors and the objects of the O'Brien and Bentinck convention, may, probably, have a use beyond the immediate occasion. Other parties, besides the honourable members for Limerick and Lynn, are too much in the habit of "leaving out of their consideration the people of this country;" and the very dangerous blunder of rather losing sight of the origin of the discussion" which has been so long dragging about, and seems still to have an indefinite futurity of duration, is one to which circumstances offer just now so many plausible inducements, that we must lay our account with seeing the weaker-headed sort of politicians altogether unable to sustain a concentrated attention to the facts before their eyes. We must, in common kindness, recall these wandering wits, and brush up these cloudy memories—for the consequences might be serious of carrying this kind of forgetfulness too far. It is really a work of charity no less than of patriotism, to keep perpetually present to the protectionist mind that unaltered and unalterable state of facts on which the responsible heads of the party will eventually have to form a judgment. They will have their attention brought back, one of these days, to the "origin of the discussion"—either by Sir Robert Peel and the House of Commons, or by the League, the constituencies, and the country; and it is highly desirable that their attention should not, in the meantime, be suffered to wander so far as to require a harsher and more disagreeable species of memento.

We beg then to remind all those extremely imprudent persons who dream that the question now before the country is susceptible of some cunning sort of compromise, or "adjustment," that the whole business has long since been taken out of their hands altogether. As the discussion now lingering through Parliament had not its origin in any Parliamentary party, or combination of parties, it lies not within the power of party men to settle it by private compact among themselves. It is not a thing to be "arranged." Mr. D'Israeli's "gentlemen of England," and Lord George Bentinck's patriots who "reign in the heart" of Ireland, did not set this question going, and cannot stop it or turn it aside now that it is going. Parliamentary parties did not create that revolution of opinion which has prepared the people of the United Kingdom to expect and demand a legislative revolution to match; nor can they control that fearful necessity which has given sudden development and maturity to a force that might else have taken another year or two to finish its growth. The question is not theirs, in either of its great elements—and any pretension on their part to dispose of it by way of "arrangement," is a sheer impertinence. After all their arrangements are completed, they will discover that "there are other parties to be consulted," namely, those who, whether living in towns or villages, buy and sell, and receive wages, and pay taxes, and eat bread, and have votes, and make Houses of Commons, and are, de jure and de facto, the rulers of the empire in the last resort. For the answer which these "other parties" would make to that question on which the fanatics of the protectionist faction pretend a desire to ascertain their opinion, we are contented to refer to Mr. Cobden's well-remembered analysis of the state of the constituencies, the data and results of which have not yet been confronted by any counter-statement or calculation that has chanced to come under our observation.

The perfect and unhesitating conviction felt by those who have most carefully studied and best understand the great practical problem of electoral dynamics, as to the results of that "appeal to the people" which would instantly ensue on any serious attempt at compromise, is the chief source of the somewhat deceptive quiet which the country now exhibits. The people take things easily, partly because they have a good deal of faith in Sir Robert Peel—mainly because they have an undoubting and absolute assurance of faith in their own power to supply all Sir Robert Peel's political or moral deficiencies. We had much rather not be appealed to, because the appeal would be a costly and unenjoyable procedure, and time presses; and we do not expect to be appealed to, because the Premier really has (generally speaking) a very happy way of managing these things, and there is a prevalent impression that the protectionists have tolerably prudent men among them, in that "other place," where alone imprudence could have any practical consequences. Still, the feeling is—if it must be, let it be. If they are ready, we are ready. If they will have it so, they shall have it so. And though we have the shortest political memories and the best hearts of any people on the face of the earth, have the smallest possible spice of vindictiveness in our composition, and are fond of economising our expenditure of the ways and means of moral and political warfare—still, there would be a sort of satisfaction in "making a moral example of the gentlemen below the gangway," the idea of which tends to abate the repulsiveness of this onerous and disagreeable necessity.

For our own part, we enjoy, on the whole, a hopeful and comfortable faith that all this is sufficiently well understood by those with whom the responsibility really lies. We are not without our apprehension, at times. The present signs of public opinion and feeling are so liable to be misinterpreted, that the possibility at least of an erroneous construction being put on them is an element which cannot be safely excluded from our calculations. We are alive to the risk which exists of the repose of conscious strength being mistaken for indifference and lassitude. The subsidence of agitation, where activity is felt to be superfluous, may very possibly be confounded, in some quarters, with "reaction." Yet we must allow, that any very serious and painful apprehensions on this score contain an implied imputation on the judgment and patriotism of those with whom the question really rests, which cannot be justified in the absence of direct evidence. Where the consequences of a false step would be so palpably and so gratuitously mischievous, it is but fair to presume on the exercise of at least an ordinary amount of discretion. Moral equity, no less than constitutional decorum, indicates the propriety of assuming that a body of legislators, charged with so vast a responsibility, cannot be found greatly wanting in the first and most elementary of political virtues. At the same time, we must warn the Premier, that there ought to be no needless experimenting on the prudence and sagacity even of the most august tribunal of the empire. Computations with an unknown quantity for one of their elements are intrinsically uncertain and deceptive. A prudent minister should beware of making superfluous exactions of the prudence of others, whose means of correct judgment are necessarily inferior to his own.

MORE NEW CONVERTS.

(From the Economist, April 25.)

It afforded us great pleasure, last week, to allude to the sound reasons which Lord Essex adduced for his conversion to the principles of Free Trade. But we have been even more struck by the singular ability and clear comprehension of those principles, as exhibited by another recent convert, contained in a letter addressed by the Rev. Christopher Nevile to Mr. Alison. This letter is a remarkably clever and racy production, of less than fifty pages, in which the writer, who had acquired some considerable reputation as an advocate of protection, gives an account of the process of observation and reasoning by which his convictions became changed, and by which he furnished himself with the most unanswerable arguments to all the fallacies of protection. For the space occupied, we have seen no production which has in a more satisfactory manner disposed of all the leading errors and prejudices against Free Trade. Mr. Nevile adopts as his motto, "Change of opinion is not inconsistency," and we are satisfied that no one will read this pamphlet without being convinced that, in the writer's case, change has only been in accordance with the enlightened convictions of a powerful and vigorous mind, which has with felicity grasped at the truth and thrown error aside. It appears that, five years ago, Mr. Nevile published a pamphlet in defence of protection, which had a flattering reception from Mr. Alison and others. After a laborious inquiry, we have understood with a view of following up his first pamphlet in further attempts to defeat Free Trade doctrines, Mr. Nevile has found their truth to be irresistible, and his opinions are "entirely changed." He says to Mr. Alison:

"I address my recantation to you, on grounds which, perhaps, may surprise you. I trace my conversion to an attentive perusal of your works. I am indebted to the most distinguished protectionist writer for my conviction that our protective system has been most injurious to the country."

The process by which Mr. Nevile first doubted the accuracy of his former opinions, and at length fully embraced his "new views," is strikingly expressed in the following words:

"A review of our position was enough, indeed, to shake my faith in my political system. I found great distress existing; the only assignable causes by the advocates of protection, being over-production and over-population. And under what circumstances were we placed? An overflow of capital, driven abroad, to our ultimate loss, for want of profitable employment at home—an immense number of workpeople, especially agricultural labourers, in vain seeking employment—millions of acres of land uncultivated, and many millions capable of great improvement—the markets apparently glutted with manufactured articles we could not consume, and with agricultural produce which could not be sold; I asked myself how could any nation be reduced to anything like distress with a superfluity of every element of prosperity and comfort? An answer there must be; but I could not find it then. I now believe it can be found. The word is monopoly. I have become convinced that protection to native industry, where it has had any effect at all, has been disastrous in its consequences, and has been indeed 'the bane of agriculture.'"

Mr. Nevile draws a clear and striking contrast of the actual free competition, notwithstanding a nominal protective duty, which has existed with respect to our manufacturers, and the real and operative monopoly which the owners of the land have unwisely secured to themselves, and shows in what way competition has been so favourable to the advancement and prosperity of the former, while monopoly has been so injurious and destructive to the latter; and he happily exposes the great fallacy and error of referring the prosperity and existence of a pursuit to some nominal price, as the lowest at which production can be repaid. In all such reasoning, the power of economising processes, of increased quantity, and of generally improved management, are entirely excluded from the calculation. From Mr. Young's calculations of the price necessary to repay production in 1814, downward to those made by land-owners of the present day, there has never yet been one of them realised; for, in spite of every impediment and inducement to the contrary, still agricultural improvements have to a certain extent gone forward. That they have not done so to an extent equal to other branches of industry, we are indebted entirely to the system of protection with which, unfortunately for themselves, the proprietors of land have had the legislative power to burthen their properties. Had the same "baneful principle" been applied to manufactures, the result would have been the same:

"If the first twenty or a hundred cotton mills erected had been protected from competition, can any one conceive that our machinery would have improved as rapidly as it has done? It would have been easy to show that, after calculating the cost of raw material, wages, with profits, interest, &c., that a yard of cloth could not be made under a certain price, and that price might have been artificially sustained. It is evident what the consequences would have been. It has, however, been open for any man with capital and skill, to build a mill and manufacture cloth, and the price was regulated, not by what all could make it for, but by what any one individual could afford to sell it at; any improvement in machinery, any economy in the manufacture, must eventually be adopted by all parties, or they could not sustain themselves in the market. The moment they were undersold, their business was at an end. The duties levied on foreign goods were of no avail, for the competition at home was unlimited.

"How different has been the case with our agriculture! The legislation was in the hands of landowners: they calculated the cost of growing wheat, and they advanced the duties on foreign corn so as to exclude it under that price. The land could not be multiplied, and the inevitable consequence was, they acquired a monopoly of the market. According to the well-known principle, it might have been expected that agricultural improvement would be slow. Necessity, the great mother of invention, being removed, the probability was, that the progress in the cultivation of the soil has been retarded. Has it been the case or not? Has British skill, capital, and industry, produced its corresponding effects in the production of food? Has the landowner, who is the real manufacturer, however indirectly, has he made the fullest use of all the means at his disposal? I will take an answer from yourself, the most able writer on the side of protection. I could confirm your testimony by numerous quotations from members of the Agricultural Protection Society."

This extract really explains the whole secret of the rapid progress and prosperity of our manufactures, and the stationary and depressed condition of our agriculture. The landowner who goes to Parliament and votes for protection to land, virtually offers a premium or encouragement to the occupiers of his land for indolence and neglect. He virtually and voluntarily deprives himself of all the advantages which would arise from an active exercise of ingenuity and economy; while he introduces a new and additional element of uncertainty, wholly inseparable from all artificial systems, and especially such as impose great abuses upon society, which deters the free application of capital. From these causes the landlord has injured himself infinitely more, in the mere amount of rent which he now receives, than any advantage which he has obtained by restriction. We have not the slightest doubt that had the trade in corn been perfectly free since 1815, the rents of lands and the profits of farmers would have been much higher than at present, while the price of food would probably have been little more than half its present rate. This is exactly what has been the case in manufactures, by the operation of the principle so well explained by Mr. Nevile. High rents and high farmers' profits are not inconsistent with cheap food.

Mr. Nevile disposes, in a most satisfactory way, of all usual pleas set up for protection in the shape of special burdens:

"The tithes never belonged to the landowner. The land has been bought and sold liable to this payment, which has recently been converted into a mortgage." "The titheowner is in the situation of a mortgagor; and the tithes are, therefore, no tax whatever in growing corn on this tract of land." "The highway-rates are wholly made up of labour." "And these rates would, therefore, accommodate themselves to any diminished scale of agricultural prices; besides, good roads are conducive to the profitable occupation of the land." "The expense of improved implements might, with nearly as much justice, be brought forward as a tax or an impediment to producing corn at a lower price." "The poor-rates are not peculiar to land; all real property is equally charged." "It is true that the capital engaged in manufactures is not rated to the poor, neither is that employed in agriculture. And if the protectionists are justified in their assertion, that for every pound embarked in manufactures, 15l. are engaged in agriculture, the less we say on that score the better." "The malt-tax falls upon the consumers, and not upon the growers, and cannot be considered a burden upon the land in particular."

The indirect taxes, amounting to about 36,000,000*l.*, out of 48,000,000*l.*, are "levied upon production or consumption of the whole nation, and are by no means paid by the landed or agricultural classes in particular." To the common argument, that protection becomes needful in consequence of the national debt, Mr. Nevile gives the following unanswerable reply and apt illustration of his reasoning:

"If the price of any article is artificially raised to enable the producer to pay his share of any national debt, that process must necessarily render the consumer less able to pay it. Suppose a community consisting of A, B, C, D, E, and that A produces corn, B cloth, and C hardware, and that they owe a joint debt to D and E. If all these articles are protected, and the prices raised, the protection is nugatory. If corn alone is artificially raised in price, it is unjust; but in neither case can the joint power of A, B, and C, to meet their common debt be increased. If in this country we should assume that there are 100 trades, and 100 commodities, and each were equally protected, it must be evident that the artificial price created is of no advantage to any one party, as he will lose as much in the 99 commodities he buys, as he can gain in the one he sells. If the protection is unequal, it will enrich one party and impoverish another in proportion; but the wealth of the whole will not be increased. So far from it, it is very possible, that by attempting to force the capital, the skill, and industry of the country into particular channels, which they would not take in their natural course, the whole trade, commerce, and prosperity of the community may be impeded. The national debt does not fall upon any particular individual or kind of property, but it is mainly paid, and must be paid, by a tax upon the general articles of consumption; and the advocates for Free Trade may and do use the argument, that our immense debt is a reason in favour of, not against, the most unlimited Free Trade."

Mr. Nevile replies in a clear unanswerable way to the general fallacy, that if we do admit corn from other countries, they will not buy our goods, but will be paid in gold. He shows that as gold is not a production of this country, it can only be obtained in exchange for something that is, and that a payment in gold is, therefore, though indirectly, as much an exchange for the produce of this country as if we gave them calico of Manchester or the cloth of Leeds. But perhaps one of the most useful points discussed in this valuable little pamphlet is the objections raised against Free Trade on account of deeply-mortgaged lands. Mr. Nevile shows that the case of such a landowner is not so desperate as at first sight it would appear. We have always entertained an opinion that one of the best things which could happen to large landed proprietors with deeply-mortgaged estates, would be the necessity to which they would be driven to sell some portion, as the only means of clearing and rendering more profitable the remainder.

FREE TRADE CLUB.

TRUSTEES.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Radnor.
The Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers, M.P.
John Lewis Ricardo, Esq., M.P.

COMMITTEE.

Briggs, Major-General, F.R.S., F.G.S.
Bright, John, Esq., M.P.
Clark, William, Esq.
Cobden, Richard, Esq., M.P.
Cogan, Captain Robert
Ducie, The Earl
Davy, Edward, Esq.
Fitzroy, Lord Charles, M.P.
Gibson, Thomas Milner, Esq., M.P.
Ivimey, Joseph, Esq.
Moore, Robert R. R., Esq.
Radnor, The Earl of
Ricardo, John Lewis, Esq., M.P.
Ricardo, Ralph, Esq.
Thompson, George, Esq.
Villiers, The Hon. Charles Pelham, M.P.
Wilkinson, Norman, Esq.
Wilkinson, William Arthur, Esq.
Wilson, James, Esq.
White, William, Jun., Esq.

BANKERS.

Messrs. Ransom and Co., Pallmall East.

SECRETARY.

Mr. James Adolphus Moore.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The committee of management, in accordance with the rules of the club, now renders an account of its stewardship for the past year.

The estimate for receipts and expenditure laid before the general meeting of the members of the club, on the 19th of May, 1845, contemplated an expenditure for the year 1845, of 1772l. 10s., and receipts amounting to 2430l. 6s. The receipts were calculated upon the then charges for entrance-fee and annual subscription. Since that time, however, a large reduction has taken place in the anticipated income, in consequence of a considerable number of persons, originally offering as members, not have joined the club. The result has been that the actual receipts have fallen short by 561l. 15s. of the original estimate.

The current disbursements of the year fell within the estimate, but the purchase of plate, linen, and cutlery, which was rendered necessary in August last, when the household management was transferred from a steward, who had contracted to provide these articles, to the house-committee, created an extra expense of 472l. 10s. 3d., to meet which there was cash in the hands of the bankers, 341l. 14s. 2d., and arrears recoverable of 170l. 2s., making a total of 511l. 16s. 2d., showing a balance in favour of the club of 397l. 5s. 11d. The property of the club at that period was 419l. 14s. 6d.

The number of subscribers, at the end of the year 1845 was two hundred, but the committee felt confident that as the objects and advantages of the club became more widely known, its numbers would rapidly increase; and, during the present year, they have found their expectations realised, 120 members having been admitted, makes the number this day, 320.

On the 31st of March, 1846, after clearing off all liabilities, there was a balance in hand of 397l. 13s. 5d., and 336l. to receive, which affords a gross sum of 733l. 13s. 5d. towards the expenditure of the current year.

The committee feel assured that the foundation of a most valuable institution is laid, and that the rapid increase of members will soon ensure the results which its originators contemplated.

Such an increase is confidently expected, the Committee relying on the exertions of the members to aid in the accomplishment of this object, which will render the club one of the most prosperous and useful institutions in the metropolis.

(Signed) JOHN BRIGGS, Chairman.

27, Regent-street, St. James's, 6th April, 1846.

OBJECTS OF THE CLUB.

The Free Trade Club has been established for the purpose of bringing into more immediate and friendly contact those who are interested in procuring for British capital and industry emancipation from the restrictions which have been placed upon their productive powers. Many distinguished and highly respectable advocates and supporters of commercial freedom are spread over the country, at great distances from each other. The Free Trade Club offers to all these the opportunity of inter-communication in reference to the evils produced by monopoly in their several professions and localities, as well as for concerting the means of more effectually bringing their grievances before the legislature of the country.

One of its immediate objects is, to afford a place for the daily meeting of members of Parliament and other friends of the cause in the metropolis, where they may have an opportunity of seeing their friends from different parts of the country, when they visit London.

The terms of admission have been reduced to a scale much below those of any similar institution: the members will obtain the usual accommodations of a London Club, and a supply of all ordinary refreshments at moderate prices.

It is the intention, also, of the Committee to make such additions to their present library, from time to time, as shall make that department of the club attractive and valuable to those of the members who may desire to refer to the best works on social and economic science. Donations of books, suited to the objects of the club and the pursuits of its members, are respectfully requested, and will be gratefully acknowledged. Attention to this feature of the Free Trade Club and the liberal co-operation of its members and friends, will, it is trusted enable the committee to realise the intentions which have been cherished from the period the club was originated. The want of a good library of reference has long been felt by every one interested in the cause of Free Trade.

The committee have now only to state that according to Rule V. of the Articles of the Club, which is inserted below, such gentlemen's names as may be transmitted to the secretary, with the recommendation of members, will be submitted to a ballot, and on their election they will be immediately apprised. Should the reduction in the terms of admission lead (as it is confidently anticipated) to a large increase of members, it is the intention of the committee to submit proposals for rendering the club still more efficient for its great objects.

As this club is formed for a specific purpose, it must be well understood that no gentleman is eligible as a member, who is not opposed to the principle of all protective and differential duties. To this he will be pledged by his application to be admitted as a member.

TERMS:

RESIDENT MEMBERS (within fifty miles of London),	£ s.
Entrance Fee	5 5
Annual Subscription	2 2

NON-RESIDENT MEMBERS, (beyond fifty miles from London), Annual Subscription 2 2
* * No entrance fee is required from non-resident members.
RULE V.—Each candidate for admission shall be proposed as a Free Trader, by one member (on personal knowledge), and seconded by another; and the candidate's name and usual place of residence, his rank, profession, or other description, must be forwarded to the secretary at the time of application.

Foreigners may be admitted by the committee for one month, without payment: after which period they may be admitted for the further term of one year, on payment of the annual subscription.

It is suggested, for the convenience of members, that they should leave with the secretary orders on their bankers, or agents in London, to pay their subscriptions to the bankers of the club, on the 1st of January in each year.

Blank forms of such orders will be supplied by the secretary.

N.B.—The situation of the present house is peculiarly convenient for country members—intersecting, as it does, the great thoroughfares of Piccadilly and Regent-street; public conveyances to all parts of the town and its suburbs pass the door at all times of the day and night.

A list of sleeping apartments in the immediate neighbourhood of the club is kept by the secretary, and members intending to come to town can, by writing to him, and stating particulars, have an apartment engaged, and ready for them on arrival.

MEETING OF CORN FACTORS IN MARK-LANE.

(From the Globe.)

A very numerous meeting of corn factors, and other persons connected with the corn trade, was held on Monday in the large room of the Corn Exchange, Mark Lane, immediately after the business of the market was concluded. Its object was to take into consideration the present deranged state of the corn trade, and the extensive injuries inflicted on the interests of both importers and purchasers by the continued delay of the Corn Bill. Several statements, illustrative of this state of things, were made by some of the oldest and most extensive factors, who represented that the overloaded state of the granaries, and the continued arrivals, without any immediate prospect of clearance, keep the foreign trade in a state of stagnation. After an animated discussion, it was determined to embody the views of the meeting in a memorial; and a deputation was appointed to wait on Sir Robert Peel, to urge on the right hon. baronet the necessity of pressing through Parliament the measures agreed upon by his Government, and sanctioned by the House of Commons, with all possible despatch.

This movement on the part of the corn trade of London will produce similar demonstrations from the provinces. The corn trade at present suffers partially. The full measure of its embarrassments and losses has not yet been poured upon the market. The manufacturing and commercial interests are now chiefly affected. Every week supplies additional proofs of the stagnation to foreign and domestic trade, which delay in proceeding with the measure has caused to the manufacturer of, and trader in, our staple commodities.

But further delay will produce injury upon the class which the protectionists blindly intend to serve by their obstructive policy. Suppose that they succeed in keeping the bill in the House of Commons until the commencement or middle of June. The price of grain is remunerative at present; and no quantity now in bond, or that can be brought in from abroad, will have any considerable effect upon it. But if the present accumulations should continue in bond until a few weeks before harvest, and if all the grain and flour which will arrive in the spring months should go into bond, instead of passing into consumption, the whole quantity accumulated before the bill can leave the House of Lords will then be poured into the market, and will necessarily have the effect of greatly depressing prices. Let the farmers be wise in time. Of all classes they are most immediately interested in protesting against delay. Their "friends" will, if allowed to proceed in the course they threaten, prove their worst foes. The remunerative prices in which they now rejoice are delusive. A reaction is at hand—caused by the very policy which they think will protect and preserve them—which will assuredly lay bare the fallacy, and show them the refuge of lies in which they were taught to trust.

FREE TRADE.—MEMORIAL OF COTTON-SPINNERS.

The following is a copy of the memorial which has been forwarded to Sir Robert Peel, Bart., &c. &c., as agreed upon at the last general meeting of the operative cotton-spinners of Manchester:

To the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Bart., M.P., &c. &c., the Memorial of the Operative Cotton-Spinners of Manchester and Salford, Sheweth,

That your memorialists are cotton-spinners in the boroughs of Manchester and Salford, and deeply interested morally, physically, and mentally, in the prosperity of the manufacturing and commercial enterprise of the country, inasmuch as their capabilities to procure the comforts and rational enjoyments of life depend upon the healthy state of trade in these districts.

That your memorialists have long entertained the views, that an extension of the trade and manufactures of England would be conducive to the well-being of the whole of the community, whatever branch of trade or other pursuits in which they are engaged.

That therefore your memorialists viewed with extreme satisfaction the enlightened wisdom and liberal philanthropy under which the measures of her Majesty's Government were introduced into the House of Commons—the tariff of 1846—more especially the bill for the admission of foreign corn free of import duty; by which, in the opinion of your memorialists, the condition of the whole of the inhabitants of this country would be materially benefited. That, independently of the personal advantages which would arise from the development of freedom of industry, your memorialists view the whole scheme as a progressive step from the old notions of society, which limit man's inventive facilities, and thereby obstructed and retarded the progress of free intercourse with our fellow-man, to the detriment of all classes of the civilised world; and more especially the happiness of your memorialists.

That your memorialists have, for many years, witnessed with regret the misery and destitution, and in too many instances, the immorality of the working class of this country, evils which, in the opinion of your memorialists, have been fostered and extended by the restrictions on trade and commercial intercourse with other nations, which the measures of her Majesty's Government are calculated to remove. Your memorialists view with great alarm the injurious effects upon trade, which the delay of the passing of the Corn Bill is now causing, and firmly believe, that further obstruction will materially injure, if not ruin, the prospects of your memorialists, inasmuch as commercial confidence is to a great extent destroyed by the uncertainty which prevails as to the motion of the settlement of the whole question.

Your memorialists, therefore, most respectfully but firmly recommend that you will, without further delay, insist on the immediate passing of the Corn Bill, believing as they do, that every argument that can be urged against it has been heard, and that all attempts now making to delay the settlement of the question are dictated by a desire to retard, rather than to reason on the merits of the subject, as affecting the industrious community of England.

Your memorialists further beg most respectfully to state, that they are quite prepared to stand by your Government, and, if need be, to defend the Queen and her responsible advisers, from the factious attempts that are now making to alienate the people from their Queen and her Government.

Signed, on behalf of the meeting,
GEORGE JOHNSON, Chairman.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

DUBLIN, APRIL 28.—The Clare Journal, which reached Dublin to-day, brings the following circumstantial and substantiated account of the destitution of a portion of the people on the western coast of the county of Clare. Can anything be more harrowing than this detail?

"Kilmurry Ibrickane, April 24, 1846.

"Two copies of the following memorial, from about two hundred poor housekeepers, a list of their families, averaging about one thousand souls, have been forwarded—one to the Relief Commissioners, and another to the Lord Lieutenant:

"The humble Memorial of the poor resident cottiers on the ploughlands of Cleenogarnane and Clohane, in the parishes of Kildard, and barony of Ibrickane.

"Humbly Sheweth,

"That in consequence of the mysterious affliction of an all-wise Providence of the potato crop, memorialists (from the swampy nature of the soil of these localities) have, by the potato rot, been deprived of all means of subsistence for themselves and families, and are at present the most miserable beings on the face of the earth.

"That a road was passed by special sessions presentment, 1st Vict., chap. 21, and for which a sum of 450l. was granted to give relief on the premises—that said road, leading from George O'Neill's by Lough Donnell to Clonahinchey, was approved of by the civil engineer.

"That in daily expectation of relief on the premises by opening of said road, memorialists have, from time to time, pawned all their day and night covering, and are at present suffering from cold and hunger in a state too much for human endurance.

"That memorialists would long since have taken refuge in the poorhouse, but, being under the impression that they would have neither house nor home on their return to shelter themselves and families, and would, consequently, for evermore go to ruin.

"That the memorialists respectfully, yet fervently, crave your honourable board will be graciously pleased to take their wretched condition into consideration, and order such immediate relief on the premises, as may be the means of saving the lives (if not of memorialists) at least of their starving families, and for which memorialists will ever pray.

"Being the nearest resident magistrate, I regret to have to state that this memorial is too true, and that it rather underates the state of destitution the poor are in.

"BURTON MACNAMARA, J.P.

"As magistrates of the barony above-named, we have made inquiry into the condition of the memorialists, and find, that some local public work is actually necessary for their sustenance and support.

"FRANCIS G. MORONY, J.P.

"THOMAS H. MORONY, J.P.

"THOMAS MORONY, sen., J.P."

DUNGARVAN, APRIL 23.—Under this date a correspondent of the Waterford Freeman writes as follows:—"On Tuesday a crowd of labouring men presented themselves at the Reverend Dr. Heally's door, and called on him to get them work. The Doctor exhorted them against the commission of any violence or breach of the public peace, and assured them that every one of them would be employed on the following day, at one shilling per day. The 'Tipperary boy,' from the thick of the crowd, cried out that a shilling a day was too low, and called on the people not to work for less than 1s. 6d. per day. At the request of Dr. Heally, the 'peelers' were sent for, and 'my bould Tipperary boy' was marched into 'quod,' where he remained till the temperature of his cell reduced his excited and foolish notions and feelings to the standard of cool reason; and after expressing compunction for his conduct, and promising to behave himself like an honest and peaceful man for the time to come, he was discharged. Many believed him to be an incendiary. The demand for the Indian meal here is most pressing and extraordinary, so much so that two or three hundred persons are waiting to be served every morning opposite the house in which it is retailed. The accounts from the surrounding districts relative to the condition of the peasantry are heartrending and alarming in the extreme. In Killmongford, Kilsentny, Comeragh Killnafrehan, &c., the stock of potatoes is consumed, and the inhabitants of these places are now using their seed potatoes, which will last them but a very short time; this is the case with many of the farmers, but the condition of the cottier and labourer is far more deplorable. Some of them had no potatoe gardens tilled at all, on others they failed; they have no relief committee to get them 'meal or malt,' and are left to their fate—to starve, perish, or plunder. A carrier from this town, as he was coming from Clonmel, a few days since, called into a house which he saw convenient to the roadside, for the purpose of lighting his pipe. It was ten o'clock in the morning, and there were five or six little boys and girls squatted on the floor of the wretched house, crying. 'Have you any fire?' said the carman. 'No,' replied the father of the children, 'and what is worse, I have not a morsel of food to give them poor children whom you see there bawling with hunger, nor can I get work to earn it.'

ADVANCES OF FAMINE.—The time has arrived when it can no longer be denied that upon the efforts of those who have the means depend whether we are to have an unemployed population, and famine and pestilence, or an employed population, and plenty and health. Our people, in the depth of their privations, have marked their repugnance to the in-door relief which even the Poor Law affords, and they have—by long and weary travelling to England and elsewhere in search of employment—given the most convincing proof of their mainly desire to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.—Western Star Conservative Journal.

Just Published,
MR. COBDEN'S SPEECH in the House of Commons
 on Friday, February 27th, 1846—Revised. Price One Penny, 16
 Pages.
MR. BRIGHT'S SPEECH in the House of Commons
 on Tuesday Night, Feb. 17. Price One Penny.
MR. GIBSON'S SPEECH in the House of Commons
 on Monday Night, Feb. 10. Price One Penny.
 LEAGUE OFFICE, 67, Fleet-street, London: J. Gadsby, Newall's-buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Where may be had,
THE GOATACKRE MEETING.
 Just published, price One Penny, or 3s. per 100.
A VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATACKRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.
 Upwards of 100,000 copies have been printed.
 Any of the above may be had at 6s. per 100.

FREE TRADE TRACTS, selected by the Council of
 the League, 1s., in cloth.

JOHN HOPKINS'S NOTIONS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Mrs. Mancer. Recommended by Mr. Cobden. 1s. 6d.
TWENTY TRACTS AND SPEECHES ON FREE TRADE. By Earl Ducie, Messrs. Villiers, Cobden, Bright, Gibson, O'Connell, McCullagh, Baines, &c. 1s. stitched. 12mo. size.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending
 Wednesday, April 29, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding,
 but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post
 Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their
 Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League
Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON,
67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
* Mercer, J., Oakenshaw, near Accrington	..	5	0 0
* Dockray, Benjamin, Lancaster	..	2	0 0
* Dockray, Hannah, do	..	2	0 0
* Taylor, James, Mawdsley-street, Great Bolton	..	1	0 0
Thomas, Richard, Millington, near Falmouth	..	1	0 0
Rowland, Rev. E., Pontypool, Monmouthshire	..	1	0 0
Daniel, Rev. Herbert, do	..	1	0 0
* Cooke, Benjamin, Hope House, Warrington	..	1	0 0
* McDonald, Robert, Ann-street, Belfast	..	1	0 0
* Fairley, George, 103, Argyle-street, Glasgow	..	1	0 0
* Eyre, Benjamin, Derby-terrace, Stock-st., Chesham, Manchester	..	1	0 0
Roberts, G. Wm., 3, Streiford New-road, Manchester	..	1	0 0
Foxcroft, Joseph, 7, Clarence-street do	..	1	0 0
Mathews, Rev. John, Newport, Monmouthshire	..	0	2 6
Lewis, Daniel, grocer, Tredegar, do	..	0	2 6
Hughes, David, do do	..	0	2 6
Pugh, Thomas, do do	..	0	2 6
Marsden, David, draper, do do	..	0	2 6
Swidenbank, Edw., grocer, do do	..	0	2 6
Ellis, Rev. Moses, Mynyddislwyn, near Newport, Monmouthshire	..	0	2 6
Moffat, N.B. * Wilson, John, Burnbraes	..	1	0 0
* McMillan, Samuel	..	1	0 0
* Anderson, James, draper	..	1	0 0
* Dickson, James, Dye Mill	..	1	0 0
Andover. * Mortimore, Thomas	..	1	0 0
Baker, Samuel	..	1	0 0
Wild, Wm.	..	0	2 6
Baker, James	..	0	2 6
* Marshes and Shepherd, Pond-street	..	20	0 0
* Smith, John Wm., East Parade	..	5	0 0
* Pitts, John, Trafalgar-street	..	1	0 0
* Cutts, Joseph, Hermitage-street	..	1	0 0
Elliot, John, Hollis Croft	..	0	10 0
Haworth, James, Fitzwilliam-street	..	0	5 0
* Clay, J. Travis, Rastrick, near	..	50	0 0
* Butterworth and Sons	..	50	0 0
* Swaine and Webb	..	30	0 0
* Heaps, T. A., Westgate	..	10	0 0
* Dewhurst, Richard, Aspley, near	..	8	0 0
* Routledge, Samuel, do	..	8	0 0
* Crowther, George, and Brothers, Pad- dock, near	..	6	0 0
* Leary, Wm., jun., Lane	..	4	0 0
* Roberts, Richard, Lowerhead-row	..	4	0 0
* Johnson, J. and C., Ramsden-street	..	4	0 0
Mellor, Wright	..	2	0 0
Robinson, Thomas, solicitor	..	2	0 0
Abbott and Swallow, Westgate	..	2	0 0
Thornton, Wm. Sykes	..	2	0 0
Froam, Wm., at Messrs. J. and T. C. Wrigley and Co.	..	1	1 0
Vickers, Wm., Market Walk	..	1	1 0
Dyson, John, draper, New-street	..	1	0 0
Shaw, Thos., Low Westwood, Golcar, nr Green, Joseph, brewer, Broad Oak, Lenthwaite	..	1	0 0
Kaye, John, Woolpack Inn	..	1	0 0
Crosland, George, Lindley, near	..	1	0 0
Rogers, Thomas, mason, Kirkgate	..	0	5 0
Small Subscriptions, Rastrick	..	0	2 0
Snaden, John, Paddockfoot Mill, near	..	0	6 0
Three Friends to Cheap Bread, do	..	0	3 0
Quarmby, Joseph do	..	0	2 0
Mallinson, Henry do	..	0	2 0
Sigall, John do	..	0	2 0
Lacey, Fnoch do	..	0	2 0
Smith, Henry do	..	0	2 0
Small Sums	..	0	1 0
Newton, Wm., at Mr. Schwan's	..	0	4 0
Beaumont, George do	..	0	4 0
Briggs, John F. do	..	0	2 0
Burtack, A. do	..	0	2 0
Craven, Edward do	..	0	2 0
Small Subscriptions do	..	1	4 6
* Suse and Sibeth, 35, Lime-street, City	..	20	0 0
* Procter, John, 18, Cheapside	..	5	0 0
* Crabbe, Rev. Geo., Vicarage, Bredfield, nr Woodbridge	..	3	0 0
* Smith, B., and Son, 8, London Wall	..	1	1 0
* Pickford, J. H., 13, Whitham's-buildings, Old-st.-rd.	..	1	1 0
* Harrison, Abraham, 16, Haverstock Hill, Hampstead	..	1	0 0
* Dye, John, 2, Alfred-place, Bedford-square	..	1	0 0
* Hardcastle, John, Old Malton	..	1	0 0
* Horton, Joseph, Chester-le-street	..	1	0 0
* Cotton, J. B., 10, New-place, Bryanston-square	..	1	0 0
* Mann, Thomas and Wm., Eastgate, Gloucester	..	1	0 0
* Shorthouse, Joseph, Newmarket-street, Birmingham	..	1	0 0
Mann, Wm., Bromley, Middlesex	..	1	0 0
* Bew, Robert	..	2	0 0
Higgins, Isaac	..	2	0 0
Taylor, Montague	..	2	0 0
Holland, John	..	1	0 0
* Overton, Wm., wine merchant	..	1	0 0

*Sinkins and Wood	..	2	0	0
*Thompson, Wm., crape manufacturer	..	1	0	0
*Houston, Henry	..	1	0	0
*Burgess, Samuel	..	1	0	0
*Gregory, Samuel, card maker	..	1	0	0
*"An Enemy to Monopoly"	..	1	0	0
Bridport. *Subscriptions, per Wm. Hayes	..	3	2	0
*Battiscombe, Wm.	..	1	0	0

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

A JOURNEY TO THE MEADOWS OF HERTFORDSHIRE.

No. I.—GETTING OUT OF TOWN.

Persons acquainted with the thoroughfares of London know that they are sometimes choked, blocked, or locked with their traffic. It is as difficult to ascertain, when a lock occurs, which of the draymen shouting, cabmen whipping, or butchers' boys "chaffing," has been the cause of the stoppage, as it is to discover who have caused the lock in the political world. But there is a lock in the political world. Never was the line of street, from St. Paul's to Temple Bar, more completely and inextricably choked, by its vehicles locking together, than is the Parliamentary thoroughfare at this moment, by which bills travel from the House of Commons to the House of Lords, and from the House of Lords to the House of Commons. And yet in the line of Fleet-street, and Ludgate-hill, with the crossing of Farringdon-street, there are occasionally lockages in the traffic so inextricable that the most skilful of the police are baffled in making a clearance; and no clearance is made until some unlooked-for condescension on the part of a few drivers, who back out, leads to a general movement forward, as the unlooked-for perseverance of a few jolly waggons, "all of a row," with their ponderous vehicles from the country—a "country party" in the street, formidable enough to obstruct the traffic, dogged enough to get into a fix and remain in it, led at first to the stoppage.

Being a passenger the other day for the country, to obtain a glimpse of the spring, the fresh green of grassy Hertfordshire, the new buttercups and daisies among the grass; the suckling lambs and their fleecy mothers among the buttercups and daisies; the farm fields, with new crops upon them; the farmers, with new notions in their heads about their fields and crops of corn; and, perchance, the lord of Essex, or his park and mansion, or his farms, who has become a kind of League lecturer, putting new notions into the heads of farmers about crops of corn, and Corn Laws, and competition with foreigners;—being a passenger for the country on the outside of one of those "busses" which gathers from the multitudes of the metropolis, one by one, the railway passengers, and transfers them by the score to the mouth of the iron giants, who swallow them by the hundred, I got fixed in one of those locks in the street which are unpleasant at any time, and particularly so when one's appointment is with a railway train. Still, it was not all lost time. Having nothing to do but to look and listen, to sit and see, I looked and listened, and sat and saw; and the parallel between the street police and the political police in urging onward the loads which would not be urged onwards, seemed to be remarkable enough to justify me in drawing my pen on the subject, as some of them drew their batons, or as others have been drawing, or threatening to draw, their pistols.

There were several waggons loaded with grain or with flour. From their bulk, they were conspicuous among the other vehicles. They had come down the street, and were warned in their progress by others loaded with straw crossing from the bridge, and halted at the crossing. One or two butcher's boys in light carts, whether in joke or in earnest I did not know, demanded that the policeman should turn the corn-loaded waggons back, and allow them, the said boys in the carts, to get past, they being charged with the safe and early delivery of joints of meat for that day's dinners, to those rich enough to have prime joints of meat sent home in light spring carts. But though these impetuous youths, with all the volubility of tongue, all the forwardness, most of the impudence, and some of the "chaff" and the "sling" peculiar to them, insisted that the police should make the corn-loaded waggons go backward to let them and others in light vehicles get on, no such counter movement could be effected. I do not know that the street police said, but they might have said, as one of the political police did—one not unknown in Fleet Street and elsewhere, for his services in clearing a passage for obstructed traffic, "that as well might the corn resolutions of the House of Commons move backwards, or be turned aside, and left in the siding, as to think that those ponderous corn waggons, each with a tonnage of loading, should be backed up hill to let butcher's boys, and the light fry of vehicles go by."

I say, I do not know that the street police spoke thus; nor am I sure that the political policeman, to whom I allude, as celebrated for his services in clearing obstructed thoroughfares, used the comparison as it is given here; I rather think it is reversed from him: at all events, whether speaking of corn-loaded wagons in the streets, or corn-charged resolutions in Parliament, he said it was impossible that they could remove backwards, or even be set aside, to make room for butcher's boys, or the butchers themselves, who had come whip in hand at an impetuous pace into the street, getting into a fix by their impetuosity, and only stopped from running over some one (some of those poor Irishmen with heavy loads on their backs) by being stopped in their head-long career.

And speaking of Irishmen with loads on their backs, I am reminded that in the street-stoppage the humblest carrier of a load fares worst when he cannot get along. He has not only to bear his burthen and make no progress, but very often, and particularly if an Irishman, and known to be one, he has to bear the "chaff" of the thoughtless, and even the back-handed cuts of the impetuous boys, who have whips in their hands, and who drive, or attempt to drive, others that they themselves may get along.

I cannot say that I observed any Irish gentleman with his cab and his tiger, though gentlemen with cabs and tigers were there, who at a moment when there was some hope of an early extrication, drove into the confusion, to the locking up of himself and the hindrance of all who were about to move; and yet there were cases not unlike this, of vehicles being driven in which might have been kept out for no purpose apparently but the strange satisfaction of being locked up, to the great annoyance of those seriously active in clearing the thoroughfare, and to the pleasure of their own drivers—if pleasure it could be—of being in the midst of confusion, delay, angry words, and personal accusations.

Of which there were enough to serve all the streets of London, including Billingsgate-market, for as long a time as the length of a session of Parliament.

Some brewers' drays, loaded with beer, had stopped the countrymen loaded with straw; or, which amounted to the same thing, the men of straw would not move, because they said—and swore it as they said it—that the brewers stood in their way, and that they had done nothing to be called on to make way for the heavy waggons of the millers and the corn merchants, which were coming down Fleet-street, and were blocked there.

The police took hold of the reins and led horses, drivers, and vehicles where they found an opening, whether the drivers assented to it or not. They did so even against the loud protests of such drivers, that they were not to be led in that way by the "Peelers" (a phrase more commonly applied to the police in London than any other), yet allowing themselves to be led notwithstanding.

Then one driver shouted to another, that the lockage and confusion had been all that other driver's fault; and that other retorted the accusation; and cabmen shook their whips at one another, and gave significant hints of what each would do to each, if they had not happened to be where they were. And the drivers of such light vehicles as those we see in every street, with soda water and ginger beer, interfered with the stormy cabmen to quiet them, but made the confusion greater by adding new elements of discord. The tradesmen of the streets had their business suspended; customers could not approach the shops; or if they were in, they could not move out; and passengers who could move on some parts of the pavement were obstructed at others, and could not proceed on such business as they had intended to proceed upon. The very dogs of the street seemed to join in, and add to the noise and confusion by their barking; and to the great hindrance and annoyance of those actively engaged in effecting a clearance, men, snarling more snappishly than the dogs, barked at and found fault with everything and every body that was engaged doing something useful. Were it not a daring flight of imagination almost equal to that of the author of the "Revolutionary Epic," one might have thought that some snarling dogs had been bitten by some other dog labouring under Peelphobia—that sad looking dog for instance, which was unmuzzled at Shrewsbury in 1841, and became Peelphobious two years after, and bit the hand that he begged a bone from.

But a riddance was made at last, and the lighter carriages were obliged to give way to the heavier, and the heavier moved on and got out of the way; and we at last reached the railway station too late for the train.

But as there were other trains, and other means of getting into the green meadows of Hertfordshire, I ultimately got there; and if there should be nothing better next week to fill these columns, I may contribute to two or three of them such posies of cowslips and daisies, and buttercups, as I have found in the fields, with such other field and farm-yard affairs as possess any interest for readers engaged in the emancipation and advancement of English agriculture.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

THE PIN TRADE.—There is much talk amongst scientific persons, and those to whom the welfare of our own manufacture is of interest, respecting the improvements recently made in pin making; improvements which have already caused preparations for closing many large works on the Continent. The machinery by which the new pin is made, to which Mr. Kirby, of Newgate-street, the holder of patent, has given the name of "Regina," is of the most extraordinary character. Strings of wire enter it upon the one side by thousands, and almost immediately appear at the other, as pins in the most perfect form, literally headed and pointed to a degree of perfection, defying microscopic power to detect a fault in shape and finish. The sticking of the pins into paper is likewise completed by the same machinery in as incredibly regular and rapid order; and it is a curious fact, and not the least gratifying, that, although the latter operation is accomplished by this invention, the great demand caused by the enormous reduction of the price of the pins necessarily calls together three times the number of female assistants for their "preparation" and "making up," and at more remunerative wages than by the old system.—Globe.

THE FALKIRK BURGHS.—The constituency of these burghs, which have now to elect a member in the room of their late representative, Mr. Baird, of Gartsherrie, amounts to 1408, distributed as follows:—Falkirk, 440; Airdrie, 302; Hamilton, 313; Lanark, 251; Linlithgow, 100. The nomination takes place at Falkirk. In July, 1841, when Mr. Baird was elected, the number of electors was 1303, of whom no more than 912 recorded their suffrages. The numbers at the close of the poll were—for Mr. Baird, 482; for Mr. Gillon, of Walhouse, 430; majority in favour of Mr. Baird, 52.—Scotch Paper.

AGRICULTURE.

AGRICULTURAL WILL-O'-THE-WISP.

A MONOPOLIST CROAK FROM THE FENS.

One of the last, perhaps the very last, petitions which will ever be made in favour of that flitting and mischievous illusion, "protection," has lately exhaled from the fens. At a meeting of the corporation of the Bedford Level, held at Ely, when the Duke of Bedford was in the chair, and the Earl of Hardwicke, and his brother, Mr. Yorke, one of the members for Cambridgeshire, were present, after the business was over, which, the report tells us, "occupied a very short time"—(how true it is idleness leads to mischief!)—a Mr. Layton got up and proposed a petition by the corporation "not to alter or repeal the present Corn Laws." The Earl of Hardwicke disclaimed all previous knowledge of the petition; but not so his brother, Mr. Yorke, for whose benefit the scene was obviously got up. Our readers will recollect that some time in last autumn Lord Hardwicke gave utterance to sentiments on rural affairs which the local monopolists thought betrayed an intention to leave monopoly in the lurch; and his brother, Mr. Yorke, was so enigmatical and pragmatical upon the subject of the Corn Laws, that his constituents—monopolist and anti-monopolist—combined to exhibit their supreme contempt for him, and to testify their just appreciation of his doubtful dodges and shallow artifices. Now there can be no question, that at the period we refer to, both Lord Hardwicke and his cadet, Mr. Yorke, had prepared, or were preparing, to cast their lot with Sir Robert Peel, and to cut themselves adrift from monopoly—that foundering hulk. But suddenly the lord and his shadow took a short turn, returned to their vomit, swallowed all their semi-Free Trade words, and the one resigned his court lackeyship, and the other stuck to his county seat. Whether the Premier refused some monstrous demand on the part of the lord—for his lordship is a very likely man to rate his own importance in a proportion inverse to that at which it would be rated by others—or whether the snug family seat in the pocket county was deemed too valuable to be lost—we cannot say. But whatever be the cause, both lord and brother have now re-appeared as flaming monopolists. The petition, suddenly presented, pistol-like, to the Level corporation, was a means intended to induce the farmers, squires, and squireens of Cambridgeshire not to turn out Mr. Yorke at the next election. Will the dodge succeed?

However, as the last of a species soon to become extinct, it may not be uninteresting to our readers to have a few passages of the petition, and the speeches by which it was supported, presented to their notice. Like the unrolling of a mummy, it is, however, a somewhat nauseous task; and its disgusting character is not redeemed by its usefulness—for these monopolist fallacies will soon die of sheer exhaustion. Like rushes on land which has been drained, though they seem to live unharmed for a brief season, nothing can long maintain their noxious vitality. As a relic of a former world of thought, or rather no-thought, this last croak of monopoly is not the least curious. It retains to the last the distinctive characteristics of its kind. It is literally a bundle of fallacies; its conclusions seem naturally not to follow from its premises. In a word, it is a monopolist plea for monopoly. What more can be said?

The petition begins by stating that the corporation was founded in the reign of Charles the Second, to drain the fens:

"That owing, as your petitioners believe, to the low prices of agricultural produce in this kingdom, and other discouraging circumstances, the embankment and drainage of the Level made slow and unsatisfactory progress for the first century and a half, after the establishment of the corporation, but that within the last fifty years many millions of capital have been expended in the improvement of the drainage of the Level, by which very extensive tracts of land have been brought into cultivation, and the Level is becoming one of the most fertile provinces in the kingdom; yielding annually, as your petitioners believe, much greater quantities of wheat than are produced from any lands of similar extent in her Majesty's dominions."

So far so good. But do the monopolists of the fens suppose all the rest of the inhabitants of the kingdom to be as slow-witted as the dwellers in their Bosotia—so little read in the history of the county as to take the following as a logical sequence?

"That your petitioners believe that the present prosperous state of the Bedford Level is mainly to be attributed to the encouragement given to agriculture by the restrictive duties imposed on the importation of foreign corn, and that the improvements that have been effected in the drainage of the Level and the cultivation of the land would not have taken place if the prices of agricultural produce had not been fairly remunerative."

That monopoly has not encouraged agriculture is now admitted even by the monopolists. Besides, why, in spite of the great natural fertility of the fens, is their cultivation so generally inferior? They have been reclaimed, it is true; but we ask any farmer, who is a farmer, whether they are more than half cultivated? Of Peel's measures the petition says, that "If carried into a law they will be attended with most disastrous consequences to the landed interests of this country, as well as to all classes of the community dependent upon them, and more especially to the small farmer and the labourer."

So said the older fenmen of the period of marsh and morass; and their resistance for a time was a great impediment to the reclamation of the fens; and the petition concludes with this bouncing non sequitur:

"That the protection afforded by the Corn Laws against the importation of foreign grain, while it has been beneficial to the agriculturist, has been instrumental to the welfare of all other classes of society, since, during the existence of those laws, large masses of capital have been created by those engaged in manufacturing and commercial pursuits; our foreign and home trades have been placed in a state of unexampled prosperity; and this nation has risen to a degree of wealth and splendour unparalleled amongst the various States in the habitable globe."

But our manufactures and commerce have flourished, so far as they have flourished, in spite of the Corn Laws. Indeed, as the system of restriction of which the Corn Laws form the key stone has been weakened, national prosperity—agricultural as well as trading—has tended to increase. Mr. Layton and Mr. Ball, the mover and seconder, seem to have contented themselves with the simple assertion, that the reasons Sir Robert Peel has given for his measure—which nine-tenths of the community deem unanswerable, and which certainly have not been answered—according to the fen lights, should have induced him to give "greater protection." Who shall estimate fenman logic? Mr. Ball said:

"What so proper as to appeal to the House of Peers, and ask that body if the opinions and arguments of the last thirty years were all to be abandoned in one moment, because a power was rising up not recognised by the laws, threatening to sweep away the rights of the British community, and abolish all that it had long been thought necessary to preserve?"

Fancy the rights of the British community being swept away with the Corn Laws! We always supposed those rights to have had root in deeper and more wholesome soil. But so it is with the monopolists; they ever try to hitch their rotten cause on to something else—just as an auctioneer lots an article nobody cares for, with some useful ones—and hope to carry on their rottenness under cover of that to which they have appended it. But that won't do now—the trick is found out. Lord Hardwicke, however, out-spoke the other fen monopolists, for he thus argued the case of monopoly on local grounds:

"There was no part of the British dominions, which, from its position, had more right to express a strong opinion on this question than the Bedford Level, inasmuch as there was no part of the country in a position resembling it. The manufacturers said that they existed by means of art and science. Now he (Lord Hardwicke) replied that they could use the same language in the Bedford Level, for there they existed by the very means of which the manufacturers made a boast. They existed there by art and industry; that great country had been brought into its present high state of cultivation, by the art and science, and industry of man (hear, hear). It was drained by the steam engine; that great mark of the progress of human knowledge had been seized upon, not only by the manufacturers of cotton, but also by the manufacturers of wheat. Therefore they stood in the same position with the manufacturers of the north in that respect, inasmuch as their prosperity was founded upon art and science."

If they stand in the same position as the manufacturers, why is it they do not repudiate monopoly as the manufacturers do? And read this, oh people of England, as a specimen of hereditary wisdom and aristocratic information:

"That was the ground which he took as a supporter of the principle of protection. And he was satisfied, upon looking carefully at this question, that the manufacturer of Manchester, before many years of his existence had passed, would be the man to come to Parliament to ask for protection for the produce of his mills. Let the Corn Laws be once repealed, and before long the progress of science in other counties, and the advantages we gave them for the purpose of rendering the British agriculturist powerless in raising food, would cause the mill-owner of Manchester to supplicate Parliament for protection to industry, and skill, and capital. Facts would soon come forth to show that a great pressure upon the cotton manufacturing interest, caused probably in some measure by sending out steam-engines to facilitate the manufacture of cotton at the very place where the raw material is grown, had been to the manufacturers a fearful notice of the risk they must run by competing unprotected with the advancing science of other countries. The cheap loaf was a sort of last hope to them, they thought if they could get a cheap loaf even for a time, they might so reduce the wages of labour as to hold up a little longer against the competition they had brought upon themselves."

That is not to be surpassed. There were, however, a few rational men present, one of whom, Mr. Gay, in opposing the petition, said:

"If it were certain that agriculturists had gained by the Corn Laws, then the owners of land had a right to call upon the legislature not to repeal those laws. But were they not begging the question? Had not agriculturists reaped the benefit from circumstances independent of the Corn Laws? True, the land did bear peculiar burdens; but it was rather their duty to get those burdens removed, than to insist upon protection, in opposition to the interests of those who were not directly connected with the land. If the Corn Laws had produced benefit to the agricultural interest, to what extent had other interests been damaged? If it had raised the price of corn, although the farmers had put more money into their pockets, they had extracted it from the pockets of others. No doubt the owners and occupiers of land must fear any change in the present system, for they had embarked their capital in the purchase and cultivation of land, and were naturally fearful lest any alteration should damage them. He once thought protection was necessary, but like the 120 spoken of, he had changed his mind, and was inclined to think that farmers had not reaped any benefit from the Corn Laws."

And this is the view of sensible men who were once protectionists. But we have before stated what was the real object of the petition.

WHAT DO THE FARMERS SAY?

Perhaps there is no class of tradesmen who suffer more from the prolonged opposition of the monopolists to Sir Robert Peel's Corn Bill than the farmers; and they and their real organs hesitate not to speak of the obstruction and the obstructives in terms of strong disapproval. Now, the eventual success of Free Trade measures is no longer doubtful; and though a temporary delay may serve the purpose of politicians who fight their party fight by means of jockey lords, and men of that sort, it can do nothing but harm to those who live by their industry rather than their wits, and especially to the farmers. Let us hear what the Mark Lane Express, the only cool-headed upholder of monopoly amongst the professed "farmers' friends'" organs, says on the subject. Indeed, so absurd are the speculations of most of the "farmers' friends'" newspapers which advocate monopoly, that we doubt whether they ever heard a real live farmer speak, except in the presence or under the dictation of the landlord. They appear to have about as deep an insight into rural affairs as those who would take their notions of the British peasantry from the labourer and peasant, as represented on the London stage, have of the condition of the agricultural working classes. Let the farmers judge whether the following passages from the Mark Lane Express do not convey a far more accurate idea of the actual state of affairs than the bombastic twaddle of landlord-inspired organs:

"Whatever view parties may take of the commercial scheme proposed by Sir Robert Peel, none will be disposed to dispute the evil consequences arising from the delay now taking place in the progress of the measure to an issue, be that issue what it may. Trade and commerce are now experiencing a taste of the paralysing effect under which agriculture has suffered since the advent of Sir Robert Peel to office in 1841. So soon as the plan of the Premier for altering the Corn and Provision Laws was propounded to the Legislature and the country, at the beginning of the session of 1842, no one who was not wilfully blind or lamentably obtuse could doubt the ultimate result of such measures. It was the beginning of a system, the complete establishment of which at no distant period was as certain as the relation of cause and effect. We feel convinced that, if the opinions of all the intelligent farmers in the United Kingdom could be ascertained, there is not a tithe of them but would admit that, when the question of outlay, dependent upon time for return, occurred in the course of his business, a doubt would intrude itself on his mind of the permanency of the new state of things; in fact, that he perceived that the concession made to Free Trade principles was but an earnest of a yielding up of the whole. There can be no question that, during the last three years, considerable expenditure has been made upon improvements in the soil; but if these could be minutely analyzed, we believe they would be found to be principally made by the owners of the soil, who foresaw the necessity of preparing themselves for a change of circumstances."

The farmers, he says, show no disposition to take an active part against Free Trade, but remain in a state of quiescence; and, in truth, it has ever been so, except when they have been goaded or cajoled into temporary activity by the landowners. The landlords know, however, that the cry of "wolf" has been made too often, and that it would not make any impression now. The writer then speculates on the progress of the measure now before Parliament, and gives it as his deliberate opinion that the House of Lords will pass it:

"It seems to us that the delay which is now taking place, and which retards the bill in its progress to the Upper House, is a circumstance rather calculated to increase the chances of its being passed by the Lords. We incline to the opinion that the longer time the members of the Upper House have to consider the measure, provided no change takes place in the Commons, and no active resistance is made by the landed interest, both land lord and tenant, the more probable it is that the number of the supporters of the Ministerial measure will increase. We know that the 'farmers' friend' journals assume to repudiate this view, and foster false hopes as much as they can, encouraging the farmer to believe that the Government scheme will be rejected by the House of Lords."

But this, like most of the statements of the "farmers' friends," will probably prove a delusion. The writer then cites, as evidences in support of his view, some passages from the Bankers' Circular, a thorough-going monopolist print, which are to this effect:

"We have been credibly informed that every resident Hertfordshire nobleman, except one, is prepared to support the Minister's Free Trade measures in the House of Lords; and a curious exhibition they will make of their sense and consistency when they have done so. Some time about Christmas the Hertfordshire noblemen and gentry assembled in county meetings to put down Mr. Cobden and his confederates, so far as their interference with the electoral franchise is concerned; and we inserted a resolution, moved by Lord Dacre, setting forth their intention. This interference was nothing more than a means to an end; and a means too, however unjustifiable and unconstitutional it may be, which noblemen of both parties had frequently before resorted to for the same purpose—viz., the acquisition of political power. Cobden was but following their example; and when he found, by such meetings as the Hertfordshire, that his proceedings had alarmed the aristocracy, there was no measure to his expression of delight that he had touched a spring that had produced such an effect; which, he said, would only stimulate him to further similar exertions till he had accomplished his object. The Minister, however, suddenly proposes to grant him all he asks."

And afterwards the wailing monopolist (the Circular) adds:

"This, if rumour speaks truth, is the exhibition of Hertfordshire valour, consistency, and judgment, in the persons of her noblemen."

Now we are not disposed to fight the battle of the Hertfordshire landocracy; but we must say that though, as a class, they may be violent, puerile, ignorant, and selfish, they do not materially differ from the landocracy of other counties. And the inference drawn by the Mark Lane Express is inevitable. He says:

"Four months" have, it seems, produced a wonderful effect on the Hertfordshire members of the Upper House. Is there any reason to suppose that the 'conversion' is confined to Hertfordshire? Is it not fair reasoning to presume that the like 'change of opinion' may have taken place in noblemen residing in other counties? and who can tell how far the 'contagion' may have spread?"

There may not be many of the landowners who have the moral firmness to avow the error of the opinion they had taken up without examination, and acted on through life, as Lord Essex lately did; yet there are many who will quietly make the same "short turn," which has been made by the "brains of the aristocracy," if, as the lawyers say, "any such there be."

THE BRITISH LION TO THE LORDS.

A correspondent of the Mark Lane Express, who signs himself "An Essex Tenant," sends a memorial to the House of Lords as a specimen of the way in which the "British lion" should address the lion's protector, the House of Lords. A passage will put our readers in possession of the force and eloquence of the "lion" language. The memorial or petition, after stating that the country does not demand Free Trade; that the agricultural interest is intensely anxious to oppose Sir Robert Peel's measure; that the farmers are not acquiescent; and sundry other assertions, for which his lionship has obviously drawn upon his imagination; thus powerfully proceeds:

"There is hardly one in a thousand who does not anticipate the sanction of your lordships to that measure but with horror; and my lords, were low prices for agricultural produce now prevalent, England at the present moment would be as distracted as ill-used Ireland; every element of disorganisation and discontent is only repressed by the present state of the averages. Let the Premier's Bill but pass your lordship's house, and the present averages fall but 10 or 20 per cent., and anarchy and discontent would evoke the same foul spirits of mischief and of evil which always attend, and are ready to do their bidding; and having marshalled the victims of Free Trade and injustice into one united and compact phalanx, tremble, my lords, to anticipate the direction that mass of discontent and poverty might pursue. Hitherto, my lords, the attachment of the landed interest to the church and to the throne has been proverbial. Will not the pauperisation of that interest diminish the ability to maintain the expenses of the one, and the interests of body and soul clash fearfully in upholding the other? My lords, agitation receives the laurel of victory; and discharged now by the party in whose service she has been so successful, she will give her services to the party she has plundered; and those two great interests, which united might defy the jealousy of a world, will feel towards each other a malignant hatred, a flame so intense and scorching that will blast every kindly feeling towards each other; the usual consequences of internal distraction and social disruption will exhibit to the world a national picture, over which angels might weep—a scene at which the patriot will tremble; and there will follow consequences from which the agricultural interest imposes its deliverance at your hands. Within your lordships' house there is many a noble brow that wears its coronet bejewelled by untarnished honour and consistency. Thank heaven, there is many a heart guiltless of perfidy and wrong, strong for the coming contest for our country's safety; and your reward, my lords, either in triumph or defeat, shall be a nation's gratitude, and the yet more glorious approval of your own unbiassed consciences. Under the fostering care of your lordship's house, England has triumphed over foreign foes, and trampled on the flag of every enemy; in the nineteenth century of our country's greatness the mighty junction is to be solved. Will your honourable house, supported as it is by all that is great and powerful, succumb to that foul confederacy whose avowed object is to humble, nay, to tread the hereditary peerage in the dust? May heaven avert so terrible a catastrophe!"

Oh, British lion, British lion, how can you utter such burning words? How can you say such fierce things of the betrayed "agricultural interest?" represented as that interest, when advocating monopoly, is, by political lords, mortgaged squires, roaring land-agents, and the most subservient class of yearly tenants whose capital is absorbed by the protective system into the landlord's pocket. After reading this effusion, we rubbed our eyes to see whether we had not misread the signature as "An Essex Tenant" instead of an "Essex Calf," for certain it is that the beatings of the poor animal leads to the suspicion, that in this case the skin only is that of the lion, and that the creature covered by it is of a less ferocious and less generous class.

AGRICULTURAL COMMON SENSE.

When the history of the decline and fall of the corn monopoly comes to be written, the Harleston Farmers' Club will deserve honourable mention as amongst the earliest agriculturists who repudiated protection and the claim to live upon profits derived from artificial scarcity. The following brief account of the last meeting of the Club, which we extract from a local journal, shows that the Club is still keeping the lead of the majority of Farmers' Clubs in England:

"HARLESTON FARMERS' CLUB—Fifth Meeting for 1846, April 8th.—Subject: 'The Cost and Value of Protection to the Farmer; the Statistics of the Question rather than the Principle.' Previous to the discussion it was decided, at the unanimous wish of the members present, that the terms of the question should be altered. It was considered that any arguments founded on a comparison of protected with Free Trade prices of corn would probably be deceptive, because it is not accurately known what portion of the former have been owing to the law, or what share of any depreciation in the latter may be due to its repeal. The principles of Free Trade in general, and of Free Trade in corn in particular, with the past effects of protection on agriculture, and particularly on the tenant farmers, and the probable future effects of Free Trade on these interests, were therefore discussed, instead of the cost and value of protection statistically considered. After an interesting and protracted debate, it was unanimously decided—That a Free Trade in corn will benefit the nation without injuring the agricultural interest, provided those requests of the farmers for the repeal of the malt-tax, for an improved tenure embracing more liberal covenants, and the other just claims on the legislature and the landowners which this club has always advocated, be at the same time conceded. The club desires also to express its opinion, that the proposed Government measure errs in not making Free Trade total and immediate, believing that the delay of three years will act injuriously in deferring the settlement of these necessary arrangements."

LEASES IN THE OLDEN TIME.

The following curious extract from an old book has been sent to us by a correspondent, and bearing, as it does, upon the vital question of leases, now so much agitated amongst farmers, will be interesting to our agricultural readers:

"AGRICULTURE LEASES, 1688.—The right honourable Henry Lord Delamer and Earl of Warrington's advice to his children." His lordship was born 1651; lived in the reigns of kings—Charles I. and II., James II., William and Mary, in which latter he was made Earl of Warrington and Chancellor of the Exchequer.

"To my dear Sons.

"In the management of your estate" (Delamer Forest, Cheshire), "take these directions along with you. In the letting of your demesns or other farms, it being supposed you will get the best rent you can, it seems advisable to let them for twenty-one years; and as often as you can take a fine of about a year's value, and then the yearly rent to abate proportionably to what the fine and interest of it will amount to at the end of the term. For as by this you can be no looser if your rent be duly paid, so it is the most probable way to have it well paid, in regard that if your tenant be behind with his rent, if it be not above a year, this fine will set you right. In the next place, the payment of the fine is a strong argument of the ability of your farmer; and besides, a rent that is less than the full worth of the farm is better paid, than when it is at the utmost value. And farthermore, by paying of a lesser rent, farmers are encouraged to make improvements, whereby your rent is not only better secured, but also at the expiration of their lease the farm is better for it.

"In the next place, tie your farmers to repairs, for they will do that for sixpence, which they will set down to you at eighteen-pence.

"And because plowing is the destruction of most farms, bind out your farmer from ploughing either meadow or any other ground that is not proper to be broke up. In the next place, let at least one half of the rest of the ground be improved only in pasture. Then oblige him to muck or manure at least a third part as much as he ploughs every year; and if he break up any ground that he has already mucked, then for the remainder of his term that he muck every year such ground as he has already broken up; and by this means"

(1688) "your farm will be as good a pennyworth at the end of the term as when he took it. Besides these general rules, I can prescribe you none, save to take good security for the performance of his covenants, and to appoint some person to see whether he fail in any of them.

"As for such part of your estate as is upon leases for lives or years, my opinion is, that if all of it were for leases of twenty-one years, it would be best for tenant and landlord. First, because it would put the tenants upon some sort of industry, which is too much neglected by such as have leases for lives. And secondly, because the landlord would be at a certainty, and accordingly he knew how to dispose his affairs. Therefore, if you renew such leases, as are upon years, let it be again for years; and if you lease any that fall out of lease, let them also be for twenty-one years.

"Then, as to renewing leases for lives, if one life is to be added to two yet remaining, take two years value to do it, unless one or both of the remaining lives be very aged or inferior, for then you may expect half, or a year's value more, as the case may fall out. If but one life remain, and two more are to be added to it, then take five years' value, unless extreme age and infirmity alter the case. For the changing of a life, take one year's value, unless the aforesaid objections lye in the way. But never change any life save where there are three lives in the lease, neither add one life when one only remains, unless upon an extraordinary consideration. Now, as to the value of a tenement, my intention is what it is worth when your old rent and services are deducted; for if those be not abated out of the value, you make your tenants pay for what they have not; and secondly, your treatment of them would be unequal; because some are much higher rented than others, and an equal hand gives great content to tenants.

"Tenants may well afford to give these rates, and grow rich by their landlord, because they are under the worth of what they would take of a stranger. And if the tenants will keep their leases full, landlords may afford to take these rates, though under the true value. And that you may as well feel the real advantage, as have the reputation of such an estate, as I hope by God's blessing to leave you."

"London: Printed for John Lawrence, at the Angel, and John Dunton, at the Raven, in the Poultry, 1694."

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

5, New-street, Covent Garden.

SIR,—Observing an article in your paper of last week, upon Indian corn, in which it is stated that "bread cannot be made of Indian meal alone: one third of meal to two-thirds of wheat flour is quite as much as the bread will bear," I take the liberty of sending you a specimen of bread made from Indian corn in the ratio of seven pounds of Indian meal to one pound of flour. I have also made bread entirely of Indian corn, although it has not given such general satisfaction as that made partly of English flour.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

THOMAS INGLIS.

[We beg to acknowledge the receipt of the two small loaves referred to above, and to assure our readers that we found them equal to the best wheat bread we ever ate.—ED. LEAGUE.]

THE CORN LAWS.

No crescat populus, scribit Malthusius ardens;
Ut quoque decrescat Lex Cerealis adest.

Pœna olim capitis populum decrescere fecit;
Nunc ceteri laud aliter Lex Cerealis idem.

Trinity College, Cambridge. C. DE LA PRYME.

Which may perhaps be thus rendered:

Malthusians write with earnest pen—
"Don't multiply, ye sons of men!"
Th' obedient Corn Law waves her mace,
And checks the propagating race.

Once on a time this swarming world
Was thinn'd by gibbet, sword, and flame;
But now the Corn Law, flag-unfurld,
Goes forth and perpetrates the same.

(P. D.)

THE NEW TARIFF.—The Commissioners of the Customs Department have issued instructions to the collectors and controllers of the revenue at the several ports and places throughout the United Kingdom, to prepare and transmit to the Inspector-General of Imports and Exports, with the least possible delay, the undermentioned accounts, so far as the same relate to their respective ports, viz.:—A return of the quantity of each description of goods ordered for consumption, free of duty, or upon payment of a decreased rate of duty, in pursuance of the resolutions of the House of Commons, and in accordance with their orders to those officers in March last, to carry such resolutions into immediate effect, distinguishing those cases in which bonds have been required from the importers to pay the duties heretofore chargeable, in the event of the repeal or reduction of duty not receiving the sanction of Parliament. It will be recollected that the first resolution of the house, and the Treasury order consequent upon the same, had reference to the admission of maize, or Indian corn, meal, buck-wheat, and rice, at new and reduced rates of duty, on a form of bond, adapted and framed for the purpose, binding parties to pay the former rate of duty, or difference of duty on the articles so delivered, in the event of the resolution not passing into a law, and which appeared in full in our columns at the time; and the second comprised the general revision and alterations of the tariff, admitting numerous articles of foreign produce and manufacture, free of duty, and a large number of others at reduced rates of duty, upon the terms or conditions of the parties availing themselves thereof, abiding the ultimate decision of Parliament in the matter. The return is to be made up to the 8th instant inclusive. Whether this return be required for Parliamentary purposes, or for the especial information of the Government, does not appear, as no mention is made in the requisition of the purpose for which the same is required.

It is with sincere regret that we announce the death of Mr. John Workman, of Belfast, which took place on Friday, the 3d of April. From the commencement of the League, Mr. Workman had been one of its most zealous, active, and consistent members.

REVIEW.

FALLACIES OF PROTECTION.—(Sophismes Economiques, par F. Bastiat, &c.) Paris: Guillaumin; London: Dulau. Second Notice.

M. Bastiat very justly observes that many exploded fallacies are abandoned by the advocates of protection in their words, and maintained in their actions. The most important of these is the fallacy of "the balance of trade," which lies at the basis of the pernicious mercantile system, which has been so long the bane of civilisation and the main impediment of human progress. According to this theory, a nation is in the course of being impoverished when the value of her imports exceeds that of her exports. If a principle be sound in itself, it must be valid in the widest extent to which it can be carried. Suppose, then, that the country exported everything, and imported nothing;—we should like to know who and what is to pay for the exports? The blunder is simply that the protectionists do not see that imports are the price paid for exports, and that a check upon imports must depreciate the returns for the goods exported. The theory of the balance of trade is just the reverse of truth; the excess of imports over exports is the precise measure of the profit that the nation makes by its system of exchange, just as the profits of a merchant are measured, not by the quantity of the goods he sells, but by the amount of what he receives in return.

If it be once acknowledged a sound principle of legislation that the State should artificially encourage producers without any regard to the interests of consumers, there is no assignable absurdity which may not be deduced from such a thesis. M. Bastiat best exposes the fallacy in the following clever parody of protectionist petitions:

To the Right Honourable and Honourable the Members of the Legislature, the petition of the Manufacturers of Candles, Tapers, Lamps, Chandeliers, Candelsticks, &c., and the producers of Tallow, Oil, Resin, Alcohol, and all other matters employed in giving light.

Humbly Sheweth,

That your Right Honourable and Honourable protectionists are in the right road. You reject abstract theories; abundance and cheapness have no charms for you. The fortunes of the producer are your only care. You wish to save him from foreign competition; in a word, you wish to reserve the national markets for national industry.

We are about to offer you an admirable opportunity of applying your—what shall we call it?—your theory? No, nothing is more deceptive than theory. Your doctrine? your system? your principle?—But you love not doctrines; you have a horror of systems; and, with respect to principles, you deny the very existence of one in social economy;—let us, then, call it your practice—your practice, without theory or principle.

We endure the horrible competition of a foreign rival, placed, as it appears, in conditions so superior to ours for the production of light, that he inundates our national markets at an extravagantly low price: for so soon as he appears, our sale is at an end—all the consumers apply to him, and a branch of French industry, having innumerable ramifications is at once struck with the most complete stagnation. This rival, which is no other than the Sun, wages such desperate war against our interests, that we suspect him to be instigated by perfidious Albion, inasmuch as he withholds from that haughty island much of that radiance with which he overwhelms our ill-used France.

We pray you, therefore, to pass a law commanding the closing of all windows, skylights, ventilators, fanlights, curtains, shutters, blinds, doors, and, in a word, the shutting up of all openings, apertures, and holes, by which the light of the sun is allowed to enter into houses, to the prejudice of the thriving branches of industry with which we flatter ourselves that we have enriched the country, as it would be ungrateful for the country to expose us to such unequal rivalry and competition.

We pray, noble lords and gentlemen, that you will not mistake our petition for a joke, and that you will not reject it without at least listening to the reasons which we can adduce in its support.

In the first place, if you close the ports against the free admission of natural light, and thus create a demand for artificial light, what branch of industry is there in France which will not gradually feel the benefits of the protection?

If more tallow be consumed, more sheep and oxen will be required; artificial meadows will, in consequence, be multiplied—meat, wool, hides, and especially manure, that basis of all agricultural prosperity.

If more oil be consumed, the cultivation of the olive, and similar trees, will be indefinitely increased. These rich and exhausting plants will enable us to profit by the increased fertility which the multiplication of cattle will give to the land. Our moors and wastes will be covered with the resinous trees. Countless swarms of bees will collect honied treasures on your mountains from those flowers which now

"Are born to blush unseen,
And waste their sweetness on the desert air."

You will realise everywhere the poet's description of an Irish Eden—

"The bees performing the air with music,
All for to adorn sweet Castle Hyde."

In short, every branch of agriculture will receive incalculable extension.

It will be the same with navigation: myriads of ships will sail to the whale fisheries, and in a short time we shall have a marine capable of sustaining the honour of France, and responding to the patriotic susceptibilities of the undersigned petitioners, candle-makers, &c.

But what shall we say under the head of Paris? See the gilding, the bronze, the crystals in chandeliers, in lamps, in lustres, in candelabra, which will shine in spacious magazines, compared with which the show-rooms of the present day are no better than cobblers' bulks.

There is no class in society, even if we go to the gatherer of resin on the top of his sand hill, or the sad miner at the bottom of his pit, whose wages and comforts will not be increased by conceding our prayer.

Reflect upon this, noble lords and gentlemen, and you will be convinced, that there is not a single Frenchman, from the wealthy banker of Auzin down to the humble vendor of matches, whose condition will not be ameliorated by your granting our humble petition.

We foresee your objections, noble lords and gentlemen, but there is not one of them which you will not be compelled to take from the books of the advocates of commercial freedom. We venture to defy you to utter a word against our claims which does not instantly turn against yourselves, and the principles by which your policy is directed.

Will you tell us, that if we gain by this protection, France will be no gainer, because the consumer must defray the expense?

We will answer you:

You have no longer a right to invoke the interests of the consumer. Whenever he has come into competition with the producer, you have sacrificed him without any regard to circumstances. You have done so to encourage industry, to enlarge the field of employment. For the same reason you should do so now.

You have yourselves anticipated the objection. When you were told "the consumer is interested in the free import of iron, coal, sésame, cheese, yams, and wets"—"Yes," you replied, "but the producers are interested in their exclusion." Well, then, if consumers are interested in the free admission of natural light, the producers of artificial light are interested in its exclusion.

But you will say, the producer and the consumer are the same. If the manufacturer gains, the farmer will gain likewise. If agriculture prospers, it will create a demand for the shopkeepers. Well, then, if you confer upon us the monopoly of lighting France during the day, we will buy more tallow, charcoal, oil, resin, wax, gold, silver, bronze, crystal, glass, to support our industry; and furthermore, we, and those from whom we derive our supplies, as we become enriched by our gains, will consume more, and will diffuse prosperity through all branches of national industry. Will you say that the light of the sun is a gratuitous gift, and that to refuse gratuitous gifts would be to reject wealth itself, under pretence of encouraging the means of its acquisition?

But take care that you do not destroy the very essence of your policy; hitherto you have always rejected foreign produce because cheapness brought it near to a gratuitous gift, and your prohibition became more stringent the nearer it approached a gratuitous gift. To obey the exigencies of other monopolists, you had only a half motive; to grant our demand, you have a complete motive; and to reject us on the precise foundation on which we are more firmly founded than all the others, would be to establish the equation that is, continued multiplication is equivalent to subtraction, or in other terms, to heap absurdity upon absurdity.

× × × = —

Nature and industry combine in different proportions, according to soil and climate, in the creation of a product. The part which nature takes is always gratuitous; it is the part taken by labour that fixes value and determines price.

If an orange of Lisbon sells for half the price of an orange grown at Paris, it is because a natural, and therefore gratuitous heat, effects for the one what the other owes to artificial and costly heat.

Hence when an orange comes to us from Portugal, it may be said that one half is given to us gratuitously, and the other half at a price; or in other terms, that, relatively to Paris, we get the orange at half-price.

Now it is precisely on this semi-gratuitousness (excuse the word) that you found your arguments of exclusion. You say, how can national industry sustain the competition of foreign industry when the former has to do every thing, and the latter has only to do half the work, the Sun taking charge of the rest? But if semi-gratuitousness determines you to oppose competition, why should complete gratuitousness induce you to admit competition? Either you are no logicians, or you ought, when you reject semi-gratuitousness as injurious to your national industry, a fortiori, and with double zeal, reject perfect gratuitousness.

Once more, when a product, coal, iron, cheese, or manufactured goods, comes from abroad, and we can acquire it with less labour than we could produce it ourselves, the difference is a gratuitous gift bestowed upon us. This gift is more or less considerable, according as the difference is greater or less. It is the fourth, the half, or three fourths of the value of the product, if the foreigners ask us but three fourths, one half, or one fourth of the price we should otherwise have to pay. It is as complete as it can be, when the giver, as is the case of the Sun with light, asks us for nothing in return. The question then is, and we state it formally, whether you desire for France the blessings of gratuitous consumption, or the advantages of expensive production? Choose, but be logical; for whilst you reject, as you do, coal, iron, cheese, and manufactured goods, in proportion as their price approaches zero, it is a monstrous incongruity to admit the light of the sun, the price of which is at zero all the day long.

Were a similar petition prepared in England, we doubt not that Lord Stanley would present it to the peers, vouching for the respectful tenor of its language, and the constitutional justness of its arguments:

"You laugh—'tis well—the tale applied
May make you laugh at t'other side."

Put corn for light, and Tamboff for the Sun, and you have the noble lord's memorable speech, only greatly improved in temper, and much strengthened in the cogency of its arguments. In fact, the light-taxers in England could quote the window-duties as a precedent, and they might also use the argument of independence of foreigners, whose caprice may induce them to withhold supplies by referring to the scurvy treatment we frequently receive from the Sun during the fogs of November. It is impossible to leave the case for protection more clearly stated; and here we shall pause for the present, but we shall return to M. Bastiat again, for every time that we consult his volume, it affords us fresh and equal pleasure and profit.

The True Grandeur of Nations: an Oration. By CHARLES SUMNER, Esq., Boston, Massachusetts. London, Smith.

This eloquent oration, advocating the principles of universal peace, and denouncing the barbarism of war, was delivered in the principal church of Boston, on the festival commemorating the anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence. It was no small proof of confidence in principle,—no slight exhibition of moral courage, to seize such an opportunity for denouncing those appeals to popular prejudices and vulgar passions, by which a party in the United States have endeavoured to force their country into hostile collision with Great Britain. He has, however, proved himself equal to the occasion; and we doubt whether any anniversary oration has ever been pronounced in Boston exhibiting so large a combination of brilliant eloquence with resistless argument.

As the work has been republished in England, at a cheap rate, and is likely to obtain a wide circulation, it is not necessary to give any formal analysis of its contents; we shall, therefore, only make a few extracts, which require neither introduction nor comment. The first we have to bring before our readers describes the honourable nature of peace:

"IN OUR AGE THERE CAN BE NO PEACE THAT IS NOT HONOURABLE; THERE CAN BE NO WAR THAT IS NOT DISHONOURABLE. The true honour of a nation is to be found only in deeds of justice and in the happiness of its people, all of which are inconsistent with war. In the clear eye of Christian judgment, vain are its victories; infamous are its spoils. He is the true benefactor and alone worthy of honour who brings comfort where before was wretchedness; who dries the tear of sorrow; who pours oil into the wounds of the unfortunate; who feeds the hungry and clothes the naked; who unlooses the fetters of the slave; who does justice; who enlightens the ignorant; who enlivens and exalts, by his virtuous genius, in art, in literature, in science, the hours of life; who, by words or actions, inspires a love for God and for man. This is the Christian hero; this is the man of honour in a Christian land. He is no benefactor, nor deserving of honour, whatever may be his worldly renown, whose life is passed in acts of force; who renounces the great law of Christian brotherhood; whose vocation is blood; who triumphs in battle over his fellow-men. Well may old Sir Thomas Brown exclaim, 'The world does not know its greatest men'; for thus far it has chiefly discerned the violent brood of battle, the armed men springing up from the dragon's teeth sown by Hate, and cared little for the truly good men, children of Love, 'Cromwells guiltless of their country's blood,' whose steps on earth have been as noiseless as an angel's wing."

The application to nations of the Rule of Right recognised in the case of individuals, is very ably put:

"Who has told you, fond man! to regard that as a glory when performed by a nation, which is condemned as a crime and a barbarism, when committed by an individual? In what vain conceit of wisdom and virtue do you find this incongruous morality? Where is it declared that God, who is no respecter of persons, is a respecter of multitudes? Whence do you draw these partial laws of a powerful and impartial God? Man is immortal; but States are mortal. He has a higher destiny than States. Shall States be less amenable to the great moral laws? Each individual is an atom of the mass. Must not the mass be like the individuals of which it is composed? Shall the mass do what individuals may not do? No. The same moral laws which govern individuals govern masses, as the same laws in nature prevail over large and small, controlling the fall of an apple and the orbits of the planets. It was the beautiful discovery of Newton, that gravity is a universal property of matter, a law obeyed by every particle in reference to every other particle, and connecting the celestial mechanism with terrestrial phenomena. So the Rule of Right, which binds the single individual, binds two or three when gathered together—binds conventions and congregations of men—binds villages, towns, and cities—binds states, nations, and empires—claps the whole human family in its sevenfold embrace; nay more:

'Beyond the flaming bounds of place and time,
The living throne, the sapphire blaze,' it binds the angels of heaven, the seraphim, full of love, the cherubim, full of knowledge; above all, it binds, in self-imposed bonds, a just and omnipotent God. It is of this, and not of any earthly law, that Hooker speaks in that magnificent period which sounds like an anthem, 'Of law no less can be said, than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy.'"

The distinctions between true and false patriotism are ably drawn:

"I do not inculcate an indifference to country. We incline by a natural sentiment to the spot where we were born, to the fields which witnessed the sports of childhood, to the seat of youthful studies, and to the institutions under which we have been trained. The finger of God writes in indelible colours all these things upon the heart of man, so that in the dread extremities of death, he reverts in fondness to early associations, and longs for a draught of cold water from the bucket in his father's well. This sentiment is independent of reflection, for it begins before reflection, grows with our growth, and strengthens with our strength. It is blind in its nature; and it is the duty of each of us to take care that it does not absorb the whole character. In the moral night which has enveloped the world, each nation, thus far, has lived ignorant and careless, to much extent, of the interests of others, which it imperfectly saw; but this thick darkness has now been scattered, and we begin to discern, all gilded by the beams of morning, the distant mountain-peaks of other lands. We find that God has not placed us on this earth alone; that there are other nations, equally with us, children of his protecting care.

"The curious spirit goes further, and while it recognises an inborn sentiment of attachment to the place of birth, inquires into the nature of the allegiance which is due to the State. The old idea, still too much conceived, is, that man is made for the State, and not the State for man. Far otherwise is the truth. The State is an artificial body, intended for the security of the people. How constantly do we find, in human history, that the people have been sacrificed for the State; to build the Roman name, to secure to England the trident of the sea. This is to sacrifice the greater for the less; for the fleeting possessions of earth to barter the immortal soul. Let it be remembered that the State is not worth preserving at the cost of the lives and happiness of the people.

"It is not that I love country less, but humanity more, that now, on this national anniversary, I plead the cause of a higher and truer patriotism. Remember that you are men by a more sacred bond than you are citizens; that you are children of a common father more than you are Americans."

We shall conclude by extracting the noble peroration:

"Let it not be said that the age does not demand this work. The mighty conquerors of the past, from their fiery sepulchres demand it; the blood of millions unjustly shed in war crying from the ground demands it; the voices of all good men demand it; the conscience even of the soldier whispers 'Peace.' There are considerations, springing from our situation and condition, which fervently invite us to take the lead in this great work. To this should bend the patriotic ardour of the land; the ambition of the statesman; the efforts of the scholar; the persuasive influence of the press; the mild persuasion of the sanctuary; the early teachings of the school. Here, 'in ampler ether and diviner air,' are untrodden fields for exalted triumphs, more truly worthy the American name, than any snatched from rivers of blood. War is known as the Last Reason of Kings. Let it be no reason of our Republic. Let us renounce and throw off for ever the yoke of a tyranny more oppressive than any in the annals of the world. As those standing on the mountain-tops first discern the coming beams of morning, let us, from the vantage-ground of liberal institutions, first recognise the ascending sun of a new era! Lift high the gates, and let the King of Glory in—the King of true Glory—of Peace. I catch the last words of music from the lips of innocence and beauty:

'And let the whole earth be filled with his glory!'

"It is a beautiful picture in Grecian story, that there was at least one spot, the small Island of Delos, dedicated to the gods, and kept at all times sacred from war, where the citizens of hostile countries met and united in a common worship. So let us dedicate our broad country! The Temple of Honour shall be surrounded by the Temple of Concord, so that the former can be entered only through the portals of the latter; the horn of Abundance shall overflow at its gates; the angel of Religion shall be the guide over its steps of flashing adamant; while within, Justice returned to the earth from her long exile in the skies, shall rear her serene and majestic front. And the future chiefs of the Republic destined to uphold the glories of a new era, unspotted by human blood, shall be 'the first in Peace, and the first in the hearts of their countrymen.'

"But while we seek these blissful glories for ourselves, let us strive to extend them to other lands. Let the bugles sound the Truce of God to the whole world for ever. Let the selfish boast of the Spartan women become the grand chorus of mankind, that they have never seen the smoke of an enemy's camp. Let the iron belt of martial music which now encompasses the earth, be exchanged for the golden cestus of Peace, clothing all with celestial beauty. History dwells with fondness on the reverent homage that was bestowed, by massacring soldiers, on the spot occupied by the sepulchre of the Lord. Vain man! to restrain his regard to a few feet of sacred mould! The whole earth is the sepulchre of the Lord; nor can any righteous man profane any part thereof. Let us recognise this truth; and now, on this Sabbath of our country, lay a new stone in the grand Temple of Universal Peace, whose dome shall be as lofty as the firmament of heaven, as broad and comprehensive as the earth itself."

GOD'S LAWS VERSUS CORN LAWS.

A LETTER TO HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, FROM A DIGNITARY OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.
(From Tail's Magazine.)

The title of this tract is not more remarkable than its contents, and the quarter whence it emanates. To find "a Dignitary of the English Church," one who proclaims himself, by inheritance and education, a Tory, denouncing the Corn Laws to his ecclesiastical superior, as directly opposed to the laws of God and the well-being of man, is a pregnant sign of the times, and we would fain hope an earnest of improvement.

The "Dignitary," a man of learning and piety, who deeply feels the responsibilities of his order, has, as appears from every paragraph of his letter, taken a comprehensive and philosophic view of the social and political history of the most remarkable nations of antiquity, and has also kept pace with the development of opinion in his own age. But he starts from a higher point than can be assumed in mere human reasoning; from the direct commission and trust of the Creator, as revealed and committed to our first parents, to "replenish and subdue the earth, and to have dominion over it." This commission, originally given to Adam, and never revoked, was renewed in the charge given to Noah; and it is broadly contended:

Under the terms of this commission, a right seems to be given to all men to partake of all the fruits of all the earth, provided they be willing to earn it with the sweat of the brow; and that no human legislation can interfere with this vested right of every individual, without violating God's law; and that all attempts, either direct or indirect, to limit this great end, can originate only in violence and tyranny—at least, not till the terms of the commission be thoroughly fulfilled, and the whole earth be subdued and replenished.

The letter sets out strenuously arguing that it is highly proper and decorous, nay, the bounden duty of the ministers of the church, and especially of the lords spiritual in their place in the Upper House of Parliament, to interfere in such questions as Corn Laws; and to use their utmost sagacity and wisdom in correcting what is amiss in legislation, and amending what is defective. The clergy and men of all ranks are roundly told:

Should, then, in a community leavened apparently by the great truths of the Gospel, and acknowledging Christ's ministrations as an important element in its constitution, certain principles prevail, and practices be grafted thereon, which tend to add to the wealth of the rich, and to diminish the narrow comforts of the poor; it appears to me that the ministers of God, who, by their arguments, maintain, or by their silence connive at, such principles and practices, betray the cause of the poor, whom it is their essential duty to protect, and are in great danger of ceasing to be "the salt" of the social mass.

Believing, as I do, that the Corn Laws, which, for a generation of thirty years, have regulated both the price and quantity of food in Great Britain, have tended, and do still tend, to increase the wealth of the rich, and to diminish the comforts of the poor, it is my bounden duty to profess publicly this belief, and to attempt to relieve our poorer brethren from the pressure which these laws seem to inflict upon them.

Throwing a rapid glance along the current of sacred and profane history, from the beginning of the world until the appearance of our Saviour on earth; the doctrines and principles which he promulgated, and the enlightened and humane civil institutions which, though still very imperfect, have grown out of the Christian system, are ably and eloquently contrasted with the principles of policy which regulated even the most illustrious and highly civilised nations of antiquity.

Limited as is our space, and though this Letter contains much that is more apt for what we conceive its main object, —namely, forcing thought, if not absolutely carrying conviction, into high places,—we must quote one passage, which, among many others, must show the "protectionists" that the "Dignitary" is something different from those most useful labourers, in their own sphere, the Anti-Corn-Law orators, whether of the hustings or the platform. He reverts to the principles and labours of the early apostles and disciples, the first Christian missionaries, and thus strikingly presents the contrast:

The natural man, the selfish creature, as known to us from actual experience, and as we find him faithfully depicted in profane history, acts upon principles directly the reverse of these. He loves his own locality with an instinctive feeling. He was steadily against all attempts to enlarge the sphere of his local attachments. His home, be it ever so homely, is his paradise. Within that narrow limit, he cherishes these prejudices which have grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength. He values all his petty privileges in proportion to their exclusive character, and resolutely resists any attempt to communicate them to others; and if he is a member of the more favoured class of the community, values his position, not according to his own real elevation in the scale of humanity, but according to a fictitious standard of his own invention, of which the favourite test is, the graduated depression of all placed below him.

On such selfish principles were constituted the world-famous constitutions of the ancient states of Greece: Sparta itself, that wonderful creation of the human intellect, presents us with a view of the most vigorous attempt ever made by man to fix within narrow limits energies which never can be permanently thus controlled, to cast all minds in one unvarying mould, and, as it were, to stereotype an everlasting imprint of social life. There were many points in this system which a disciple of Malthus would gladly reproduce. Sparta had an aristocracy as fixed in its dimensions as the everlasting hills which looked down upon her mean-looking capital. Into her sacred band no new blood could possibly be infused,—no merits, however great, or whatsoever might be their nature, could entitle a Spartan, not legitimately descended from members of the privileged class, to have his name registered among the blood nobility of Sparta. Her middle class was limited in number, and her laws positively forbade any increase of its constituent members. The first-born male of every Peloponnesian family was alone regarded as the representative of his class. His brothers, debarred from marriage, were compelled to serve labour on his territorial lot, without any hope of improving their position, except by the death of their brother without male offspring. The lower classes were represented by the Helots, slaves of the lowest description, without any social rights, without property, and whose numbers were kept down to suit the exigencies of the times by private assassination and public massacres. It has been supposed,—and the supposition is partly borne out by tradition,—that Lycurgus borrowed some of his institutions from Moses. The only conservative principle, in this exclusive state, was the exemplary self-denial of the aristocracy. Its members were contented to forego all the luxuries of life, and to restrict their wants, as far as the body was concerned, to a provision for sufficient protection against cold, hunger, and thirst; they were, literally speaking, contented "with food and raiment." A Spartan noble, for centuries, lived as plainly, if not more so, than the lowest Helot of the community. Such self-denial was not without its reward; for the power of the Spartan aristocracy flourished for a period of time, of which we have no similar example in the histories of ancient states. To secure power, the desire of which is the last infirmity of noble minds, they voluntarily resigned those sensual enjoyments which ignoble minds regard as most to be desired. Even the fall of Sparta had nothing abrupt or destructive in its results. She died of a gradual decline, without any dangerous convulsion, without any intestine war of brother against brother, or wholesale massacre of citizens by kindred hands. But Sparta fell "without a sign;" her greatness is really the "magnum nominis umbra" of the poet, recorded in books alone, and not leaving the impress of her mind upon the history of man. She stands alone,—her pedigree begins and ends with herself; she had no ancestors, and left no successors.

Athens was less exclusive in her institutions: her population consisted not of the pure Cæropian race alone, but was an amalgam of almost every tribe in Greece: repeated revolutions had fused most of her free inhabitants into a compact democracy, instinct with life, and boundless in ambitions; her movements were consequently less cramped, and her activity more decided than those of any other free state of ancient Greece. At a period almost antecedent to the regular history of the race, Athens had sent forth colonies, which in time swelled out into the fair proportions of the Hellenic states of Ionia; nor did she, to the latest period of her power, cease to act upon the same principles, and to send her surplus population to distant shores. But she could not transfer her affections to her transplanted children. Her care was limited by the boundaries of Attica and a few neighbouring islands. Thus to her colonies she was an unkind stepmother—to her acquired subjects a cruel and despotic mistress. She thought that the brute force at her command would enable her to defy the discontent of those dependents, to whom she denied equal rights and privileges; that, by the superiority of her fleets, she might safely domineer both over her colonies and conquests, and make them her slaves and tributaries. But she drew the reins too tightly; they snapped in her hands; the fleet of her dependents went over to the enemy. Her naval supremacy was thus overthrown; and she fell amidst the horrors of a home-war and civil bloodshed, with a suddenness in direct contrast with the slowness of her ascent. But she did not fall without a sign. The sons whom she had cherished in the days of home-life, left the impress of their minds on all succeeding ages; and she still lives in her orators, poets, historians, and philosophers, and in the remains of her marble wonders, whose ruins still breathe. After many a bloody struggle, not without glory, Athens gradually subsided into the peaceful teacher of her ruder conquerors, the favourite seat whence the ancient world derived its intellectual knowledge, and finally, the pride and glory of the unchristianized world.

The wisest of her sons amused themselves with constructing systems of policy, in which all the advantages resulting from social and political life were to be secured, and all the evils avoided. But as they knew not of the high mission of man, they could never raise their imaginations beyond the contemplation of a territory limited in quantity, and consequently of a body of citizens limited in number. The necessary operation of what we now call the Malthusian law was perfectly well known to them; and that the principle on which they acted would necessarily prove fatal to any prosperous community formed on the very narrow basis on which alone they professed to found their systems, were not some means taken to counteract this principle, and to keep the number of citizens within the prescribed limit. It grieves me to write, that although both Plato and Aristotle hint at certain anterior measures which might palliate the evil, they teach openly, that the only effectual remedy against its ultimate certainty, was the destruction of superfluous infants, before they can appreciate the gift of life.

Still there was an authority even in their days which might have taught them a better lesson. That authority the majority of their countrymen regarded with something of the veneration with which we regard the Holy Scriptures. Old Homer, had they consulted him, would have told them of lands untilled by the hand, untrodden by the foot of man, which waited for nothing but man's labour to change them from a howling wilderness into smiling gardens, which would have furnished her with ample domains, ready to be occupied by that superfluous population which was the source of their difficulties, and against the evils supposed necessarily to result from which they knew of no better remedy than the destruction of their own children, the continuous removal of the genial spring from the course of the year.

But the high attitude which England is called upon to assume as a colonising country, possessed of means and resources, such as the world never before saw, for executing the commission originally given by the Creator to man, is less to our immediate purpose than the narrower but more pressing question of Free Trade. It is enough that the subject of colonisation is ably treated, though only on general principles, and illustrated by examples drawn from the history of the greatest conquerors and colonisers of the ancient world. One sentence from a brief and masterly sketch of the Norman Conquest we copy as an indication of the general spirit of the "Letter."—"It must be confessed that the period of the Norman domination is marked by events which, however pleasing they may appear in the eyes of a mediæval enthusiast, have no charms for the truly benevolent man, who wishes to improve the great body of his countrymen."

But setting out with better principles, and with nobler ends than ever yet animated conquerors, and possessing unrivalled means and advantages, which are proudly enumerated, the "Dignitary" exhorts his countrymen to fulfil the high destiny for which Providence seems to have selected this favoured land, and to become the beneficent agents in the great works of peopling and civilising the world. There is, however, one great but not insurmountable obstacle to the accomplishment of an object in which it would be glorious even to co-operate, namely, our restrictive commercial policy, and the condition to which it has reduced our industrial classes; our laws that are opposed to God's laws. This obstacle, which the reasonings and persuasions of this Letter must tend to remove, is thus treated:

As far as human reason can infer, as far as experience can lead us to conceive, there is but one visible obstacle to prevent us from fulfilling so glorious a duty; and this obstacle has been thrown across our path, not by any necessity imposed upon us by the physical laws of the universe, nor erected by the ingenuity of human enemies, but deliberately built up by our own suicidal hands. We, the favoured, the energetic, the patient, the hard-toiling inhabitants of this realm, so powerful for good, so abstemious from evil, able to produce to an unlimited extent all the other necessities of civilised life, and to part with them as a medium of exchange, cannot and do not produce a sufficiency of wholesome food for the healthy maintenance of our existing population.

The Legislature in an evil hour passed laws, which, however wisely intended, have eventually prevented us from supplying this deficiency in proportion to our wants. I need not recapitulate to your Grace the history of our Corn Laws; most probably, it is better known to you than it is to me. But your Grace must well remember the memorable year when they assumed their present form, and the instinctive hatred with which their enactment was regarded by those who have since that time been called "the masses." The Bill, against which, in its every stage, those poor people published their turbulent and riotous protests, passed into a law.

Its proposers and supporters affirmed that it was imposed upon them by necessity; and, to a certain extent, perhaps it was so. We were told that it was necessary in our transition state from almost a universal war to almost a universal peace; to save the landowners from certain ruin—to lighten the burden of the national debt—to enable us gradually to descend from the false position into which we had been inevitably brought by our isolated existence of so many years' continuance, and especially by the fearful debasement of our legal currency. It was more than hinted that were only time allowed, all might be rectified, and we might again safely and gracefully descend to the level of other nations.

With the truth or fallacy of these arguments, it is not my present intention to deal. But I know this, that since that period a generation of men has passed away, that the Corn Laws are still in force, although mitigated in their stringency, and that the arguments adduced for their continuance, are of that character, which, if unrefuted must render the laws perpetual, cripple our ever-elastic energies, arrest us in our onward course, and render our statesmen the by-word and scorn of future generations.

The "Dignitary" next sets himself to combat the hackneyed arguments of the protectionists, and to demolish, in particular, the thrice-refuted fallacies, which our readers have so often seen knocked upon the head during the last dozen years. But we have little to say on this section of the "Letter," save to express a fervent hope that, for the common good, it might take effect in quarters where Colonel Thompson and the League might in vain raise their voices. This hope is indeed one main ground of our satisfaction at the appearance of this remarkable pamphlet. The writer at once gives up the point of the labouring population being fed as generously as he would have them fed from the produce of our home territories; and roundly denies the necessity of any restrictions. His working man's dietary, or his definition of what "wholesome food" is, would really go far to make the country deserve its old appellation of "Merry England."

"Wholesome food," (he says,) according to my definition, ought to consist of a diet, of which bread made of the ground seeds of the more generous cerealia, ought to constitute a large element; and this bread might, to a certain extent, be partially displaced by preparations of the seeds of leguminous plants. But along with this farinaceous food, there ought to be consumed a fair proportion of animal substances, whether in the form of milk, butter, cheese, flesh, fowl, or fish. I have no hesitation in adding, that there should also, in the case of hard-working men, be a due allowance of fermented liquor, the soul of the seeds of the cerealia, or of fruit-trees, in the shape of cider, wine, beer, porter, &c. This will be recognised all over Europe as the Englishman's bill of fare.

Such was the food of the patriarchs,—the kid, the calf, the lamb taken from the fold, milk in its various forms, and especially bread, without which Jacob and his children could not live comfortably, with all their numerous flocks and herds. Such was the food which Melchisedec brought forth to refresh the wearied servants of Abraham. He refreshed them with bread and wine, God's best earthly gifts to his creatures. The priests of the old world, under every dispensation, approached the altars of their gods with similar offerings.

Old Homer allowed no other food to his warriors before Troy but the generous diet of bread, what we call butchers' meat, and wine. And the riotous suitors in the Odyssey revel on the same substantial courses. The harvest food of even his rapiers was the roasted ox and newly-baked scones, and his very ploughmen received, at regular intervals, a refreshing draught of wine.

Herodotus states as an historical fact, that the warriors of Egypt received, among other perquisites, a daily allowance of bread, butcher's meat, and wine; even her very bondsmen, when tasked hardest to their work, were allowed to revel in the luxuries of the flesh-pots.

We call this sound and admirable doctrine; and some remarks follow about the physical condition of the Irish, and the poor of the North of Scotland, which we gladly hail from the pen of a "Dignitary of the English Church;" though such language about the people's food, or want of food, might, forty years since, have qualified a man for Botany Bay. The conclusion is:

It is therefore a gross fallacy to affirm, that the agriculture of these islands furnishes its population with a sufficient quantity of wholesome food. The utmost that can be said under this head is, that it does provide a sufficiency for the consumption of the easier classes.

Instead of favouring what are called the Malthusian doctrines, the "Dignitary" contends that a numerous and increasing population—where religion and morality, wise legislation, and an enlightened system of civil policy fulfil their great purposes—is to be regarded as a special blessing of Providence, as a token of the divine favour. This, he holds, is the doctrine taught in the Scriptures, and corroborated by profane history. Thus it is stated, that Sparta was ruined by the want of Spartans of the ancient stock. So also Athens and Carthage fell because their citizen population did not increase in proportion to their ever-increasing number of imperial subjects. Rome was in some degree either wiser or more fortunate in this respect; but even Rome, with much greater advantages, and with more liberal principles, showed alarming symptoms of a similar disease, and tried various means of remedying the gradual decrease of real Romans.

What but God's judgment has smitten the regions once ruled over by the great monarchs of Assyria, Media, and Persia, with sterility and barrenness—sterility in their soil and barrenness in their families? We read in the pages of Herodotus of the almost incredible productiveness of ancient Babylonia. "This," writes the father of history, "this is the most fertile of all the regions with which we are acquainted in its crops of cerealia. It does not attempt, however, to produce vines, figs, and olive trees; but in grain crops it is so fertile, that, on an average, it returns its seed two hundred-fold, and in favourable seasons even three hundred-fold."

In another passage he states, that this province alone, after feeding its own great population, could spare enough to supply with food all the public establishments of the empire for four out of the twelve months of the year. Now this same district barely furnishes the necessities of life for two or three paltry cities, and for a few wandering tribes of Arabs, who have located themselves among its mighty ruins. If we look at Asia Minor, especially at the portion occupied by the Ionian Greeks, which was pronounced by Herodotus to enjoy the most genial climate and the most fertile soil known to him, we see the same astounding result. Its spontaneous fertility, its natural advantages, have been counteracted by some causes powerful enough to prevent its few and scattered inhabitants from deriving any corresponding benefit from their happy location, and, which is more to my purpose, from continuously decreasing in number. In Palestine, and all through Syria, the population is evidently dying away; and the land now very partially cultivated, will apparently be soon left desolate. Even in islands like Cyprus and Crete, the same course of things is discernible. Cyprus, when under the Venetian government, had a population of 1,500,000 souls, when for a certainty it could trust to nought but its own soil; now that it has become a part of the Continental dominions of the Osmanlis, it with difficulty feeds 60,000 human beings. The Osmanlis in Europe, Asia, and Africa, are daily decreasing in numbers; and Turkey, in the words of Lamartine, is dying for want of Turks. Our islands, on the contrary, are yearly adding some three or four hundred thousand souls to our population, and no improvement in agriculture can possibly enable our farmers to increase the quantity of marketable food in proportion to the call for it on the part of our increasing population. Even the series of bad harvests which preceded the summer of 1841, and the consequent distress, might perhaps have checked for the time, but did not prevent, our continuous increase in numbers. Time will therefore, in spite of all obstacles, in a few years virtually repeal the Corn Laws, and compel us to derive no small portion of our daily bread from other sources than the British soil.

The peculiar advantages which landowners, as a class, possess, are not overlooked in the "Letter;" while of those protective laws which, in 1814, might have been necessary, as temporary measures, it is said:

The transition from a state of almost universal war to a state of peace as almost universal, required delicate management; and the extraordinary legislation of the day, which placed us in a very invidious light to the rest of the world, was, it may be held, a prudent precaution to secure us from great and imminent evils. No sound-minded politician of that day ever dreamed that they were to be one of our sacrosanct institutions, to be non-removable and perpetual. The constant struggle against their continuance, the war of words which was ever maintained upon the subject, ought to have acted as a full and sufficient warning to the agricultural interest, that they were but the result of a temporary policy, and not to be regarded as the sacred and unalterable code of the Medes and Persians. If the landholders obstinately refused to accept these continuous warnings, we may regret their folly, but cannot deeply sympathize with the sorrows which may be the result of such chronic blindness.

I have read that Sir Robert Walpole once described the landed interest as a sheep which, when seized by the shepherd, submitted to its fate without a struggle, and silently yielded up its rich fleece. But the same great statesman's rustic symbol of the mercantile and commercial interest, was what an Orientalist would call "the father of our hams and bacon," who, when rough hands were laid upon him, disturbed the neighbourhood with his unmusical clamour; and, after all, however closely the instrument was applied, yielded only a few useless bristles to the shearer. In our days we have witnessed a change as wonderful as any celebrated by Ovid: the silent sheep has become the loud grunter, and ceases not to disturb our social system by her discordant bleatings.

The advantages which landlords have derived, and must continue to derive, from railroads, are not forgotten; and wonderfully little sympathy is displayed with aristocratic disgust at the pestilent vulgarities of smoky manufactories, steam-engines, and a besmirched industrious or an upstart wealthy commercial population. What follows, if coming from a less sacred source than a Church Dignitary, would be thought to smack of stark radicalism:

I must confess that I feel little sympathy with the morbid feelings of a nobleman or gentleman, who, after passing half his time in London, and mixing there with its busy population, content to walk, or to ride, or drive, amidst a continued throng, then retires to the country for the remainder of his year, to have his nerves shattered and his equanimity disturbed, should two or three strangers be found wandering among the splendid scenes of his ample domains. It is the invasion of these sacred retreats, so dear to the pride and even to some better feelings of the aristocracy, that makes a manufactory an odious sight, and a railway a source of fear to many men otherwise benevolent and beneficent.

The progress of Great Britain to imperial power, presents a strong contrast in the effects produced on the home provinces, when compared to the similar advance of Rome to a similar imperial greatness. The victories of Rome were accompanied by the constantly-increasing desolation of Italy. In proportion to the extent of the empire, the arable land, the olive yards and vineyards, gradually began to disappear; not because their cultivation was unproductive, but because the ground was wanted for the villas, the parks, the hunting forests of the more than royal aristocrats. Their insane substructions, their boundless fish-ponds, their woodlands, their spacious gardens, with their profusion of all rare plants that could either delight the scent or charm the eye, drove the tiller of the ground from their immediate vicinity, whether pleasant spots on the lower or upper sea. And where nature was less adapted for such pleasant seats, the shepherd reigned supreme, and covered the hills of Apulia and Lucania with countless flocks, which were maintained with little expense, and managed principally by slaves.

England, the empress of the commercial world, and with wings capable of wafting her to the remotest parts of the earth, is tethered by cords from which she cannot break loose to her Island Home. The mass of engines which the present generation has either inherited or created, the iron-stone and coal mines in various districts, the railroads over which she can so easily convey her produce to the seashore, furnish the capitalist and labourer with facilities and capabilities which they would in vain seek to realise in other regions. And the very density of the population, which is no small constituent in the elements of her productive power, is compelled, as it were, in proportions still more dense, to spread around certain centres. Hence the continuous process which threatens to convert England into great operative factories and bleaching greens; to make it everything but a rose bed, or a park residence for exclusive proprietors.

But, if this be the case, why should our splendid aristocracy, who have nothing but local prejudices to tether them to certain spots, not remove themselves, if they cannot abate the increasing nuisance? The progress of manufacturing industry will daily enable them more and more to put money in their purses, and to go forth and establish spacious parks, inviolable preserves, in the wilds of Canada, the steppes of Australia, or the boundless plains of Southern Africa. I see no reason why a powerful nobleman, who now rejoices in the preservation of hares and pheasants should not be more ambitious in this line. A preserve of wolves, grisly bears, moose deer, not to speak of smaller game, in Northern Canada, would really be aristocratic, or even royal.

This remarkable Letter closes with a view of the Revolution produced in this country by the Emancipation of the Catholics and the Reform Bill; changes not less mighty or important in their consequences, that they have been quietly accomplished, and are silently doing their work. But hopeful and cheering conclusions are drawn; and, in substance, we are told that, morally and physically, the British empire never stood among the nations of the earth in so powerful and noble an attitude as at the present time. The Tory party—what was deemed Sir Robert Peel's party—are, in this pithy paragraph, shown the folly of the senseless clamour, and more senseless invective, in which they are indulging against that great Minister and his Liberal colleagues:

The statesman who would attempt to steer the commonwealth by the principles and through the channels of the unchanged constitution, would undoubtedly strike upon shoals and rocks not marked on the older charts, and experience storms and whirlwinds where his predecessors had been favoured with regular trade winds and fixed monsoons. To attempt, therefore, to bind down any of our living statesmen by any declaration made by them under our former political system, smacks strongly of insanity. All taunts, also, and slanderous invectives against the statesmen of either party, because their present course of action may not be in strict consistence with previous expressions of opinion, are mere idle talk, not worth a wise man's consideration.

The ecclesiastical order is also admonished of its present duty; and the necessity of the school and library for the working classes is as distinctly recognised as that of the church. But, returning to the original point; before the blessings anticipated can be realised, "the Corn Laws must be abolished," and "the sooner the better." Their present existence on the statute book is considered "a disgrace to our legislature;" and once more, therefore, a voice is raised in solemn warning.

Steps in wrong directions often place men in difficult positions, whence either advance or retreat may be accompanied with some risk. We cannot advance, nor can we stand still; retreat therefore is our only resource. Any attempt on the part of our aristocracy to give battle in their present position, will expose them to something worse than defeat; for assuredly a temporary victory, on this point, would in the end prove more fatal than many defeats. They are in the wrong, and we know, as a general truth, that a continuous struggle against wrongs terminates not with their correction, but involves the wrongdoers in imminent danger. I can assure your Grace, that there are many bad citizens, who contemplate with pleasure the continued resistance of the aristocracy to measures which millions regard as necessary to their very existence. May God in his mercy avert any continued struggle between the many and the few on this point, and may we never see our glorious aristocracy worsted in a sordid attempt to increase their wealth at the expense of the poor! Your Grace will remember the rebuke which Dr. Johnson administered to a Sir Thomas Robinson, who expressed his fears that corn imported from Ireland might prove prejudicial to the English corn trade. "Sir Thomas," said the Doctor, "You talk the language of a savage. What, sir! would you prevent any mass from feeding themselves, if by any means they can do it?" The great mass of our people are being rapidly convinced that "they can feed themselves by honest means," and will assuredly regard the man who may attempt to prevent them from doing so as a savage.

The Dignitary—and we can assure our readers that this is no sham designation—denies all connection between what he regards as Tory principles and the odious and impolitic Corn Laws. And we must acknowledge that the pure high-bred Whigs, until a new light lately broke upon them, have been quite as wrong-headed on this point as the Tories.

We have deemed this Letter entitled to more space than it is usual to bestow on a pamphlet of the day, from the belief that, coming, at the present crisis, from a Tory and a Churchman, it is calculated to do much good. The writer, while he stirs the stagnant and sluggish waters, also contrives to throw oil upon the angry surges which threaten to submerge the vessel of the State. That besides fulfilling the higher functions of a peacemaker, he is an accomplished scholar and a philosophic student of history, accustomed to view moral and political questions from a calm and commanding position, must be apparent to every one who reads even the above garbled passages from his Letter. And surely the solemn protest and recorded testimony of such a man must forcibly come home to those of the self-styled protectionists who are not altogether deaf to the voice of Christian charity, nor yet to that of reason and experience.

THE NEW TARIFF;

ITS EFFECT ON BRITISH MANUFACTURED ART.

(From the Art Union.)

The principle on which the new tariff is based may be simply stated as consisting in the removal of all taxation from raw material, and the imposition of such duties on manufactured goods as may contribute to the revenue without being either prohibitory or protective. Now, in all questions connected with production on the one side, and revenue on the other, it is almost impossible to avoid discussing economic questions; and, though the view which we mean to take of the tariff is purely artistic, it would be impossible to make such a view clear and intelligible if the economical relations of the subject were wholly disregarded. It is better to meet direct a difficulty which cannot be avoided; and, therefore, instead of incidentally discussing the grounds of distinction between raw material and manufactures, we shall set out by a direct explanation of the grounds on which a difference is established, not for the purpose of justifying premiers, parties, or parliaments, but for elucidating the principles of plain common sense.

Raw materials should not be subjected to taxation, for the simple and obvious reason that whatever diminishes the supply of material acts as a prohibition on the industry to be employed in its manufacture. A tax on the import of wool would at once lessen the amount of employment given to combers, spinners, weavers, and cloth-dressers; but as food is a raw material in every kind of manufacture, being worked into the thews and sinews of the operative, it appears, on the first aspect of the matter, that a tax upon food, so far as it is enforced, acts as a prohibition of manufacturing industry, and a consequent diminution of the amount of employment distributable among the working population. On the other hand, it may be urged that corn being virtually a manufacture from the soil, produced by farmers and labourers, in the very same way that calicoes are produced by the owners of factories and their factory-hands, the incentive given to the production of food at home supplies a compensating amount of employment to the agricultural population. As we are not about to enter on any discussion of the Corn Laws, we need only say here that discouragement by taxation is a very different thing from encouragement by protection; the former is a positive and obvious evil; the latter, a very questionable and doubtful good. Indeed, we should not have referred to the corn question at all, only that any examination of the tariff from which that question was wholly excluded, would too closely resemble a representation of "Hamlet," with the part of Hamlet omitted by particular desire.

Raw material, then, ought not to be taxed, because such an impost limits employment and diminishes the amount of means for the application of industry. But taxation must fall somewhere; the interest of the national debt and the cost of our extensive and expensive civil, military, and naval establishments, must be maintained; under this necessity, we think that duties may fairly be levied on the import of manufactured goods, because all taxes are ultimately paid by the consumer, and the consumers of imported manufactures belong to a class of society the best able to bear the burden of fiscal imposts. Taxes on imported manufactures may be levied for the sake of protection, for the sake of revenue, or for both purposes combined in different proportions; but it is important to bear in mind that the objects of a protective tariff and a revenue tariff are not only inconsistent, but are directly opposed to each other. The design of protective duties is to exclude, that of revenue duties to invite, imports. When, therefore, any advocate for high import duties argues at one time for the sake of protection to native industry, and at another for the sake of the public revenue, he is manifestly contradicting himself, and demolishing with one course of reasoning the arguments he has endeavoured to establish with the other. It is, indeed, an evil incidental to revenue duties that they must, to a certain extent, be protective; and, therefore, in every tariff for revenue purposes it is important to fix the scale of duties so low as not to discourage consumption. The less that consumption is, the less will be the import; and the less the import, the less will be the revenue.

Now, the rate of duty fixed by the new tariff on the import of manufactured goods is in nearly all cases so low as to be utterly worthless in a protective or prohibitory point of view; there would not probably be a yard more of French silks, muslins, or laines imported under a system of perfect freedom, than at so moderate a rate of duty as ten per cent.; and there is probably no class of manufacturers—always excepting the disciples of the Macclesfield school of political economy—who would object to having this incidental shadow of protection altogether abolished, so far as their own private interests are concerned. It must, therefore, be clearly understood that these duties are maintained solely and exclusively for the purposes of revenue, and that they must cease with the exigencies which have called them into existence.

The distinction between raw material and manufactured goods, though apparently simple, becomes a little complicated, when we reflect that the product of one branch of manufacture becomes the raw material of another. Organsilk is the product of the throwster, but it is the raw material of the weaver; rectified spirit is the product of the distiller, but the raw material of the varnish maker; flour is the product of the miller, but the raw material of the baker. Hence arises the inherent injustice of every protective tariff: if it served one class, it seriously injured many others; if it stimulated one branch of production, it stunted and blighted several other branches. We say nothing here of the injury done to consumers, because that is sufficiently obvious; but, looking to artistic as well as to economic results, there is an obvious want of logic in every protective tariff: for, while it encourages the industry where the article was a product, it discourages the industry where that product became a raw material. But there are many materials which are used in manufactures, not singly, but in combination with others. In such a case, protective duties levied on one portion of the materials discourages the consumption of the rest, and thus becomes a tax on whatever branches of industry may be engaged in their production. There was a singular example of this incidental effect of protection in the old wool duties. To make good cloths from English wool it was necessary that it should be combined with the fine wools of foreign growth; but, when a tax was laid on the import of foreign wool, the price of the proportion necessary to be combined with English wool was so high as to interfere with the progress of manufacture, and thus the demand for wool of English growth was lessened by the very system devised for its protection. At length the duty on foreign wools was abolished, and the immediate consequence was, that the demand for English wool greatly increased, and its price rose in the market. We may mention, as further illustrations of this point, the injury which the weavers in the south of Germany suffer from the imposition of a duty on yarn, and the backward state of agriculture and ship-building in France, chiefly owing to the maintenance of a heavy protective duty on raw and wrought iron. This is a matter of great importance in reference to the proposed revision of the tariff; as, on the one hand, the incidental evils of protection fall on the most remote and apparently unconnected branches of industry; so we may reasonably expect that the benefits of relaxation will have an equally wide range, and will manifest their stimulating influences in quarters never suspected of having been subjected to discouragement. The abolition of the duty on drugs and dye stuffs last year has led manufacturers to try experiments on the mercantile value of the liberated articles, and several of them already have been found available for useful purposes to which they were not previously known to be applicable.

ON THE EFFECT OF COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES IN RESPECT TO POPULAR INTELLIGENCE.

So favourable, then, to intelligence, both directly and indirectly, are the social relations which obtain in towns and great cities. Our next point is, that cities owe their origin to handicraft and traffic, and that it is the effect of commercial habits to give great comparative expansion and discipline to the intellect.

Wherever men are employed in trade and manufactures, the diversity of their occupation must, in itself, suggest varied thought, and stimulate to some degree of mental effort. It is true, as the arts advance, men become intent on dispatch, which is best realised by a division of labour, and the effect of that process is to separate artisans into classes, leaving only a narrow province to each. But this method of proceeding must have its limits, and where most acted upon, each man knows full well what his kindred craftsman is doing, though that section of labour may be one in which he has himself no share.

It is also in the nature of machinery that it should, at least in many cases, greatly lessen the demand on the spontaneous ability of the workman. Results which once depended in a great degree upon his individual skill, are made to follow, and with more certainty, from the action of the instrument which he is now required to superintend. But the action of that machine is as a constant lesson on human ingenuity. It shows what the ingenuity has done, and suggests what it may do. Less demand may be made on the manual skill of the mechanic, but that does not prevent his thoughts from being familiar with a wide range of ingenious operation. If an old man, he will know something of the history of his craft, and of others carried on about him; and in many cases his mind will be a chronicle of the inventions which have so greatly changed the processes of manufacture since the years of his boyhood. His thoughts, we may be sure, will not be those of one who has learnt to look upon the world as doomed to stand still. He lives in the midst of the skill and enterprise of his country; and he necessarily hears much concerning the skill and enterprise of other countries. In his mind, the leading idea in regard to society is that of progression—onwardness, and not, as in the case of the peasant, who, whatever he may see of change in the nature of his implements, is disposed to look on matters about him as doomed to be in the main as they have been. In the view of the one, change is generally regarded as hopeful; in the view of the other, it is an object of dread, as being too commonly identical with mischief.

If there are causes in connection with commerce which operate thus favourably on intelligence in the case of the humbler classes, to whom it furnishes employment, there are of course others of a much higher description, which affect the merchant, and the capitalist. Such men, as we have already observed, possess a direct interest in knowing, more or less, the natural and the artificial of all lands, and in weighing the knowledge thus acquired, in order that it may be turned to the best account. In the wide and venturous traffic which engages such heads, the greatest consequences are known to depend on the possessing, or the not possessing, such knowledge and discernment. Hence the intricacy which belongs to social policy when taking its texture from the relations of commerce; and the causes which naturally contribute to give such caution, and compass, and vigour to the genius of the ministers of commercial states, exert a similar influence over the people generally in such states. Questions by no means simple in their nature, are always rising to the notice of such a people. In such communities, accordingly, the power of making the difficult plain is of great value. It is only by means of the many that the few can hope to see their plans carried into effect, and this necessity devolves upon them the further necessity of becoming effective teachers of the many, and teachers of as much promptitude as vigour, the many with whom they have to deal being always immediately about them.

But whatever may be the result of a comparison between the men who have become rulers in commercial states, and those who have distinguished themselves as members of a landed aristocracy, no comparison can be made between the intelligence of the society at large with which these two classes of great men have stood respectfully associated. We repeat, the people of a large commercial city feel necessarily much more than any other people, as citizens of the world. They see that their interests depend, not on themselves merely, nor on their immediate neighbours, but on the relations which they may possess sufficient wisdom and power to maintain with the ends of the earth. No nation wanting in the capacity to look thus abroad, can ever become great in the history of commerce: and the continuance of such greatness, if once realised, must depend on the continuance of that capacity—the fear being, in the case of such a people, as in the case of a prosperous individual, that men will learn to place an undue reliance on their supposed sagacity; that familiarity with change will beget an undesirable tendency towards change; and that the success which has resulted from caution, may be followed by disaster, as consequent upon presumption. It is true, in a great degree, of states, as of men, that they think all power mortal except their own.—From the Age of Great Cities, by Robert Vaughan, D. D.

THE BRITISH LION.

The British Lion for a long time good-naturedly consented to associate, as guarantee of respectability, with a lady called Britannia, who used to sit with a tea-board and toasting fork, on the reverse of our copper coins. At last he left the aforesaid lady, and never afterwards did anything under a shilling, but now, as a royal animal, prefers crowns and half-crowns. His aristocratic predilections are natural enough, for an illustrious personage always has him in her arms, and often exalts him above her crown.

With our jolly tars he was an especial favourite. They fought for him—swore by him; the main was their home, and they allowed their tails to grow to show their relationship; and when they did put their claws, or, as they called them, grappling irons, upon anything, they never let go but with their lives, at the same time striking terror into their enemies with the loud roar of their cannon, for they were never known to leave off without going the whole animal.

The Law, when it puts its paw upon any property, the recovery of which is doubtful, calls it putting a Lien upon it, meaning that it intends to have the Lion's share, but, with its usual chicanery, it alters the spelling, to avoid an action for libel.

In social life we have nothing to designate great ability, power, célat, or any distinguishing mark in a man from his fellows, except by calling him a Lion.

This is the poetical side of the picture, but as faithful historians we must say that in reality he has made a sad beast of himself; for since peace has been proclaimed a virtue, and war a vice, all regard to decency seems to have left him, and he associates with shocking low company, and it is quite melancholy to see one, once so noble, in his imbecility and degradation.

Of late, he has condescended to do anything for employment, actually cudging from door to door, with a very extraordinary horse, who carries a horn—an animal without a character from his last place; in fact, nobody as yet has found out where such an impossible beast could come from, being nothing but a horse marine. The poor Lion, as if really ashamed of his downfall, carries about with him a ribbon, on which is written a kind of deprecatory apology, running thus:—“Honi soit qui mal y pense.” This makes it worse and worse. Where did he learn French? Why not put it in plain English, as a British Lion should do? The English will beat the French at any time!

You may now see him sometimes, covered with gold, like a ginger-bread toy at a fair; at other times hanging about a public-house door, playing the fool, with his face painted red or blue, according to the landlord's fancy; for which indignity he is allowed the full swing of the place, as he attracts custom to the house, and no doubt gets dreadfully drunk at times, as he cuts strange gambols, such as standing on one leg, and other ridiculous antics.

Every paltry tradesman, now he finds he is to be had cheap, engages him to tout for customers to his petty shop.

The quack doctor employs him to stand sentry over a box of boluses, to physic his friends, instead of piles of cannon-balls, as formerly, to physic his enemies, and he is complaisant enough to make a face, as if he felt the effect of them.

The brushmaker, who wishes to recommend his bristles, places him in front of the shop, with his whiskers, or smellers, extended in the most ridiculous manner.

The hairdresser, who has very little respect for Lions or any kind, except in the way of wigs, employs the poor beast merely on account of his fine head of hair, to attract his customers. It is very amusing to see the old brute with his hair in full curl and his whiskers trimmed à la mode; but such, indeed, is the melancholy fact.

The dentist borrows his valuable aid, and most ungratefully satirises him at the same time, by making him show his teeth, as an advertisement, so long after he has ceased to bite, leading people to imagine that they can procure as good a set by entering the shop of his employer.

Indeed, he has so un-Lionified himself as to go into the service of the milliners; and, above all, French milliners. Here he stands over the brass-plated door of some corset-maker to Her Majesty, continually smiling and simpering, so as not to alarm the fair creatures who swarm to the shape-makers; but his attempt at amiability and softness is most ridiculous. A smile on a face never intended to express anything but fierceness! You might as well try to turn a duelling-pistol into an Eau de Cologne bottle.

Thus, according to the trade of his employer, does he befool himself to the very great degradation of his once-honoured name; in fact, he has turned from a warrior into a warehouseman; his roar is no longer feared, for, instead of his once-dreaded note of preparation, in answer to an insult, a complimentary one is sent to the offender, who is invited to come and stop a few days, and talk the matter over, and who returns laughingly with a very different bellyful to that which would have greeted him in days of yore. He now settles all quarrels with soft words instead of hard blows.

The consequence of which is, that numbers of small animals, that did not know they had voices before, encouraged by his tameness and silence, try their feeble crows and growls, and flatter themselves that their pigmy attempts sound as powerful as the thunder-like roar of the once noble British Lion.—By Alfred Crowquill, from "Our Own Times."

USES OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.

I wish, for my own part, there were no such thing as political economy. I mean not now the mere name of the study; but I wish there had never been any necessity for directing our attention to the study itself. If men had always been secured in person and property, and left at full liberty to employ both as they saw fit, and had merely been precluded from unjust interference with each other—had the most perfect freedom of intercourse between all mankind been always allowed—had there never been any wars, nor (which in that case would have easily been avoided) any taxation—then, though every exchange that took place would have been one of the phenomena of which political economy takes cognisance, all would have proceeded so smoothly, that probably no attention would ever have been called to the subject. The transactions of society would have been like the play of the lungs, the contractions of the muscles, and the circulation of the blood, in a healthy person, who scarcely knows that these functions exist. But as soon as they are impeded and disordered, our attention is immediately called to them. Indeed, one of these functions did exist for several thousand years before it was even suspected. It is probable that (except perhaps among a small number of curious speculators) anatomy and physiology would never have been thought of, had they not been called for in aid of the art of medicine; and this, manifestly, would have had no existence, but for disease. In like manner it may be said to have been disease, actual or apprehended—evils or imperfections, real or imaginary, that in the first instance directed the attention of men to the subjects about which political economy is conversant; the attention, I mean, not only of those who use that term in a favourable sense, but of those no less who hold it in abhorrence, and of our ancestors who never heard it. Many, no doubt, of those evils have been produced or aggravated by the operation of erroneous views of political economy, just as there are many cases in which erroneous medical treatment has brought on or heightened diseases; but in these, no one will deny that it is from correct medical views we must hope for a cure.

And you may add this remark, that the greater part of those who do in this way induce disease, are such as make no pretension to the medical art, nor entertain any respect for it; they are often the foremost to declaim against the folly of trusting in physicians—of dosing one's self with medicines—of tampering with the constitution; and think themselves secure from any such folly as long as they abstain from the use of anything that is called a medicine; while perhaps they are actually tampering with their constitution by an excessive use of spirituous liquors, or of other stimulants, not bearing the name of medicines, but not the less powerful in their effects on the human frame. In like manner, you may observe many have ventured boldly on measures tending to produce the most important results on national wealth, without suspecting that these had anything to do with political economy, because the name of the science was carefully avoided. Buonaparte detested that name. When he endeavoured by all possible means to destroy the commerce of the Continent with this country—means which brought on ultimately the war which ended in his overthrow—there is no doubt he believed himself to be not only injuring us, but consulting the best interests of his own dominions. Indeed, the two ideas were with him inseparable; for all that he himself had ever acquired having been at the expense of others, he could not understand how we could gain, except by their loss. Yet all the while, he was in the habit of saying that political economy, if an empire were of gravitate, would crumble it to dust. That erroneous political economy may do so, he evinced by the experiment he himself tried; but to the last, he was not aware that he had been in fact practising such a system.—It had been practising political economy in the same sense in which a man is said to be practising medicine unskillfully, who through ignorance prescribes to his patient a poisonous dose.

Anatomy and physiology, though, as I have said, they probably owe their rise to medicine, as that did to disease, are yet universally acknowledged to be among the most curious and interesting studies, even for those who have no design to apply them professionally in the practice of medicine. In particular, they are found, the more they are studied, to throw more and more light on the stupendous wisdom of contrivance which the structure of organised bodies displays;—in short, to furnish a most important portion of natural theology. And it might have been anticipated, that an attentive study of the constitution of society should bring to light a no less admirable apparatus of divinely-wise contrivances, directed no less to beneficial ends;—that as the structure of a single bee is admirable, and still more so that of a hive of bees, instinctively directing their efforts towards a common object, so the Divine Maker of the human body has evinced no less benevolent wisdom in his provisions for the progress of society;—and that though in both cases the designs of Divine Wisdom are often counteracted by human folly—by intemperance or neglect, as far as relates to the body—and by mistake or fraud in respect of the community—still, in each case, attentive study may enable us to trace more and more the designs of a wise Providence, and to devise means for removing the impediments to their completion.—Archbishop Whateley.

JOURNAL OF THE REV. W. ROBERTSON.—Not the least among the curiosities of Seville is the tobacco manufactory. Tobacco is one of the royal monopolies, and it is manufactured in a palace. A very cursory glance at this singular establishment will afford some idea of the great value of this monopoly. It is a noble and stately edifice, of a quadrangular form, 600 feet in length by 480 broad. It is surrounded by a moat, and approached by a drawbridge, like a regular fortification. Soldiers are continually on duty at the entrance and in the courts; all the work people are carefully searched every night on leaving the establishment, and no cloaks are permitted within its precincts—all precautions against the abstraction of the precious weed. It employs no fewer than 5000 hands. Of these, 3000 are women; almost all of whom are employed in twisting cigars. Of the 2000 men, a great proportion are similarly occupied; while a considerable number are employed in the manufacture of all the different articles and implements which are required in the establishment. Women are preferred for the manufacture of cigars, as lightness and delicacy of touch are of importance in this branch of the business. Two immense halls are set apart for the cigar twist—one for the men, and the other for the women. The largest of these, in which 3000 women are seated, busily engaged in rolling up the fragment leaf, each with a little basket of bread and fruit beside her for dinner, presents a very extraordinary spectacle. The work is performed with amazing rapidity, and a single individual will roll up from 500 to 600 cigars per day. The time of labour is from 7 o'clock A. M. to 4 P. M. One part of the process is sufficiently disgusting, but out of consideration for the lovers of cigars, we refrain from mentioning it! We saw the whole process of manufacturing snuff. The tobacco leaves are first steeped in a decoction of Brazilian tobacco, plums, walnuts, lemon-peel, &c.; the heart stalks are then removed, and the leaves twisted into ropes, and coiled up in tight packages. These are pressed by a machine, not unlike a large cheese-press and are then stored up for six or eight months to ferment. Afterwards they are uncoiled, and chopped into small pieces by a very clumsy set of hammers worked by mules. When chopped sufficiently, the tobacco is conveyed to the mill and ground into snuff. The stems and heart-stalks are, I believe, manufactured into a coarser article. When the wind blows in a particular direction, it is said that this establishment may be nosed at a league distant. There are five royal tobacco manufactories in Spain, of which this at Seville is the largest. The quantity of cigars consumed by this nation of cigar smokers is prodigious. Spaniards are decidedly the greatest smokers in Europe. All Spaniards smoke, and all smoke cigars. The pipe is comparatively unknown. The cigar gleams betwixt the lips of the haughty noble and the poor muleteer. Like death, it levels all distinctions; all are alike subjected to its sway. It overpowers the odour of garlic in the poor man's hut, and mingles with the rich perfumes of the halls of the wealthy.—Tait's Magazine.

JACOBINISM OF THE RICH.—The origin and foundation of property, is labour. The proposal to keep up rent by restrictions, virtually includes the essence of personal slavery; which consists in obliging one man to labour for the benefit of another without an equivalent. The landlords may have a property in their honest rent; but they have not a property in the power of adding to it by violence.—Catechism on the Corn Laws.

RECIPROCITY FALLACY.—Reciprocity is having two good things instead of one. But if we cannot have both the good things, it is no reason why we should reject the one we may have. The fraud of “reciprocity,” therefore is like saying, “Don't take the half-crown you may, unless somebody will give you another for taking it.”

J. Patrick, Paisley, manufacturer.

BRITISH CONSUL'S OFFICE, PHILADELPHIA.—Know all Persons to whom these presents shall come, That, GILBERT ROBERTSON, Esq., his Britannic Majesty's Consul, do hereby certify, that R. WATSON, Esq. (who attests to the efficacy of)

OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA,
IN RESTORING HAIR,

is Mayor of this City, and that M. RANDALL, Esq., is Prothonotary of the Court of Common Pleas, to both whose signatures full faith and credit is due. I further certify that I am personally acquainted with J. L. ENGLISH, Esq., another of the signers, and that he is a person of great respectability, and that I have heard and examined the application of the effects of OLDRIDGE'S BALM, in restoring his Hair. Given under my hand and seal of Office, at the City of Philadelphia, December 29, 1823.

Price 3s 6d, 6s, and 11s per bottle. No other prices are genuine. OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

On the 1st and 15th of each Month, every Part containing Four highly-finished Portraits, price One Shilling,
THE PEOPLE'S NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY
Of Illustrious and Eminent Personages of the Nineteenth Century, engraved by first-rate Artists, from Paintings by Lawrence Reynolds, West, Ince, Hoppner, Beechey, Phillips, Carrick, &c. &c.
With Memoirs by W. COOKE TAYLOR, LL.D.
Fisher, Son, and Co., the Station Press, Angel-street, Newgate-street, London.

C. KNIGHT and CO'S Weekly Publications.—This Day
KNIGHT'S WEEKLY VOLUME: BACON'S HIS WRITINGS AND HIS PHILOSOPHY. Vol. I. By G. L. CHALK, M.A. Price 1s, sewed; 1s 6d, cloth.
KNIGHT'S PENNY MAGAZINE. No. 31. Containing:—Spanish Scenes in 1845; the Lopez Family; Historical Scenes, &c.; Conquest of Constantinople by the Crusaders; Education of the Army, &c.—Progress of Volcanic Eruption.
London: Charles Knight & Co., 22, Ludgate-street.

This Day is published, in 1 plain 3s, colored, 4s.
The First Monthly Part of KNIGHT'S MAPS FOR THE TIMES:
selected from the Maps of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and corrected to the present day: containing Four Maps of India, connected with passing events, together with Geographical Memoirs, explanatory of the Maps.
The Weekly Issue for May will consist of the following Maps and Memoirs: plain 6d.; colored 9d., each.
No. 5—May 9. America, General Map of
No. 6 " 10. British North America.
No. 7 " 23. Canada and the United States.
No. 8 " 30. Central America, Texas, California, &c.
London: Charles Knight & Co., Ludgate-street. Sold by all Booksellers in the United Kingdom.

The Sixth Edition, with 155 Figures, price 10s 6d.,
WITHERING'S SYSTEMATIC ARRANGEMENT OF BRITISH PLANTS, according to the Linnaean System. Corrected and Condensed; preceded by Instructions adapted for persons commencing the Study of Botany; and an Appendix containing the arrangement of the Genera according to the Natural method. By Professor MacILLIVRAY, LL.D. Marischal College, Aberdeen.
This work comprises descriptions of all the Flowering Plants and the Ferns which are found in the British Islands, so full as to enable the young botanist to determine every species that may come in his way, without the assistance of others.

MAGILLIVRAY'S MANUAL OF GEOLOGY. Second Edition, with Woodcuts and coloured Geological Map of the British Islands. Price 4s 6d.
"It forms the very best companion which the young geologist can take with him in his rambles."—Edinburgh Witness.
Adam Scott (late Scott and Webster), Charterhouse-square.

On the 30th of April was published, No. V., price 6d., of ALMANACK OF THE MONTH. A Review of Everything and Everybody.
Edited by GILBERT ABBOTT ABBETT.
Principal Contents of the May Number:—Charts for Railway Travellers, London and Dover; the Glasgow Standard; the Martyr of the Month, Mr. Smith O'Brien—Fine Old English Sports—Eat and You'll be Prime Minister—The Gallic Cock—Amusements in Passion Week—Chronology of the Month—Talk of the Month—Peter Palmer's Ghost—The Opera of the Month, &c. &c., with 15 Illustrations by R. Doyle, and Portrait of Grisli.
London: Published at the Punch Office, 85, Fleet-street.

MUSIC FOR THE MANY. Edited by an Eminent Writer, containing four quarto pages of Select Music, and four of entertaining and instructive Musical Literature, will be published on the 2nd of May, and every succeeding week, for the small charge of only TWO-PENCE. Notwithstanding its unprecedented cheapness, all lovers of Music are invited to inspect this specimen of a new Era. To be had of all Booksellers.

WISDOM AND CHEERFULNESS.
THE FAMILY HERALD. Parts 34 and 35 of this popular and interesting literary miscellany, price only Sixpence each, contain Malina Gray; by Mrs. Stephens—The Lady Helen—Valerie, or the Young Italian—The Welsh Wife—The Sleep-Walker; by Zschockie—La Vendetta, or the Feud; by Balzac—Uncle John and his Nephew—Alonso and Zoroaster—The Professor's Daughter—And several other charming tales, with variety of useful, moral, entertaining, and instructive reading for the intelligent and reflecting of all classes. Everybody reads the FAMILY HERALD, the most universal favourite ever published, and just the kind of periodical for whiling away a leisure moment agreeably and profitably.
With No. 137 (the commencement of a New Volume) will be presented, GRATIS, the First Number of the MUSICAL HERALD, containing eight 40 pages of Music and Musical Literature.

Dr. Robert Culverwell's Guide to Health and Long Life. (300 pages, pocket volume; price 1s. by post, 1s 6d.)
WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID; with Diet Tables for all Complaints. By R. J. CULVERWELL, M.D., M.R.C.S., L.A.C., &c. Contents:—How to insure perfect digestion, tranquil feelings, a good night's rest, a clear head, and a contented mind. By an observance of the instructions herein contained, the feeble, the nervously delicate, even to the most shattered constitution, may acquire the greatest amount of physical happiness, and reach in health the full period of life allotted to man. To be had of Sherwood, 23, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand, who may be advised with on these matters daily till 3; evenings, 7 till 9.

CORNER'S NEW HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading.
Each History, commencing with the earliest authentic records, is continued to the present time; faithfully portraying, also, the Manners, Customs, and States of Civilisation of the People.
Bound with Questions. Without Questions.
England and Wales; five fine plates, and map, 4s. - - - 3s. 6d.
Ireland; three fine plates, and map - - - 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.
Scotland; three fine plates, and map - - - 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.
France; three fine plates, 2s. 6d. by post, 2s. 8d.
Spain and Portugal; three plates, and map - - - 2s. 6d.
Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; with two fine plates and map - 2s. 6d.
Germany and the German Empire; 3 fine plates, and map - 3s. 6d.
Austria and the Ottoman Empire; 3 fine plates, and map - 3s. 6d.
Poland and Russia; with three fine plates, and map - 3s. 6d.
Italy and Switzerland; three fine plates, and map - 3s. 6d.
Holland and Belgium; with two fine plates, and map - 2s. 6d.
The object of these works—peculiarly suited to Schools and Families—is to furnish the reader with a faithful History of each Nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the Religion, Customs, National Characteristics, State of Civilisation, and Domestic Habits of the people, in various periods of their history:—to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of detail; and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of the knowledge of the leading events of history.
London: Dean and Co., Threadneedle-street, and, by order, of all Booksellers.

Books publishing by B. D. COUSINS, Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn, London.
In one thick octavo volume, cloth boards, 5s. 6d.: in Eleven Parts, at 6d. each; or in 15 Penny Numbers.

THE MEMOIRS OF SELEANT PAUL SWANSTON, written by himself, and never before published. This is the complete Life of a Soldier in Portugal, Spain, France, America, Ireland, and Great Britain, from 1800 to 1825. The Camp, the March, the Skirmish, the Battle, the Victory, and the Defeat; the Siege, the Fort Hope, the Plunder, the Riot, the Ravage, the Military Heroism, and the Moral Crime, the fallacies of one day, and the hunger of another. Liberty and Hope, Captivity and Despair, were parts of the Author's every-day life. Memorials of his most adventurous Comrades are also recorded; with many new details of the Battle, his Campaigns, Officers, and Soldiers, which have never appeared in any other work of the kind.

POPE'S ESSAY ON MAN, with a COMMENTARY by the Rev. J. E. SMITH, M.A. Price 1s. by post, 20 penny stamps.

TWELVE REASONS AGAINST TAKING AWAY LIFE AS A PUNISHMENT. By H. H. H. H. Price 6d., by post, 10d.

THE MORALIST, devoted solely to the inculcation of Morality and such scientific knowledge as relates to Moral Improvement. In one vol., cloth boards, 2s. 6d. by post, 2s. 8d.

THE FARTHING JOURNAL, the Wonder of the World and the Envy of surrounding Bookellers, in 1 vol. 8vo., price 2s. cloth boards; or in 66 numbers, at One Farthing each. N.B. This work is stereotyped; therefore, if your bookseller tells you it is out of print, he tells you an untruth.

DONALDA; or, the Witches of Gleniel; a Caledonian Legend of thrilling interest, containing 80 pages of small type. Price 1s.; by post, 1s 6d.

ALF OF MUNSTER; or the Anabaptists. Translated from the German. Being an Historical Romance of intense interest—of Love, in consequence, Civil War, Rapine, Torture, and Wholesale Bloodshed. Price 9d., by post, 1s.

ABORIGINES' PROTECTION SOCIETY.—The Ninth ANNUAL MEETING of this Society, the object of which is to promote the well being of Natives and Settlers in the British Colonies, will be held at Grosby Hall, Bishopsgate-street, on MONDAY, the 18th of MAY, at 8 o'clock.
The attendance of the Friends of the Society is earnestly requested.
Cards of Admission may be had at Smith, Elder, and Co.'s, 65, Cornhill; C. Gilpin's, 3, Bishopsgate-street without; Hatchard and Co.'s, 187, Piccadilly; and at Grosby Hall.

THAMES TUNNEL.—Brilliantly lighted with "Lowe's" Patent Naphthalized Gas, is open as a thoroughfare day and night—Toil, One Penny.
National Tableau of Public Interest, which has been Eight Months in Preparation.

THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert caressing their Four lovely Children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F. Tussaud, the Costumes by Mrs. F. Tussaud, is now added to the Collection.
—BAZAAR, Baker-street, Portman-square.
"This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis."—Times.
Admission, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 7 till 10.

RICHARD COBDEN, ESQ., M.P.—The ENGRAVING OF THE PORTRAIT OF RICHARD COBDEN, ESQ., M.P., engraved in the highest style of art by F. C. Lewis, Esq., engraver to the Queen, is NOW READY. The Portrait has been produced under the patronage and sanction of the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and is the only authentic engraved portrait published. The likeness is a most characteristic one, and has received the unqualified approbation of Mr. Cobden's personal friends.
First class Proofs, with autograph - 11 6
India Proofs - 1 0
French Paper Proofs - 0 10
Prints - 0 3
Uniform with the above, Mr. Agnew has published a series of Portraits of the Members of the Council of the League, all of which are engraved in a fine and finished style. The following are now ready:—
Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P. John Bright, Esq., M.P.
Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P. Right Hon. Earl Radnor.
George Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the League. Robert Thompson.
Dr. Bowring, M.P. Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P.
Henry Ashworth, Esq. William Rawson, Esq., Treasurer of the League.
J. Brotherton, Esq., M.P. Sir Thomas Potter.
Arrangements have also been made to publish the Portraits of William Brown, Esq., of Liverpool.
Edward Baines, Esq. Lawrence Heyworth, Esq.
Right Hon. Earl Ducie. Right Hon. Lord Morpeth.
All executed the same size, and forming one of the most interesting Gallery of Portraits ever brought before the public. The Portrait of WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., which is being engraved by James Thomson, Esq., of London, will be ready, and, along with standards, 3 feet 9s.; to be forwarded their names without delay, to secure good impressions.
Manchester: published by THOMAS AGNEW, Repository of Arts, Exchange-street. London: Messrs. Ackerman and Co., 98, Strand.

FENDERS, STOVES, and FIRE-IRONS.—The largest assortment of Stoves and Fenders, as well as General Ironmongery in the world, is now on sale in a Saleroom, at the late RIPPON and BURTON'S extensive warehouses. Bright steel fenders, 4 feet, from 30s each, ditto, with ornamental ornaments, from 60s.; iron fenders, 3 feet, 4s. 6d.; 4 feet, 6s. 6d.; 5 feet, 8s. 6d.; 6 feet, 10s. 6d.; 7 feet, 12s. 6d.; 8 feet, 14s. 6d.; 9 feet, 16s. 6d.; 10 feet, 18s. 6d.; 11 feet, 20s. 6d.; 12 feet, 22s. 6d.; 13 feet, 24s. 6d.; 14 feet, 26s. 6d.; 15 feet, 28s. 6d.; 16 feet, 30s. 6d.; 17 feet, 32s. 6d.; 18 feet, 34s. 6d.; 19 feet, 36s. 6d.; 20 feet, 38s. 6d.; 21 feet, 40s. 6d.; 22 feet, 42s. 6d.; 23 feet, 44s. 6d.; 24 feet, 46s. 6d.; 25 feet, 48s. 6d.; 26 feet, 50s. 6d.; 27 feet, 52s. 6d.; 28 feet, 54s. 6d.; 29 feet, 56s. 6d.; 30 feet, 58s. 6d.; 31 feet, 60s. 6d.; 32 feet, 62s. 6d.; 33 feet, 64s. 6d.; 34 feet, 66s. 6d.; 35 feet, 68s. 6d.; 36 feet, 70s. 6d.; 37 feet, 72s. 6d.; 38 feet, 74s. 6d.; 39 feet, 76s. 6d.; 40 feet, 78s. 6d.; 41 feet, 80s. 6d.; 42 feet, 82s. 6d.; 43 feet, 84s. 6d.; 44 feet, 86s. 6d.; 45 feet, 88s. 6d.; 46 feet, 90s. 6d.; 47 feet, 92s. 6d.; 48 feet, 94s. 6d.; 49 feet, 96s. 6d.; 50 feet, 98s. 6d.; 51 feet, 100s. 6d.; 52 feet, 102s. 6d.; 53 feet, 104s. 6d.; 54 feet, 106s. 6d.; 55 feet, 108s. 6d.; 56 feet, 110s. 6d.; 57 feet, 112s. 6d.; 58 feet, 114s. 6d.; 59 feet, 116s. 6d.; 60 feet, 118s. 6d.; 61 feet, 120s. 6d.; 62 feet, 122s. 6d.; 63 feet, 124s. 6d.; 64 feet, 126s. 6d.; 65 feet, 128s. 6d.; 66 feet, 130s. 6d.; 67 feet, 132s. 6d.; 68 feet, 134s. 6d.; 69 feet, 136s. 6d.; 70 feet, 138s. 6d.; 71 feet, 140s. 6d.; 72 feet, 142s. 6d.; 73 feet, 144s. 6d.; 74 feet, 146s. 6d.; 75 feet, 148s. 6d.; 76 feet, 150s. 6d.; 77 feet, 152s. 6d.; 78 feet, 154s. 6d.; 79 feet, 156s. 6d.; 80 feet, 158s. 6d.; 81 feet, 160s. 6d.; 82 feet, 162s. 6d.; 83 feet, 164s. 6d.; 84 feet, 166s. 6d.; 85 feet, 168s. 6d.; 86 feet, 170s. 6d.; 87 feet, 172s. 6d.; 88 feet, 174s. 6d.; 89 feet, 176s. 6d.; 90 feet, 178s. 6d.; 91 feet, 180s. 6d.; 92 feet, 182s. 6d.; 93 feet, 184s. 6d.; 94 feet, 186s. 6d.; 95 feet, 188s. 6d.; 96 feet, 190s. 6d.; 97 feet, 192s. 6d.; 98 feet, 194s. 6d.; 99 feet, 196s. 6d.; 100 feet, 198s. 6d.; 101 feet, 200s. 6d.; 102 feet, 202s. 6d.; 103 feet, 204s. 6d.; 104 feet, 206s. 6d.; 105 feet, 208s. 6d.; 106 feet, 210s. 6d.; 107 feet, 212s. 6d.; 108 feet, 214s. 6d.; 109 feet, 216s. 6d.; 110 feet, 218s. 6d.; 111 feet, 220s. 6d.; 112 feet, 222s. 6d.; 113 feet, 224s. 6d.; 114 feet, 226s. 6d.; 115 feet, 228s. 6d.; 116 feet, 230s. 6d.; 117 feet, 232s. 6d.; 118 feet, 234s. 6d.; 119 feet, 236s. 6d.; 120 feet, 238s. 6d.; 121 feet, 240s. 6d.; 122 feet, 242s. 6d.; 123 feet, 244s. 6d.; 124 feet, 246s. 6d.; 125 feet, 248s. 6d.; 126 feet, 250s. 6d.; 127 feet, 252s. 6d.; 128 feet, 254s. 6d.; 129 feet, 256s. 6d.; 130 feet, 258s. 6d.; 131 feet, 260s. 6d.; 132 feet, 262s. 6d.; 133 feet, 264s. 6d.; 134 feet, 266s. 6d.; 135 feet, 268s. 6d.; 136 feet, 270s. 6d.; 137 feet, 272s. 6d.; 138 feet, 274s. 6d.; 139 feet, 276s. 6d.; 140 feet, 278s. 6d.; 141 feet, 280s. 6d.; 142 feet, 282s. 6d.; 143 feet, 284s. 6d.; 144 feet, 286s. 6d.; 145 feet, 288s. 6d.; 146 feet, 290s. 6d.; 147 feet, 292s. 6d.; 148 feet, 294s. 6d.; 149 feet, 296s. 6d.; 150 feet, 298s. 6d.; 151 feet, 300s. 6d.; 152 feet, 302s. 6d.; 153 feet, 304s. 6d.; 154 feet, 306s. 6d.; 155 feet, 308s. 6d.; 156 feet, 310s. 6d.; 157 feet, 312s. 6d.; 158 feet, 314s. 6d.; 159 feet, 316s. 6d.; 160 feet, 318s. 6d.; 161 feet, 320s. 6d.; 162 feet, 322s. 6d.; 163 feet, 324s. 6d.; 164 feet, 326s. 6d.; 165 feet, 328s. 6d.; 166 feet, 330s. 6d.; 167 feet, 332s. 6d.; 168 feet, 334s. 6d.; 169 feet, 336s. 6d.; 170 feet, 338s. 6d.; 171 feet, 340s. 6d.; 172 feet, 342s. 6d.; 173 feet, 344s. 6d.; 174 feet, 346s. 6d.; 175 feet, 348s. 6d.; 176 feet, 350s. 6d.; 177 feet, 352s. 6d.; 178 feet, 354s. 6d.; 179 feet, 356s. 6d.; 180 feet, 358s. 6d.; 181 feet, 360s. 6d.; 182 feet, 362s. 6d.; 183 feet, 364s. 6d.; 184 feet, 366s. 6d.; 185 feet, 368s. 6d.; 186 feet, 370s. 6d.; 187 feet, 372s. 6d.; 188 feet, 374s. 6d.; 189 feet, 376s. 6d.; 190 feet, 378s. 6d.; 191 feet, 380s. 6d.; 192 feet, 382s. 6d.; 193 feet, 384s. 6d.; 194 feet, 386s. 6d.; 195 feet, 388s. 6d.; 196 feet, 390s. 6d.; 197 feet, 392s. 6d.; 198 feet, 394s. 6d.; 199 feet, 396s. 6d.; 200 feet, 398s. 6d.; 201 feet, 400s. 6d.; 202 feet, 402s. 6d.; 203 feet, 404s. 6d.; 204 feet, 406s. 6d.; 205 feet, 408s. 6d.; 206 feet, 410s. 6d.; 207 feet, 412s. 6d.; 208 feet, 414s. 6d.; 209 feet, 416s. 6d.; 210 feet, 418s. 6d.; 211 feet, 420s. 6d.; 212 feet, 422s. 6d.; 213 feet, 424s. 6d.; 214 feet, 426s. 6d.; 215 feet, 428s. 6d.; 216 feet, 430s. 6d.; 217 feet, 432s. 6d.; 218 feet, 434s. 6d.; 219 feet, 436s. 6d.; 220 feet, 438s. 6d.; 221 feet, 440s. 6d.; 222 feet, 442s. 6d.; 223 feet, 444s. 6d.; 224 feet, 446s. 6d.; 225 feet, 448s. 6d.; 226 feet, 450s. 6d.; 227 feet, 452s. 6d.; 228 feet, 454s. 6d.; 229 feet, 456s. 6d.; 230 feet, 458s. 6d.; 231 feet, 460s. 6d.; 232 feet, 462s. 6d.; 233 feet, 464s. 6d.; 234 feet, 466s. 6d.; 235 feet, 468s. 6d.; 236 feet, 470s. 6d.; 237 feet, 472s. 6d.; 238 feet, 474s. 6d.; 239 feet, 476s. 6d.; 240 feet, 478s. 6d.; 241 feet, 480s. 6d.; 242 feet, 482s. 6d.; 243 feet, 484s. 6d.; 244 feet, 486s. 6d.; 245 feet, 488s. 6d.; 246 feet, 490s. 6d.; 247 feet, 492s. 6d.; 248 feet, 494s. 6d.; 249 feet, 496s. 6d.; 250 feet, 498s. 6d.; 251 feet, 500s. 6d.; 252 feet, 502s. 6d.; 253 feet, 504s. 6d.; 254 feet, 506s. 6d.; 255 feet, 508s. 6d.; 256 feet, 510s. 6d.; 257 feet, 512s. 6d.; 258 feet, 514s. 6d.; 259 feet, 516s. 6d.; 260 feet, 518s. 6d.; 261 feet, 520s. 6d.; 262 feet, 522s. 6d.; 263 feet, 524s. 6d.; 264 feet, 526s. 6d.; 265 feet, 528s. 6d.; 266 feet, 530s. 6d.; 267 feet, 532s. 6d.; 268 feet, 534s. 6d.; 269 feet, 536s. 6d.; 270 feet, 538s. 6d.; 271 feet, 540s. 6d.; 272 feet, 542s. 6d.; 273 feet, 544s. 6d.; 274 feet, 546s. 6d.; 275 feet, 548s. 6d.; 276 feet, 550s. 6d.; 277 feet, 552s. 6d.; 278 feet, 554s. 6d.; 279 feet, 556s. 6d.; 280 feet, 558s. 6d.; 281 feet, 560s. 6d.; 282 feet, 562s. 6d.; 283 feet, 564s. 6d.; 284 feet, 566s. 6d.; 285 feet, 568s. 6d.; 286 feet, 570s. 6d.; 287 feet, 572s. 6d.; 288 feet, 574s. 6d.; 289 feet, 576s. 6d.; 290 feet, 578s. 6d.; 291 feet, 580s. 6d.; 292 feet, 582s. 6d.; 293 feet, 584s. 6d.; 294 feet, 586s. 6d.; 295 feet, 588s. 6d.; 296 feet, 590s. 6d.; 297 feet, 592s. 6d.; 298 feet, 594s. 6d.; 299 feet, 596s. 6d.; 300 feet, 598s. 6d.; 301 feet, 600s. 6d.; 302 feet, 602s. 6d.; 303 feet, 604s. 6d.; 304 feet, 606s. 6d.; 305 feet, 608s. 6d.; 306 feet, 610s. 6d.; 307 feet, 612s. 6d.; 308 feet, 614s. 6d.; 309 feet, 616s. 6d.; 310 feet, 618s. 6d.; 311 feet, 620s. 6d.; 312 feet, 622s. 6d.; 313 feet, 624s. 6d.; 314 feet, 626s. 6d.; 315 feet, 628s. 6d.; 316 feet, 630s. 6d.; 317 feet, 632s. 6d.; 318 feet, 634s. 6d.; 319 feet, 636s. 6d.; 320 feet, 638s. 6d.; 321 feet, 640s. 6d.; 322 feet, 642s. 6d.; 323 feet, 644s. 6d.; 324 feet, 646s. 6d.; 325 feet, 648s. 6d.; 326 feet, 650s. 6d.; 327 feet, 652s. 6d.; 328 feet, 654s. 6d.; 329 feet, 656s. 6d.; 330 feet, 658s. 6d.; 331 feet, 660s. 6d.; 332 feet, 662s. 6d.; 333 feet, 664s. 6d.; 334 feet, 666s. 6d.; 335 feet, 668s. 6d.; 336 feet, 670s. 6d.; 337 feet, 672s. 6d.; 338 feet, 674s. 6d.; 339 feet, 676s. 6d.; 340 feet, 678s. 6d.; 341 feet, 680s. 6d.; 342 feet, 682s. 6d.; 343 feet, 684s. 6d.; 344 feet, 686s. 6d.; 345 feet, 688s. 6d.; 346 feet, 690s. 6d.; 347 feet, 692s. 6d.; 348 feet, 694s. 6d.; 349 feet, 696s. 6d.; 350 feet, 698s. 6d.; 351 feet, 700s. 6d.; 352 feet, 702s. 6d.; 353 feet, 704s. 6d.; 354 feet, 706s. 6d.; 355 feet, 708s. 6d.; 356 feet, 710s. 6d.; 357 feet, 712s. 6d.; 358 feet, 714s. 6d.; 359 feet, 716s. 6d.; 360 feet, 718s. 6d.; 361 feet, 720s. 6d.; 362 feet, 722s. 6d.; 363 feet, 724s. 6d.; 364 feet, 726s. 6d.; 365 feet, 728s. 6d.; 366 feet, 730s. 6d.; 367 feet, 732s. 6d.; 368 feet, 734s. 6d.; 369 feet, 736s. 6d.; 370 feet, 738s. 6d.; 371 feet, 740s. 6d.; 372 feet, 742s. 6d.; 373 feet, 744s. 6d.; 374 feet, 746s. 6d.; 375 feet, 748s. 6d.; 376 feet, 750s. 6d.; 377 feet, 752s. 6d.; 378 feet, 754s. 6d.; 379 feet, 756s. 6d.; 380 feet, 758s. 6d.; 381 feet, 760s. 6d.; 382 feet, 762s. 6d.; 383 feet, 764s. 6d.; 384 feet, 766s. 6d.; 385 feet, 768s. 6d.; 386 feet, 770s. 6d.; 387 feet, 772s. 6d.; 388 feet, 774s. 6d.; 389 feet, 776s. 6d.; 390 feet, 778s. 6d.; 391 feet, 780s. 6d.; 392 feet, 782s. 6d.; 393 feet, 784s. 6d.; 394 feet, 786s. 6d.; 395 feet, 788s. 6d.; 396 feet, 790s. 6d.; 397 feet, 792s. 6d.; 398 feet, 794s. 6d.; 399 feet, 796s. 6d.; 400 feet, 798s. 6d.; 401 feet, 800s. 6d.; 402 feet, 802s. 6d.; 403 feet, 804s. 6d.; 404 feet, 806s. 6d.; 405 feet, 808s. 6d.; 406 feet, 810s. 6d.; 407 feet, 812s. 6d.; 408 feet, 814s. 6d.; 409 feet, 816s. 6d.; 410 feet, 818s. 6d.; 411 feet, 820s. 6d.; 412 feet, 822s. 6d.; 413 feet, 824s. 6d.; 414 feet, 826s. 6d.; 415 feet, 828s. 6d.; 416 feet, 830s. 6d.; 417 feet, 832s. 6d.; 418 feet, 834s. 6d.; 419 feet, 836s. 6d.; 420 feet, 838s. 6d.; 421 feet, 840s. 6d.; 422 feet, 842s. 6d.; 423 feet, 844s. 6d.; 424 feet, 846s. 6d.; 425 feet, 848s. 6d.; 426 feet, 850s. 6d.; 427 feet, 852s. 6d.; 428 feet, 854s. 6d.; 429 feet, 856s. 6d.; 430 feet, 858s. 6d.; 431 feet, 860s. 6d.; 432 feet, 862s. 6d.; 433 feet, 864s. 6d.; 434 feet, 866s. 6d.; 435 feet, 868s. 6d.; 436 feet, 870s. 6d.; 437 feet, 872s. 6d.; 438 feet, 874s. 6d.; 439 feet, 876s. 6d.; 440 feet, 878s. 6d.; 441 feet, 880s. 6d.; 442 feet, 882s. 6d.; 443 feet, 884s. 6d.; 444 feet, 886s. 6d.; 445 feet, 888s. 6d.; 446 feet, 890s. 6d.; 447 feet, 892s. 6d.; 448 feet, 894s. 6d.; 449 feet, 896s. 6d.; 450 feet, 898s. 6d.; 451 feet, 900s. 6d.; 452 feet, 902s. 6d.; 453 feet, 904s. 6d.; 454 feet, 906s. 6d.; 455 feet, 908s. 6d.; 456 feet, 910s. 6d.; 457 feet, 912s. 6d.; 458 feet, 914s. 6d.; 459 feet, 916s. 6d.; 460 feet, 918s. 6d.; 461 feet, 920s. 6d.; 462 feet, 922s. 6d.; 463 feet, 924s. 6d.; 464 feet, 926s. 6d.; 465 feet, 928s. 6d.; 466 feet, 930s. 6d.; 467 feet, 932s. 6d.; 468 feet, 934s. 6d.; 469 feet, 936s. 6d.; 470 feet, 938s. 6d.; 471 feet, 940s. 6d.; 472 feet, 942s. 6d.; 473 feet, 944s. 6d.; 474 feet, 946s. 6d.; 475 feet, 948s. 6d.; 476 feet, 950s. 6d.; 477 feet, 952s. 6d.; 478 feet, 954s. 6d.; 479 feet, 956s. 6d.; 480 feet, 958s. 6d.; 481 feet, 960s. 6d.; 482 feet, 962s. 6d.; 483 feet, 964s. 6d.; 484 feet, 966s. 6d.; 485 feet, 968s. 6d.; 486 feet, 970s. 6d.; 487 feet, 972s. 6d.; 488 feet, 974s. 6d.; 489 feet, 976s. 6d.; 490 feet, 978s. 6d.; 491

THE LEAGUE.

No. 137.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1846.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newalls-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE REAL QUESTION FOR THE COUNTRY.

"The real question for the country is, ARE THESE RESTRICTIONS CONSISTENT WITH JUSTICE? That is the question—that is the only question."—SIR ROBERT PEEL, May 4.

"I have satisfied myself that this law is injurious, and further, that it is UNJUST to the great body of consumers."—SIR JAMES GRAHAM, April 23.

"THE LAW OUGHT TO LOOK EQUALLY ON ALL."—LORD JOHN RUSSELL, May 4.

We have again to discharge the grateful task of recording the fearless and full-toned utterance, by our leading statesmen, of those great and all-commanding principles which, when enunciated by official lips, and clothed with the prestige of official authority, sensibly influence the destinies of a people, and—if less appreciably, not less really—govern the public opinion of the world. Again has our Free Trade Minister, concurrently with the ablest of his colleagues, and with the most distinguished of his political opponents, declared the landlords' law of artificial famine to be not only impolitic, but intrinsically UNJUST—and, as such, not admitting of any of those cunning devices of compromise or "adjustment," by which your over-clever politicians think to patch up a truce between right and wrong. The Premier keeps to the cardinal point of the whole question, and is determined that others shall keep to it. He "adopts, and deliberately repeats, that expression" which has carried dismay and confusion into the Rigby camp, and sent a thrill of joy through every honest man's heart. Here he takes his stand—on the solid rock-foundation of moral right and justice. Here he fortifies himself—ready for all contingencies. Monopoly is unjust, and there can be no making terms with a moral wrong.

It is of no use asking, "How is it you never found this out before?" He owns at once, he ought to have found it out before. All that can be reasonably said on this head he grants, with a manly candour and straightforwardness that must command respect even where it does not at once silence criticism. He "admits that he ought to have seen that these restrictions were unjust some years ago." He is "sorry that this conclusion was not fixed on his mind at an earlier period." He regrets greatly that he can make no pretension to political and ethical infallibility, and that truth comes to him by the way of experience and reflection, rather than by intuition. All perfectly true—and all perfectly beside the question. "The question really for the country is not a personal one, as to what period a man ought to entertain a particular opinion; the real question for the country is, ARE THESE RESTRICTIONS CONSISTENT WITH JUSTICE?—that is the question—that is THE ONLY QUESTION."

Sir Robert Peel's speech of last Monday night (which appears in another part of our paper) will have been read with the liveliest satisfaction in every part of the country. It is, in all respects, the speech of an accomplished statesman, and of a wise, far-seeing, and earnest man. Even apart from its great intrinsic value, it derives a special interest from the circumstances under which it was delivered. It was worth noting, that this able and elaborate exposition of the ethics of economical reform was an impromptu effort. The Premier was taken by surprise. The discussion so indiscreetly raised by the blundering lord whom the protectionists are obliged to put up with as a pis-aller leader, had not been expected to arise before the debate on the third reading; and there was no time for that preparation which the Minister's sense of the importance of the subject would otherwise doubtless have induced him to bestow. No particular preparation, however, was needed. He did excellently well without it. Nothing helps advocacy like a good cause and a strong conviction. A ready clearness of thought, and force and ease of diction, are the natural consequences of the earnest adoption of a great principle. Truth has a very quickening efficacy on the mind that intelligently and heartily espouses it. We have more than once observed, that since Sir Robert Peel has given in an unre-served allegiance to the principles of commercial freedom, he has seemed to have a more perfect mastery over his own powers, and to be capable of doing fuller justice to a mind naturally acute and vigorous. It does not surprise us that he found it one of the easiest of tasks to vindicate, on the shortest notice, the position that artificial restrictions on industry and hunger are both politically and morally wrong.

The argument is, in truth, of the simplest. "The restriction upon the import of food—that is, the increase of the natural price of food by legislative enactment"—in other words, the imposition of artificial difficulties in the way of life—contradicts the common sense, and offends the common conscience of mankind. "The presumption—the natural presumption" of human judgment and feeling is altogether against it. If defensible on any ground, it must be on the ground of "some great public reason connected with the public good;"—to set up a private reason, based on the interests, or supposed interests, of a class were adding insult to injury. Now, is there any such public reason for taxing the people's bread? The Premier was once of opinion, with other statesmen of his time, that there were such public reasons, of sufficient force to overbear the natural presumption against restriction, and to make that right which otherwise were wrong. He has now carefully re-examined them, one and all—re-examined them under circumstances presenting the strongest imaginable inducements to conclude, if possible, in favour of their validity—and he finds himself constrained to admit, that they are, one and all, sophisms and fictions. The "independence-of-foreigners" fallacy; the "wages" fallacy; the "burdens" fallacy; the "agricultural-interest" fallacy—every one of these is a demonstrated falsity in point of fact, or a palpable absurdity, in point of logic. There is, therefore, nothing to take the case from under the jurisdiction of the common sense and conscience of mankind—nothing to break the force of that indignant condemnation which the voice of public morality pronounces on all attempts artificially to curtail poor men's wages and means of existence. Not being demonstrably necessary on public grounds, the bread tax is demonstrably unjust and iniquitous. "It is because I cannot with truth allege that if you establish Free Trade in corn, you will thereby render us dependent upon foreign nations for a supply of food—it is because I do not believe that the rate of wages varies directly with the price of corn—it is because I cannot persuade myself with respect to the farmer, that the continuance of protection is necessary to agricultural prosperity—it is because I cannot establish these facts, that I have come to the conclusion that the natural presumption in favour of unrestricted import ought to prevail; therefore it is, I think it UNJUST to continue the legislative restriction.

Well might poor Lord George Bentinck complain that "a new feature and a new character have been given to the discussion of this question." What is to be said against this? And—what is more to the point—what is to be DONE against this? Do the men live (at large) that would dare join issue with a Minister who thus appeals to the country on a plain, broad question of moral right and wrong?

We might abstain from detailed comment on a speech, every word of which is sure of commanding the attention due both to the intrinsic importance of its subject-matter, and the position and reputation of the speaker. But we must express the especial gratification we have derived from the truly noble tone and spirit in which Sir Robert Peel adverts to the influence of England's example on the opinion and legislation of other nations. It is quite true, as he is well aware, that a Government like that of France may for a while be "controlled by a predominant influence in the Chambers, supported by those who are interested in the maintenance of restriction"—this is a subject on which our Free Trade Minister can speak feelingly. But he has a generous confidence in the power of truth and justice to counter-work and overthrow the domination of the oligarchical sordidness that would make a nation pay black-mail to an "interest." He has faith in PRINCIPLE, and in the FUTURE. He "believes that in France and other countries, the interests of the great body of the consumers will, at no remote period, be recognised." He can, indeed, give no guarantee that it will be this year, or next year; but the time will come—is coming. Already he sees the heaven of truth and sound principle at work—and he knows that it must, in the nature of things, work on till it shall have leavened the whole mass. He points with delighted satisfaction to those "societies in France, formed of intelligent men," who are preparing the way for the future Free Trade Minister of that country—and he has full faith that, after all, on the whole and in the long run, the intelligent men are too strong for the dunces. He has the proud confidence, too, which befits an English statesman, in the moral power of England over surrounding nations. He is "confident, that if we set them the example"—"if we adopt the motto of ADVANCING in commercial freedom, instead of receding"—then, "notwithstanding temporary obstructions, the influence and example of England will prevail." In the mean time, we are not to make our knowledge wait on their ignorance. Right is right, whatever France may happen to think of it. If France and England cannot yet agree to adopt the policy which is good for France and England, that is no reason why England should not adopt the policy which is good for England. "If the double benefit cannot be got," of a joint abolition of restrictions, and mutual freedom of intercourse—at all events, "let us not pay a higher price for a worse article, because we cannot induce France to buy a good article at a cheap rate;—words which go straight to the root of the miserable "reciprocity" fallacy that would make England the humble copyist of other nations' blunders.

This is worth having worked seven years for. Speeches like those of Sir Robert Peel and Lord

John Russell, on Monday night last, are of the class that guide the public opinion, and mould the public policy of the world. Such utterances by the statesmen of a great country are very fruitful of results. There is a vast futurity in them. They go far to make that history of which they are prophetic anticipations. They do much to hasten the full flow of that tide of which they indicate the direction and the force. The sentiments and convictions recently avowed by every public man standing in the front rank of English statesmanship, mark the advent of a new era of Government and legislation, whose motto is "ADVANCE!" and whose consummation will be, "ENGLAND'S TEACHING THE NATIONS HOW TO LIVE."

POLITICAL ECONOMY, AND SHORT HOURS OF LABOUR.

Many of our readers will have observed with interest the proceedings of the second annual meeting of the Birmingham "Association for the Abridgement of the Hours of Labour," held on the evening of yesterday week; from which it appears, that public opinion in that town has recently been directed, with much earnestness and a considerable degree of success, to the important social object of diminishing the duration of the labour imposed on assistants in retail houses of business, by inducing shopkeepers to adopt earlier hours of closing. Although the subject is one which must possess deep interest for every friend to the well-being and improvement of the industrious classes, we might not have thought it necessary to advert here to a question not directly within the scope of our own labours, but that certain expressions, used on the occasion by our respected friend Mr. Scholefield, appear to us to convey an erroneous and depreciatory estimate of the practical value of those great principles of economics, of which he is well known to be a zealous and efficient supporter. In the course of a speech marked by kindly and generous sympathies with that sadly overworked class, whose cause he was pleading, Mr. Scholefield declared himself as follows:

"He was sorry to say that in his views upon this question he differed with many, with whom, on subjects of public policy, he usually concurred. He agreed in their opinion that the science of political economy did contain within itself a remedy—more or less complete—for the evil complained of. He believed that its principles, rightly understood and wisely applied, would satisfactorily abate, if they did not entirely remove that evil. But he was far from being so bigoted in his views as not to admit that he might be in error; and whether or not, he could not but admit that a very small portion of the community concurred in them; so small a portion, indeed, that their practical application, perhaps for many years to come, was a mere dream. If so, was he to be told that he must wait? Must he defer action till hundreds and thousands more of his fellow creatures had sunk under their grievous toils? Must he wait till he had converted the sceptics to the truths he himself fancied he saw so clearly in the science of political economy? No, he would do no such thing. Some change must be made, and at once, if counsel and persuasion would not do, they must try the effect of public opinion. If that failed, they must resort to legislative enactments, legislative compulsion. There was no time left them to fight for the abstract truths of political economy."

We cannot help thinking, that on further reflection, so sound and enlightened an economist as Mr. Scholefield will be disposed very considerably to modify the sentiments here expressed. It strikes us that he commits two very serious errors;—first, in suggesting a resort to "legislative compulsion," to effect that which mere legislative compulsion never can effect, but at a cost of police force and espionage that public opinion in England would refuse to endure—and next, in underrating the practical power of political economy to redress the class of social evils which he so feelingly deplores. Mr. Scholefield does not seem to us to put sufficient faith in that remedial action of sound and just economical legislation which, in the abstract, he admits it to possess. The process by which commercial liberty tends to abate the social evils resulting from an overstrained and excessive competition among employers and workpeople, is represented by him as being much more tardy and precarious than we believe it really is. When Mr. Scholefield says, that the "practical application" of the science of political economy to the removal of these evils must be regarded, "perhaps for many years to come," as "a mere dream," he does political economy the injustice of overlooking what it has actually achieved in this direction, under circumstances by no means favourable to the full development of its natural tendencies. He seems to forget that in Manchester political economy and economists have already secured for young men employed in warehouses, and counting-houses the precious weekly half-holiday, on the Saturday afternoon—when their time is all their own, for self-improvement, recreation, healthful rest, or more healthful activity, of mind and body. Perhaps, too, our friend is not aware, that the leading political economists of that home of political economy are, at this moment, among the most active promoters of the early hours' system in shops. All this, be it observed, without any of that "legislative compulsion" which Mr. Scholefield so hastily and unwisely invokes, to accelerate a result which will naturally and inevitably work itself out, as the public mind is prepared for it, and as circumstances render it practically feasible and safe.

The experience of Birmingham itself might sufficiently suggest how very needless it is to look to legislative compulsion to supply the supposed deficiencies of political economy. All that has been done—and, seemingly, well done—in Birmingham, has been done according to the most approved principles of political economy; and only because it has been so done, is there ground for believing in the permanence and extension of the social reform thus commenced. The committee of the association, in their report, "have the greatest pleasure in announcing, that those tradesmen" who have adopted the early hours' plan, "far from complaining, have every reason to be well satisfied with the alteration, as they find that their business can be done in less time than has been the custom; and that so far from being diminished, their business has increased." In that case, they will of course persevere in an experiment at once lucrative and agreeable; and their example will find imitators. Does Mr. Scholefield think that, if they had not "reason to be well satisfied with the alteration," either public opinion or legislative compulsion would avail, to give it permanence? The change works well, and bids fair to grow from the exception into the rule, simply because political economy pronounces in its favour. We entreat our friend to put a full and unreserved confidence in his own principle, that "the science of political economy does contain within itself the remedy" of all evils resulting from those grievous misapplications of time and labour which he so justly laments.

There cannot be a greater mistake than to regard political economy as unfriendly, either in theory or in practice, to the abridgment of the hours of labour. It is not the economists, but the protectionists—the Sisyphists, as our French coadjutor, M. Bastiat, happily designates them—who would aggravate the burden, and lengthen out the duration, of labour. It is they who render the business of production and exchange artificially toilsome, and compel the artisan and the shopkeeper to do more work for the loaf, or the shilling, than need be. Political economy is always for abridging and minimising labour. "Buy in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest"—what, after all, does this mean but "Take life as easily as may be, do no needless work, make a little labour go a long way, make a few hours do the work of many, and reserve the rest for recreation and self-improvement?" Such is the direct practical tendency of all sound economical legislation—to diminish the sum of human toil, and abridge the hours of labour. The best and most efficient abridger is the legislator who removes those restrictions on trade and industry which artificially lessen the exchangeable value of labour, and which compel the labourer to expend more than he need of this great first commodity.

For our own part, we believe that those most important social reforms which Mr. Scholefield has so much at heart will come much more certainly and rapidly than he appears to expect, when the liberation of commerce and industry shall have made the conditions of the Englishman's life easier than they are at present. As trade extends, and as the demand for clerks, porters, artisans, and all kinds of labourers extends with it, the industrious classes will be more their own masters; they will be better able to make their own terms with the capitalists—to give less, and receive more. This early-closing movement, be it remembered, was born of commercial prosperity—of that prosperity which opened on us in the year 1844, with abundant harvests and cheap bread—and its life and power are altogether dependent on the continuance, the extension, and the security of commercial prosperity. The real thing to be done, with the view of abridging the hours of labour in this country, is not so much to suggest incentives and inducements (which nature has already provided most abundantly) as to give facilities. We all love leisure, and would gladly have much more of it than the present conditions of industrial life in England afford to any class of working men. What we want is such an addition to the market value of labour as shall make ten hours go as far as twelve, and eight hours as far as ten—which is exactly the object and tendency of the science of political economy.

THE PROGRESS OF LEAGUE PRINCIPLES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES—THE SPANISH FREE TRADE LEAGUE.

We trust the triumph of our principles at home will shortly bring our labours to a close; but our joy and rejoicing on that account are not confined to the happy results achieved in our own country. The honest pursuit of truth and justice have attracted the sympathy of the wise and good of all nations, who see in the great principles advocated by the League the dawn of that millenium of peace and brotherhood, of liberty and civilisation, for which they have hitherto sighed in vain. Our communications with our brethren in America, France, Germany, Holland, and Spain, all breathe the same spirit—all are animated by our example, and rejoice in our success as the harbinger of their final triumph in the same course.

There are few communications which have given us more pleasure than those with our friends in Spain, because that is the country from whence we least expected to hear that our principles had taken root, or to see a periodical devoted to economical questions, giving details of the League Bazaar at Covent Garden, extracts from THE LEAGUE, accounts of its proceedings, the speeches of Cobden, Villiers, Bright, Fox, &c. It is gratifying to see that even in that benighted country there are an enlightened few who perceive that, under their existing monopoly system, Nature has lavished her bounties in vain on their rich and beautiful country, and who are struggling for that commercial freedom which presents the best means of securing its moral and political regeneration. Our readers will sympathise with the efforts of the Spanish Free Traders, and we doubt not will read with much interest the following translation of the admirable letter, addressed to the Secretary of the League by Don. Juan Antonio Seoane:

Office of the Amigo del Pais, Madrid, 30th March, 1846.
TO THE SECRETARY OF THE ENGLISH ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

My dear Sir,—I have received your esteemed letter of the 23d of February, from which I perceive, with much satisfaction, that my exertions in defence of the principles of the Economical Society of Madrid have called forth a sympathising and approving voice in the illustrious English League. Being charged by a twice-repeated election with the direction of the periodical of this society, no other testimonial, after theirs, could be more flattering to me than that of the Association of which you are the worthy Secretary.

Plunged into a career of selfishness by the avarice of the powerful classes, both countries have, for many years past, known no other feeling than that of rivalry, no other aim than that of the ascendancy of one upon the ruins of the other. Nevertheless, during the fierce struggle maintained to uphold the privileges of the few over the subsistence and the well being of the many, there appeared in both countries enlightened men who, elevated by their genius and their love of mankind above the common notions and practices, demonstrated, logically as well as eloquently, that if the moral code has taught the brotherhood of man, economical science proves its pecuniary advantage.

When, amidst the disdain of the aristocracy of England, Adam Smith promulgated these principles, Jovellanos and Campomanes repeated them in our country to a clergy, a nobility, and officials, who applauded them from time to time because they never dreamt of the possibility of the triumph of these theories. The Economical Society of Madrid was founded, like all others in this kingdom, to spread this new mode of teaching over all parts of the country; and from its commencement it has not relaxed in its patriotic task.

At that time the inalienable civil and ecclesiastical tenure entirely shut out the commercial classes from two-thirds of the territorial property of Spain. The energetic voice of Jovellanos was raised, and, supported by the powerful influence of this association, the fetters were broken which bound the land to the privileged bodies; and the source of human subsistence was restored to freedom of traffic. These same classes possessed, in the tithes, the most valuable, perhaps the only, portion which the cultivator could carry to market, after satisfying the first wants of his family. The reiterated votes of the Economical Society of Madrid tended to incline the balance in favour of the abolition of that loathsome tillage, the tithes, when they were under discussion in the Parliament. The restrictions which impeded the internal freedom of trade in articles of food were abolished by the force of public opinion, enlightened by the labours of this society; and there has been scarcely any administrative abuse got rid of, whose existence had not been previously undermined by its continued representations. Nor is there an existing abuse, the abolition of which has not been repeatedly called for.

Still the Society is of opinion that little has hitherto been accomplished for the freedom of the commerce of the world, as long as the sale of its products remains cramped by restrictions avowedly in favour of the monopoly of particular interests. Spain presents to the world a scandalous neglect of her most important interests while the rich and abundant produce of her fields lies valueless in the storehouses, or anxiously begs for the lowest pittance in her markets. The easy and steady export of her natural products will be the basis of the economic regeneration of Spain.

England may with advantage secure to herself the benefit of this exportation. She can obtain from us better and cheaper corn than that of the United States, or the North (of Europe). The price of a quarter of wheat, in most parts of Spain, is 25s.; whereas in the London market it sometimes sells at 70s. the same measure. A difference of 45s. is a wide margin, from which may be abated one-third for the advantage of the English people, another third for the benefit of Spanish agriculture, and the remainder for the encouragement of internal transport, and the navigation of both nations.

Selfish interests, in both countries, oppose themselves to the immediate attainment of such immense results. But the mask has already fallen; knowledge has united the people to put to flight the birds of prey, who, under the pretence of representing the national feelings, feed upon the real substance of the thinking classes and of the people.

The press and the spirit of association will exact justice from economical as well as from other tyrannies. The people will not travel backwards at the whim of a handful of landed or manufacturing monopolists. Wise men recognise constant progression in the operations of nature; and in this constancy, the eternal and incontrovertible law of civilisation in the moral, as of attraction in the physical world; but they have never found a sliding scale of duties on the introduction of grain, nor any system of prohibitions for the real or pretended protection of manufacturers of cotton.

Sound principles are gaining ground in public opinion in Spain; and a short time since, a mercantile association was formed, whose chief object is to promote freedom of trade, as you will have seen in their newspaper, "La Guía del Comercio," which has been sent to the League by the editor, D. Casimero Rufino, who also desires to enter into correspondence with you.

We have watched with much anxiety the progress of the new Corn Law proposed by Sir R. Peel, and the discussion consequent upon it; and we deplore the delay of a measure so eminently beneficial to the well-being of the people and the prosperity of the country, as well as to the interests of those nations who have intercourse with it. We hope, nevertheless, that the principle of Free Trade in corn will speedily be adopted, and that upon this basis the peace of England will be firmly maintained with a people born to be their brothers and their friends.

My enlightened associates in the editorship of the "Amigo del País" participate in these sentiments, and deserve equally with myself the consideration of your Association; since each one in his sphere labours for the development of Spanish prosperity, by the means of economical freedom. In all countries great obstacles oppose themselves to the regeneration of nations. Everywhere the powerful classes cling to the remains of ruinous privileges acquired by force, or intrigue, during a barbarous and uncultivated social state; but enlightened men of different nations, uniting under the same banners, moved by a common conviction, will struggle against these degrading abuses, these powerful obstacles; since, whatever may be the differences which separate them on other points, there is among them all one universal religion, which is, faith in the triumph of civilisation and improvement.

For this holy purpose I shall have the greatest pleasure in entering into a mutual correspondence with you as it may suit your convenience.—Yours very truly,

JUAN ANTONIO SEOANE.

The abolition of monopoly in England will be a memorable epoch, and must facilitate its abolition throughout the world. The barbarous warfare of the sword has ceased in Europe to waste and destroy. Will nations continue the folly of injuring each other by a war of tariffs, equally mischievous with cannons and bombshells, in destroying the development of their natural resources? We believe not. The signs of the times portend the commencement of a moral revolution, which will not cease until the principles of commercial aggression and retaliation are laid in the dust. We have already had the pleasure of recording the formation of a Free Trade League in France—Spain has followed the example set by her neighbours, and has established a "Mercantile Confederation" for the same objects. It is a good omen that the leaders of the confederation are not insensible of the difficulties before them, because it shows a determination to persevere to the end. We encourage them to proceed in their good work, never doubting that their labours will be finally blessed with success.

The following encouraging letter has been addressed by the Secretary of the Spanish Mercantile Confederation to the Secretary of the League, inclosing the rules of the confederation:

SPANISH MERCANTILE CONFEDERATION.

Secretary's Office, Madrid Mercantile Society,
Madrid, March 25, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—This Board of Direction, justly appreciating the extraordinary efforts of the English League against every class of monopoly, has been apprised of your communication to our mutual friend, Don Juan Antonio Seoane, whom it appears you have stimulated to the advocacy of the same principles of political economy which the League promulgates.

For your satisfaction I beg to say, that having already resided for some time in England, similar sentiments have long been entertained by myself. To these I have not ceased to give expression through the medium of my periodical, the Guía del Comercio, since January, 1842. The country, however, has never responded to my impressions until January of this year, when, as you will see by the circular and regulations inclosed, the Spanish Mercantile Confederation was constituted.

The Directory of the Confederation desires me to offer to yourself and to the League, in their name, an expression of that mutual sympathy which ought to animate our endeavours to obtain the glorious triumph of our common principles; principles which the Spanish nation held in practice in its province of Arragon, until the discovery of America, when the House of Austria arbitrarily proscribed them from our land. We trust, however, that we shall ere long recover the benefits of Free Trade with moderate tariffs, so as not to exclude any of the known products of the world. For so arduous an enterprise, and in a country like ours, you may easily conceive how many obstacles this Board will have to encounter.

I am desired, therefore, to place myself in communication with you, in order to express the concurrence of their sentiments with your own, and their anxious desire to enter into an explanatory and advantageous correspondence. With this motive I have great pleasure in placing myself at your service, and remain, &c. &c.,

CASIMERO RUFINO, General Secretary.

To Joseph Hickin, Secretary of the Anti-Corn-Law League, Manchester.

(INTRODUCTORY PREFACE TO THE RULES OF THE SPANISH MERCANTILE CONFEDERATION.)

MADRID MERCANTILE ASSOCIATION. THE COMMERCE OF SPAIN.

The peace in which the nation reposes, and in the preservation of which the commercial classes are more interested than any other—without which there can be neither order, enterprise, nor trade—induced the commercial body of Madrid in January, 1844, to establish a Society based upon the interests of every class of its members.

The benefits to be derived from the spirit of association and enterprise are now well understood by all enlightened countries of modern times. Among all the societies which in our own country have fulfilled the moral and patriotic objects of their founders, the meed of justice is due to the Mercantile Society of Madrid. Its labours and persevering exertions, during the two first years of its existence, have been fully appreciated and approved by the sympathetic and spontaneous incorporation with it of the commercial bodies in the various cities and districts identified by the same objects of pursuit with that of the metropolis.

Still there is an imperative necessity for the formation of a body practically acquainted with the necessities of our commerce, and the utility of drawing closer, by the bonds of an effective union, its various branches and interests; and which should be qualified to assist the Government with its advice, whenever it may think proper to consult them upon its measures. This is a serious defect—particularly that of the want of a central board of direction—which has become very evident to this and similar societies desirous to throw off the weakness and injurious isolation incident to their present management. This has been very appropriately manifested, among other bodies, in the commercial chamber of Bilbao, in its exposition of Sept. 27, 1844, and by that of Cadiz, of Jan. 16, 1845; from which we quote:

"The commerce of Spain will never attain prosperity without an intelligent and central directing body, capable of urging upon the Government a more serious consideration of the commercial question than we have hitherto had, on account, perhaps, of its own disunion, or in consequence of the political disturbances which have distracted the attention, both of governors and governed, from the spirit of the age. During this epoch, more especially, commerce has been like an orphan abandoned to its fate; although in meetings, and before tribunals, it has sometimes met with reproaches, or expressions of barren sympathy."

Actuated by the recognition of this lamentable evil, and stimulated at the same time by various communications, and by mercantile bodies and meetings in several of the principal districts and towns, the directing body of the Madrid Mercantile Society resolved to name a committee of its own which should occupy itself in framing and proposing some regulation for the advancement and combination of the before-named elements. This honour was delegated to Seniors D Alejandro Pena Arillanjo, D Pablo Martinez, and D Casimero Rufino; who, after several meetings, and amidst many obstacles and difficulties in the compilation of each article, at length, in the course of last year, completed its task. It was then presented to the Direction; and having been again discussed and modified, was finally approved.

To give solidity and firmness to this great association, and to avoid its exposure to the dangers of apathy and disunion, the rivalry or indifference of its members, which have always been the ruin of such associations, it has been provided, that no involuntary labour shall be required, nor any, even the most insignificant personal expense incurred, without immediate payment from the funds of the Society.

One of the questions most debated, was that of the fitting title to be adopted by the new association; that of the Spanish Mercantile Confederation was at length approved of. Its objects and aims are solely to combine for the defence of its associated branches from all injustice affecting the exercise of their commercial functions—to promote the diffusion of knowledge, the improvements and prosperity of commerce through the peaceful medium of the most illustrious men to be elected from each of the provinces of the monarchy, and sent to the Directive Council in the Metropolis.

Necessity and expediency have every day the more forcibly urged the formation of a society to organise the various commercial bodies for the promotion of the common interest, and to protect and defend the rights of each one in particular. This union once effected, much will be done to render Spanish commerce powerful for the welfare of the country and of the mercantile classes.

To the Madrid Mercantile Society is due the glory of having promoted and established this organisation. It now rests with the commercial classes to complete the work. Let every merchant and tradesman, whatever may be their rank concur in enrolling their names, the class and extent of their business, and the province and population where their establishments are situated. Let them cast aside mere personal and class interests in support of this project—let them join this Confederation, which, avoiding political objects, will confine itself exclusively to the careful promotion, by legal means, of useful reforms for the general good. The apathy which benumbs our commerce, must be thrown off, as well as that careless indifference and inactivity, so fatal to its prosperity. A united and compact body once formed will soon find itself respected and possessed of that influence which belongs to commercial men in the mercantile age in which we live.

THE FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY, MANCHESTER. —(From a Correspondent.)—I attended the meeting of this Society last night. It was their fifth monthly meeting, and was held in the Corn Exchange, the largest room in Manchester, except the Great Free Trade Hall. On entering the building, I was struck with amazement. There were nearly 700 persons present, all on the qui vive, either paying or receiving subscriptions. The walls, four square, were covered with printed bills, such as "Nos. 1 to 100 at this table," "Nos. 101 to 200 at this table," and so forth, of which there were 50, so that there were 50 stewards receiving money. The regulations were admirable. Though nearly 4000*l.* was received in sums from 10*s.* and upwards, no confusion prevailed, and the whole was done in little more than an hour. Instead of names, the members are distinguished by numbers from 1 to 1000, holding in the aggregate upwards of 7000 shares! Notwithstanding that a premium of 4*s.* per share was charged for new shares, yet 200 were taken up last night, in addition to the branches, of which there are ten; 71 shares were sold last night. Only imagine a sum of 4000*l.* being received every month, in one Society alone, for building purposes! Where will monopoly be ere long?

REPRESENTATION OF MONMOUTHSHIRE.—A requisition is in course of signature, calling on Captain Edward Somerset to offer himself, in the protection interest, as a candidate for the representation of the county of Monmouth. Lord Granville Somerset, aware of the active canvass carried on against himself, has already issued an address to the electors, in which he says: "I am unwilling to disturb the county of Monmouth, when Parliament may continue for a considerable time. But I am fearful lest my silence should be misconstrued. I now, therefore, take the liberty of informing you that when the time to enter upon a contest shall arrive, I shall appeal to you to decide upon my merits as your representative."

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE'S DEFEAT.—Mr. Cochrane's defeat has not been taken so graciously by his followers as by the honourable gentleman himself. Some of the more obstreperous of his political supporters at Bridport could not restrain their indignation against the witness Walsh, whose evidence, it may be remembered, disposed at once of the enquiry before the house. On this individual entering one of the Conservative public houses, shortly after his return from London, he was assailed by groans, and thereupon a row took place, in which every article in the room was broken. The next day Walsh's effigy was burnt, and his windows broken. Some other parties retaliated by breaking the windows of Mr. Cochrane's supporters. Appeals have been made to the several magistrates, and on Monday last, eleven persons were severally fined 10*s.* each for their share in the disturbances.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE
SESSION OF 1846.

Sixteenth Week, ending Saturday, May 9.

On Friday the Coercion Bill was removed out of the way of the Corn Bill, the first reading having been carried by a majority of 274 to 125. On Monday, after votes sanctioning pensions to Lord Hardinge and Lord Gough (the House of Lords passing similar votes on Tuesday), the Corn Bill came on for discussion. The question was, that the house should resolve itself into committee on the Corn Importation Bill, whereupon

Lord George Bentinck rose, and remarked that a new feature had been given to the discussion since the measure had been introduced. Sir Robert Peel had declared that the restrictions which he once considered were impolitic, he now believed to be unjust. It was proper, both to him and the house, that he should have an opportunity of explaining the grounds which had produced such a change during the last three months. They might be charged with producing stagnation of trade by these delays; but the charge was applicable, not to those who opposed, but to those who proposed, the change in the law. But it was alleged that the farmers were anxious for a settlement. That was true, if affirmed of their desire for a rejection of the measure. They certainly did not anticipate by it to obtain higher prices for their corn; if they did so, in the face of an importation of 1,500,000 quarters of foreign wheat, they must be what Lord John Russell had once described them to be, as dull as the clouds they tread upon—

Lord John Russell rose, and, interrupting the noble lord, explained that he had never applied such an epithet to the farmers of England. He had merely spoken of those who had termed him an enemy of the farmers, because he had proposed an 8s. duty.

Lord George Bentinck resumed, arguing that a large importation of foreign grain must necessarily produce a great precipitation of price, and that notwithstanding the alleged famine and stagnation, more corn had been sold in the 288 grain markets of this country during the four months of the present year, than in the four corresponding months of the preceding one. The fluctuations of price in the markets of the Continent, not merely in wheat, but in rye and oats, the food of the people, greatly transcended the fluctuations in this country under the operation of the sliding scale; and Mr. Huskisson, up to the last year of his life, had advocated the essential importance of steadiness of price. Our example had not yet "shaken Prussia;" France, to judge from the language of M. Guizot, and other public men, was not likely to abandon, with us, protection to native industry; the last news from the United States were not favourable to the adoption of our new commercial policy; while the potato famine in Ireland receded as we approached the predicted periods. The Irish markets had been disturbed by the false alarm raised by the Government; but it was subsiding, and prices were settling downwards. All these allegations the noble lord supported by figures, citations, and private documents; and concluded by moving, as an amendment, that the house go into committee that day three months.

Sir Robert Peel expressed his surprise that after the ample details furnished from the Scarcity Commissioners any gentleman should get up and deny the existence of distress in Ireland. No doubt it was not universal; but there was distress to an unparalleled extent, and disease, arising from deficiency of food. To check this, the Government were purchasing provisions, but the fund which supplied the means was taxation. Lord George Bentinck charged them with propagating delusion on the subject of Ireland; yet the noble lord was willing to be a party to a three months' opening of the ports in Ireland, to remedy a distress in the existence of which he did not believe. They were blamed with taking superfluous precautions; but this Irish case would not be confined to the present year; and had they neglected their duty, the censure upon them would have been ten times more severe. Adopting and deliberately repeating his affirmation, that the restrictions on the importation of grain, which he once believed impolitic, he now considers unjust, he proceeded to show why he thought them incompatible with justice. No doubt he should have found this out earlier; and he admired those who from the outset have an intuitive perception of what constitutes true principles and policy. But when a man changed his opinions, why should he not have the manliness to avow it? That was dishonesty, where conviction was concealed from a regard to personal consistency. But the question was not a personal one—it was national. Restrictions on the importation of wheat was not of general importance even to the agriculture of this country. Drawing a line from Inverness to Southampton, the wheat-growing districts would be found chiefly on the east side; and the western side of the island, as Lancashire, had no interest in restriction. The great defect of Irish agriculture, and even of this country, was the want of capital; and the delay of a final settlement of the Corn Law question prevented its application. In no country more than in this, with its ancient habits and mixed monarchy, was there greater importance to be attached to the maintenance of a territorial aristocracy. But the question was, whether or not the maintenance of restrictions on corn was essential to the existence of a territorial aristocracy. Burke had descended on the just influence which the English aristocracy derived by its wise deference to public opinion. In a former debate, Mr. Banks had compared him (Sir Robert) to Turgot, and regarded him as the precursor of a revolution.

He accepted the comparison as a compliment; for it was the French aristocracy who had themselves precipitated the revolution, by their resistance of all change, and their maintenance of exclusive privileges, when the necessity and the reason for them had passed away. The growth of our manufactures, and the increase of our population, had brought about a state of things, when the continued maintenance of restrictions on the importation of corn were no longer compatible with justice; and he, therefore, thought that their removal would as much strengthen the aristocracy as it would benefit the country. He had not affirmed that France was ready to change her commercial policy, in imitation of our example. He relied on the prevalence of good sense. Ultimately the interest of the great body of the consumers would prevail, and they would come to see the folly of buying dear and bad hardware, cotton, and linen, instead of cheap and good. A similar feeling was growing up in the United States—in fact, there was a movement of the public mind in every commercial country on the subject of Free Trade, which our example must impel. But even if we were not met by reciprocal advances on the part of other countries, we suffered no harm by relaxing our restrictions. Direct trade was better than indirect; but even if we exported gold in return for our imports, that gold must be obtained elsewhere in exchange for some other production. He concluded by emphatically expressing his confidence in the truth of Free Trade principles, and their ultimate progress.

Mr. George Banks deplored the tardy conversion of Sir Robert Peel, whom he had formerly compared, not to Turgot but to Neckar, as being in possession of similar virtues and weaknesses, and feared that his concessions to public opinion would lead to further and more disastrous changes.

Lord John Russell thought that whatever of argument the speech of Mr. Banks possessed, resolved itself into an objection to any change of opinion on the part of Sir Robert Peel. In Gil Blas, the assistant to Doctor Sangrado objected to the perpetual bleeding and hot water, as never effecting a cure, but always ending in death. Doctor Sangrado admitted this, but replied that he had written a book, in which he had proved bleeding and hot water to be the only infallible cure for all diseases, and he could not, therefore, change his practice. He was no admirer of the wisdom of Neckar, but it was not that minister, but the aggressions on and the impatience of the French people which led to the revolution. The safety and security of the aristocracy in this country depended on their wise deference to public opinion, and this was compromised when they maintained a law adverse to the interests of the community, and the repeal of which was viewed with so much unnecessary alarm. There had always been a wide difference between the opinions of Sir Robert Peel and such of his former supporters as now assembled "under the gangway." If not, why had he undertaken his first Free Trade experiment? If it were their destiny to teach the nations of the world how to live, let them deeply consider which of their laws and institutions were incompatible with the general welfare. Be wise beforehand; let them be taught by Catholic emancipation, the Reform Bill, and the Corn Bill; stand by institutions which are good, and give up or correct those which ought to be abolished and amended; and by that great example earn the universal title of a wise and understanding people.

Mr. D'Israeli said they did not blame the Government for the precautions which they had undertaken, but for the new commercial policy which they had proposed. The space was so short, between the last and not the least able of the protection speeches of Sir Robert Peel, and the development of his Free Trade schemes, that it was not to be wondered that they were not prepared to follow him. The speech delivered that night by the First Lord of the Treasury had not been heard for the first time. It had been delivered in different localities, and by master hands, in Stockport, in Durham, and in that classic theatre, whose representations must necessarily influence exhibitions elsewhere, and consequently it might be expected that the inferior company would adopt the popular performance. He felt this when Sir Robert Peel was tracing that picturesque line across the country; he thought of rival railways, and said this must be the line of the member for Stockport. The real question was, whether or not the measures of the Government would displace capital and labour; if they did not, he would abandon his opposition. But he insisted that they would have that effect. The capital accumulated under protection was lent by Lombard-street bankers to Lancashire manufacturers, and they must not forget what fostered their infancy, even if they had outgrown the support. He admitted that a protective policy could not be supported on isolated and petty arguments, as peculiar burdens; if they could not make out a complete and overwhelming case, they had none. But the territorial aristocracy, under which public liberty had grown up, did not comprise the whole of the landed interest. That embraced a large body of the people. Since the time of Walpole, a considerable proportion of the soil of England had passed into the hands of individuals from our great seats of industry; and this investment of capital showed that there was nothing alien in our laws to the free and ready occupation of land in this country. Colonel Torrens, in his series of pamphlets, called "The Budget," had started the subject of the circulation of the precious metals—a moot point amongst political economists; and an acute thinker, Mr. John Mill, had come deliberately to the conclusion that hostile tariffs must be met by hostile tariffs—that the only legitimate basis of exchange was reciprocity. A country, with great capital, might go on unhurt for a time; but ultimately we must exchange more and more of the labour of this country for a decreasing amount of foreign productions.

The gallery was cleared for a division, but none took place, and the house went into committee. It was understood that this was owing to a mistake, the SPEAKER not having heard a motion for the adjournment of the debate.

When the house was in committee, and Mr. Greene had read the first clause of the bill,

Lord George Bentinck moved that the chairman report progress. On this there was a division:

For the motion	85
Against it	181

Majority against it 96

Mr. P. Bennett then moved that the chairman report progress, and "don't" sit again. This created great laughter. He corrected himself by saying "report progress, and ask leave to sit again." Another division took place, when the numbers were 166 to 55.

Another motion for adjournment was made by Mr. Packe, on which

Mr. Charles Buller asked what was the object of these repeated motions? The house ought to come to some understanding on the subject.

Colonel Sibthorp disclaimed anything in connection with "understandings." Their course was straightforward. He had moved for returns which had not been produced.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained that the production of the returns required time.

Sir Robert Peel suggested the withdrawal of the motion, on the understanding that the Committee should not proceed that night. This was ultimately acceded to.

On Tuesday the house went into committee on the bill; and after passing wheat and barley, on arriving at "oats," Lord George Bentinck got up, and delivered another violent tirade, terming Ministers "political prostitutes," and using other phrases not very decent. He affirmed that the reduction of the duty on oats would ruin the agriculture of Ireland (as if Ireland were a rich prosperous country!), and accordingly moved that "oats" be omitted. Unluckily for the sagacity of Lord George Bentinck, it turned out that the effect of the amendment, if it were carried, would be quite the reverse of what he intended. It would admit oats without the payment of even the nominal duty of one shilling. This was a galling discovery. Lord George was obliged to abandon his amendment, and though he substituted for it an amendment to omit the whole clause, wheat, barley, oats and all, he abandoned that also; and in spite of an abortive attempt to get up a debate, the Corn Importation Bill, and afterwards the Customs' Bill, triumphantly passed through committee, amid great cheering.

There was nothing in the business of Wednesday or Thursday requiring specific notice from us, though in itself intrinsically important. We trust that next week we shall have the satisfaction of reporting the passing of the Corn Bill in the House of Commons.

We here give at length the speeches of Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, delivered on Monday night. They will both amply repay perusal.

SIR ROBERT PEELE'S SPEECH.

SIR R. PEELE.—Sir, I shall in the first place notice that part of the noble lord's speech, the concluding part of it, in which he referred to the position and circumstances of Ireland. I certainly little expected, after the information that has been laid on the table of this house by Her Majesty's Government, information not given on any unfair selection, as the noble lord states, but the full and entire reports which have been received from the Scarcity Commissioners appointed by her Majesty's Government,—I did not expect that any hon. gentleman would deny those allegations (hear, hear). Sir, I know that scarcity is not universal throughout the kingdom; I know there are parts of the country in which the disease affecting the potato does not exist, or not to that calamitous extent in which it exists in other parts; and there may be gentlemen writing from Ireland that in the markets in their immediate vicinities there has been no great rise in the price of potatoes. You may multiply those letters from particular countries where the disease has not prevailed, but they will be no contradiction to the fact that sickness does exist in that country, growing out of the scarcity of food (hear, hear);—that there exists in many parts a scarcity of food almost to an unparalleled extent, and that the remedy her Majesty's Government are now applying is the purchase of food in order to provide subsistence for the people, who would otherwise be subjected to the greatest privation (hear, hear). And out of what source does this money come which is thus applied to the purchase of food? Is it from any great fund at the command of her Majesty's Government applicable to the purchase of food for the subsistence of the people of Ireland? No; the source from which the purchase of food is made is the general taxation of the people of the United Kingdom (hear, hear). "But," says the noble lord, "some 60 tons of potatoes have been shipped from Ireland for the supply of Liverpool and Bristol," and the noble lord asks us why we did not go into the markets and purchase the quantities so shipped? Is the noble lord ready to intercept the natural supply of food to this country, and pay for it out of the taxation of the people? Does he charge us with indifference in not having purchased the food sent for the ordinary supply of the people of this country? There are, no doubt, some markets in which there has been a reduction in the price of food; but, owing to what circumstances? (hear, hear). Solely from the purchase of Indian corn and meal, which this house has permitted to be imported duty free into Ireland, and which has checked the price of potatoes; it is to the purchase of this Indian meal that the public money has been applied (cheers). Sir, I refer to the reports that have been received from Ireland:—is there a universal conspiracy on the part of the people of Ireland to misrepresent the facts of the case, as to the state of famine and the apprehensions of disease, and to say that no such famine and no such apprehensions of disease exist? We have not withheld from the knowledge of the house any information that has reached us on this subject, and the house must judge whether we are justly chargeable with exaggeration of facts for the purpose of facilitating the passing of the Corn Bill (hear, hear). The noble lord says that by the adoption of these measures we are countenancing delusions. Sir, that is a heavy charge (hear, hear); but how, then, came the noble lord himself to consent to this extraordinary measure—that he would permit, for the period of three months (great cheering), the importation of food into Ireland to be free (cheers)? Was not the noble lord ready to give his consent to that measure (cheers)? Yet the noble lord not only believes that it would be no remedy for the distress, but he denies there is any foundation for the allegation of the existence of famine in Ireland (“hear, hear,” from the protectionists). If that is the case, what could induce the noble lord willingly to consent to so extraordinary a measure (loud cheers), one, too, which he believes would be no remedy—the relaxation of the duty on the importation of corn and provisions into Ireland (cheers)? If it is the duty of the legislature to undecieve the people, and not to countenance delusions, it is clearly incumbent on those who think with the noble lord to resist the application of so extraordinary a measure (“hear, hear,” from Lord G. Bentinck). I do not understand the noble lord’s cheer; this is what the noble lord says—“I believe that the importation of foreign provisions duty free into Ireland would be no remedy whatever for the present evils; I believe what the people of Ireland want is money with which to purchase food, not food without money (hear), but still I will give my consent to the free importation of food.” Well, but the noble lord thinks there is no particular necessity—that is, not any necessity—for resorting to any extraordinary measure. He thinks the resorting to an extraordinary measure is countenancing and exciting delusion, and has kept up the price of food (hear, hear). Yet he says he is ready to countenance that delusion by permitting, for three months, the free importation of food into Ireland (cheers). Am I wrong in saying the noble lord is ready to consent to that measure? And on what grounds is he ready to consent to it? Because the Irish members wished it! Well, the Irish members only wished it under a strong impression on their part that there is a necessity for it (hear, hear); and if nearly all the Irish members do represent that there is such an alarm of scarcity in Ireland that it is necessary to make a temporary provision for it by suspending the law imposing a duty on the import of foreign food, does the noble lord believe that those Irish members, on whose expressed wish on the subject he is ready willingly to consent to the measure, have entered into a conspiracy to delude the house into a belief that this sickness and scarcity exist? I certainly infer that the noble lord must have had a strong impression himself that there is such a scarcity as to justify such an extraordinary measure, because the noble lord did not profess any readiness to yield to the opinions and wishes of the Irish members on another subject (cheers). The impressions and wishes of the Irish members were against the Coercion Bill, but the noble lord resisted them; he thought the necessity for the Coercion Bill was established, and against the wishes and opinions of a majority of the Irish members, he acted on his own opinion, and refused his consent to the rejection of the measure (hear, hear). Therefore, if the noble lord thinks no case for it has been made out in Ireland, why is he willing to consent to a temporary suspension of the duty on foreign provisions imported into Ireland (hear, hear)? Why does he do so, if it is countenancing delusion,—if it is calculated to raise prices and to aggravate the evils of the present calamity (cheers)? Sir, you will find this Irish case is not limited to the present year; as far as Ireland is concerned, you will find the temporary suspension of the duty will not be sufficient; you will find that in the course of the present year a much smaller quantity of land has been planted with potatoes than in former years; you will find that this arises first from the unwillingness of the farmers to let their land in conacre for fear the rent should not be received, and partly from the apprehensions of the cottiers and peasants that the same disease which has affected the potatoes this year will affect them in the next (hear, hear, and cheers). You must calculate on the probability that the pressure will extend beyond the month of August next, and that in the next year, as in this, there will be a deficient supply of food; therefore, as far as Ireland is concerned, I absolutely deny that there has been any exaggeration on the part of the Government. I peremptorily deny that there has been any intentional exaggeration for the purpose of facilitating the passing of any measure. A Government seeing the progress of the disease, and being responsible for the protection of the people against famine and scarcity, has a high and important duty to perform; if that Government was known to have neglected any reasonable precaution against those evils, any precaution by which they might have been obviated, one universal condemnation would be pronounced against it, and only at the risk of such condemnation could the executive Government have neglected such precautions; in such a case, the censure you lavish on us—and most unjustly—for our superfluous precaution, would be levelled with ten times more force, because with ten times more justice, if we had presumed that all these statements were untrue, and had neglected the precaution of increasing the supply of food in Ireland. Sir, the noble lord says I stated the other night, that in the course of this discussion the opinions I entertained on this subject had undergone a change; and that the restrictions which I some time believed to be impolitic I now believed to be unjust (hear, hear). Sir, I adopt, and deliberately repeat, that sentiment (cheers). I believe these restrictions on the importation of foreign corn are unjust (cheers). The noble lord may have a right to blame me for not having made that discovery at an earlier period (“hear, hear,” from Lord George Bentinck and the protectionists); he may say I ought to have seen that these restrictions were unjust three or four years since (hear, hear); well, I admit it (cheers)! I admit that those who, having an intuitive perception of what is right respecting matters of commercial policy—that those who, after giving a patient and deliberate consideration to the subject, have adopted the right course.—I admit that they, and not others who at a later period have adopted their sentiments, are entitled to all the credit of the policy that has been pursued (hear, hear). But it is the duty of those who see reason to change their opinions to have the manliness to avow them (loud cheers). This is dishonest—to be convinced, and yet try to consult your credit for consistency by being unwilling or afraid to admit the change. I am perfectly willing to admit that by making the change I disentitle myself to the confidence of the noble lord (“hear” from the protectionists). But the question the country really has to consider is not a personal one (cheers); it is not as to the period up to which men have entertained particular opinions. The real question is, are these restrictions consistent with justice? That is the question, the only question, we have to consider.

Punish me, if you will, for not having discovered that sooner; let the discovery disentitle me to your confidence; but you cannot, on account of the personal imputation, escape the necessity of arguing the questions—are these restrictions politic, and are they just (cheers)? I do not think, then, they are consistent with justice; the noble lord says he has a right to hear from me the grounds on which I entertain that opinion. Sir, I had no reason to believe this discussion would come on to-night; I thought a debate would take place on the third reading; but I had not the slightest reason to suppose that the noble lord in the exercise of his discretion would have made a demand on me at any period of this discussion for the grounds of my opinion. But, as the noble lord requires me to do so, I will assign the grounds upon which, after mature consideration, after hearing these debates, and even after having listened to the speeches of the noble lord himself, I have come to the conclusion that these restrictions are not politic, and are not consistent with justice (hear, hear, hear). I do not think we can defend the restrictions on the importation of food, that is, an increase of the natural price of food by legislative intervention, except upon some great public reasons connected with the public good. I think the presumption is against these restrictions; the presumption, and it is a natural one, particularly in this House of Commons, which has adopted the principle of freedom from restrictions in respect to almost all other articles of import, is in favour of an unrestricted import of food; but even consistency on the part of this house requires that the same principle which has been applied to almost all other articles of foreign produce should be applied to food also, unless you can establish some clear distinction, some reason founded on the general and permanent welfare of the country, distinguishing the article of food from other articles of manufacture and produce, and showing that it is for the general interest of the community that this restriction should be maintained (hear, hear). And it is because I cannot with truth allege my belief that by establishing a Free Trade in corn you will thereby become dependent on foreign nations for that supply,—it is because I do not believe that the rate of wages varies with the direct price of food—it is because I cannot persuade myself that the continuance of this protection is necessary to agricultural prosperity—it is because I cannot establish these facts, I have come to the conclusion that the natural presumption is in favour of unrestricted import; therefore it is I think it unjust to continue the legislative restriction. I have listened to the argument, that because in this country we have a very heavy taxation there is a reason for the continuance of the restrictions on the import of food. But on mature consideration and reflection I believe that argument to be totally without foundation (cheers). I believe it is impossible to assign a high rate of taxation as a valid reason for maintaining the Corn Laws (cheers). I believe it to be illogical to contend that because the great mass of the community are heavily taxed, and necessarily heavily taxed, in respect to the consumption of all other commodities, therefore this is any good reason to lay a tax on the importation of wheat (loud cries of “hear, hear, hear”). I cannot contend that by increasing the range from which you draw your supplies of food, by bringing your food from the United States and the Continent of Europe, by increasing the number of countries in different latitudes which can feel an assurance that the British market will be open to them, and that there will be no operation of a sliding scale to excite their produce when it has been brought to our markets—I cannot contend that this dependence upon foreign nations constitutes a reason for maintaining those laws any longer (cheers). Now, look at the different classes of the community—take first the manufacturing population—is it just towards them to continue these restrictions? Can we maintain in argument that the great mass of the population who depend for the means of purchasing subsistence upon daily labour, and are employed in manufactures—can we say that they are interested in the maintenance of these laws? If you tell me that the maintenance of these laws will ensure them a more abundant supply of corn at a lower price—not in this or the next year, but I give you the greater latitude—if on a series of years you show me that the maintenance of these restrictions will ensure that abundant supply at a lower, or, if you will, at an equal price, I admit that is an argument for continuing them. But I doubt whether that is the case (hear, hear). And when I am constantly asked what will be the price I calculate of wheat in future years, and told that I am disturbing the Tithe Commutation Act, which was founded on a price of 56s. the quarter, whereas the price of wheat may fall to 48s., I think these questions afford a strong presumption in the minds of those who put them that the unrestricted import of foreign corn will have a tendency to reduce the price of wheat. The apprehension that the Tithe Commutation Act will be permanently deranged by permitting a free importation of wheat must proceed on the assumption that the calculation on which it proceeds is erroneous, and that wheat will probably be lower rather than higher. With respect, then, to the great manufacturing population, can we contend that it is for their interest that the price of wheat should be enhanced by restrictions on its import (cheers)? I do not believe that the price of wheat will be enhanced by the removal of these restrictions (hear, hear). I do not believe that the removal of the restrictions will have a tendency to increase fluctuations (cheers). I therefore believe that the great mass of the manufacturing population will be doubly benefited by the removal of these restrictions; first, by increasing the demand for these manufacturing articles upon which their labour is expended; and in the next place by giving them from the wages they receive a greater command over the necessities and comforts of life (cheers). So far then as that part of the population is concerned, I cannot maintain these restrictions in order to consult their interests. But now, with respect even to the agricultural body itself, immediately engaged in the production of articles of food. With respect to maize there is no contest, nor is there any great contest about barley, and there only remain wheat and oats. Let us then consider how much of this country are districts producing wheat. I apprehend that the wheat plant requires exposure to the sun, and if you were to divide Great Britain by a line drawn from Inverness to Southampton, I think you would find the wheat growing districts to be in a great extent to the eastward of that line. I don’t mean to say that to the westward, in Shropshire and Somersetshire for instance, you won’t find wheat-growing districts. But, speaking generally, both in Scotland and England, I think you will find the wheat-growing districts to the eastward of a line drawn as I have described. I don’t apprehend that the districts to the westward, I don’t apprehend that even the agricultural districts of Lancashire are interested in the prohibitions on the importation of wheat. I think that the wheat growing districts of this country are, comparatively speaking, those lying exposed to the sun on the eastern coast, with the freedom from the humidity of the western coast; and it would be difficult to show that even the agricultural interest is directly concerned in increasing the price of wheat (cheers). Now, let us take Ireland—the noble lord himself read me a pretty strong lesson, that Ireland is not much interested in the continuance of these restrictions. The noble lord, on a former night, described the position of the Irish farmers to be this—he said that Lord Essex had declared that the farmers who had a large capital and much skill might contend against unrestricted import; but speaking of farmers without capital and without much skill, it would be difficult for them to contend against unrestricted import. The noble lord said that there are 500,000 farmers in Ireland, and that they all answer the description, speaking generally, as a mass of persons, without capital, and certainly without skill. What has protection then done for them (loud cheers)? It is true that there are 500,000 persons employed in the promotion of agriculture in Ireland, with all their families depending on them, and at the present moment they are farmers without capital? If it can be asserted of them as a class—I do not say universally, for, of course, exceptions to such a description are to be found—if it can be asserted generally of the farmers of Ireland as a class that they are men without capital, can we contend that the system of protection has been to them a benefit (hear, hear)? Why, to make the assertion that they have realised no capital is a very strong proof that protection has not been for their benefit (cheers). And then, with respect to the agricultural labourers in Ireland; can we contend that protection has ever operated for them advantageously, or that to them it has ever been beneficial (hear)? There is direct proof to the contrary. If you state that the agricultural labourer is in distress—that he is suffering from scarcity and disease in many parts of the country, what is the answer from the advocates of protection? Why, that it is nothing extraordinary, that it is nothing unusual, nothing out of the common course of nature, that every time it is the same (“hear, hear,” from the Opposition benches). We are told, further, that there are six weeks in every year in which the agricultural labourer finds it impossible to make the two ends meet. His potatoes fail in June or early in July, and he then finds the greatest difficulty in procuring the substitute by which to sustain life. Well, if that be the normal state of the Irish agricultural labourer, if that be not the exceptional case for which we are contending, if that be the ordinary condition, and if you say that therefore we are not justified in adopting any extraordinary remedy, can we contend that protection has been greatly for the benefit of the agricultural classes in Ireland (hear, hear). Take it as you will, if the present is an exception to the rule, in that case our remedies are justified. If, on the other hand, you state that there is always prevailing throughout the country during two months in the year destitution and famine—supposing this allegation to be correct, can you have a stronger impeachment of that state of the law under which hitherto the Irish agricultural classes have existed (cheers from the Opposition benches). I have thus attempted to show, and I, at least, am of that opinion, that the continuance of these restrictive laws is disadvantageous for the manufacturing interests, and for the interests of that class in Ireland, which is immediately connected with agriculture. And now, with respect to the agricultural classes here,—I do not mean to maintain that this change in the law will be altogether unaccompanied by distress (“hear, hear,” from the protectionist benches). I cannot deny that so great a change cannot be made without involving it in some distress; I wish, indeed, it were possible to make any alteration in any great system of law without subjecting some class to some distress. But, is it not the fact, that the parties who will be the most distressed will be those who have not science, and skill, and capital? It would be impossible permanently to maintain a law which could not be shown to be advantageous to men of capital and skill, and only to be maintained in order to give the means of subsistence to those who have not capital and skill. Nor should we be justified, as a permanent system, in maintaining these laws, and taking the food of the great body of the community, on the allegation not that they were necessary for the protection of agriculture, were science and skill applied to agriculture, but that they were necessary for the protection of those who had given in their adherence to the old system, and had unlimited means by which they could better it (cheers). And if you cannot permanently maintain it, my firm impression is, that the sooner you make known to the country what is your ultimate decision the better (hear, hear). Why, I believe also the agricultural interest is of this opinion (cheers from the Opposition benches). Yes; I believe the agricultural interest is most desirous of ascertaining the ultimate decision of Parliament with respect to the permanent system finally to be adopted. That is my decided impression (hear, hear, and cheers). I believe that the agriculturist with capital and skill, not only derives no advantage from these laws, but that he is subjected to direct injury. I consider that he has no interest whatever in the maintenance of these laws. I do not deny that there are cases in which, from the absence of capital and skill, there may be, and probably must be, some temporary suffering; but what I do deny is, that you could defend a permanent system of protection on the alleged necessity of protecting that class. And if you cannot base it, as a permanent system, on that ground—if those laws are not for the advantage of capital and skill as applied to agriculture, their duration is, I believe, necessarily temporary; and, if temporary, sooner, as I said before, a permanent arrangement is made the better (loud cheers from the Opposition; and cries of “No, no,” from the protection benches). This is the argument; the hon. gentlemen who interrupt me may have reason to show that this argument is either not conclusive or that it is fallacious; but that is the ground on which I maintain the opinion that an early settlement of these laws is absolutely required. The noble lord says, that a Minister of England would do well to adopt the language of the Minister of France, if he would see the advantage of upholding a territorial aristocracy—the maintenance of a territorial aristocracy being essential to the preservation of the Conservative principle of legislation. Now I am disposed to adopt the doctrine of that French Minister—of M. Guizot. I believe it to be of the highest importance that a territorial aristocracy should be upheld—and that in no country is it of greater importance than such should be the case than in this country, peculiar for its constitution and the character of its people (cheers). I trust that in England a territorial aristocracy, invested with just powers and authority, will long be maintained. I am convinced that it is essential to the purposes of good Government, and I am also convinced that a timely concession in a certain state of public opinion and of society would be the most effectual way of maintaining the legitimate authority of a territorial aristocracy (hear, hear); and if I thought that the continuance of this protection was essential to the maintenance of that territorial aristocracy, I should see in that fact a very strong reason for the preservation of protection; but I must see whether it be for the real interest of the territorial aristocracy to attempt to maintain its authority by continuing restrictions on our commercial policy. The question is, will the just and legitimate influence of the landed aristocracy be best maintained by consenting to forego, or by insisting on the maintenance of this protection? My firm belief is, that it will more increase the just influence of that body now to forego protection (cheers from the Opposition benches). Why, of all the authorities on the subject, there is not one who dwells more upon the importance of a territorial aristocracy, upon the necessity of maintaining the authority of the aristocracy in this country, or who dilates more philosophically upon it, than Mr. Burke. He says that it is essential that a territorial aristocracy should be maintained in this country; he says that the aristocracy has at all times taken the lead in all measures of reform; and that, on the other hand, it is the great strength and support of conservative government. He asks, how is it that the territorial aristocracy of England has so long maintained its position? and he says that it is because it has always and invariably identified itself with the people, because it has never pertinaciously insisted on the continuance of privileges when the time for foregoing those privileges had arrived. He draws a contrast between the aristocracy of England wisely consulting public opinion, relinquishing its privileges when called upon to do so, and the territorial aristocracy of France, insisting on the retention of its privileges when, from the course of events, those privileges could no longer be concealed. In a former debate my hon. friend the member for Dorsetshire, thinking, perhaps, he was uttering a severe sarcasm, though I took it as the highest possible compliment, compared me to a Minister of France, to Turgot; and he thought I was laying the foundation of a revolution in this country by adopting and applying the principles of Turgot. Has my honourable friend so read history as to think that the doctrines of Turgot led to the French Revolution? Does my honourable friend think that, if the aristocracy had not acted as it did—if it had not insisted on the corvées and on the other privileges of the order, the doctrines of Turgot would have precipitated the French Revolution (hear, hear)? Does not my honourable friend feel that it was this conduct of the aristocracy, this asserting of bygone rights and immunities, rather than the doctrines of Turgot, which paved the way to that revolution (hear, hear)? I do not refer to the privileges of aristocracy because I think they will be destroyed by conceding Free Trade in this country. I truly believe, speaking of the territorial aristocracy generally, that they will receive no injury from such a policy. I make exceptions; but speaking generally of the interests of land in this country, I do not believe that the value of land, that the privileges of land, or the influence of land, will now be diminished by acceding to that policy (cheers from the Opposition). And if it will not, I am sure you are establishing only a new claim on the affections and the sympathies of the people by making a willing sacrifice. If it is demonstrated that these laws are for your benefit, then you are wise to maintain them; but if you have the conviction that agricultural prosperity and the value of land and of agricultural produce is closely interwoven with manufacturing prosperity, then, in this country, in this complicated state of society, you cannot without serious danger to the land, fix a great and lasting charge upon the manufacturing population (hear); and if you would avoid that, then, I say, better for the interest—the extended permanent interest of the territorial aristocracy to make this concession fairly and at once (cheers from the Opposition benches). There are many privileges that the aristocracy have had that have been voluntarily abandoned, and without any loss of influence whatever. How long is it since one of these privileges was that the land alone should form a qualification for a seat in this house (hear, hear)? That was one of the ancient privileges of aristocracy, and you might argue that the abandonment of that was destructive to the influence of a territorial aristocracy (hear, hear). The constitution and long prescription had required that the sole means of entering this house was by the possession of land; you found that the law was avoided, and that it was insufficient for the purpose; you voluntarily relinquished it, and by relinquishing it has the influence of the aristocracy been diminished (hear, hear)? Was not this a proof, among many others, that power has been secured to you by a timely abandonment of nominal privileges much more than by a pertinacious adherence to them (hear, hear)? Well, now, for some months, for two or three months, we have had before us an expectation of this great change; the country has had a fair knowledge that, if this law should pass, there will, on the 1st of February, 1849, be a duty of 1s. only applicable to the import of foreign corn. The people of this country, it must be remembered, are a reflecting and provident people; they look forward; and, I ask, has the interest of land, in consequence of the announcement of the contemplated change, been injuriously affected,—are farms out of lease, has there been less demand for them than usual? Is there not a conviction, on the part of the tenant, about with capital and skill to enter a farm, that there has not been, for the last ten years, a period in which he could enter on his occupation with greater advantage than at this moment (hear)? There must be in this house many gentlemen who have lately had farms to lease. Have the offers for them diminished? Is there any necessity of letting them at lower rates? As I said long ago, before this change was imputed to me, I think agricultural is to such an extent interwoven with manufacturing prosperity, that it is more dependent on that than on anything else. Reflection has confirmed me in that opinion, and I think it is for the permanent welfare of the agricultural interest, that we should lay the substantial and certain foundation of manufacturing and commercial prosperity (hear, hear, and cheers). The true interests of the land must be co-existent and consistent with the prosperity of commerce and manufactures. In point of fact, agricultural prosperity cannot exist without commercial prosperity. In all relaxations of commercial restrictions we lay the foundation for improved commercial and manufacturing prosperity, and, therefore, on that account I look forward to their direct operation on land, and I feel satisfied you will find that the value of land will increase with the removal of these restrictions and with the new claims which, by giving your consent, you will have to the sympathies of the people (cheers). And as to these laws, I believe that, with respect to the greater portion of the community, not only have they no direct interest in their continuance, but that their wishes are directly to the contrary, and that, on that account, such laws are only to be maintained at the expense of protracted and harassing strife (cheers). I believe that the repeal of these laws is the interest, direct and indirect, of the agricultural classes also. I cannot acknowledge that they are necessary to the extension of scientific agriculture, and as I cannot assign that reason for the maintenance of restrictions, I come to the conclusion that the natural presumption is in favour of an unrestricted trade in corn, that it would be unjust as well as impolitic to continue longer the existing prohibitions (cheers). After the best reflection I can give to the whole of the subject, therefore, I now deliberately repeat what I said before,—that restrictions which at first I believed to be impolitic I now believe to be unjust (cheers). I am sorry that this conclusion was not fixed in my mind at an earlier period (ironical cheers from the protection benches). Yes, the hon. gentlemen who cheer me retain their former impressions. I dare say their views are more just than ours. But, even, although I should pay the severe penalty of losing their confidence, it is my duty to avow that my sentiments have undergone a change, and not persist in defending restrictions which I cannot think are consistent with justice. The noble lord has referred to the relaxation of restrictions by foreign countries, and has said that the promises I made two or three months ago that other countries would follow our example and relax their restrictive system have not been fulfilled. Why, considering that we are now only going into committee on the bill (cheers), considering we are told that the law will never pass, and that it is confidently expected that here or elsewhere it will be defeated (cheers from the protectionists), the noble lord cannot expect that when the bill has only been read a second time, foreign countries should relax their restrictive systems. But I did not promise that your legislation would be immediately followed by such results. I prophesied that other countries would in time follow your example, but I did not say they would do so at an early period. There are, however, countries that have shown a willingness to adopt your course (cheers). Since I made the declaration in favour of a more liberal commercial system, the Two Sicilies have made an alteration in their commercial code (cheers, ironically taken up by the protectionists). That is a small country, I admit, but is it not a convincing proof that you have made some progress already, and that the charge made by the noble lord is an unfair charge to be made? With respect to France, the noble lord said, I promised that France would adopt our principles. I said no such thing. I said this—that I gave credit to the French Government for being too enlightened to wish to persevere in all their present restrictions on British articles of manufacture, but that I believed that Government would be controlled in both Chambers by the influence exercised by those who were interested in upholding the present restrictions (cheers). But I said that ultimately the opinion of the Government, backed as it is by that of many intelligent men in that country, would prevail over these interested parties, and lead the way to a more liberal commercial code. That is what I said, and all I said. I did not promise that there would be an immediate alteration in the law. What I said then I now believe. I believe that in France the interests of the great body of the consumers will at no remote period prevail, as they should prevail, over the interests of the few; and I believe now, that if you adhere to your motto of advancing in your commercial relaxations, France will follow your example; but that if, instead of advancing, you recede, your example will be much more powerful in an opposite direction. I know that societies have been formed in France to introduce into commerce and manufacture a freer system. They will be able to show that it is not for the advantage of the great body of the consumers that they should buy dear and bad hardware, dear and bad cotton, and dear and bad linen. They will be able to show that the great mass of consumers in France will benefit by obtaining instead the cheaper and better articles of this country. But I never promised, knowing as I did the strength of the interests in the French chambers, that those interests would at once yield to the influence of reason (cheers); that on the approach of an election the Ministers of that country would adopt our principles. But if you set them the example we now propose, this example will prevail—the truth of these principles will be discovered in France—the interests of the great body of the people will be understood, and, being understood, they will prevail (cheers). Well, in the United States, I believe they will prevail there also. I don't say immediately, but I know this, that a movement is taking place in the public mind in every country (cheers); and that the example of England, as it told most powerfully in favour of restriction, will now be the strongest argument in favour of relaxation. But if we now retrograde—if we say we are convinced that we have been wrong in the steps we have already taken, then we shall continue in every country the system of restriction. The noble lord said, that if we got the corn of France and the timber of Prussia, the great consideration was, what we should get them to take in return. Why, suppose they took nothing in return, what should we suffer from that (cheers and counter-cheers from the protectionists)? On what principle does the noble lord think foreign commerce is carried on? When we buy the brandies of France they are not given to us—something is given in exchange for them. We cannot take the silks of France, the timber of Prussia, and the corn of Prussia, without paying for them—there is no mode of making purchases but by giving an equivalent for them,—but, do you send out gold to those countries now? I have not seen any diminution in the gold of the Bank of England that could be attributed to this cause. If there has been a decrease in gold, it has been from our internal concerns. I have not seen that any great quantities of it have gone to Prussia. What will astonish you still more perhaps is, that I wish it had (cheers). This country would be able to command a sufficient quantity of gold if it were required in the steady and legitimate course of trade. When a regular commerce is carried on there can be no drain of gold, and even if they take nothing but gold we can only procure that by transmitting our manufactures for that gold, and then purchasing corn and timber with it. I should not be alarmed, therefore, if there should be an export of gold from this country, knowing that we shall obtain that gold by exchanging our manufactures for it. No such export can take place as will derange our internal affairs, or derange the stability of our commerce. By permitting a freer access to the brandies and silks of France, I am persuaded that we shall inflict no wound on the commerce of this country, even if France should not adopt the same with reference to our manufactures. We shall be able to get a better and a cheaper article by introducing French brandy, and we shall enable our own population to apply what they save to the purchase of other articles of consumption. Of course, if France could see her advantage in making a corresponding relaxation in her tariff, then I admit that direct commerce is better than indirect—that it is better to exchange immediately than to carry gold for the produce of other countries. But if we can't have the double advantage, don't let us refuse to have the single (loud cheers). If we can't have the good article cheaper, do not let us refuse to avail ourselves of it because our neighbours will not do the same. Sir, I have that confidence in the example of England, that when it is seen to be in favour of commerce, and not in favour of restriction—when the public attention in different countries is called to it—I still retain the impression, that at no remote period this principle will ultimately prevail. I therefore reiterate the advice I have given before, that England should take for her motto, and the indication of your intentions—"Advance, and do not retrograde in the course of your commercial policy." (The right hon. baronet resumed his seat amid loud and continued cheering).

MR. BANKES then addressed the house, and was succeeded by LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

LORD J. RUSSELL: The hon. and learned member who has just sat down (Mr. Bankes) has declared that he did not mean to taunt the right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir R. Peel) with changing his opinion, and has stated that he believes that change of opinion to be sincere. At the same time I must say, that the speech of the hon. and learned member was so much wanting in argument, and consisted so much of a repetition of what I considered taunt against the right hon. gentleman opposite, that I do consider that that does form the staple of the objections which are felt to the course which the Government is now pursuing (hear, hear). I cannot but ask, supposing the right hon. gentleman—as I think we may in justice to him suppose—to be sincere in the opinion he now professes, I cannot but ask, what course it was possible for him to pursue? Diminish, as much, as you please, the scarcity and disease of potatoes in Ireland, still you must admit that in some parts of that country there does exist great distress. We have readily agreed to grants for the purpose of relieving that distress, and have admitted that relief was required by some extraordinary measure. Such being the case, those who are in favour of a change of the Corn Laws would have argued—it is impossible for them not to have so argued—that this formed an additional ground for taking into consideration the Corn Laws (hear, hear). It would have been said that large sums of public money would have been laid out in, and a great portion of the taxes applied to the relief of the people of Ireland, in cases where they are suffering from want of food, and yet you still maintain a law by which food is not admitted here from foreign countries ready to send it us (hear, hear). If the right hon. gentleman opposite had thought that these Corn Laws ought to be maintained under all circumstances, he might have made an argument for their maintenance; but if such is not his opinion—if he feels that these laws could not be maintained to the advantage of this empire—how intolerable would have been the position of the right honourable gentleman, if he had attempted to defend these laws, and had asked only for temporary remedies and temporary grants for relief (hear, hear, hear). What other course could the right hon. gentleman, as the Minister of a great country, take—holding the opinion he professes, and I believe sincerely entertains, that this question ought to be finally settled—than that which he has taken (hear, hear)? No doubt this is not consistent with the course he took before, and the hon. and learned gentleman says, with great satisfaction, "I see no reason to change my opinion." I think we have heard arguments in variety for the last few years, which I need not endeavour now to repeat, sufficient to show that these Corn Laws have produced great evils in this country, and that in times of distress, when food was dear, mortality and crime have increased in proportion to the dearthness of food (hear, hear). I know but one example like the consistency which the hon. and learned gentleman would seem to recommend, and that is contained in the novel of Gil Blas. I recollect that Gil Blas, when assistant to Dr. Sangrado, says to his master, "I have now been your assistant for some months, and I see that every case ends fatally; we have tried bleeding and hot water whether the patient was a young person or old, whether the illness was sudden or of long standing, and the termination has always been the same; we have effected no cure; our treatment has only increased the disease, and ended in death." And then Dr. Sangrado replies, "It is quite true; there is not a case in which we have effected a cure; my treatment seems to have no good result; but I have written a book to show that it is the only cure, and therefore it is impossible to change it" (cheers and laughter). The hon. and learned gentleman seems to be alarmed at the prospect of evils approaching us, and it appears that he has found a great likeness between the right hon. gentleman opposite and Neckar. I confess I do not see those points of resemblance to which the hon. and learned gentleman has alluded, or any resemblance between the abolition of the Corn Laws and the commencement of the French Revolution, though I am no admirer of his wisdom, firmness, or talent. I believe that the cause of the French Revolution was the oppression of the French people, and I entirely agree in those observations which the right honourable gentleman quoted from Burke, to the effect that the safety and the security of the aristocracy of this country depends on their wise observance of public opinion, and their determination not to maintain laws which the country feels convinced are injurious to it (hear, hear). I wish to maintain the landlord aristocracy, and I do not wish to see them supplanted by any other class of the community; but I think, with respect to these Corn Laws, that if the aristocracy went on from year to year maintaining laws which it could be shown had the effect of raising the price of corn grown on their own land, and thereby tending to increase their income: and if, as might be the case, the majority of the community came to be of opinion that the aristocracy were acting from such motives, there would then be no position so dangerous to them as the obstinate maintenance of those laws (hear, hear). And when these Corn Laws are done away with—when that date of February, 1849, arrives, in what respect will the landed aristocracy be in a worse position than they ought to be according to equity and just laws (hear, hear)? They will not have any disadvantage by being deprived of the protection which other classes of the community have. The law is, generally speaking, to be equal to all (hear, hear). The aristocracy are not to have the advantage of protection for corn; neither are the manufacturers or commercial men to have protection or prohibition with reference to articles in which they deal. There is not, in that respect, therefore, to be any inequality. All parties are to be placed on equal terms; and with respect to other matters, I do not know any country in the world where any class has a position at once so honourable, so advantageous, and I would almost say, so easy to fulfil as the English landed aristocracy (hear, hear). They are in the possession of great property, which has been increased enormously since the time when manufactures and commerce, towards the end of the last century, took a great start and made great progress (hear, hear). They have the advantage of competing for political power with all the other classes of the community, and they are able to obtain places in the House of Commons, whilst they nearly possess the whole of the House of Lords; and they have the further advantage which a civilised community, such as is to be found in this country, always carries with it (hear, hear). I must say that I do not know that there is any class in any country in the world which the English landed aristocracy have to envy (hear, hear); and if I were asked with respect to their political power, I should say, that while they competed with other classes of the community, which likewise have acquired wealth, and likewise have intelligence, and are fitted to rise to the highest posts which British subjects can occupy under the constitution, the English aristocracy need to be proud to fill no other situation than that, which their own ability, exertions, and industry, and those of their forefathers, enable them to do. The honourable and learned gentleman seems much alarmed at the idea that the country will have to pay very dearly for this boon of the abolition of the Corn Laws, and he appears afraid that we shall part with all the gold in the country. Wheat is to be brought from other countries, and it is said that the foreigners will take nothing but gold in exchange. But gold must be obtained somewhere: and so, if we have gold, we must give manufactures in exchange for it. But then it is contended that we do not know the price that must be paid for gold; but, for my part, I think that matter may be safely left to the manufacturers, who will know the price which gold naturally should bear (hear, hear). Therefore I say that any alarm of that kind is really preposterous. In point of fact there has been for several years a great quantity of wheat imported; at first there was an exportation of bullion and of specie, but after two or three years the course of trade became regulated, the export of our manufactures has increased, and these manufactures have been taken in exchange for corn. Such will be the result when trade is constantly carried on, as will be the case under the law which the right hon. baronet has proposed (hear, hear). And now, Sir, I must say a few words on the question with regard to which the hon. and learned gentleman has also spoken, namely, as to the division which has taken place between him and those who follow the noble lord the member for Lynn, and those who still follow the right honourable gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and I must say, I do not think this difference of opinion has arisen for the first time during the present year (hear, hear). Whatever may be said, a difference of opinion has existed. It has appeared to me for years that the opinions of the right hon. gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, the opinions of the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the opinions of others who now act with them have been exceedingly different from the opinions of the hon. and learned gentleman who has just spoken, and of others who have acted with him during the present session. Accordingly we have seen, from the first commencement of the ministry, that there has been this great difference of opinion between them. The right honourable gentleman, the First Lord of the Treasury, said, at the beginning of the present session, that the experience of the last three years of Free Trade, in certain articles, has convinced him of the propriety of proceeding in the same course; but if the right honourable gentleman had been a friend of the protection so common on the part of the great body who vote for the maintenance of the Corn Laws, why were those experiments in Free Trade made? What could have induced those experiments in the commercial policy—the enlightened and the enlarged policy, as I think, but at all events, the commercial policy opposed to the views of the hon. gentlemen below the gangway? We have seen, in the course of the last few years, whether, with respect to this commercial policy, or the Canadian Corn Bill, or on religious questions, such as the Maynooth Bill, that there has been a great difference of opinion between the Government and those who, before they succeeded to office, were their most active and cordial allies. What is the conclusion to be drawn from this? The conclusion is, that though there was a union to put an end to the late Government—though there was a combination, there was no party united in their views of public policy. Therefore, I think for the public interests, it is better, far better, that the right hon. gentleman should entertain his views of public policy, and that those gentlemen should fairly declare their views and the opinions they honestly entertain, and vote against the right hon. baronet (hear, hear). The hon. and learned gentleman who has just spoken has referred to an association—meaning what is commonly known by the League, and of another association existing across the channel, with another object—the repeal of the legislative union. Now, I do beg the hon. and learned gentleman to consider a little—as he has so strong a dislike to yielding to associations, as he does not approve of the course of policy which has been agitated in our market places, and in our streets for years, and as he thinks it wiser that improvements should commence with Parliament, and should be sent as law at once among the people rather than that they should be the consequence of popular agitation—as I collect that to be his opinion—I wish that he, and those who act with him, would consider the experience of late years. For many years we contended for the question of Parliamentary reform. I remember, Sir, that I said in this house, if we did not allow it to flow on with the river, we must expect it to rush like the torrent. I was laughed at for that expression; it was said to be an absurd and ridiculous expression. But when the Reform Bill was introduced, the popular fury rose to such a height that it would consent to nothing but the bill; and it was then seen that it would have been wiser to have made some concession to the previous agitation. And, with regard to the subjects which may arise when the question of corn shall be settled, especially with respect to that country to which the noble lord the member for Lynn, and the hon. and learned gentleman have alluded, I hope that he and others will consider whether there may not be measures which it will be wise in Parliament to enact, before we are dictated to by popular agitation (cheers). Of this I am sure, that if we mean, as I trust it is our destiny, to give a great example to the nations of the world—to teach the nations of the world how to live—we, the House of Commons, ought most deeply to consider which of our institutions and laws are founded upon truth, upon reason, and upon justice (cheers). You find fault with the right hon. gentleman for now declaring the Corn Laws to be unjust. Why are they unjust? Because they are restrictions; and if they are not authorised and justified by the general safety and welfare of the country, we ought not to uphold what are otherwise unjust laws. And, if there are other laws which stand in the same position, do not wait till agitation shall render a change inevitable. Be wise beforehand (hear, hear). Profit by the example of Catholic emancipation, of the reform in Parliament, and of the Corn Laws, and endeavour to secure what alone can be maintained. Stand by the institutions that are good, and give timely correction to abuses which are unworthy of your support. This is the way, I am convinced, by which you will give a great and noble example, and by which, in the sight of all nations, it will be said "Truly this is a great nation, this is a wise and understanding people (hear, hear)."

THE CONDITION OF OUR WEST INDIAN COLONIES.

To the Editor of the Economist.

Sir,—In a circular which I addressed in May, 1845, to the shareholders of the Jamaica Railway, I said:

"I am deeply impressed with the conviction that the falling off in the aggregate production of the Island staples, may be traced to many concurring causes besides that of the abolition of slavery. I apprehend, that the want of the necessary capital, on the part of resident proprietors—the want of confidence on the part of absentees (resulting from deficient crops, the natural effects of the great social changes which have been so recently brought about)—the numerous instances in which estates are the subject of legal proceedings—and, above all, the inexperience of the bulk of the community, as to the most economical mode of applying free labour, added to the comparatively small progress which has been hitherto made in agricultural science have, one and all, so overlaid and entangled the question of comparative cost between the two systems, that the solution of this most important and interesting problem, by a deliberate, and careful, and practical analysis of every branch of the subject, has yet to be attempted.

"Connected, as it is, with the success of the railway, as well as of other projects for benefiting the island, I have determined on devoting a few months of prospective leisure to the task. With this view, I have engaged the services of Mr. Thomas Dickon, of Thorsey, near Caistor, Lincolnshire, a gentleman who has been long and extensively known as an experienced and scientific agriculturist, and who will accompany me to Jamaica. With his assistance, it is my intention to ascertain, by personal observation, the actual condition and present mode of cultivating estates; and it will be our united endeavour to apply to the necessities of tropical agriculture the results of practical experience in this country."

I will now submit as briefly as I can the result of our observations in Jamaica. For the sake of clearness, I will address myself seriatim to the various causes which I had previously imagined as having a concurrent influence in the decreased aggregate production of the island.

The abolition of slavery has, of itself, had a considerable effect; because with it the artificial system of production without profit has received a serious check. I need not trouble you with any explanation of the causes which made the original cultivator of a sugar estate by slave labour dependent upon the English capitalist for the necessary means; or the temptation which was held out, by the facility with which such assistance was procured, to injudicious investments. It is enough for my purpose to state the fact that a very large portion of Jamaica estates were constantly under mortgage to English merchants, whose annual emoluments in the shape of interest, commission, freights, and overcharges on supplies, were so great, as to reconcile them to the improbability of their being repaid the principal money; while the planter had no alternative but to continue the cultivation possibly with the hope of ultimate independence, but certainly as the only means of propitiating his creditor, and saving himself from foreclosure and ejectment. So long as slavery existed, he contributed, by the labour of his slaves, to the production of the estate. Abolition deprived him of this, and left him a mere incumbrance on the mortgage. The latter received an instalment of the debt in his share of the 20 millions compensation fund, and finding himself the only responsible party in the transaction, declined to incur the hazard and expense of working the estate by free labour. The result of all this has been, that a large number of estates have been abandoned, which, under a sounder system, would never have existed.

As somewhat analogous to the preceding may be cited the cases of numerous estates, where joint-ownerships—receiverships in chancery—life interests—and other similar predicaments, have only begun to operate seriously when a stop was put to their being worked by slave labour. Any one acquainted with Jamaica will be at no loss to adduce instances in every parish where the finest properties are rendered wholly unproductive by some one of the aforementioned causes, and which might be advantageously cultivated, could the legal difficulties be removed.

Another serious drawback upon the cultivation has been found in the long and unexampled droughts to which the island has been exposed during the last ten years. The effects of these visitations have no doubt been aggravated by the fact of their occurrence at the time when the transition from slavery to freedom had unhinged the usual relations of society, and had beyond all dispute (for a time at least) deprived the planters of that labour which was indispensable to the efficient cultivation of their estates. It will be readily understood how two such powerful causes have combined to dissipate the available means of the planter, and bring about the inevitable abandonment of the cultivation.

Here, then, we have important elements of decreased production, which, although called into action by the substitution of free for slave labour, have really nothing whatever to do with the comparison of the relative cost of either system. Let us now proceed to examine the arguments and position of those who are unaffected by any of the preceding contingencies.

It is alleged by the Jamaica planters, and reiterated by the absentee proprietors, that it is difficult to secure a supply of labour on sufficiently reasonable terms to work the estates to profit; and that it is utterly impossible to secure continuous labour from the negroes at any rate of wages; that immigration is consequently indispensable for the purpose of meeting this double difficulty; and it is made a ground of complaint, that while they are threatened with an increased competition in the home market, they are so hampered by government restrictions as to be prevented from increasing their population to any sensible extent.

During our recent sojourn in Jamaica, Mr. Dickon and I, either together or separately, visited 18 out of the 22 parishes into which the island is divided. Our avowed object was to make inquiries respecting the system of cultivation and manufacture of the staples, and the all-important question of the supply of labour, confining myself, for the moment, to the latter topic. We found that, although everybody was ready to bear witness to the generally acknowledged want of labour in his district, the cases were exceedingly rare, indeed, that I could actually enumerate them), where our informants spoke from their own personal experience; and in these cases a little inquiry sufficed to show that the unwillingness of the labourers to work upon the estates might be traced to either inability to pay the wages, or some difference of opinion as to the rate.

The best evidence which I can adduce of there being no general disinclination on the part of the negroes to work, is the fact, that we met with more than one instance where they had continued to labour on the estate without having received their wages for many months, but were depending on the honour of their employer to pay them out of the first money which came into his hands. We also found that from some parishes, where the circumstances of the planters were the most reduced, the negroes had migrated to others, some 30 and 40 miles distant, in search of employment—not so much for increased wages, as for the sake of securing regularity in their payment.

It must, however, be recorded that, in some districts, we found that the labourers had, in the month of August after the anniversary of emancipation, and for a week or ten days immediately subsequent to the vernal and autumnal rains, almost universally absented themselves from their labour on the estates.

It is impossible to deny the great evils to which such an interruption must subject the planter; but even these are certainly to be mitigated, and, I believe, effectually overcome by a greater regard than is at present paid to providing continuous employment, whereby many portions of the cultivation might be more economically and efficiently performed than they are at present, and by the payment of such money-wages as will induce the labourer to value his place more than his provision ground.

But I shall be met by the assurance, that the cultivation of sugar will not admit of paying higher wages than 1s. or 1s. 3d. per diem. Let us examine for ourselves. The materials are not always at hand to analyse the outgoings of a Jamaica estate; but I happen to have before me the particulars of one of the estates which we visited, and which bears so fully upon this head, that I shall be excused for giving them at length. It will be seen that they fully corroborate the accounts already published by the Jamaica Agricultural Society respecting Denbigh House Hall and Seville estates.

ACCOUNT OF ACTUAL EXPENSES OF MONEY MUSK ESTATE IN THE PARISH OF VLER, JAMAICA.

For 30 Acres of Plants.

Ploughing, three men per acre; opening plough holes, 30; dropping manure and planting, 26; carrying out manure, 15; first cleaning and supplying, 12; second cleaning, 8; third cleaning and banking, 14; trashing (if heavy lodges), 10 3,540

For 200 Acres of Labourers.

First turning trash and moulding, 8 men per acre; cleaning and supplying, 7; cleaning and moulding supplies, 5; booting (lightly), 4 4,800

For 30 Acres Guinea Corn.

Planting, 2 men per acre; singling and moulding, 10; supplying and drawing suckers, 12 720

Billing 60 acres pastures, at 2 men per acre 120

Employment during Crop.

About the works—say, total for crop, 16 weeks .. 2,720

Cutting canes, 25 per diem 2,000

Tying canes and loading wains (inferior hands) .. 2,000

Children drying trash, 10 for 16 weeks 800

Wain-men and boys, 10 per day 192

Wagoner and boy 1,040

1 head carpenter and 3 assistants 9,592

1 wain-man and boy out of crop 400

2 cattle boys for 365 days each 730

3 grass cutters for 260 do 780

1,910

Total 20,642

Cost of 15,636 days' labour, at 1s. 781 16 0

— 4,206 — at 6d. 1,053 0 0

— 800 — at 4½d 15 0 0

Total cost .. Sterling 901 19 0

Add the following general charges in Jamaica old currency:

Coopers raising and heading 200 hhd. at 3s. 4d., and 60 puns. at 5s. 48 6 8

Carpenter 200l., 3 masons 50l., blacksmith 20l. .. 270 0 0

Watchmen 40l., domestic servants 180l., mason work 50l. .. 270 0 0

Coppersmith work 40l., wharfage 100l., ranger 20l. .. 160 0 0

Medical attendance 25l., cattleman 20l., mill timber, 10l. .. 55 0 0

Staves, puncheons, packs, deals, and smiths' coals .. 290 0 0

Nails, rivets, tools, &c., 17l., sundries for steam engine, 20l. .. 57 0 0

Beef, pork, lard, &c. &c. 105l., lamp and punt oil, tallow, &c., 48l. .. 153 0 0

Taxes 240l., 10 head cattle purchased 180l. .. 420 0 0

All salaries, attorney included .. 360 0 0

Currency 2,163 6 8

Sterling 1,262 0 0

Add for day labour .. 901 19 0

Total expenditure .. £2,163 19 0

Estimated value of 200 hhd. sugar at 30l. .. £6,000

currency .. 1,080

Ditto of 60 puns. rum at 18l. do. .. 1,080

Currency 7,080—or £4,248 sterl.

The foregoing valuations of the produce are too low, but I adhere implicitly to the original figures.

Here, then, we have a gross revenue of 4,250l. sterling, produced by 20,642 days' labour, at rates varying from 1s. and 4½d. per day, and costing in the whole the sum of 900l. Without going into the questions of how far the net proceeds of the estate might have been increased by the sale of corn and cattle, which form items on the debit side, or how far the labour actually employed might by the more extensive use of implements have been economised, I think it may be safely asserted, that if necessary the daily wages might have been augmented from 50 to 75 per cent. without subjecting the proprietor to anything like loss in his cultivation.

The estate in question has no peculiar advantages beyond those by which it is surrounded. It was at the time of our visit under the charge of the son of the proprietor, and although suffering from many portions of the prevailing system, its general condition and appearance were among the best which we witnessed. We were assured that the only labourers employed were the former slaves on the estate.

We are again told that no amount of wages will secure continuous labour. This assertion was not borne out by what we saw upon several estates, and certainly it is completely refuted by our experience in the construction of the railway between Kingston and Spanish Town. We employed for upwards of a year an average of 500 men, without experiencing at any time any difficulty from interrupted labour. I shall be told that we paid exorbitant wages, and that the work was such as suited the tastes of the negroes from its nature and novelty. True, we paid 2s. per diem, but we took care to accompany it with strict and constant supervision, and we found our account in substituting the pick-axe, the shovel, and the wheelbarrow, for the worn out hoe and little wooden bowl, whereby we secured the removal of 10 cubic yards of earth as the daily task, and for which we should have had to pay something like 3s. 6d. in England. I cannot well imagine what there was in either the nature or novelty of the work to make it more inviting than the labour on an estate, or on their own provision grounds. The only coercion we used was the certainty of dismissal for absence, and we found it work well.

The capital which some would suggest should have been devoted to the economy of manual labour—to the erection of steam engines—the laying down of tramways—the importation of skilled agricultural labourers and artisans—to the judicious management of cattle—the more perfect and scientific tillage of your soil, and the more economical manufacture of your produce—has been devoted to the importation of human beings—to, in short, a modified species of slave trade. You have staked your existence on physical strength—you have asked for and obtained "liberty to compete"—you have had a clear stage, and you must look for no favour. Look around you. Your first competitors are the East Indians, with their labour at 3d. per day; your next, the planters of Java, China, and Manilla, with their millions of populations; your next, those of Cuba and Brazil, with their crowds of African slaves, whose thews and sinews are so many more marketable machines, to be used and used until they snap, and are replaced by others.

I refrain from urging, with the force which the subject merits, the injustice which any scheme of immigration, by means of public taxation, must inflict upon the mercantile classes in the towns, or on those planters who look to other appliances than manual labour for the cultivation of the soil; and above all, on the present labouring population, who already pay 3-5ths of the duties on imports, and who are to be further taxed for the mere purpose of creating their own competitors. I will rather ask, Who can magnify the evils of a system of small holdings and separate self-dependence when once created, or who can set bounds to the demoralising effects which the introduction of a large body of Pagan Hill Coolies is to have upon the nascent Christianity of the negro race?—or what can guarantee the island (for the laws do not) against a general defection on the part of the Coolies after the first twelve months, and their becoming an idle and dangerous body of vagrants, loiterers, cursing the land? It will be in vain that the colonists shall seek to rid themselves of their presence by incurring the vast expenditure of their removal. The pollution of their vices will have been already sown broadcast, and cannot fail to yield a corresponding harvest.

If, then, we look at immigration as a remedy for high wages and interrupted labour, we find it unavailing—as a means of enabling the planter to sustain increased competition, a broken reed—or as a financial operation, an unwise investment. We find it too depending on injustice for its accomplishment, and involving in its operation an amount of social evil which it is sickening to contemplate.

In my next letter I will endeavour to trace some of the real difficulties which beset Jamaica interests.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM SMITH.
London, 30th April, 1846.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, May 6, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

	£.	s.	d.
*Miller, Thomas, Preston	100	0	0
*Lees, Wm. and Co., Blackburn	100	0	0
*Miller, Henry, Preston	40	0	0
*Marshall, Henry, M.P., Stockport	40	0	0
*Crosley, John, and Sons, H. Helen Bridge	30	0	0
*Vines and Williams, Brown-street, Manchester	20	0	0
*Aitken, T. and J., Bacup	10	0	0
*Sagden, Joseph, Chesham-street, Rochdale	5	0	0
*Trippett, Wm. L., 12, Exchange-street, Manchester	4	0	0
*Kettlewell, Wm. and T., Briggate, Leeds	4	0	0
*Burrows, Wm., Dunkirk	3	0	0
*Wright, Robert, Briggate, Leeds	1	1	0
*Conyers, Joseph, Timber Bridge, do	1	1	0
*Corbett, Edward, 13, Crescent, Salford	1	1	0
A Few Friends, per Charles Souter, White's Place, Montrose, N.B.	0	13	0
Small Subscriptions, Montrose	0	3	0
Milner, J. B., 11, Todd-street, Manchester	0	5	0

Hull.	*Bates, Elv, West Hill	10	0	0
	*Walton, Barnabas, Sanare	10	0	0
	*Clay, Jas., and Sons, Sowerby-bridge, nr	2	0	0
	*Jeanning, Wm.	2	0	0
	*Miller, B., Paddockfoot Mill, near	2	0	0
	*Shaw, Wm., woolstapler, Westgate	2	0	0
Hudders-	*Briggs, John	1	0	0
field.	*Redburn, John, Leeds Road	1	0	0
	*Thames, Wright, Kirkburton	1	0	0
	*Pitt, Robert, do	0	4	0
	*Gibson, Wm., King-street	0	2	0
	*McPhail, Dargald, and Co., Greenhead	50	0	0
	*Crum, J. and W. and Co., Cochrane-st.	30	0	0
	*Young, John, jun., Ingram-street	20	0	0
	*Gibson, Wm., Nile-street	20	0	0
	*Stewart, Robert, 37, West George-st.	20	0	0
	A Friend, per W. Buchanan, St. Vin-	12	0	0
Glasgow.	cent place	12	0	0
	*Anderson, John, 20, Renfield-street	12	0	0
	*Stirling, George, 28, Indirect-street	10	0	0
	*Laurie, James, 31, Montrose-street	10	0	0
	*McClelland, James, 123, Ingram-street	10	0	0
	*Couper, James, Exchange buildings	10	0	0

*Bryson, Robert, Wilson-street	8	0	0
*Mitchell, James, Miller-street	6	0	0
Orr, Robert, 34, Elm Bank Crescent	5	0	0
A Friend, per Alex. Smyth, 20, West George-street	5	0	0
*Finlay, R. G., and Brothers, Montrose-street	5	0	0
*McLaren, Wm., Camberlriggs	4	0	0
*Corbett, Alex., and Co., Montrose-st.	4	0	0
*Naimson, Alex., 5, St. Andrew's-sq.	3	3	0
*Lancaster, George, Printfield, Furnistown	3	0	0
*Hamilton, John, Stockwell-street	3	0	0
*Allen, Alexander, Camberlriggs	2	0	0
*Kerr, Malcolm, Queen-street	2	0	0
*White, Wm., 73, do	2	0	0
*Young, George, 163, Ingram-street	2	0	0
*Glanias, George, Springfield Court	2	0	0
*Cairns, Jas., and Sons, London-street	2	0	0
*Barr, Robert, Griffe Grove Mill, Bridge of Weir	1	10	0
*Anderson, Messrs. and Co., 157, Tron-gate	1	1	0
*Henderson, Peter B., George's-square	1	1	0
*Bow, Wm., 48, London-street	1	1	0
*Boyle, Wm., 52, Hutcheson-street	1	0	0
*Bannantyne and Ferguson, 46, Renfield-street	1	0	0
*Workers of W. and A. Taylor, Millend	1	0	0
*Barclay, Wm., 66, Argyle-street	1	0	0
A Friend, per Robert Graham and Co., 52, Glassford-street	1	0	0
*Houston, Wm., 13, Little Hamilton-st.	1	0	0
*Aitkin, H., and Co., 703, Gallowgate-st.	1	0	0
*Campbell, J., Renton, Dumbartonshire	1	0	0
*Chalmers, Thomas, 161, Tron-gate	1	0	0
*Phillips, Thomas, 35, Glassford-street	1	0	0
*Miller, Joseph, 395, Argyle-street	1	0	0
*Ingles, Thomas, 649, Gallowgate	1	0	0
*Caird, John, 320, Renfrew-street	1	0	0
*Aked, J. S., Springfield Court	1	0	0
*McDonald, David, 134, Tron-gate	1	0	0
*Robertson, A. and W., 169, do	1	0	0
*Stuart, Wm., 18, Hutcheson-street	1	0	0
*Alexander, James, 99, Glassford-street	1	0	0
*Mure, G. W., 46, Gordon-street	1	0	0
*Rigg, Arch., 55, Buchanan-street	1	0	0
*Muir, David, Kilwinning, Ayrshire	1	0	0
*Turner, James, Stirling-street	1	0	0
*Russell, Alex., 51, North Hanover-st.	1	0	0
*Salmon, John, Wilson-street	1	0	0
*Kirkpatrick, Robert, 15, Hutcheson-st.	0	4	0
*McCall, H. and Son, Glassford-street	0	4	0
*McTear, Andrew, Argyle-street	0	4	0
*Gardiner, Wm., Buchanan-street	0	4	0
*Wilson, And., Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Office	0	4	0
A. M. K., Miller, 189, Tron-gate	0	4	0
*Dawson, C. H.	0	60	0
*Rennie, Tetley, and Co.	0	50	0
*Salt, D., and Son	0	30	0
*Bateman, Daniel, and Sons	0	20	0
*Russell, J.	0	20	0
*Oxley, George	0	20	0
*Craven and Harrop	0	20	0
*Garnett, James	0	20	0
*Smith, Samuel	0	20	0
*Free Trader	0	10	0
*Armitage, George, and Co.	0	10	0
*Law, James	0	10	0
*Douglas, Wm.	0	10	0
*Harrison, Benjamin	0	10	0
*Brown, Henry	0	10	0
*Aked, Thomas	0	6	0
*Passavant, Ph. and Co.	0	5	0
*Leeming, J., and Son	0	5	0
*Berry, Benjamin	0	5	0
*Allen, E. and R.	0	4	0
*Clapham and Whitaker	0	4	0
*Steel, Wm.	0	4	0
*Smith, M. and S.	0	4	0
*Bottomley, Samuel	0	3	0
*Wilkinson, Wm.	0	3	0
*Holden, P. K.	0	2	0
*Byles, Wm.	0	2	0
*Scott, Rev. Walter	0	2	0
*Acworth, Rev. James	0	2	0
*Stowell and Sugden	0	2	0
*Miller, John	0	2	0
*Wilson, Christopher, and Brothers	0	1	0
*Dinton, Wm.	0	1	0
*Droglan, John	0	1	0
*Duffon, Joseph, and Son, Pudsey, near	0	1	0
*Wade, Wm., Chapel Town, do	0	1	0
*Kempsey, Mr., do	0	1	0
*Womersley, R., Marsh, do	0	1	0
*Moss, Charles, do	0	1	0
*Stansfield, Geo. and Co., do	0	1	0
*Walker, J. T., Lane End, do	0	1	0

*Waguelin, T. M., 7, Austin-friars	20	0	0
*Weymouth, H., 17, Bryanstone-square	10	0	0
*Jerram, J., Fenchurch-buildings	10	0	0
*Harrison, F. and Co., Bow Churchyard	6	0	0
*Fennings, R. L. and J., Fennings's Wharf, Tooley-st.	5	5	0
*Bateman, Dr. J., East Lida-road	5	0	0
*White, Henry, 87, Lower East Smithfield	5	0	0
*Woodfill, G., Angel-court, Skinner-street	4	0	0
*Miller, John, of the firm of Miller and Arthur, Leith	1	1	0
*Melluish, Wm., Blackheath-hill, Blackheath	1	1	0
*Bennett, G. W., Tranquil Vale, do	1	1	0
*Shove, W. S., do	1	1	0
*Post, Jacob, 15, Lower-street, Islington	1	1	0
*Webb, C. J., 440, Oxford-street	1	1	0
*Brewin, W., Denmark-hill	1	1	0
*Harding, J. G., 96, Albany-street, Regent's-park	1	1	0
*James, James, 3, Benthick-street, St. James's	1	1	0
*Shove, John, Lewisham, Kent	1	1	0
*Hamblin, John, 19, Welbeck-street, Lenark	1	1	0
*Paine, John, 10, Parade, Birmingham	1	1	0
*Dennis, Charles, 10, George-street, Piccadilly	1	1	0
*Brown, J., 17, Upper George-street, Bryanstone-sq.	1	1	0
*Harbert, C., 20, Clippstone-street, Marylebone	1	1	0
*Dennis, Wm., Little Pultney-street, St. James's	1	1	0
*Shea, John, 59, Aldermanbury	1	1	0
*Nowell, W. H., 7, Brick-lane, Whitechapel	1	1	0
*Merryweather, F., 42, Bedford-st., Commercial-road	1	1	0
*Prowse, J. S., Conduit Vale, Blackheath	1	1	0
*Boys, Captain, 12, Holwell-place, Blackheath-road	1	1	0
*Naylor, Charles, solicitor, 2, Trinity-street, Leeds	1	1	0
Burr, T., 33, Cannon-st.-road, St. George's-in-the-East	0	2	6

Blairst, James, King-street	1	0	0
Scott, James, Victoria-terrace	0	2	6
McKie, Alexander, do	0	2	6
Livingston, Alexander, do	0	2	6
Beckton, Joseph, Wolverhampton-street	0	2	6
Campbell, Wm., Abbey-street	0	2	6
*Sykes, Jos., and Son, Raywell and Hull	20	0	0
*Sykes, Major, West Ella, near	10	0	0
*Thompson, Thomas, merchant	10	0	0
*Jones, Joseph, draper	10	0	0
*Hittison, Wm., brewer	5	0	0
*Gresham, John, Mayor	4	0	0
*Seaton, Herbert	2	0	0
*Collins, E. T., Advertiser Office	2	0	0
*Bell, W. H., merchant	1	0	0
*Meggit, Thomas, painter	1	0	0
*Spinks, John, butcher	1	0	0

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Great Torrington, Devon, April.

Sir,—I shall thank you to insert in your paper the account of the distribution of the beds and bedding given to the agricultural labourers of this town and neighbourhood. I should have written the account of the distribution before, but severe illness in my family has caused the delay.

Good Friday last was the day fixed on for the distribution of the League-present to the labourers of this town and neighbourhood. About 10 o'clock in the morning the labourers from different parishes round Torrington began to assemble at my house, and were there met by the Rev. James Buckpitt, Independent Minister, with T. K. Tapley, Esq., surgeon, Philip Fry, Esq., M.R.C.V.S., and a great number of other friends, with the Great Torrington reporter for the North Devon Journal, Mr. Thomas Elsworth, who gave a report of the distribution of the beds, &c., in that paper. The Rev. James Buckpitt addressed the labourers in a speech of considerable length, and under the canopy of a blue sky and a bright sun explained to them the object that the National Anti Corn-Law League had in view in thus seeking a repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws. The rev. gentleman told the labourers that the League, hearing that the agricultural labourers were in such a destitute state through me, George Toms, who had put himself in communication respecting their destitution, had induced the benevolent individuals to send them the present of beds and bedding which they had that day met to receive, and he trusted that when they (the labourers) would lay down on their beds, they would offer up a prayer for those individuals who were endeavouring to raise the present agricultural labourers from the state of starvation which they had been brought to.

The labourers heard the observations made by the rev. gentleman with tears of joy, and at the conclusion tremendous applause was given for the League and others who had assisted in any way in so good a cause. After the address, we then distributed the beds and bedding to the undermentioned individuals, labourers; and if you had only been present to witness the tears of gratitude, and the earnestness expressed by the labourers and their wives that we would be kind enough to thank the gentlemen of the League for their gifts, it would, I think, be long remembered by you.

I cannot give you the least idea the good effects that the distribution of the beds and bedding which have been given away has had upon our opponents, for since Good Friday I have had hundreds of agricultural labourers, or wives, giving me a most awful account of their destitution; many of them have brought me written statements, signed by the farmer whom they work for; others by the overseer of the parish; some by the minister of the parish. If I could only have time to take down their statements it would be a second Ireland. I will send you the different statements which I have had delivered to me, should you think it would be of any service so as to induce others to help to relieve such distress. I will with pleasure attend to it, and at any future time I shall be most happy to receive anything for those starving labourers, and will distribute the same amongst them.

Names.	Parish.	No. of Children.	Wages, &c.
John Bright	Gt Torrington	10	1 get nothing; 1s. 2d. per day; about half work.
J. Lockyear	do	10	3 dead, starved; 1s. 2d. per day; not full work.
Richard Bell	do	6	1s. 2d. per day; 4½ days' work per week.
James Short	do	4	1s. 2d. per day; about 4 days per week.
Jos. Stocker	do	6	1s. 2d. per day; full work.
James Vicary	do	4	1 get nothing; not half work.
Jas. Jeffery	do	7	1s. 2d. per day; not full work.
P. Morrish	Fristlestock	4	Full work; 1s. 2d. per day.
G. Hoare	do	5	Not full work; 1s. 2d. per day.
S. Perryman	St. Giles.	11	5 under 9 years, ill; 4s. per week, and 20s. from parish.
Rich. Scott	do	8	5 get nothing; 1s. 2d. per day.
Rich. Kelly	do	10	Very poor; 1s. 2d. per day.
Rich. Sussex	do	6	is. per week.
S. Ackland	do	2	5s. 3d. per week.
A. Bright	do	10	1 get nothing; 1s. per day.
M. Judd	do	5	Under 9 years of age; 5s. 10d. per week.
Wm. Perr	do	2	1s. per day; full work.
Richard Bird	do	4	1s. 2d. per day; about 5 days a week.
Geo. Jewell	do	8	1s. 2d. per day; ill for nine weeks.
J. Lethbridge	Roborough	6	1s. per day.
W. Banbury	Langtree	8	1s. 2d. per day; neither of his children get anything.
W. Mitchell	Shelbear	4	1s. 2d. per day; about 5 days per week.
W. Northcott	Ashroigney	6	1s. per day; 5 children get nothing.
Thos. Short	Buckland	12	7 home, get nothing; 1s. 2d. per day.
David Harry	Winkley	4	1s. per day.
John Pollard	Fristlestock	6	6 get nothing; 1s. per day; 5 days a week.
Wm. Davey	St. Torrington	4	7s. per week.
Thos. Hearn	Langtree	4	Very poor; gone to Wales to look out for work.
John Baker	Roborough	12	5 get nothing; 1s. 2d. per day; 3 days per week.
Geo. Davey	Torrington	4	Not much work; 1s. 2d. per day.
J. Hellings	St. Giles	2	5s. per week, family and self.
Geo. Judd	St. Giles	5	1s. 2d. per day.
John Bennett	Gt Torrington	12	3 get nothing; 1s. per day.
J. Curtee	Shelbear	10	1s. 2d. per day; full work.
John Curtee	St. Giles	5	1s. 2d. per day; not full work.
W. Woodman	Highampton	9	5 get nothing; 1s. 2d. per day.
A. Lutz	Buckland	6	1s. 2d. per day.
R. Wakeley	Gt Torrington	3	4s. 8d. per week.
W. Shaddock	do	3	5s. 10d. per week.
R. Peckand	do	0	4s. 8d. per week; wife.

Having so many applications from the labourers, we divided the present of the League to the greatest objects, which I trust will meet the approval of the givers.

I beg to remain, Sir, yours, most respectfully,
GEORGE TOMS.

P.S.—I should state that the labourers all have to pay rent, from 1s. to 2s. per week, out of their miserable earnings.

Charles Waterton, Esq., of Walton Hall, has determined to destroy the game within his park. This is an effectual mode of putting an end to poaching.—Wakefield Journal.

A FARM-FIELD RAMELE IN HERTFORD-SHIRE.

No. II.

In a farm yard, with an orchard of cherry-trees and apple-trees shaded in blossom beyond it; and a field of green pasture with cows in the pasture beyond the orchard; and a field with ploughs, and horses, and men, and women, and boys, at work in it beyond the green pasture; and other pastures and meadows of grass for hay beyond the ploughed field; and white daisies, and yellow buttercups, and cowslips, in all of them; and hedgerows in green leaf and fragrant blossoms surrounding the fields—large, rough, and rustic, though green and blooming, like the men of the fields; not free from vices, but possessing virtues, and much to be pleased with; the woods of the lord of many acres rising above the fields, and looking down upon them, as lofty above the humble shrubs of the hedgerows, as the lord who dwelt within them in his noble mansion was above the humble workers in the fields who dwelt in tiled sheds;—in that farm-yard with pools of rain-water large and foul in it, and wet dung which had been washed by the rain-water, and heaps of bean-straw and chaff upon the wet dung, and young pigs and old sows with their snouts burrowed in the straw and chaff in search of cast away beans, as some legislators may be seen in search of cast-away arguments gathering minute particles of fact with full mouths of fallacies, and swallowing all—digesting them and existing on that kind of provender scattered on the political dunghill by men who have winnowed the grain from the chaff long ago, only because it is their nature not to have a higher taste nor a higher power of discrimination in filling their mouths with chaff and dirt for the sake of the one or two grains of fact which may be there;—in that farm-yard, with the pigs in it, some of which are grown-up hogs, and are old enough to remember—if hogs have such memories or such knowledge—the time when the lord of the land on which they were bred and fed was a monopolist, which he is not now, when he was all for the confining of hogs like them to the mere grains of “native grown” corn among the chaff on the dunghill, and not as he is now, in favour of hogs getting food good and clean, that Englishmen may have enough of native-fed bacon, even if that bacon is fed on foreign grain;—in that farm-yard, in the occupation of a tenant of that remarkable lord—the Earl of Essex—I met that tenant, and had a conversation with him. And after talking on several topics, such as the making the most of the manure which lay around, much of it wasted, and converting it into a productive element of new crops, and of the rearing of hogs and the conversion of hogs into good hams and bacon, we talked of the conversion of the landlord from a monopolist to a Free Trader, and the process by which it had been done; and of the effect which the conversion of a monopolist landlord was likely to have on a monopolist tenantry.

FARMER: You know that I have always been in favour of the Corn Law. I cannot say I have changed my opinions, as Lord Essex has changed his. Probably I have not the capacity of judgment that he has; perhaps I have not seen the same arguments presented to me in the same way. He is a landlord and I a tenant. A landlord may see things differently from a tenant. If I were a landlord I might have all the high hopes for the future prosperity of agriculture which his lordship has; but I do not see what a tenant has to hope for. If he augments the produce of his land, by sinking capital in the land, he has his rent augmented upon him. If he does not improve his land, he loses by it. I see no hope for the tenant farmers.

WHISTLER: It is to be fairly expected that Lord Essex will not stop in his own exertions to advance agriculture. He says there are some tenant farmers who never should have been farmers; but there are landlords who never should have been landlords. As landed property has hitherto been managed, and must still for some time to come be managed, the landlord's services in promoting agricultural improvement are more necessary to it than the tenant's services. As tenures and conditions of agreement now exist between landlord and tenant, the power to improve the cultivation of the land is almost entirely in the hands of the landlord. But I think there is much to hope for from Lord Essex. On the question of Free Trade he adopted the opinions and prejudices of his class without inquiry, as he now confesses. May we not suppose that he has adopted the customs of his class in letting his farms on insecure tenures to his tenants, and loading those tenants with conditions as only asses are loaded—and they only so loaded by very thoughtless or very cruel boys—may we not suppose that his lordship has as thoughtlessly adopted and acted on the tenorial customs of his class, as he confesses to have adopted and acted on the opinions and prejudices of his class about Free Trade? He says, that until the Corn Law question came to a crisis, he had never given it any serious consideration, save on one side—his own side—that of protection. But when it came to a crisis, he was induced to inquire, and read, and study the arguments on the other side—the Free Trade side—to see what it was that had converted Sir Robert Peel; by which inquiry, reading, and study, he found himself converted. And listen to what Sir Robert Peel confesses the other day; and not only confesses, but proclaims as a legislative fact. “I will not deny,” he says, “that during the debates on the question, my opinions have undergone a change—and it is this; that restrictions, which I at first believed to be impolitic, I now believe to be unjust.”

FARMER: But Sir Robert Peel is not a tenant farmer, with a rent to pay. He is a receiver of rents. Now, as I said before of Lord Essex, I might think as he thinks if I were a landlord, and had seen all the Free Trade arguments as he has seen them; but as a tenant, I see nothing to hope for. Explain to me, if you can, how improved agriculture is to do the tenants any good when his rent goes up with his produce, and seldom falls with the price of his produce.

WHISTLER: This is the very point at issue between landlord and tenant; but it is not the point at issue between the League and the tenant farmers, between Free Trade and agriculture—between Sir Robert Peel, a Prime Minister, and you, a farmer. Sir Robert Peel was a statesman, and Sir Robert Peel as a landlord, is not the same. The conditions upon which you should hold your farm must be these: that you will receive the profits of your improved agriculture for a term of years which no caprice or capidity on the part of your landlord, and no accident to his life, can deprive you of. This is and must be the first principle in all agricultural improvement. Lord Essex will do nothing to achieve that success which he foretells to the agriculturists of England, unless he adopts a system of leases liberal and long enough to secure practically to his tenants the profits of their capital and skill.

FARMER: Do not you think that if tenants-at-will were to be legally entitled to compensation for all their improvements on quitting their farms, it would be a great benefit to them—as good as if they had leases?

WHISTLER: A benefit, compared with their present state of helplessness as tenants-at-will, but not so good as a lease. I observe that farmers' clubs in different parts of the kingdom are discussing this question; and I regret exceedingly to see them wasting valuable time and a fair opportunity on such a worthless object as the improvement of tenancy-at-will. Under no form whatever, with no possible qualifications can tenancy-at-will be rendered fair and equitable to the tenant, or beneficial to the landlord, and the progress of agriculture. I will say more, that no honest landlord, if not a weak-minded or ignorant man, will seek to have tenants-at-will upon his land, to expend capital and skill and health and strength on that land. Many landlords, who are honest men, let their farms on yearly tenancies, dismissing the tenants when they think fit; but if honest, they are ignorant, having never studied the subject, as Lord Essex says he never did until the Corn Law came to a crisis; or they may be, unlike his lordship, so weak-minded that they cannot study and understand such subjects; or, unlike his lordship, they may be so inveterately prejudiced in favour of their territorial supremacy—the remnants of feudal power, that they will not yield independence and security to their tenantry even when convinced that such independence and security would be to their own advantage. And it is possible that there are some, a good many perhaps, who have used their tenancy as political instruments in the polling booth, as mercenary men use their bills of exchange, bonds, and notes, and take them to the money market to make profit of them; the profit being places of honour and emolument under Government, in the army, the navy, the church, the law courts, and the palace. But I believe the time has arrived, or it is not far off, when subservience to a political party in Parliament through the use of such men as you at the hustings will be impracticable. We may therefore hope that you tenant farmers will be looked upon by your lords as farmers employed in the advancement of the national agriculture, and not as political beasts of burden employed in the advancement of families to high prizes in the lottery of politics and plunder. And so I return to the point which I say is the one at issue between you and your landlord—that of security of tenure by a lease—and a liberal lease untrammelled by Game Law covenants; and all the other feudal covenants which you know well, but which are too numerous at present to mention.

FARMER: Do you think we are, landlords and tenants, so near that age of prosperity and general well-doing foretold by Lord Essex, as to need nothing but a repeal of the Corn Law and a system of leases? If you think so, I must say about you as I have said of my landlord, that I cannot see things as you see them.

WHISTLER: But I must take the liberty of saying, my dear Sir, that while you, like your landlord, did not read or listen to any arguments, save those on your own side of the question, up to the coming of the Corn Law crisis, you, unlike your landlord, have read nothing, or almost nothing, since, on the Free Trade side of the question. You told me that yesterday. You say that you have read the debates in Parliament during the present session, or so much of them as appears in the County Herald; and you complain that if the Free Traders have good arguments in favour of the farmers seeking Free Trade, they do not state them. But, Sir, the Free Traders in Parliament are done with the argumentative part of the subject; that is taken out of their hands. Their business is now to vote, to consummate by enactment, that which they have taught for years. When they were teaching, and you were not listening, that was not their fault. You should have listened to what concerned you so much. If you were to say to your clergyman, at the conclusion of the church service, “You must preach your sermon over again; I was not listening to you. I and my neighbours here were asleep; or we were playing and idling while you were praying and preaching; we must have it all over again, and the congregation must be halted here until we have it all over again,”—if you were to say that on Sunday, and every Sunday, to your parson, and go on sleeping at church, and idling, and never listening from week to week, from year to year, what would that large majority of the congregation say to you who had been listening?

FARMER: I hardly see how this applies. But admitting that it does apply, I want to know what we idle boys, the farmers, as I suppose you will call us, are to do now that we are woken up.

WHISTLER: I do not call you idle boys. You are a most hard-toiling and struggling class of men; but the best of your energies and the greatest of your struggles go for nothing. Some of them are mischievous. You must not only do new work, but you must undo some of the old. You are not “idle boys,” but you are sometimes “mischievous boys,” and you must undo some mischief by abstaining from a repetition of it. If you will let me, for a few minutes, compare you to schoolboys, I will tell you what some of you have done in Hertfordshire. A boy who was far in advance of any of you, who sought to teach you and make you equal to himself,—you, to please your master (you do not do so now when your master confesses that he was wrong and that boy was right) you, though knowing that your neighbour was a better farmer than any of you, getting the best of crops out of indifferent land, and profit from cultivation, when you were only getting loss, you counted that boy, fell on him, and abused him, and called him ill-names in the market-place. You must not do so again. Indeed you will not, for Lord Essex is now of opinion that this farmer was right, and he and you were wrong, and you only called that neighbour ill-names in the market-place, and abused him and hooted him, because you knew Lord Essex was pleased at your doing so and like some other “bad boys,” you had never been taught better. If I had nothing else to rejoice at in the conversion of your landlord to Free Trade principles than the fact that his tenants will have no interest, or supposed interest, in ill-using their Free Trade neighbours, I would rejoice; for that alone is a great gain in Hertfordshire.

FARMER: Who do you speak of as the boy so far in advance of us, and whom we ill-used; the tenant who wrote against Lord Essex about the game, and whom his lordship turned out of his farm?

WHISTLER: No: I mean Mr. Lattimore, of Wheatthamstead.

FARMER: Because I was going to say, that it was not his neighbours, the tenant farmers, that said anything against him who wrote against the game; quite the reverse. We were all too well pleased to say anything against him. And as for Mr. Lattimore, I do not think he was ever opposed by us but in a fair way. We did not agree with him, and opposed him, as we would have opposed you.

WHISTLER: But you would not listen, and hissed, and shouted him down at public meetings. You now listen to him; you now listen to me. Two years ago, though you are still of the same opinion as then about the Corn Law, so you say, you would not have permitted me to have stood here, not because this is your farm, but because the firm is Lord Essex's, to speak of Free Trade as I have been doing. The truth is, you dared not have done so. Now, my object with you farmers, is to get yourselves raised to independence as occupiers of the land; not that you may dare to differ in opinion with your landlord, but that you may be able to cultivate your land as it should be cultivated. I have spoken of leases; but a lease is not enough. It is absolutely requisite to secure you against the landlord, or his agents, or his successors, when he dies. But there are things which must be effected, through the united efforts of tenants and landlords, before agriculture can reach that healthy state predicted for it by the Free Traders years ago, and now predicted for it by Lord Essex. The rights of lords of manors over copyholders, must be qualified to allow copyholders to cut down hedgerow timber, divert springs, water-courses, or, in other words, to drain. The copyholders and their tenants being the parties interested in the improvement, and the lord of the manor, or other superior, as the case may be, having no direct interest in such improvements, the latter is a fatal obstacle in the way of progress.

FARMER: What do you think of the Duke of Richmond's Bill for charging the expense of permanent improvements, by drainage on the heirs-in-tail.

WHISTLER: The object is good; and the machinery, so far as it goes, is good. But it reaches only a very short way. And so does Sir Robert Peel's proposal to pass an act, if the new Corn Law scheme passes, to lend money from the treasury to assist in agricultural improvements. Sir Robert's intention to lend public money, as I view it, is not only useless, but bad. Where proper security is offered for money, it can be got now to improve the cultivation of land to any amount, from private individuals or from banks. If the security offered is not good, the money ought not to be lent, not alone because public money should be as carefully parted with as private money, but because, to lend money to landlords or tenant farmers who do not give such security as a private lender would accept, is to offer a bounty on the continuance of the present loose system of tenures. Private individuals lend money fast enough to landowners, when it is notoriously for their private expenditure, when it is not for the improvement of their property, but when there can be no doubt it will involve them in debt for life, and their property in bondage and bad cultivation for many years. Why then should there be any difficulty in obtaining money to improve the property? Let a tenant be properly protected from mortgages, from the landlord, and from the landlord's creditors, by a lease of twenty years duration at least. Let him be the borrower of the money, and his lease the security (I speak of estates where the landlords are already drowned in debt, and cannot borrow money). Let the tenants in this and all cases pay their rents according to the prices of farm produce. Let the lawyers have as little to do with the land as possible, but above all, let the tenant be efficiently protected from his landlord, and there is no fear but that the time will come, and come soon, of which Lord Essex speaks so hopefully when he says, he sees better times coming for landlords and tenants, and for all.

ONE WHO HAS WHISTLED AT THE PLOUGH.

Note.—A circular received from a member of the Burton-on-Trent Farmers' Club did not come to hand until too late by several weeks to give the opinion requested upon it for which that opinion was to be used. Yet I am obliged to the gentleman who sent me the circular; and as he suggested that some notice might be taken of it in this paper, I now do so. The foregoing dialogue with a tenant of the Earl of Essex, expresses part of my opinion on the proceedings of the Burton-on-Trent Farmers' Club, namely, that it is a waste of precious time to attempt any improvement in tenancies at-will. The resolutions were:

“That the Burton-on-Trent Farmers' Club is of opinion that a tenant of land from year to year ought to enjoy a legal claim to compensation for such improvements as he shall have made during his tenancy, and for which he shall not have received the whole benefit which he is fairly entitled to claim.”

“That the tenant has under a tenancy-at-will a fair claim to the enjoyment of his improvements for as long a period as a good farmer would require, if the length of his occupancy were made a matter of agreement beforehand.”

“That impartial arbitrators, chosen mutually by the landlord and tenant, would without difficulty form a correct estimate as to what belonged to the tenant on this principle of adjustment.”

“That it appears to the Club to be advisable for the general body of farmers to join in petitioning the Legislature to make a law which would give to the tenant a legal right to recover from the landlord such compensation for improvements made by him as impartial and competent arbitrators would decide to be his equitable right.”

In the first place, it is gratifying to see the farmers turning to the advocacy of that kind of protection to agriculture which alone can protect it—security of tenure—security to money, skill, and industry. But I can go no farther with these resolutions. So far from believing “that impartial arbitrators, chosen mutually by the landlord and tenant, would, without difficulty, form a correct estimate as to what belonged to the tenant on this principle of adjustment,” I believe that no arbitrators could do so; and moreover, that “impartial arbitrators” could not long exist under such a system. Even now the land-owners are the land-vultures of England. They are an encumbrance from their numbers, their expensiveness, their inefficiency, and frequently mischievousness, greater than anything which now impedes agricultural improvement. A sound system of leases needs no land-owners or arbitrators. Let the tenant go in free; enter on his lease with all his capital in hand, not by paying it over to a predecessor, or to the landlord, who had paid that predecessor and the arbitrators, and land-vultures. Let the tenant proceed to enhance the value of his land with this money, and let him hold the farm on such a lease as will secure him a return of the capital and interest. Let him be under restrictive clauses during the last two or three years of his lease not to exhaust the soil. If he does not renew his bargain, let him go out, leaving the farm free for another to enter upon it as he entered. He thus goes out with the repayment of his improvement in his pocket, if there was a repayment due to him. No arbitrator could settle the question so fairly, whether the land had been improved or not, and the least rapacious of the land vultures could not settle the case at so small a cost. The new tenant would again have his own money free in his own hands, and the old tenant would have his own money to go into a new farm free, to improve it as he improved the other.

THE FALKIRK ELECTION.

The polling commenced at eight o'clock on Friday. In the early part of the day Mr. Wilson had a decided majority; but as the returns came in later in the day, his friends became less confident of success, though up to the last moment they were not prepared for the defeat of the candidate. At Falkirk, on Saturday last, the sheriff officially announced the poll as follows:

	Lincoln.	Wilson.
Falkirk	106	184
Lanlithgow ..	27	55
Hamilton	165	44
Airdrie	112	143
Lanark	96	69
	506	495

Majority for Lord Lincoln, 11.

It will be seen that Lord Lincoln's majority has been chiefly obtained in the burgh of Hamilton, where his father-in-law, the Duke of Hamilton, possesses very considerable influence. After the official declaration of the poll, Lord Lincoln returned thanks to the electors; and Mr. Wilson then addressed the constituency in a speech in which he alluded to the fact that, of 100 electors of Hamilton who had signed the requisition to him, only 42 had redeemed their promises of support; and expressed his intention of coming forward at the next election. It is stated by the Glasgow Citizen that Lord Lincoln declared to his committee that had he been again defeated in his attempt to obtain a seat in the House of Commons, he should have felt called upon immediately to resign his office of Chief Secretary for Ireland.

COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES.—CAUSES OF THE RECENT DEPRESSION.—Many persons, and amongst them some who are generally well informed, are of opinion that the recent severe depression in the staple manufactures of the country has been caused principally by a falling-off in the demand for foreign markets; and we must confess, that, although not supposing this to be the chief cause of the evil, we had an impression that the striking difference between the state of the cotton manufacture in the first three months of 1845 and 1846, was, in some degree, caused by a falling-off in the exports of yarn and manufactured goods. We find, however, from the monthly circular of Messrs. Dufay and Co. of this town, just issued, that this impression was erroneous, and that, in all important articles of manufacture, with the exception of printed and dyed calicoes, the exports for the first three months of 1846, exhibit an excess over those in the corresponding period of 1845. The following are the comparative quantities of the most important articles in each period:

	1845.	1846.
Cotton yarn, 24	21,495,811	23,750,343
Plain calicoes, yds	137,919,924	143,415,089
Calicoes printed and dyed, yds ..	82,358,102	75,567,334
Cambries and muslins, yds	695,791	1,173,462
Cords and fustians, yds	370,619	542,418
Linen and cotton cloths, yds	291,935	428,273
Linen, yds	17,568,839	18,687,580
Woolleus, yds	248,703	248,555
Worsted, yds	248,555	923,119
Worsted yarn, lb	1,007,794	862,501

These facts, proving as they do, that the recent depression has been caused almost entirely by a falling-off in the home demand, exhibit in a very striking manner the injurious effects resulting from the protracted discussion in the House of Commons, and from the derangement produced by excessive railway speculations; but, at the same time, they furnish strong grounds for expecting a gradual improvement in business. During the last six months, the condition of the working-classes of this country has been, on the whole, comparatively good; and, although the purchases of dealers have been on a much smaller scale, it is by no means probable that consumption has diminished. On the contrary, judging from the deliveries of sugar, coffee, tea, &c., we believe it has been decidedly on the increase; and, therefore, the stocks of intermediate dealers must have been considerably diminished. Indeed, we believe, that they were scarcely ever known to be so low as at the present time. The dealers must, however, eventually come into the market, and take supplies, not only for present wants, but also to provide those stocks, without which, under ordinary circumstances, they cannot advantageously carry on their business.—Manchester Guardian.

THE SEASON AND THE CROPS.—Since our last we have had true April weather, with an occasional dash of March or February. The temperature has generally been low, out of the sun, and the rains have been both frequent and heavy. On Saturday afternoon, there was a violent storm of thunder and lightning between Liverpool and Manchester, and great quantities of hail have since fallen. Although the country has much improved to the eye, during the last fortnight, yet the continuance of wet weather is very unfavourable to the ground. In many places the oats are not yet sown, although it is at least a month after the usual time, and we have not seen a single place in which potatoes are planted in the open fields. At present, appearances are much against the productiveness of those two crops, but a few days of fine weather would still make a prodigious difference. With regard to the greatest crop of all, that of wheat, we should say that its appearance is very good in this part of the country. The grass crops, as we have already stated more than once, are unusually fine, and live stock of all kinds is in better condition than it has been in the spring months for some years. In the rural districts, nearly all the feathered visitants of spring have made their appearance. A few swallows, not enough to make a summer, may have been seen skimming over our different streams during the last week, and the cuckoo is heard, between the showers, in all the well-wooded parts of the country. Great numbers of young birds are already hatched in the copses, and a few days of warm weather would bring the hedges into blossom. The only spring visitor which has not yet arrived in this part of the country is the corn crane. The blossoms of the fruit trees have been less injured in this neighbourhood, by the early frosts, than was at first supposed, but the nights continue very sharp, so that they are not yet out of danger.—Liverpool Times.

AGRICULTURE.

FARMERS, IS THIS YOUR LEADER?

"We want a 'leader,' an uncommon want.
When every day and year brings forth a new one,
Till having filled all the gazettes with 'rant,'
The 'clique' discover he is not the true one."

We feel for Stafford O'Brien; and we doubt not his constituents deeply sympathise with him. In truth, the painfulness of his position is enough to melt the heart of a bullock, to say nothing of a Northamptonshire grazier.

The political monopolists, at the commencement of the present session, were in great straits for want of an effective leader. The act of defending monopoly had convinced every public man of note in the protectionist party that monopoly was indefensible. It had been thoroughly exposed in all its naked deformity throughout the length and breadth of the land. One could not get into a railway-carriage or an omnibus without hearing disquisitions on the laws governing the exchange of commodities, which, ten years ago, would have done no discredit to professors of political economy. Monopoly, which is vice in one of its most noxious forms, had been seen by the British public, and of necessity it had become thoroughly detested. Then there was the failure of the potato crop, a failure which the monopolists, notwithstanding their asseverations that there was none, well knew to be real.

But the dominant landocracy of the realm had no disposition to abandon their monopoly, because it had been demonstrated to be mischievous to the public, injurious to the operative, and, above all, ruinous to the farmer. They knew, or at all events had a suspicion, of all that before. Monopoly is not loved by the monopolist aristocracy, on account of the things about which they have talked, but for its effects, of which they say nothing—in public. It was not merely for the sake of high rents that they hugged the Corn Law with such desperate energy, as to peril their social position and constitutional power in its defence; for rents may be, and where the farmer can make a fair bargain, will be, as high, or higher, under Free Trade than under monopoly. But they wanted the high rents of the present times and the feudal power of bygone ages. They wished to receive the high rents from a dependent, servile, cap-in-hand tenantry, who would march to the poll at the command of the landlord's steward, and farm according to the capricious will of the landlord's game-keeper.

Our agricultural readers will well understand for what it was the monopolist landlords wanted to preserve monopoly, though perhaps the inhabitants of towns will scarcely comprehend its full extent. Landlordism should be seen on its own ground to be understood. They who have not seen landlordism at petty sessions, in the poachers' wing of the county gaol, in its dealings with the tenantry and so forth, know nothing about it. Nevertheless, these things are grievous, cruel realities; and such things were to be maintained. Hence, though the brains of the monopolist party had been knocked out, monopoly did not die. Then came the question of leadership. D'Israeli might be retained as a sharp-shooter, and would appear to the greater advantage from being the only man amongst the party who can pretend to sharpness. But D'Israeli, the ex-"sedition" loving candidate for Marylebone, who may be taken as an exemplar of lack-land political adventurers, would not do to lead the squirearchy. They wanted some one of more weight. The dull Bramston had tried his hand at "lard and grease," and made a sad mess of it. The duller Miles had not been very successful in his opposition to the "invasion" of foreign cattle; while Bankes, the dullest, had been saved from conspicuous failure by his very dullness. Nobody could ever see that he had any object or purpose, and his speeches were commonly supposed to relate to the objects he had in view. He is one of those who make a dark subject darker by talking about it.

At this period of monopolist despair, the commencement of the present session, Mr. Stafford O'Brien chivalrously undertook the post of monopolist leader in the House of Commons, and by his first speech in that character proved himself to be a person of some dexterity and adroitness. But his very talent proved his ruin as a monopolist leader. He had been through the last three or four years of the Corn Law discussion, and he attempted to make a plausible defence for monopoly, after all, and with the knowledge of all, that has been proved and admitted against it. Moreover, his own speech proved that he was undergoing that process of conversion to Free Trade which every man of average intellect, and ordinary political honesty, who has seriously attempted to defend monopoly, has invariably undergone.

The very measure of his success in that speech, proved him to be no genuine monopolist. This would not do for his party. He was too clever, too plausible, too solicitous of finding reasons—albeit not very good ones—for monopoly. Monopolists don't want reasons. They therefore be-thought themselves of starting some man as their leader, who would not attempt to reason, who knew nothing of the subject; to whom all that had been said or written for the last seven years, for and against monopoly, was as if it had not been said or written. They wanted the freshness of profound ignorance.

Moreover, they wanted some one with recklessness enough to say all the exploded sayings; some one with all the prejudices, without the responsibility of landowning. Bramston, Miles, Bankes, O'Brien, were men of large possessions; they had a certain status in society; if they had the power, they had not the will to fling themselves into the breach made in the fortress of landlordism with the daring of one who would stake all upon a desperate chance. Seeing, then, the qualities—positive and negative—wanted in their leader by the monopolists, they could not look in a more likely place than the racing stable. There they sought and there they found what they wanted. Lord George Bentinck now leads the monopolist host, much to the satisfaction of the genuine monopolists.

But, farmers, is he your leader? Does he represent your opinions? Are you content to be represented in Parliament by the unflinching and unscrupulous defender of the Game Laws? Ask any of the farmer-witnesses examined before the Game Law Committee what they think of Lord George Bentinck? whether they like the courtesy, the fairness, or the accuracy of this new "farmers' friend?"

Let farmers, too, read his speeches—if they can, for truly 'tis a heavy task—"your true no meaning puzzles more than sense"—and see whether the description Sir Robert Peel gave of the speech of the new and fast leader of the monopolists on Irish scarcity, when he said "the multiplication of letters from parts of the country where disease does not prevail, forms no contradiction to the fact that there does exist in other parts of that country disease arising from scarcity of food."

But this has always been the game of the monopolists; they are ever looking beside the mark; and being unable to avow their real objects in maintaining monopoly, talk wildly about something else. Farmers are now becoming aware of this, and the new leader, from Newmarket, of the monopolists, will help to make it still clearer.

A GLANCE AT THE WHEAT CROP.

Whilst the monopolists in Parliament are doing all they can to prevent the abrogation of their special law to create scarcity, the wheat crops of this country are offering evidence of the precarious nature of the supply of food afforded by our own soil. Our own observation has satisfied us that upon a very great breadth of strong and cold land the wheat crops have sustained considerable injury. We do not say they may not be restored by dry and warm weather, but we are by no means confident that they will. Insects of all kinds injurious to wheat are unusually abundant from the nearly entire absence of frost during the past winter, and in many places are committing serious ravages; and the succulent state of the plant has rendered it very susceptible of injury from the sharp frosty nights which have lately occurred. We extract a few passages from local reports on the subject. The reader, however, will remember that the greatest damage was done last week, and was probably subsequent to the reports we refer to. From the Cambridge report we learn:

"That the wheat, without exception, is a good plant, and is very early; some of it is losing colour and becoming yellow, partly through the wet and cold weather, and partly through continuing so full a plant throughout the winter; a few warm sunny days would, we hope, soon restore its good looks. It usually loses colour in May; and according to the season, it is the middle of May; or even the latter end in comparison with last year, as the crop is certainly about a month earlier now than it was at this time last year."

So, in Yorkshire, we find the agricultural reporter of the Mark Lane Express saying:

"Of the appearance of the wheat plant, we know how illusive all remarks on this ticklish subject at this season of the year often are—how appearances for good or for evil are disappointed or thwarted by a few gaudy days, or vice versa. However, this we will certainly say, that though the breadth of wheat sown is somewhat large, we never remember a greater deficiency of plant for many years past, and we have heard elder and sound-judging farmers say their wheat never looked so ill. And, unhappily, this is not because of any temporary check to a winter-proud crop, which a few warm showers will restore; it is a thinness and baldness of plant spring up; thousands of acres have been ruined with the slug, which not being checked by the frosts of winter, and being, owing to the wet summer of last year, very numerous to commence with, have made sad destruction; this, with the hundreds of acres lost by the floods, reduces the breadth to an average; and should an unfavourable season follow, we may need as much more as the million and a quarter of quarters of wheat now in bond. Our millers have no stocks, our farmers' stocks are not more numerous than usual, and our markets are assuming a firm and lively tone."

Again in Leicestershire:

"The late heavy rains and cold temperature have had a great effect upon the wheats in dry land, and the blade has assumed a yellow tinge which is exceedingly unpleasant to the eye, but perhaps not of that ultimate consequence to the crop as many expect. In some cases, from various causes, the plant is very thin, and presents a weakly appearance; but we are glad to state that these are by no means numerous. The late rains have been a great hindrance to cleaning the crops from weeds, as on all strong land the operation of hoeing has been suspended, consequently much wheat is in a very foul state; but should we now be favoured with dry sunny weather, this work must be carried on with perseverance, and both the horse and hand hoe must be constantly in action. Upon the whole, as to the wheat crop in this county, we may conclude that it presents an average appearance, with promise of a fair yield; but, of course, at present, all is surmise as to the result."

So another report says:

"The wheat in the northern part of the county are suffering from the effect of the late rains. They have a most sickly appearance. The white snail is making sad havoc in the bean fields, whole acres having been entirely destroyed."—Payne's Leicester Advertiser.

Again, also:

"The state of the spring wheat begins to excite some alarm; the long continued cold and bleak weather, with rain and easterly winds, have not only checked vegetation in general, but caused a great breadth of wheat in the midland districts to turn yellow and set. We hope a change for the better is at hand."—Birmingham Pilot.

Such is the character of the reports of the wheat crops at the present moment. We freely admit, that on our own farm, we look at the state of the wheat plant with great apprehension, and we know that feeling is shared by our neighbours, with respect to their own wheat.

